SECT. II.

The hiſtory of Ætolia.

THE republic of Ætolia (G) was, in the times we are now writing of, next in power to that of Achaia, and formed much upon the ſame plan, being governed by a general aſſembly, a prætor, and other magiſtrates of an inferior rank and authority. The general aſſembly, called by the antients Panætolium, met uſually once a year, and that in autumn; but the prætor was empowered to ſummon it out of the ſtated time upon any extraordinary occaſion, the whole

The Ætolian confederacy.

(G) Under the name of Ætolia was formerly comprehended that country, which is now called the Deſpotat, or little Greece: It was parted on the eaſt by the river Evenus, now the Fidari, from the Locrenſes Ozolæ; on the weſt from Acarnania by the Achelous; on the north it bordered upon the country of the Dorians and part of Epirus, and on the ſouth extended to the bay of Corinth. See the account we have given of the country and its inhabitants, vol. vi. ch. 17. ſect. 8. par. 13. & ſeq.

whole power of enacting laws, declaring war, making peace, and concluding alliances, being lodged in that court. Beſides the Panætolium or great council of the nation, which conſiſted of members choſen by each city of the Ætolian alliance, there was another called the council of the Apocleti; this was compoſed of the moſt eminent men in the nation, their office anſwering that of the demiurgi among the Achæans, which we have ſpoke of above: but as to their number we are quite in the dark. Their chief magiſtrates, after the prætor, were the general of the horſe, the public ſecretary, and the Ephori. The two firſt were held in great eſteem; for in the laſt alliance they concluded with the Romans, they allowed them to chuſe forty hoſtages out of the whole nation, without excepting any but the general of the horſe and the ſecretary, as if the republic could not ſubſiſt without them. The Ephori were introduced in imitation of the Lacedæmonians, with whom they were many ages ſtraitly united, as Thucydides, Xenophon, and Polybius inform us; but as to their number the ancients are quite ſilent; their office was much the ſame as that of the Spartan ephori, but they acted in ſubordination both to the general diet and the prætor. The Ætolian confederacy was formed ſome time after that of the Achæans, whoſe example they followed, uniting ſeveral cities, which were before independent of each other, into one republic, and thereby inabling themſelves to withſtand the attempts of the Macedonian princes, who aſpired to the ſovereignty of all Greece[r].

The Ætolians were a reſtleſs and turbulent people; ſeldom at peace among themſelves, and ever at war with their neighbours; utter ſtrangers to all ſenſe of friendſhip or principles of honour; ready to betray their friends upon the leaſt proſpect of reaping any advantage from their treachery; in ſhort, they were looked upon by the other ſtates of Greece no otherwiſe, as our author informs us[s], than as out-laws and public robbers. On the other hand, they were bold and enterprizing in war; inur'd to labour and hardſhips; undaunted in the greateſt dangers, jealous defenders of their liberties, for which they were on all occaſions willing to venture their lives and ſacrifice all that was moſt dear to them. They diſtinguiſhed themſelves above all the other nations of Greece in oppoſing the ambitious deſigns deſigns of the Macedonian princes, who, after having reduced moſt of the other ſtates, were forced to grant them a peace upon very honourable terms. But the gallant behaviour of this warlike people, in defending the common liberties of Greece againſt thoſe powerful invaders, we ſhall have occaſion to relate in the hiſtory of Alexander and his ſucceſſors, as in a more proper place; our preſent province being confined to thoſe occurrences only that happened after they had formed themſelves into a republic. The conſtitution of the Ætolian republic was, as we have hinted above, copied from that of the Achæans, and with a view to form, as it were, a counter-alliance. For the Ætolians bore an irreconcilable hatred to the Achæans, and had conceived no ſmall jealouſy at the growing power of that ſtate. The Cleomenic war and that of the allies, called the ſocial war, which we have deſcribed in the hiſtory of Achaia, were kindled by the Ætolians in the heart of Peloponneſus, with no other view, but to humble their antagoniſts the Achæans. In the latter they held out, with the aſſiſtance only of the Eleans and Lacedæmonians, for the ſpace of three years, againſt the united forces of Achaia and Macedon; but were obliged at laſt to purchaſe a peace, by yielding up to Philip all Acarnania. As they parted with this province ſore againſt their will, they watched all opportunities of wreſting it again out of the Macedonians hands; and one very favourable for their deſign ſoon offered.

M. Valerius Lævinus had been appointed by the Roman ſenate to guard the coaſts of Italy on the ſide of Greece, and to watch the motions of Philip, who, after concluding an alliance with Hannibal, was preparing to paſs over into Italy. The Roman had under his command a fleet of fifty ſhips of war, and a legion for land ſervice. But as he was no-way in a condition with ſo ſmall a force to oppoſe the deſigns of Philip, he caſt his eyes on the Ætolians, who were highly diſſatisfied with the peace they had lately concluded with the Macedonians and their allies. This general diſcontent Lævinus reſolved to improve to the advantage of his republic; and by ſtirring up the Ætolians againſt Philip to divert him from any attempts upon Italy. As he was therefore then cruiſing with his ſquadron on the coaſts of Greece, he invited ſome of the Ætolians on board, and, entering into private conference with them, found, that it would be no difficult matter to engage the whole nation in the intereſts of Rome. To this end he went to their general assembly, where he gave them an account of the victories Rome had lately gained over Hannibal, and the conquests of Marcellus in Sicily; he extolled the great generosity and constant fidelity of the Romans towards their allies; adding, that the Ætolians might expect to be ever lookt upon with an eye of distinction by Rome, if they were the first nation beyond the seas that joined her; that Philip was a dangerous neighbour, and his over-grown power would prove fatal to them, unless they were supported by some more potent state; that the Romans in conjunction with the Ætolians would easily oblige him to quit Acarnania, which he had usurped, and keep himself upon the defensive in his own dominions. He concluded his speech by assuring them, that if they entered into engagements with Rome, Philip should never obtain a peace, without restoring Acarnania to its former owners [t].

Scopas, at that time prætor of the Ætolians, and Dorimachus, a man of great authority, strongly enforced the arguments and promises made by Lævinus, expatiating in commendation of the Romans, with all the eloquence which they were masters of; for Lævinus out of modesty had said but little in commendation of his republic. These two chiefs were not only for entering into an alliance with the Romans, but for sending deputies to the neighbouring states, inviting them to accede to the same alliance. Accordingly they sent embassadors to Elis (H), Lacedæmon, and Attalus king of Pergamus (I); to Pleuratus

(H) See an account of this country, vol. vi. ch. 17. sect. 8. The greatest part of this province bears now the name of Belvedere, as does Elis its capital. This country was antiently dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, whence to commit there any acts of hostility was deemed a great profanation.

(I) Attalus mentioned here is Attalus the first, who succeeded his father, Eumenes the first brother to Philetærus. Philetærus was treasurer to Lysimachus king of Thrace; but afterwards acquired the dominion of Pergamus, which he erected into a little state, as we shall see in the history of Pergamus.

ratus (K), and Scerdelaidas king of the beſt part of Illyricum. In the ſenate of Lacedæmon two orators, Chlæneas and Lyciſcus, made long harangues, the firſt in favour of the Ætolians and Romans, the other in favour of king Philip [u]; but the Ætolians carried their point, and Lacedæmon with Elis declared for Rome; the kings Pleuratus and Scerdelaidas followed the examples of Lacedæmon; ſo that the treaty was drawn up in theſe words: "If the inhabi- The Ætolians conclude an alliance with the Romans.

" and Scerdelaidas think fit to enter into an alliance with " the Romans, let them immediately arm and make war
" upon Philip. The Romans ſhall furniſh the confederates " with twenty ſhips at leaſt: all the conqueſts that ſhall be " made between the confines of Ætolia and the ſea of " Corcyra ſhall belong to the confederates, and the cap-

" nania. The Ætolians ſhall not conclude a peace with
" Philip, but upon condition that he withdraw his troops " from the territories of Rome and her allies, nor the
" Romans with Philip, but upon the ſame terms [w].

THESE articles were not ſigned till two years after, when they had been confirmed by the Ætolians at Olympia, and the ſenate at Rome. This delay was occaſioned by the dilatorineſs of the Romans in ſending embaſſadors into Ætolia. When they were ratified and confirmed by both nations, the ſenate ordered them to be placed in the capitol, as a laſting monument of their firſt alliance with the Greek nation. However, hoſtilities began aſſoon as the treaty was concluded: Lævinus ſeized on the iſland and city of Zacynthus (L), took Æniadæ and alſo Naſus (M), two

(M), two cities of Acarnania, and reſtored them to the Ætolians. After this he returned with his fleet to Corcyra, where he wintered, fully perſuaded, that the king would now give over all thoughts of invading Italy.

The king was at Pella, making preparations for his expedition into Italy, when news was brought him of the new treaty concluded by the Ætolians. Whereupon he altered his meaſures, and reſolved to fall upon his new enemies the next ſummer. Accordingly he took the field early in the ſpring, laid waſte the Ætolian territories, and then marched back his forces into Macedon, in order to oppoſe the Mædi (N), who were ready to fall upon his dominions. During his abſence, Scopas, then prætor and general of the Ætolians, entered Acarnania, in hopes of reducing that country before Philip could return to their aſſiſtance. This conqueſt had been begun the laſt campaign by Lævinus, who had taken Æniadæ and Naſus, and was now near enough to aſſiſt the Ætolians with his fleet and legion. The Acarnanians were ſenſible, that they could not oppoſe two ſuch powerful nations at the ſame time; but nevertheleſs reſolved to ſtand to their defence, and ſell their lives at the deareſt rate. Accordingly having ſent into Epirus all their women, children, and ſuch as were not able to bear arms, thoſe who remained from the age of fifteen to threeſcore bound themſelves by oath, not to return home till they had utterly deſtroyed the Ætolians: they only deſired the Epirots to place the aſhes of thoſe, who ſhall fall in battle, in one tomb with the following epitaph; Here lie the Acarnanians, who died fighting for their country, in oppoſition to the violence and injuſtice of the Ætolians. This found it with another iſland bearing the ſame name in the Archipelago or Ægean ſea (15.)

(M) Naſſus or Naſus was a city of Acarnania not far from the mouth of the Achelous. There were two cities that bore the name of Æniadæ; one in Acarnania on the Ionian ſea near the mouth of the Achelous: This city according to our modern travellers is now called Dragomeſto; the other was according to Stephanus, in Thrace, not far from mount Oeta.

(N) The Medi poſſeſſed a part of Thrace beyond mount Rhodope, and therefore Ptolemy calls their country Medica, but others give it the name of Macedonian Greece, becauſe it bordered on Macedon on the ſide of the Ægean ſea.

(15) Pauſan. in Arcad. Strabo l. 10.

This reſolution ſo terrified the Ætolians, that they returned home without offering to enter the borders of Acarnania, or to do any thing that might provoke a people reſolved to conquer or die [y].

The Ætolians, not daring to invade Acarnania, turned their arms againſt Anticyra (O), a city of the Locri, and in the neighbourhood of Ætolia. This place they inveſted by land, and Lævinus at the ſame time by ſea; as it was battered night and day on all ſides it was ſoon obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. Lævinus, purſuant to the treaty, delivered up the city to the Ætolians, reſerving for his own troops the captives and the plunder. The Ætolians fluſhed with this ſucceſs, leaving Lævinus at Anticyra, entered Achaia, and there committed ſuch ravages as obliged Philip to leave Demetrias (P), where he was encamped, and draw near to Greece. On his march he met the Ætolian army commanded by Pyrrhias prætor for that year (Q), who had advanced as far as Theſſaly to give the Macedonians battle. The two armies met near Lamia, a city of Phthiotis in the Ætolian intereſt. Pyrrhias had been reinforced with a ſtrong detachment of king Attalus's troops, and a thouſand legionaries ſent by him by P. Sulpicius, who had ſucceeded Lævinus

(O) Anticyra ſtood near the river Sperchius over-againſt mount Oeta. Its territory bordered on Theſſaly, and near it was an iſland of the ſame name, abounding, as Pliny informs us (16), with hellebore. Ptolemy and Strabo mention another city bearing the ſame name in Phocis, near Criſſa on the confines of Bœotia (17).

(P) The city of Demetrias, now Dimitriada, was built by Demetrius Poliorcetes on the ſea coaſt of Theſſaly near the territory of the Magneſians. Pliny confounds this city with that of Pagaſæ; but Strabo and Ptolemy make them two different cities, and place them both at the entrance of the Pegaſæus ſinus now the gulf of Armiro. Demetrias was for ſome time the ſeat of the kings of Macedon (18).

(Q) The prætorſhip of the Ætolians was, according to Livy (12), divided between Pyrrhias and king Attalus; the general aſſembly of the Ætolians having beſtowed that honour upon the king of Pergamus, though then abſent.

Lævinus as pro-prætor of Greece. Notwithstanding this re-inforcement the Ætolians were twice defeated, and forced to save themselves under the walls of Lamia. After this victory Philip encamped in the neighbourhood of Phalara near the mouth of the Sperchius, with a design to surprize a strong detachment of Ætolian cavalry, which was to return from Thessaly and pass that way. But while he was encamped here, embassadors arrived from Ptolemy Philopater king of Egypt, attended with a great number of deputies from the islands of Chios and Rhodes and the city of Athens. Their errand was to prevail on Philip and the Ætolians to put an end to the war. This was not so much out of good will to the latter, as jealousy of the former, who by reducing the Ætolians might easily enslave all Greece, and have a ready access to the cities which Ptolemy possessed out of Egypt. Philip put off the conferences till the next diet of the Achæans, and in the mean time granted the Ætolians a truce of thirty days. In this interval Philip was invited by the Greeks to preside at the Heræan (R) and Nemæan games. This was a distinction, which

(R) The Heræan games, or Heræan festivals, were celebrated by the Argians, with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. They were called Heræan from the Greek word Ἥρη signifying Juno, whom the inhabitants of Argolis worshipped as their tutelary goddess, and in whose honour this festival was first instituted. The ceremony consisted in a pompous procession made by the Argian youth under arms. The statue of Juno, which was of ivory and gold, and thought one of the best performances of the famous Polycletus, was carried in a chariot drawn by two white oxen. In the driver's seat was placed the image of one Trochilus the son of Callithea, who was the first priestess of Juno Argiva. This ministry, which was granted to none but women of great distinction, was held in such esteem among the Argians, that they dated their public acts by the priesthood of the priestesses of Juno, as we do by the reigns of our kings. The Argian youth marched in good order from the city of Argos to the temple of Juno, which stood at a small distance, and was one of the most stately edifices of Greece. Upon their arrival at the temple an hundred oxen were sacrificed, and their flesh distributed among all that were present. When the religious ceremonies were over the sports began, and the youth entered the lists, disputing the honour of carrying off a buckler which was fixed to the wall of the city. The conqueror was rewarded with a crown of myrtle, and walked thro' the city for several days successively, amidst the acclamations of

of his fellow citizens, making a ſhew of the buckler he had gained. Some aſcribe the inſtitution of theſe games to Archinus tyrant of Argos, and others to Lyncæus, who is ſaid to have reigned in Argolis, in the year of the world 2558. The Heræan games were common to ſome other nations of Greece, and alſo to the iſlanders, namely to the inhabitants of Samos, Ægina, and Cos. At Corinth this ceremony had the air of a mournful one; it being a received tradition among them, that Medea after having killed her children inſtituted the Heræan games by way of attonement for her crime. The Corinthians therefore renewed the memory of her cruelty by ſacrificing a goat to Juno (20).

As to the Nemæan games, moſt of the antients agree, that they were inſtituted in honour of Archemorus, the ſon of Lycus, according to ſome, or of Lycurgus king of Thrace, as others will have it. We are told, that an army of Argians, commanded by Adraſtus king of Argos, being in great diſtreſs for want of water as they were marching towards Thebes to aſſiſt Polynices, addreſſed the nurſe of the young prince Archemorus, whom they accidentally met, and that ſhe laying down the child ſhe had in her arms, on a branch of ſmallage, out of compaſſion led the thirſty ſoldiers to a fountain. But, in the mean time, a ſerpent attacked and put to death the child, before Adraſtus and his Argians could bring them any relief. However, to allay the grief of Lycurgus for the death of his ſon, they inſtituted ſolemn games in honour of the deceaſed, which were celebrated near Nemæa, a city of Argolis. Some ſay they were renewed annually, others every five years, and others every tenth year. Many are of opinion, that they were inſtituted before the Theban war; but all agree, that they were revived by Hercules, and conſecrated to Jupiter in thankſgiving for his victory over the Nemæan lion (21). Euſebius is of opinion, that they were inſtituted in the fifty-firſt olympiad (22). This feſtival was celebrated with ſports, namely, chariot-races, foot and horſe-races, tournaments, boxing, wreſtling, &c. The conqueror in any of theſe exerciſes were rewarded with a crown of olives, and alſo of ſmallage, which was made uſe of in funeral ceremonies, and renewed the memory of the death of Archemorus. Clemens Alexandrinus informs us, that on this occaſion an orator uſed to pronounce a funeral native of Greece. In this ſtation the king behaved like a voluptuous prince, and purſued debauchery to exceſs. But at laſt the diet was held, which drew him from his pleaſures to Rhium, the place appointed for the aſſembly. The negotiations began, and moſt of the nations engaged in the war inclined to a reconciliation, fearing Attalus and the Romans would take advantage of their diviſions and get footing in Greece. At the opening of the aſſembly, one of the orators exhorted the contending parties to mutual concord, in a ſpeech, which is preſerved to this day, and may be looked upon as a maſter-piece of the kind [z]. The diſcourſe moved the whole aſſembly, and it was no ſooner ended but Philip's embaſſadors were introduced, who declared, that their maſter was ready to give peace to Greece, if the Ætolians would conſent to it, and charged them with all the evils that would inevitably attend the proſecution of the war. The Ætolians, however, came to no reſolution; and in the mean time news was brought them, that Attalus was arrived with his fleet at the iſland of Ægina (S), and Sulpicius with his at Naupactus (T), which made funeral oration in honour of the young prince, and that the judges, appointed by the cities of Greece to deſtribute the rewards, were clad in mourning. Theſe games were common to the Argians, Corinthians, and the inhabitants of Cleonæ, who had a right to chuſe the preſident by turns (23).

(S) Ægina, now Engia and Legina, or Lalona, is an iſland in the Ægean ſea, between the territory of Athens and that of Epidaurus, in the Saronic gulf, to which it gives its name. It is about thirty-ſix miles in circumference; and was antiently famous for the ſkill of its inhabitants in ſea-affairs, and its athletæ or wreſtlers. Stephanus takes it for one of the Cyclades, and Tzetzes for one of the Sporades; but they are both miſtaken, as is plain from Strabo and Pauſanias (24).

(T) Naupactus or Naupactum was formerly a conſiderable city in Ætolia. The preſent inhabitants call it Epactos or Nepactos, the Turks Einebacti, and the Italians Lepanto. It ſtood near Antirrhium, within the Criſſæan bay, and was called Naupactum, becauſe made the Ætolians put an end to the conferences. For they declared, that they would consent to no peace, unless Pylos (U) was restored to the Messenians, Atintania (W) to the Romans, and the country of the Ardians (X) to Pleuratus and Scerdelaidas. This was giving law to all Greece, which so incensed Philip that he left the assembly, after having made a short speech, wherein he acquainted them, that he was sincerely desirous of peace, and would hearken to any reasonable proposals, but could not by any means brook such insults, meaning the terms proposed by the Ætolians, from those he had conquered [a].

because the Heraclidæ built there the first ship that carried them into Peloponnesus. It first belonged to the Locri Ozolæ; but they were driven out by the Athenians, who gave it to the Messenians, whom the Lacedæmonians had obliged to abandon Peloponesus. After the battle of Ægos Potamus the Lacedæmonians took it from the Messenians, and reunited it to the Locri. Afterwards Philip, the father of Alexander, having seized it, bestowed it upon the Ætolians, and from that time it was always deemed a city of Ætolia (25).

(U) We find three cities mentioned by the antients bearing the name of Pylos. The first stood on the western coast of Messenia over-against Sphagia or Sphacteria, now Sapienza, a small island in the Ionian Sea. The second was situate more to the north in Tryphilia, a province of Elis. The third stood more to the northward of the other two, not far from the mouth of the river Peneus. These three cities laid claim to the honour of having been governed by the famous Nestor the son of Neleus. It is very plain, that the city of Pylos in Messenia was the subject of dispute between Philip and the Ætolians; for the Messenians could have no pretensions to the two latter cities, which belonged to the Eleans, in whose territory the stood (26).

(W) The Atintanes, according to Thucydides, (27), inhabited part of the country of the Molossi; but Livy and Polybius place them on the confines of Macedon towards Illyricum.

(X) The Aryænans or Ardians inhabited the eastern part of Illyricum; they had been conquered by Philip, who united their country to Macedon.

The assembly being dismissed, the king went to Argos to preside in the Nemæan games, as he had lately done in the Heræan. But while he was giving himself up, without restraint, to the enjoyment of such diversions as were no-ways seasonable in times of war and alarms, the pro-consul Sulpicius setting out from Naupactus landed between Sicyon and Corinth, and being joined by the Ætolians laid waste all that fertile country. This unexpected invasion obliged the king to interrupt his diversions and take the field. His arrival struck the enemy with such terror, that, leaving the booty behind, they hastened to their ships, and re-embarked for Naupactus. Philip returned to the games, where he was received with an universal applause, the circus, the theatre, and all the streets of the city ringing with his name. But he gained more on the affections of the Greeks, who were zealous republicans, by his affable behaviour, and the popular airs he affected, than by his victories. He appeared at the shews without his diadem, purple robe, or any other ensigns of royal dignity; a sight very pleasing to the inhabitants of free cities [b].

Some days after the games, news was brought him that the city of Dyme on the confines of Elis had declared for the Ætolians, though it stood in Peloponnesus, and had received an Ætolian garison. Hereupon Philip crossing the Lariſſus (Y) entered the territorry of Elis, and ravaged the country, and encamped under the very walls of the capital. But he was soon obliged by the Romans and Ætolians to retire at a greater distance, as we have related in the history of Achaia. However, he took by storm, in sight of the Romans and Ætolians, a strong hold of great importance, where he found a very considerable booty. While he was dividing the prey among his soldiers, advice was brought him, that the Dardanians had entered Macedon, and possessed themselves of a small district called Oreſtida (Z); that the Dassaratæ had revolted, and that se-

[b] Polyb. & Liv. ibid.

(Y) The Lariſſus, now the Riso, divided Elis from Achaia propria; it watered the territory of Dyme, and fell into the Ionian sea.

(Z) Oreſtida was a country in the south-west part of Macedon. Oreſtes having fled into this country after the murder of his mother veral cities were ready to join the rebels. The Barbarians had been encouraged to ſhake off the yoke, and invade the kingdom of Macedon, by a falſe report of the king's death. Philip, in purſuing the Roman and Ætolian foragers between Corinth and Sicyon, had ſtruck his head againſt a tree with ſuch violence, that he broke his helmet in pieces. Theſe pieces were gathered up by an Ætolian, and brought to Scerdelaidas, who knew that they belonged to the king's helmet: and hence aroſe the report, that Philip had been killed in a battle in which he had gained the advantage. His preſence therefore being neceſſary in his own dominions, he haſtened home, leaving only a body of three thouſand men to protect his friends in Greece [c].

During his abſence, the Romans, Ætolians, and king Attalus poſſeſſed themſelves of Oreum, Opus, Torone, Tribonos, and Drymus. Whereupon embaſſadors being diſpatched to him from all the nations that were in his alliance, he ſettled the affairs of Macedon in the beſt manner he could, and marched back with incredible expedition into Greece. Upon his arrival Attalus re-imbarked his forces and returned to Pergamus, Sulpicius, having but one legion on board, retired to the iſland of Ægina, and the Ætolians, thus abandoned by their allies, were forced to ſhelter themſelves in their ſtrong holds, not being able to make head againſt the united forces of Macedon and Achaia, with the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians alone. Philip, being thus left maſter of the field, retook moſt of the cities which had been reduced in his abſence, laid waſte great part of Ætolia, put the Lacedæmonians to flight, and then, as winter was drawing near, marched his forces back to Macedon. Early in the ſpring he returned into Greece, and, entering Ætolia at the head of a numerous army, obliged the Ætolians to conclude a peace on very diſadvantageous terms. The Romans, employed in a more important war at home, had left their friends in Greece to ſhift for themſelves;

ſelves; but nevertheleſs took it very much amiſs, that they had made a peace without their conſent and approbation. Sempronius the pro-conſul endeavoured to ſtir them up anew againſt Philip, but to no purpoſe, they were quite exhauſted with ſuch an expenſive war, and no-ways in a condition to lend the pro-conſul any aſſiſtance. He therefore altered his meaſures, and inſtead of making war began to treat with the king and his allies of a peace, which was ſoon agreed on by the mediation of the Epirots [d].

This peace was not of long continuance; for the Romans having, a few years after, reſolved upon a war with Philip, ſent Furius Purpureo into Ætolia to engage that nation anew in the intereſts of Rome. Furius was attended by the convoys of Athens, a city greatly addicted to the Romans; and at the ſame time embaſſadors from Philip arrived with very advantageous propoſals, in caſe the Ætolians would either join their maſter, or ſtand neuter. The Ætolian nation was never more honoured than at this time, when they ſaw their friendſhip and alliance courted by a great king and two powerful republics. On the arrival of the embaſſadors an extraordinary diet was convened at Naupactus, whither the convoys from Rome, from Athens, and from Philip, immediately reſorted. Democritus preſided in the diet in quality of prætor; and as he had been bribed by Philip, he directed, that the Macedonians ſhould be heard before the Romans; his pretext for this preference was, that the alliance between Philip and Ætolia was yet freſh, and had been but lately concluded. The ſpeech made by the Macedonian embaſſadors was full of invectives againſt the Romans, they enlarged on their proceedings at Rhegium, Capua, and Tarentum, as inſtances of their treachery and cruelty; and concluded with exhorting the Ætolians to obſerve the conditions of peace, which they had concluded a few years before with Philip. The Athenians, who ſpoke next, endeavoured to efface the impreſſions which this diſcourſe had made: they expatiated, in an affecting manner, on the cruelty and impiety of Philip, who, according to his barbarous method of making war, had ſhewn no regard to the auguſt temples of the gods, or the venerable tombs of the dead; they extolled the courage and piety of the Romans, and, laſtly, conjured the Ætolians to join in the common cauſe of the two moſt formidable powers, Heaven and Rome. Afterwards Purpureo was heard, and his ſpeech chiefly chiefly turned on juſtifying the conduct of the Romans, with regard to the three cities mentioned by the Macedonian orator; he expatiated on the lenity and moderation ſhewn by his republic to the Carthaginians, and returned the reproaches of cruelty upon Philip; he did not forget the advantages, which the conſular army had already gained over the king; and, laſtly, adviſed the Ætolians to lay hold of the preſent opportunity of renewing their confederacy with the Romans, unleſs they choſe rather to periſh with Philip, than conquer with Rome [e].

The diet was inclined to favour the Romans; but Damocritus ſuſpended their determination, by declaring, that nothing which related to peace or war could be reſolved upon out of a general diet, which this was not. The artful prætor made a merit with his countrymen of his addreſs in this affair, pretending, that his deſign was only to gain time, till he could judge which of the two contending parties was moſt likely to prevail, and then join the ſtrongeſt [f].

In the mean time, the proconſul Sulpicius having penetrated into the king's dominions and defeated him near Octolophum, the Ætolians at laſt determined to ſide with the conqueror, and accordingly, in conjunction with Aminander king of the Athamanes, (A) made an irruption into Macedon, and laid ſiege to Cercinium a city of Magneſia (B). This ſudden invaſion alarmed all the nations in the neigh-

(A) The Athamanes had then a ſeparate diſtrict of their own, ſurrounded by Theſſaly, Epirus, Acarnania, Ætolia, and Doris; whence ſome have made it a part of Theſſaly, others of Epirus: Pliny places it in Ætolia; Stephanus makes it a part of Illyricum. According to Ptolomy it was divided from Epirus by the bay of Ambracia (29); and according to Strabo (30) from Ætolia by the river Achelous.

(B) Magneſia was a ſmall country, lying at the eaſtern extremity of Theſſaly, between the gulf of Armiro and the Saronic gulf. Circinium ſtood at the foot of mount Oſſa, near the lake Bæbis, between Sotbuſſa and the Macedonian ſea (31).

neighbourhood of the lake Boebis (C), who abandoning the country fled to the neighbouring mountains; ſo that the Ætolians finding no more booty there fell upon the province of Peræbia, took the city of Cyretiæ (D) by aſſault, and obliged Malæa (E) to take up arms, and join them againſt the king of Macedon. From Mallæa Aminander was for marching againſt Gomphi (F) which was very near Athamania, and might have been eaſily reduced, as it was defended only by the inhabitants. But the Ætolians choſe rather to pillage Theſſaly, than aſſiſt Aminander in taking a city, which was ſo conveniently ſituated to protect his ſmall dominions from the inroads of the Theſſalians. The Ætolians having entered Theſſaly, committed there great devaſtations, dividing themſelves into ſmall bodies, and lying down in the open fields without keeping guard, or ſecuring themſelves with trenches. Aminander, ſeeing he had reaſon to apprehend ſome ſudden attack, being in an enemy's country, adviſed them to be upon their guard, and encamp in a regular manner: But they deſpiſed his advice, and advancing to the very walls of Phæcadum (G), and there lying down on the graſs, gave themſelves up to eating and drinking, as if they had been in the heart of Ætolia. Hereupon Aminander thought it adviſeable to withdraw to a riſing

The Pamiſus, now called Pontigna Maranta, falls into the Peneus. The Curalius, now Onocero, riſes in the province of Pelaſgiotis, and empties itſelf into the ſame Peneus.

(E) Mallæa, or Malia was a city of Phthiotis, not far from mount Oeta and Thermopylæ. Near it were the hot mineral waters mentioned by Catullus in his elegies. Some are of opinion, that the Maliac gulf, now the gulf of Zeiton, borrowed its name from this city (32).

(F) The city of Gomphi was ſituate in that part of Theſſaly which the ancients call Eſtiotis, near the ſprings of the Peneus (33). According to Livy it was the neareſt city of Theſſaly to the confines of Epirus (34).

rising ground about five hundred paces from the Ætolians, and there secure himself with a ditch and rampart. He was scarce gone, when Philip appeared at the head of a numerous body of horse, fell upon the Ætolians, and cut most of them in pieces; those that escaped fled to Aminander's camp, whither they were pursued by the Macedonians. But Philip, contrary to his expectation, finding the camp well fortify'd, and the Athamanes ready to receive him, put off the attack to the next morning, his infantry being tired with the long march they had taken to surprize the enemy. In the night, the few Ætolians that remained and the Athamanes decamped together, and under the conduct of Aminander escaped through by-ways, and arrived in their own countries [g].

The next year they entered Thessaly again, and took the cities of Cymines and Angea at the first onset. From thence they advanced to Theuma, Calathama, Achorra, Xinia, and Cyphara (G), all which cities they took and pillaged. Thus great part of Thessaly fell a prey to the most cruel and avaricious of all the nations that were in alliance with Rome. For the Ætolians, where-ever they came, left nothing in the cities or houses but the bare walls, destroying in the flames what they could not carry away, and either putting to the sword the inhabitants, or selling them for slaves to the best bidder. Such was their inhuman method of making war [i].

The Ætolians continued steady in the interest of Rome during the whole course of the war, and were favoured by the Roman commanders above the other nations of Greece, as being the first that had joined in alliance with their republic. But after the famous battle of Cynocephalæ, in which Philip was entirely defeated, the affection between the two nations began to cool, and Flaminius, who commanded in that action, to treat the Ætolians in a quite different manner from what he had done formerly. They without all doubt gave some occasion with their boasting speeches to this change. Their cavalry did wonders in the engagement, and by covering the Roman infantry, which was put in disorder at the first onset, gave them time to rally, and saved them the shame of a dishonourable flight. Hence they ascribed to themselves all the glory of the victory, giving out, that without their timely assistance the Romans had been defeated and cut in pieces. In the songs which they dispersed all over Greece, they named themselves as the chiefs, and the Romans as their auxiliaries (H). Flaminius, who was already disgusted with the Ætolians for plundering the enemy's camp, while the Romans were busy in making prisoners, was now more fired at these insolent reports, which greatly lessened his reputation among the Greeks. His resentment was still warm, when three envoys came from Philip, under pretence of asking a truce to bury the dead, but in reality to solicit a peace; the pro-consul received them, and gave them an answer, without consulting the heads of the Ætolian nation, who were then in the camp, and had greatly contributed to the victory. The Roman was glad of this opportunity to mortify their vanity, whereas he ought to have dissembled, and been more tender of allies, who had proved so useful to him on all occasions. Flaminius agreed with the deputies of Philip upon a truce of fifteen days, without admitting to the conference any but the officers of the Roman army; and even promised to grant their master an interview during that time. This air of absolute authority and independence on the other allies shocked the Ætolians to such a degree, that they spread a report in all the cities of Greece, that Flaminius was betraying the common cause, and that he had been bribed by Philip. But notwithstanding these reports, the pro-consul appointed a place for the conference, and after having treated the king's embassadors with uncommon civility, he ordered them on their departure to tell their master, that he desired him not to despond. This message highly offended the Ætolians, who were utter strangers to all humanity and politeness, and confirmed them in their opinion, that the Roman had sold himself to Philip. The place appointed for the interview was a narrow pass, which led

(H) Thirty thousand Thessalians, said one of their poets, were killed on the spot. The Ætolians subdued so powerful an enemy with the assistance of the Latins, whom Flaminius had brought to ruin Ematia. The author of this distich was one Alcæus, an Ætolian by nation. He was far inferior to the famous Alcœus, who was cotemporary with Sappho. The latter lived about the 44th Olympiad, and is famous for the Alcaic verses which took their name from him (35).

led into the vale of Tempe. Thither Flaminius reſorted, after having invited all his allies to aſſiſt at the conferences, which he would not begin till he had conſulted the heads of the confederates, upon what terms they thought it proper to grant Philip a peace. Amynander and the Achœans ſpoke with a great deal of moderation, and only begged, that he would conclude ſuch a peace as might enable Greece to preſerve her liberties in the abſence of the Romans: as to the particulars of ſuch a treaty, they referred them entirely to his prudence and judgment. But Alexander, one of the heads of the Ætolians, riſing up, haughtily addreſſed the pro-conſul in the following terms: "You have done wiſely to call us to the confe"rence: you have at laſt thought fit not to treat of a "peace without your allies. But, pray, what do you pro-
"poſe by granting a peace to Philip? Greece will never "enjoy its liberties ſo long as he enjoys the throne of "Macedon. You are greatly miſtaken, if you fancy it "will. Philip muſt be driven out of his kingdom, be"fore Greece can promiſe herſelf a laſting tranquility.
"You Romans have flattered us with hopes of liberty;
"but there is no liberty for the Greeks till Philip is dead,
"and his dominions entirely ruined." When Alexander had done ſpeaking, Flaminius directing his ſpeech to him;
"You are unacquainted, ſaid he, with the character and
"ſentiments of the Romans; my republic does not carry
"her reſentments to exceſs: ſhe knows how to revenge
"injuries; but upon the firſt appearance of ſubmiſſion
"her anger is appeaſed; Hannibal and Carthage are con"vincing proofs of our moderation. As to myſelf, I never "intended to carry on an irreconcileable war with Phi"lip; but was always inclined to grant him a peace,
"whenever he ſhould yield to the conditions that my re"public thought fit to preſcribe him. You yourſelves,
"O Ætolians, never once mentioned the driving of Phi"lip from his throne till our late victory. Shall we then "be inexorable, becauſe we are conquerors? When an "enemy attacks us, it is our duty to repel him with all
"poſſible bravery; but if he yields, it is the part of a "generous victor to uſe him with gentleneſs and huma"nity; for animoſity dies after victory, and brave men "are courageous in action, but mild after it. Nay, it is "not your intereſt to deſtroy the kingdom of Macedon,
"which ſerves you as a barrier againſt the Thracians and

" Gauls (I), who, were they not checked by it, would " certainly over-run all Greece [k]." Flaminius concluded with declaring, in the name of all the officers of the Roman army, " That a peace ought to be granted to Phi- " lip, if he complied with the conditions which the other " allies ſhould propoſe, adding, that if the Ætolians did " not like it, they might take what reſolutions they " pleaſed on that occaſion." Phineas, the Ætolian præ- tor, anſwered Flaminius, and repreſented to him in very ſtrong terms, " That Philip, if he were left in poſſeſſion " of Macedon, would ſoon kindle a new war in the heart " of Greece." But before he ended his harangue, the proconſul roſe from his ſeat in a paſſion, and ſaying with a loud voice, " That he would put it out of Philip's power " to make any further attempts upon Greece," diſmiſſed the aſſembly [l].

But after all, it was not good nature or compaſſion that prompted Flaminius to urge the concluſion of a peace with the king of Macedon, but the advice he received, that Antiochus, ſurnamed the Great, was ready to march out of Syria at the head of a powerful army, and make an irruption into Europe. This prince had long kept a correſpondence with Philip; and if theſe two monarchs ſhould join their forces, ſuch an alliance might prove of dangerous conſequence to the Roman republic. Beſides, Philip, tho' conquered and driven out of the field, might ſhut himſelf up in his ſtrong holds, and diſpute inch by inch the conqueſt of his kingdom. This Flaminius dreaded, being ſenſible, that in the main time another might be ſent to ſucceed

(I) It is uncertain, whether Livy ſpeaks here of thoſe Gauls who had ſettled in that part of Aſia, which was from them called Galatia, or of another Gallic nation which was nearer to Greece, and had made a new ſettlement about the conflux of the Danube and the Save. Theſe new-comers took the name of Scordiſci, as Juſtin informs us. Strabo (36) places them about Sirmium, between the Danube and Macedon. About fourſcore years before the time we are here ſpeaking of, the Gauls had ſpread terror and deſolation in all the countries of Macedon and Greece, not ſparing even the famous temple of Delphi.

THE next day Philip appeared at the congreſs, with an air of ſubmiſion ſuitable to his preſent circumſtances, and without any preamble declared, that he accepted the articles which he had hitherto rejected, and referred all other matters to the Roman ſenate. After he had uttered theſe words, there was a deep ſilence in the aſſembly, moſt of thoſe who were preſent being touched with compaſſion. But Phineas the Ætolian prætor, finding that no body made him any reply, took the liberty to aſk him, whether he was willing to reſtore to the Ætolians the cities of Lariſſa, Pharſales, Thebes in Phthiotis, and Echina. I do reſtore them to you, reply'd Philip. Flaminius was greatly offended at the pretenſions of the Ætolians to the city of Thebes, and replied with ſome warmth, "It belongs to "the Romans. I was the man who appeared before it, "and to me it ſurrendered; it is therefore become ſub-"ject to the Romans." Phineas inſiſted, that, according to the terms of the treaty concluded between Ætolia and Rome, it belonged to the former; the diſpute grew warm, but at length the aſſembly determined in favour of Flaminius. By theſe ſteps the Ætolians began to raiſe that violent ſtorm, which we ſhall ſoon ſee gather and diſcharge itſelf upon that unhappy nation [n].

THE king having accepted the conditions, a truce was granted him for four months, to negotiate a peace at Rome; but Flaminius demanded his ſon Demetrius with ſome of the chief lords of his court for hoſtages, and moreover two hundred talents upon condition, nevertheleſs, that both the money and hoſtages, ſhould be reſtored if the peace did not take place [o]. Philip comply'd, and immediately diſpatched his embaſſadors to Rome, as alſo did the Ætolians; the former to ſollicit a peace, and the latter to obſtruct it. When they arrived at Rome, the republic had juſt choſen new conſuls, L. Furius Purpureo and M. Claudius Marcellus. The latter being deſirous of having Macedon for his province, and there finiſhing the war, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the peace, and being ſeconded by the Ætolians in his oppoſition, had like to have prevailed in the ſenate. But the tribunes bringing the affair before the people, the tribes unanimouſly voted for granting Philip his requeſt [p].

The Ætolians diſſatisfied with the peace.

THE Ætolians were the only people in Greece diſſatisfied with the peace, they had been refuſed ſome cities which they claimed, and thought their ſervices very ill rewarded by the Romans, who could not have conquered, ſaid they, without their aſſiſtance. They carried their complaints to the general diet of all Greece, called the Pylaicum (K), and there endeavoured to ſtir up new enemies againſt Rome. But finding that the free ſtates of Greece were all well pleaſed

(K) Livy by the Pyliacum concilium means that aſſembly of the Amphictyones which met every year at Thermophylæ, to deliberate on the common intereſts of Greece. Theſe diets were eſtabliſhed by Amphyction the third king of Athens, in order to unite all the Greeks in one body. He believed, and with a great deal of reaſon, that if he could ſucceed in this point, he ſhould render them formidable to the barbarians. Many years after Acriſius king of Argos, enlarged the privileges of this council, and granted it an unlimited power. He likewiſe added ſeveral deputies of other provinces, who had not till his time been admitted to the council. Some have inferred from hence, that there were two different ſorts of Amphictyones, or general aſſemblies; the one inſtituted by Amphictyon, the other by Acriſius; whereas the king of Argos only improved what the king of Athens had begun. Æſchines ſpeaks of twelve Amphictyonic nations, (for ſo the Greeks called thoſe that had a right to ſend deputies to this aſſembly) but names only eleven, viz. the Theſſalians, Bœotians, Dorians, Jonians, Perrhœbes, Magneſians, Locrians, Oetæans, Phthiotes, Maleans and Phocians: the name of the twelfth has been probably loſt by the negligence of the tranſcribers. The Dolopes, not mentioned by Æſchines in this enumeration, are ſaid by the antients to have enjoy'd the Amphictyonic right. Each of theſe nations choſe two deputies, whom they ſent to the general aſſembly; one of thoſe was charged with the care of religious matters, and thence ſtyled Hieronemon; the other was called Pylagoras, or the orator ſent to Pylæ or Thermopylæ. Sometimes each nation ſent three and even four deputies; but whatever their number was, they had only two votes in the aſſembly. The Phocians were formerly excluded from the aſſembly for having plundered the temple of Delphos; but afterwards wiped off this diſhonour by ſaving the ſame temple from being plundered by the Gauls, who invaded Greece under the conduct of the ſecond Brennus. This ſupreme council was held twice a year, in autumn at Thermopylæ, in a temple dedicated to Ceres, and ſituate in a large plain watered by the Aſopus; in the ſpring at Delphos in the temple of Apollo (37).

pleaſed with the late treaty of peace, they determined to have recourſe to Antiochus king of Syria, to Nabis tyrant of Lacedæmon, and even to their ſworn enemy Philip king of Macedon. It was natural enough for them to ſuppoſe, that Macedon and Lacedæmon would readily enter into a league againſt the Romans, who had lately impoſed very hard conditions upon them. And as for Antiochus, his intereſt, his honour, the ſteps he had already taken, and the advice he received from Hannibal, all inclined them to believe, that he would not delay paſſing over into Europe, and declaring war with Rome. Nor did they deſpair to ſee Carthage alſo join ſo many confederate nations, and make ſome efforts to ſhake off the yoke which Rome had laid on her. All theſe conſiderations encouraged the Ætolians, and gave them no ſmall hopes of ſeeing the imperious republic humbled in her turn. They choſe for their prætor one Thoas, a man fit for their deſign, being an inveterate enemy to Rome, and a ſanguine oppoſer of the peace lately concluded with the Macedonians. Thoas immediately aſſembled a general diet at Naupactus, and there convey'd into the breaſts of all the deputies the irreconcileable averſion which he bore to the Romans. A decree paſſed without oppoſition, impowering him to ſend embaſſadors to all the princes who were diſſatisfied with the Romans, and ſtir them up to war againſt the common enemy. Purſuant to this decree, Damocritus was diſpatched to Lacedæmon, Nicander to Macedon, and Dicœarchus to Syria. The firſt was ordered to make Nabis ſenſible of the contemptible condition into which he had been brought by the Romans. His ſtate was reduced to a ſmall territory, and Achaia was ſole miſtreſs of Peloponneſus. By yielding up his ports, he was deprived of the riches he formerly got by trading with the neighbouring nations, and being ſhut up within the walls of Lacedæmon he had only the empty title of king. The ſecond was inſtructed to tell Philip, that he would never have a fairer opportunity of redeeming himſelf from the Roman tyranny. The conqueſts of Alexander the great and his glorious exploits were alſo deemed proper topics to awake his jealouſy. Nicander was likewiſe ordered to aſſure him, that the propoſals of the Ætolians were not chimerical, that Antiochus was ready to croſs into Europe with a mighty fleet and a numerous army, that the great Hannibal, whoſe very name ſtruck the Romans with terror, aſſiſted him with his advice, that the Ætolians would join him with all their forces, and that Rome could not poſſibly reſiſt ſo many enemies at once. The third embaſſador was directed to perſuade Antiochus to paſs over into Greece, and magnify to him the forces of Ætolia: he was to let him know, that the conqueſts of the Romans in Greece were chiefly owing to the Ætolians, and aſſure him, that their troops were numerous and well diſciplined, and that their country would furniſh his army with proviſions, as it afforded ſafe harbours for his fleets. Nay, Dicœarchus was charged to deceive the king of Syria with a lie, and tell him, that Philip and Nabis had already ſigned the confederacy [q].

Philip and Antiochus were not haſty in coming to a determination; but Nabis immediately took up arms, and beſieged Gythium, a maritime city, which the Romans had obliged him to give up to the Achœans. Upon this beginning of a general commotion, the Roman ſenate thought it adviſable to ſend embaſſadors into Greece to defeat the meaſures of the Ætolians, and maintain thoſe cities ſteady in their alliance with Rome. At their arrival they found, that Ætolia had already declared openly for Antiochus. The embaſſador (L), who had been ſent to Antiochus, was returned, and had brought with him an embaſſador from the king of Syria to the Ætolian diet. Before the general diet was convened, theſe two endeavoured to preposſeſs the minds of the peeple in favour of Antiochus. Nothing was talked of but the prodigious army he was to bring over with him. They exaggerated beyond meaſure the number of foot, horſe, and elephants, that were to come into Ætolia; and above all the immenſe treaſures, which the king would diſtribute among his friends, ſufficient to purchaſe all the lands belonging to the Roman republic. The minds of the Ætolians were blinded with theſe prejudices, when the diet was aſſembled to give audience to the king's ambaſſador. The Roman deputies among whom was Flaminius, highly reſpected by all the other ſtates of Greece, had regular notice ſent them of whatever was tranſacting in Ætolia; and they ſuborned ſome of their chiefs chiefs to thwart as much as poſſible the deſigns of the factious Thoas. Flaminius alſo engaged the Athenians to ſend deputies to the aſſembly of Ætolia, and there to ſupport the intereſts of his republic. Thoas opened the diet by acquainting his country-men, that an ambaſſador was come from the mighty monarch of Syria to court their friendſhip, and propoſe things greatly to the advantage of both nations. He was immediately ordered to introduce him, that they might hear his propoſals from his own mouth. Being introduced, he made a harangue well calculated for the preſent circumſtances. He told them, that it had been happy for Greece, that his maſter had concerned himſelf in their affairs before Philip was reduced ſo low; that if he had joined his forces to thoſe of the Macedonian, Greece would not now groan under the tyrannical oppreſſions of Rome. "But ſtill your caſe, ſaid he, is not without remedy, "the wound is not incurable; if you put in execution the "deſigns you have formed, I promiſe you a deliverer "in the great Antiochus; he, with your aſſiſtance and "that of the gods, will be able to reſtore Greece to its "antient ſplendor[r].

[q] Liv. l. 35. c. 12.

(L) Livy had ſaid a little before, that Dicœarchus, the brother of Thoas then prætor of Ætolia, had been ſent embaſſador to Antiochus; and here he tells us, that Thoas was ſent; wherein he agrees with Appian. Perhaps the prætor went with his brother to give the greater weight to his embaſſy.

The Ætolians were ready to accept the offer without further deliberation; but the Athenian embaſſador prevailed upon the aſſembly to hear the Romans before they came to any reſolution. Accordingly Flaminius being ſent for and introduced, put them in mind of their alliance with Rome; and after exhorting them rather to carry their complaints to the ſenate, than fill all Greece and Aſia with them, he concluded thus: Ætolians, "are you then de-"termined out of mere wantonneſs to light a fire in Greece, "which it will be in your power to extinguiſh? Will "you arm the nations of the eaſt for their mutual deſtruc-"ion? What a dreadful ſtorm are you bringing upon "yourſelves! you are the firſt on whom it will fall." The Ætolians, who had already laid their complaints before the ſenate, and had been by the ſenate referred to Flaminius, ſeeing themſelves now referred back by Flaminius to the ſenate, grew outrageous, and in the preſence of the Roman paſſed a decree conceived in the following terms: Let Antiochus be called into Europe to reſtore Greece, oppreſſed by the Romans, to its antient liberty. Flaminius demanded a copy of the decree; but the prætor refuſed it him, anſwering with a haughty air, that he had buſineſs of much much greater consequence at that time on his hands; but that he would communicate it to him very soon on the banks of the Tyber, with all the forces of Syria. This was an open declaration of war, whereupon Flaminius returned to Corinth, there to watch the enemies motions, and acquaint the senate with the steps they should take [s].

The Ætolians form a design of seizing Chalcis, Demetrias, and Lacedæmon.

In the mean time the privy council of the Ætolians formed a design of seizing on three cities, which were reckoned the bulwarks of Greece; these were Chalcis in Eubæa, Demetrias in Thessaly, and Lacedæmon in the heart of Peloponnesus. Three men of known valour and ability in war were charged with the execution of this extraordinary design. Thoas was appointed to take Chalcis, Alexamenes to surprize Lacedæmon, and Diocles to make an attempt upon Demetrias. They all three set out at the same time on their respective expeditions, but were not attended with the like success. Diocles approaching the city of Demetrias with a small body of chosen troops, sent a messenger to acquaint the inhabitants, that he was come with no other design, but to attend Eurylochus to his native country, and conduct him with that honour which was due to his rank and merit. Eurylochus had been chief magistrate of Demetrias, and in that post disobliged the Romans, whose partizans had forced him to leave his country and take sanctuary among the Ætolians. However, the Demetrians, touched with the tears of his wife and children, had consented to recal him; and his return Diocles made use of for the execution of his design, Eurylochus himself being privy to the whole plot. Both Diocles and Eurylochus arrived at the gates of the city with a small body of horse, the rest of the cavalry being ordered to follow at a distance. To prevent giving umbrage to the inhabitants, Diocles ordered his troop to dismount, and enter on foot, leading their horses by their bridles. At the gate he left a few horse-men to be ready to fall on the citizens, if they should offer to shut it when the rest of the cavalry appeared. Thus Diocles was admitted without the least suspicion; but while he was leading Eurylochus by the hand to his house, news was brought him that the whole body of the Ætolian cavalry was arrived, and had got possession of the gate. Hereupon he ordered the troop that attended him to remount, and in that surprize making himself master of the the moſt important poſts in the city, detached ſeveral ſmall bodies with orders to put to death all the heads of the Roman party. Thus the Ætolians poſſeſſed themſelves of one of the moſt important places of Theſſaly [t]. Demetrias taken.

But Lacedæmon was not to be ſo eaſily ſurpriſed. Nabis was a cunning and ſuſpicious prince, and as he had many enemies, always on his guard. The council therefore of the Ætolians, in the inſtructions they gave Alexamenes, had recourſe to treachery. Nabis had been lately defeated by Philopœmen, and apprehending that the brave Achæan deſigned to beſiege him in his capital, ſent meſſenger after meſſenger to his friends and allies the Ætolians, acquainting them with the danger that threatened him, and earneſtly entreating them to ſend him without delay ſuch a reinforcement as might extricate him out of the difficulties and ſtraits, which his alliance with their republic had reduced him to. The treacherous Ætolians thought this a favourable opportunity for putting in execution their horrid deſign, which was to aſſaſſinate their ally, and ſeize on the city of Lacedæmon for themſelves. Alexamenes therefore, a man well qualified for ſuch a work, was ordered to ſet out with a thouſand foot and thirty horſemen. The latter were all young men, choſen out of the whole body of the cavalry, as the moſt fit for any deſperate attempt. When they were ready to march, the young horſemen were introduced by the prætor Demetrius to the council of the apocleti, and there told, that it was not their buſineſs to think what expedition they were ſent upon, but only to execute blindly whatever Alexamenes ſhould enjoin them; and that how deſperate ſoever the thing he commanded might ſeem, and repugnant to reaſon, yet, unleſs they readily performed it, they ſhould not meet with a kind reception on their return home. With theſe inſtructions they began their march to Lacedæmon, where they were received by Nabis, with the greateſt tranſports of joy. Alexamenes encouraged him not to be under any apprehenſion of danger either from the Achæans or Romans, ſince Antiochus had already paſſed the Helleſpont, and would ſoon enter Greece with a prodigious army, and ſuch an immenſe number of elephants as would be ſufficient, without any other help, to tread down the Romans. As for the Ætolians, ſaid he, they would have ſent you all their troops, if they had not thought it it neceſſary to keep them at home till the arrival of the king of Syria, before whom they were deſirous to make the beſt appearance they could. He added, that it would be much for the glory and reputation of Lacedæmon if he could ſhew the great king his phalanx finely equipped and well diſciplined. Nabis was highly pleaſed with this ſoothing diſcourſe, and uſed every day to exerciſe his ſoldiers in the plains of the Eurotas near the capital; Alexamenes attended him at the head of his Ætolians, whom he drew up apart from the Lacedæmonians, and then keeping cloſe by the tyrant's ſide, while he rid through the files of his army to order their motions, watched a proper opportunity to give the blow he deſigned. He obſerved, that Nabis uſed to ride from one wing of the phalanx to the other, guarded only by three or four horſemen. This made him form a deſign of aſſaſſinating him in ſight of his troops when under arms. Accordingly having fixed with himſelf a day for the execution of ſo deſperate an attempt, he waited on the tyrant to the place of the rendezvous, and there, while Nabis was buſy in exerciſing his phalanx, he ſtept aſide to his thirty horſemen, and told them, that he ſhould ſoon ſtand in need both of their courage and addreſs; Keep your eyes, ſaid he, fixed upon me, and whatever you ſhall ſee me take in hand, be ſure to finiſh it, if you care to ſee your country again and your relations. He ſaid no more, but returned to attend the king as uſual. At length, as Nabis was riding from one place to another with great ſpeed, guarded only by two or three horſemen, Alexamenes ſeized on the deſired opportunity, and with his lance wounded the king's horſe. Then the thirty Ætolians, without deliberating on the matter, flew in, and diſpatched him before any one could come to his aſſiſtance. His guards were ſo ſurpriſed, that, inſtead of ſeizing the aſſaſſins, they ſtood gazing at the king's dead body, which lay on the ground covered with wounds. But Alexamenes heading the Ætolian infantry, which was poſted in the left wing of the Lacedæmonian phalanx, haſtened to the capital, and entering it without oppoſition began to plunder the tyrant's palace. As Nabis was equally hated by his citizens and ſoldiers, his death would have been generally approved of, if the Ætolian had convened the aſſembly, and made a ſpeech ſuitable to the occaſion. But the love of plunder prevailed over all other conſiderations; and Alexamenes, contrary to all rules of prudence, ſpent the remainder of the day and the whole night in ſearching for the treaſures of the murdered king. mean time the Lacedæmonians, recovering themſelves from their ſurpriſe, were highly provoked to ſee the antient palace of their kings ranſacked by a treacherous aſſaſſin, as if their city had been taken by ſtorm. Wherefore the whole city ran to arms, and for want of a better leader putting at their head a young child of the blood royal, they fell upon the Ætolians, who were ſtraggling about the city in queſt of booty, and put them all to the ſword. Alexamenes was killed in the palace, and thoſe few that made their eſcape were ſeized by the magiſtrates of Arcadia, and condemned to ſlavery. Such was the reſult of the attempt upon Lacedæmon. Philopœmon no ſooner heard of the death of the tyrant and his aſſaſſin, but he haſtened to Lacedæmon, and finding all things there in the utmoſt confuſion, he aſſembled the people, and exhorted them to recover their antient liberty. They followed his advice, and readily joined in the Achæan league. Thus the antient kingdom of Sparta became a member of a common-wealth, whereof the name was ſcarce known when the Spartans ruled over all Greece [u].

Lacedæmon joins in the Achæan league.

As for Thoas, he failed in his attempt upon Chalcis, the magiſtrates of that city, who were ſtrongly attached to the Romans, having received timely notice of the deſign, and put the city in a condition to ſuſtain a long ſiege. The inhabitants of Chalcis, hearing that Thoas had hired a great many tranſports in order to carry over troops to their iſland, ſent a meſſenger to him, deſiring to know for what reaſon he was going to commit hoſtilities in their territories; the Ætolian anſwered, that his only deſign was to deliver Eubæa from the Romans, who domineered more inſolently over it than the Macedonians had ever done. But the inhabitants reply'd, that they neither found their liberties abridged, nor needed any avenger or deliverer from the Romans, ſince they feared no danger, nor apprehended any injury, from them. This diſconcerted the meaſures of the Ætolian, who had placed all hopes of ſucceſs in a ſudden attack. Wherefore finding that proper preparations were made for his reception, he retired much diſſatisfied at his failing in an attempt upon a city, which would have made him maſter of the whole iſland, and opened a way for Antiochus into Attica [w].

FLAMI-

FLAMINIUS, who then reſided at Corinth, being informed, that the Ætolians had made themſelves maſters of Demetrias in Theſſaly, took upon him to recover it to the Roman party. He firſt wrote to Eunomus, prætor of Theſſaly, deſiring him to arm all the young men of the country. Then he charged Villius to go to Demetrias, and inform himſelf upon the ſpot of the diſpoſition of the inhabitants. Accordingly Villius embarked on a quinqueremis, and came in ſight of Demetrias. The report of his arrival raiſed a great commotion among the inhabitants, who ran in crouds to the port to ſee him. But the Roman, without any concern at ſeeing crouds about him, addreſſed Eurylochus the chief magiſtrate in this manner: Can the Romans reckon the people of Demetrias among their allies or no? Am I received here as a friend or not? The magiſtrate anſwered, that his fellow citizens were attached to Rome; but at the ſame time he let them know, that his preſence might diſturb the repoſe of a city that was jealous of its liberty; which was in effect telling him in a gentle manner, that he would not admit him into Demetrias. And indeed Eurylochus had already declared for Antiochus, and the inhabitants, ſeduced by his councils, had juſt then concluded a league with the Ætolians againſt Rome. Villius underſtood by Eurylochus's diſcourſe, that he could not, without danger, appear among the people; and the interview ended with ſevere reproaches on both ſides; the Roman upbraided the Demetrians with ingratitude, ſince they owed their liberty to Rome, and the Demetrians reproached the Romans with injuſtice, haughtineſs, and ambition. Villius therefore was obliged to put to ſea again; but before he reimbarked, turning to the multitude that were purſuing him with great noiſe and menaces, "I plainly ſee, ſaid he, "the ſtorm that will fall upon your heads; your misfor-"tunes will convince you, when it is too late, that none, "who provoke the Romans, eſcape with impunity". Flaminius, upon the return of Villius and his report, laid aſide all thoughts of bringing the Demetrians back to their old alliance [x].

ON the other hand, Thoas, having failed in his attempt upon Chalcis, went ſtrait to Antiochus, and preſſed him to delay no longer his ſetting out for Greece. At the ſame time he diſſuaded him from ſending Hannibal with an army into into Italy, inſinuating, that the Carthaginian would aſſume to himſelf all the glory of ſuch an enterprize. As this fell in with the Syrian's ſuſpicious and jealous temper, he entirely dropped the deſign, to which he was before well inclined. And now it being reſolved, that Greece ſhould be the only ſeat of war, the king pitched upon Demetrias for the place where he ſhould land. Having therefore got every thing ready for his departure, he imbarked with an army conſiſting only of ten thouſand foot, five hundred horſe, and ſix elephants; ſuch a ſmall body of men was no-ways ſuitable to the majeſty of ſo great a king, nor anſwered the expectations of his Greek allies: but theſe were all the troops he had ready; Polyxenidas indeed, one of his generals, was ordered into Aſia to draw together the reſt of his forces, and lead them into Europe. The king landed at Pteleum in Phthiotis, and from thence marched to Demetrias. Here the heads of the Ætolian nation waited upon him, and invited him to Lamia, one of their cities, where a general aſſembly was convened to receive him. Being introduced to the diet, he made an harangue, wherein he told them, that his eagerneſs to comply with their requeſt had induced him to leave Aſia, before he had made the neceſſary preparations for ſuch an expedition; that his zeal for their deliverance had made him even forgetful of his own dignity; that their expectations ſhould be fully anſwered next ſpring; and that aſſoon as the ſeas were paſſable, they ſhould ſee all Greece covered with armies, and their harbours filled with fleets. He concluded with theſe words; "I will ſpare neither fatigues nor expences, I will expoſe "my perſon, to the greateſt dangers, to re-eſtabliſh you "in the full enjoyment of your liberties: Rome has enſlaved you, but Syria offers you a deliverer; let us then "ſhare the trouble between us; do you furniſh proviſions, "I will find men and arms [y]".

Antiochus arrives in Greece.

THIS ſpeech was received with great applauſe, and, when the king was withdrawn, it was debated in the aſſembly, what title they ſhould give him, and in what character he ſhould act in Ætolia. The moſt judicious ſaw plainly, that Antiochus, inſtead of a real and preſent aſſiſtance, gave them little more than bare hopes and promiſes, and therefore were for having him act only as a mediator diator between Rome and Ætolia. But this being rejected by a great majority, the opinion of Thoas prevailed, which was, that the king ſhould be honoured with the title of generaliſſimo or commander in chief of all the Greek armies againſt Rome. Then a council of thirty perſons was appointed, to whom the king might have recourſe on all occaſions. The firſt ſtep he took by their advice was, to enter into a negotiation with Chalcis, a city which was famous for its affection to the Romans. In a conference which was held between the Ætolians and Chalcidians at Salganea, the former uſed their utmoſt efforts to draw that important city into an alliance with Antiochus, but without renouncing the friendſhip of the Romans; they declared, that the king of Syria was come into Greece, not to make it the ſeat of war, but to deliver it from ſlavery; that nothing could be more advantageous to the cities of Greece than to live in amity both with Antiochus and the Romans, ſince the one would by that means be a check on the other; that if they withſtood the advantageous offers of ſuch a mighty monarch, they might ſoon repent it, the Romans, on whom they depended, being at a great diſtance, and the king at their gates [z].

Mictio, one of the chief men of Chalcis, replied; that he could not imagine what people Antiochus was come to deliver, and for whoſe ſake he had left his kingdom and croſſed over into Greece; that as for the inhabitants of Chalcis, they had no occaſion for a deliverer, ſince they were free; nor of a defender, ſince they enjoyed the ſweets of peace under the protection of Rome; that they did not refuſe the friendſhip of Antiochus and the Ætolians; but if they would ſhew themſelves friends, the beſt proof they could give at preſent of their friendſhip was, to leave the iſland, ſince they were fully determined neither to admit them into their city, nor make any alliance with them, but in conjunction with the Romans [a].

This anſwer being brought to the king on board his ſhip, where he had continued during the conference, he thought it adviſeable to return to Demetrias, not having a ſufficient number of troops with him to make an attempt upon the city. He was not at all pleaſed with his Ætolian counſellors, ſeeing the firſt ſtep they had made him take proved ſo inglorious. But Thoas appeaſed him with the hopes of gaining over Amynander king of the Athamanes, manes, with the Bœotians and Achæans, who, ſaid he, are all diſſatisfied with the proceedings of the Romans. Accordingly negotiations were ſet on foot, and embaſſadors diſpatched to theſe three powers. The Achæan diet, which was held at Ægium, gave audience to the embaſſadors of the Ætolians and Antiochus, in the preſence of Flaminius. The Syrian embaſſador, who ſpoke firſt, expatiated on the irreſiſtible power of his maſter; he declared with an emphatical tone of voice, that a numberleſs multitude of horſemen were croſſing the Helleſpont, conſiſting partly of cuiraſſiers in impenetrable armour, and partly of bow-men, who diſcharged their darts with as much ſkill and dexterity, when they turned their backs, as when they faced their enemy: to the cavalry, which alone was ſufficient to overpower all the forces of Europe, he added more numerous bodies of infantry, the Dahæ, the Medes, the Elymæans, the Caduſii, &c. names never before heard in Greece, and therefore, as he thought, more terrible; with regard to the fleet, he aſſured them, that it would over-ſpread all the coaſts, and fill all the ports of Greece; concerning money, it was, he ſaid, needleſs to mention the immenſe ſums which Antiochus poſſeſſed, ſince they knew that the kingdom of Aſia had always abounded with gold. In the cloſe of his ſpeech he addreſſed the Achæans, telling them, that though his maſter was come from the moſt remote parts of the eaſt, purely to reſtore Greece to its freedom, yet he did not require, that the Achæans ſhould take up arms againſt Rome, but only deſired them to ſtand neuter, and treat both parties as friends, aſſuring them, that their neutrality ſhould ſcreen them and their country from the many calamities that threatened Greece [b].

Infolent ſpeech of Archidamus the Ætolian before the Achæan diet.

ARCHIDAMUS, the Ætolian embaſſador, ſpoke to the ſame effect, adviſing the Achæans to ſit only as ſpectators of a war, which muſt bring utter deſtruction upon Rome; then growing inſenſibly warmer, he launched out into invectives and reproaches againſt the Romans in general, and Flaminius in particular; he called them an ungrateful people, who had forgot, that they owed to the valour of the Ætolians not only the victory they had gained over Philip, but their general's life and the ſafety of the army. "For "what great exploits, continued he, has Flaminius per-"formed during this war? his whole time has been ſpent "in

THE Achæans without hesitation declared for the Romans, and resolved to make war upon Antiochus and the Ætolians. They immediately sent five hundred men to reinforce the garison of Chalcis, and the like number to Athens, which began to waver.

ANTIOCHUS and the Ætolians received no greater satisfaction from the Bœotians, who told their embassadors, that they would come to no resolution till Antiochus's army was on the frontiers of Bœotia [d].

THE king of Syria having thus solicited in vain, either by his embassadors or in person, most of the Greek states to join in alliance with him, retired at last to Demetrias, where he held a council of war on the operations of the ensuing campaign. Hannibal, who was invited to it with all the chief commanders of the army, being asked his opinion first, advised the king, before he undertook any thing else, to use his utmost endeavours to gain over Philip of Macedon; which, he said, was so important a step, that could they but succeed in it, they might without much ado become masters of all Greece. But if Philip should refuse to take up arms against Rome, in that case he was of opinion, that the king should send his son Seleucus at the head of an army into Macedon, and by that means prevent him from lending any assistance to the Romans. He insisted on a still more important point, and maintained, as he had always done, that the only way to defeat the Romans was to send an army into Italy [e].

THE council could not but approve of what Hannibal said, but at the same time the Ætolians diverted the king from following his opinion, pretending, that if he pursued the Carthaginians plan, all the glory would be ascribed to him, and that since Antiochus had already taken another course and was in Greece, it would be highly disreputable in him to altar his measures. In the council it was resolved, that the king should again attempt the winning over of Chalcis, and accordingly he set out again for that place. On his march he detached Menippus, one of his generals, with three thousand men to intercept a body of five hundred Romans, which Flaminius had sent, under the command of Mictio the Chalcidian, to reinforce the garison of Chalcis. Menippus came upon them unexpectedly, while they were amusing themselves in viewing the rarities of a temple dedicated to Apollo in the neighbourhood of Tanagra (M). Neither the ſanctity of the place, which enjoy'd the privileges of an aſylum, nor the friendſhip that ſtill ſubſiſted between Antiochus and the republic, war not being yet declared, protected them from the fury of the Syrians; they were attacked in the very temple and grove of Apollo, moſt of them put to the ſword, and fifty taken priſoners; a few of them eſcaped with their leader Mictio, who in a ſmall boat got ſafe to Chalcis. This was the firſt time Antiochus drew his ſword in theſe parts; but by ſhedding Roman blood he made himſelf the aggreſſor, and gave Rome a new right to declare him an enemy. The Syrian, flushed with this ſmall advantage, became more bold and enterprizing; he advanced at the head of ſix thouſand men to the Euripus, where he had ordered his fleet to attend him, and appeared the ſecond time before Chalcis. This city was rent into factions, and, now the Ætolian party prevailing, Mictio and Xenolcides, with ſuch other citizens, as perſiſted in their attachment to the Romans, were commanded to depart, and the city opened her gates to Antiochus. The example of the capital was followed by the whole iſland, and all Eubœa ſubmitted to the Syrian, who from that time made Chalcis the place of his reſidence. He ſpent the winter there, ſending deputies to all the free ſtates of Greece to court their friendſhip. His power began now to be formidable; wherefore the Eleans, the Epirots, the Bœotians, and the Athamanes readily joined him, renouncing their alliance with Rome. The Athamanes were prevailed upon to join him, by Philip the regent of Athamania, who was a pretender to the crown of Macedon (N) [f].

AND now the time drawing near to take the field, Antiochus advanced to Lariſſa, and from thence ſummoned his allies to ſend their troops to the neighbourhood of Pheræ, where they were to rendezvous. While he was waiting here for the arrival of the confederate troops, he made a very impolitic ſtep, which was taking the regent of Athamania with him to the plains of Cynocephalæ, where the Macedonians, who had been killed when Philip was overcome, lay ſtill unburied. He thought, that the pretended king of Macedon, by procuring their obſequies to be performed, might gain the affections of the Macedonians. But this ſerved only to exaſperate the true king of Macedon, who immediately gave the Romans notice of the progreſs Antiochus was making in Greece [g].

The progreſs of Antiochus's arms in Greece.

THE king of Syria, being reinforced with the troops of his allies, and having no enemies to reſiſt him, laid ſiege to Pheræ, which after a vigorous reſiſtance was forced to ſurrender. From Pheræ he advanced to Lariſſa, and while he was deliberating whether he ſhould lay ſiege to it or not, news was brought him, that a body of Romans was arrived at Gonni, a city about twenty miles from Lariſſa. Claudius, who commanded this ſmall detachment, in order to deceive Antiochus, encamped in a much larger camp than was neceſſary for ſo ſmall a number of troops, and kindled ſo many fires, that Antiochus, believing a numerous army of Romans was ready to fall upon him, decamped with great precipitation, and returned to Chalcis, which city proved as fatal to him as Capua had been to Hannibal. For there, though he was advanced in years, being above fifty, he ſuffered himſelf to be ſhamefully captivated by the charms of a fair Chalcidian. She was the daughter of one of the chief citizens of Chalcis, named Cleoptolemus, in whoſe houſe the king lodged, and a young woman of great virtue. The king therefore was obliged to diſcloſe his paſſion, not to her only, but likewiſe to her father, and deſire his conſent to marry her. The diſproportion of her among the Megalopolitans, that he was the true heir of the kingdom of Macedon. The brother of Apamia, whoſe name was Philip, governed the kingdom of Athamania under Amynander, who was a weak prince: and Antiochus gained over Philip, by promiſing to reſtore him to the throne of his anceſtors.

age and condition to those of the king's made Cleoptolemus fear, that his daughter would soon repent her advancement to so high a station, and therefore was very unwilling to grant the king his request. But Antiochus to the passion of a lover joined the authority of a sovereign, and then the father was obliged to acquiesce; and the nuptials were celebrated with regal magnificence, and all the security of the most peaceable times. The king was now so taken up with his young queen, that he seemed to forget Rome, Greece, and Syria. Neither the important war he was engaged in, nor the defence of his allies, nor the preservation of the glory he had already acquired, affected him in the least. His unreasonable love was become a standing topic of railery in all conversations, his allies made loud complaints, the soldiery, being kept in a state of inaction, began to mutiny, and the Ætolians themselves to express great uneasiness. But the king, insensible to every thing but his passion, which engrossed the whole man, spent the rest of the winter in feasting and rejoicings; and the ill example of the court infected the officers, and even the common soldiers, of the Syrian army: discipline was neglected, their bodies were weakened, and the whole army abandoned themselves to idleness and debauchery [h].

While Antiochus was thus lost in pleasures at Chalcis, Rome kept a watchful eye over him. A hundred quinqueremes were fitted out to scour the eastern seas, and, after the elections were over, and a regulation made of the troops that were to serve this year, war was formally declared against Antiochus. Then the new consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica and A. Acilius Glabrio, drew lots for their provinces, and Greece fell to the latter, who set out in the beginning of May for Brundusium, whence he set sail for Greece, and, crossing the Ionian sea, landed his forces, without the least opposition, to the number of twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and fifteen elephants. He immediatel sent his infantry to Bœbius, who was encamped near Pellinæa in Thessaly, and with his cavalry he marched to Limnæa, another city of Thessaly, which the king of Macedon was besieging. Both these places surrendered to the consul at discretion, and in Pellinæa was taken Philip the pretender to the crown of Macedon. The king in derision called him brother, ordered him to be saluted king, and conducted him to the consul, who put him in irons, irons, and sent him to Rome. Then the Romans and Macedonians parted, to spread the terror of their arms in different places. The king made himself master of all Athamania, Amynander having retired with his wife and children into Epirus; and the consul soon reduced all Thessaly. This surprizing progress of the Romans roused at last Antiochus out of his lethargy. He loved his new wife Eubia to adoration; but his reason, pointing out to him the shameful figure a man of his years and character must make in being thus taken up with youthful pleasures, at last got the better of his passion; and he determined to leave Chalcis and draw nearer to Ætolia. This obliged him to assemble all the troops he had dispersed over Greece, and join them in one army. All the Syrian troops amounted to no more than ten thousand foot and five hundred horse. With these he advanced to the confines of Ætolia, in hopes of powerful succours from thence; but he was disappointed; for the Ætolian chiefs could not raise above four thousand men, who were for the most part their own clients and vassals. Antiochus was then sensible that he had been imposed upon by Thoas; but, notwithstanding this disappointment, he pursued his measures. He knew, that the Roman army had passed the Sperchius, and was ravaging Phthiotis. To prevent therefore their entering Achaia by way of Locris, and at the same time to secure himself against the attacks of the enemy, he seized a pass, already famous in history, called Thermopylæ. This pass was not above twenty-five foot broad, and bounded on one side by the sea, and on the other by mount Oeta. The king strengthened the natural fortifications of the place with trenches and ramparts. And as he was not ignorant, that Xerxes would not have been able to force the Lacedæmonians, if he had not ordered some of his troops to climb up the mountains, and from thence rush down upon the enemy, he detached two thousand Ætolians to seize the summits of mount Oeta, which were nearest his camp [i].

The progress of the Romans rouzes Antiochus.

Antiochus seizes Thermopylæ.

The Roman general was informed of the prudent precautions which Antiochus had taken, and was under no small concern. To endeavour to drive the enemy from passes, where scarce ten armed men could march a-breast, was a dangerous attempt; to follow the example of Xerxes, and climb over the mountains, was impracticable, the tops of

of the mountain being guarded by two thouſand Ætolians. In this perplexity he had recourſe to the famous Cato, who, being tired with the wranglings of the bar, had rouzed up his martial ſpirit, and now ſerved in the troops in no higher a ſtation than that of a legionary tribune. This brave and prudent warrior extricated the conſul out of his difficulties, by offering to diſlodge the Ætolians from their advantageous poſt. As this enterprize was of no leſs difficulty than importance, the conſul thought proper to join L. Valerius, one of his lieutenants, with Cato in the execution of it. The former was ordered to march againſt that body of Ætolians, which was encamped on the ſummit, called Tichius, and the latter againſt thoſe who were on the other, named Callidromus. Valerius was repulſed by the Ætolians, and forced to retire; but Cato, after undergoing inexpreſſible fatigues and dangers, got at laſt to the top of the mountain, and charged the Ætolians with ſuch reſolution, that he obliged them to abandon their poſt, and fly for refuge to the valley. In the mean time, the main body of the army was warmly engaged with Antiochus, but could not with all their valour force the Syrian's entrenchment. Acilius did wonders, but great numbers of his men being either killed or wounded, the reſt began to be diſheartened, when the conſul all on a ſudden ſpied Cato half way down the hill, and the Ætolians flying before him. This ſight inſpired the Romans with new vigor, and ſtruck no ſmall terror into the Syrians, who had behaved during the action with incredible valour, and ſtill maintained their ground, till Cato, attacking the camp in its weakeſt part, put an end to the diſpute. The king, having received a blow on the mouth with a ſtone, turned his horſe about and fled. His example was followed by the whole army, every one ſhifting for himſelf, and leaving the paſſes open for the Romans, who did not purſue them, being taken up with plundering the camp, where they found a rich booty [k].

But is diſlodged and defeated.

The next day early in the morning, the conſul marched to Elatia, whither Antiochus had firſt retired. But before the arrival of the Romans the king was fled from thence, and had got ſafe to Chalcis with five hundred horſe. All the infantry, being too much tired to follow the king in his flight, were ſurpriſed by the Roman horſe and cut in pieces;

pieces; ſo that Antiochus may be ſaid to have loſt his whole army, in the action of Thermopylæ and in the purſuit (O). The conſul continued his march through Bœotia to the Euripus, with a deſign to drive Antiochus from Chalcis, and recover the iſland of Eubœa. The Bœotians had declared for Antiochus, and therefore being ſeized with terror at the ſight of the conſular army, they appeared before Acilius in the attire of ſupplicants, and the conſul ſpared both their lives and lands, not ſuffering his ſoldiers to commit any hoſtilities, except at Coronæa, where, by a public edict of the Bœotian diet, a ſtatue had been erected to Antiochus. At this ſight the legionaries were ſo provoked, that Acilius could not refrain them; the city was plundered, and the territory laid waſte. When the conſular army appeared before Chalcis, Antiochus, embarked with his new queen, ſet ſail for Aſia, and retired to Epheſus. Upon his departure Chalcis opened her gates to the Romans, and all Eubœa followed the example of the citadel. Acilius then returned to Thermopylæ, and from thence continued his march to Heraclea (P), which two thouſand Ætolians ſtill kept for Antiochus [1].

Antiochus leaves Chalcis.

Before the conſul beſieged the city in form, he ſummoned the gariſon and the inhabitants to ſurrender; repreſenting, that they could expect no relief from a fugitive king; that all Greece had anew declared for Rome; that it was not too late to have recourſe to the clemency of the Romans; and that he would look upon their delivering up of the city as an unqueſtionable proof of a ſincere repentance. Damocritus, who had told Flaminius that he would give him on the banks of the Tyber a copy of the decree inviting Antiochus into Greece, was governor of the place; and by his means the Ætolians, as well as the inhabitants, reſolved to hold out to the laſt. The conſul therefore was obliged to have recourſe to force, and it was not without the

(O) Valerius of Antium, according to Livy, greatly magnified the king's loſs; for he wrote that forty thouſand Syrians were killed upon the ſpot, and five thouſand taken priſoners (5).

(P) This city, called Heraclea Trachynia, ſtood between the Sperchius and the Aſopus, near the gulf of Zeiton, and about forty furlongs diſtant from Thermopylæ (6).

the utmoſt difficulty that he made himſelf maſter of it. Heraclea was fortified by nature and art, and in a condition to make a long and vigorous defence. The conſul having inveſted the city on all ſides, began to batter it night and day with a great number of warlike machines, which diſcharged ſhowers of darts and ſtones on the beſieged. The Ætolians on the other hand maintained their poſts with inexpreſſible courage, haraſſed the Romans with frequent ſallies, ſet fire to their engines, and by letting down iron hooks from the wall, rendered their battering rams quite uſeleſs. The aggreſſors no ſooner opened a breach by undermining the wall, but the beſieged made vigorous ſallies, keeping the Romans employed till their companions within repaired the breach. Thus they held out forty days againſt the inceſſant attacks of the whole conſular army. The great number of the beſiegers leſſened their fatigues; but the beſieged were employed night and day, the whole garriſon being ſcarce ſufficient for the conſtant defence of the place. The conſul, being ſenſible that the Ætolians could hardly be overcome with fatigues and watchings, reſolved to give ſome relaxation, but with a view the more effectually to deceive them. He commanded a ſtop to be put to the attacks at twelve every night, and did not renew them till nine in the morning. The Ætolians, being perſuaded that the Romans were as much exhauſted as themſelves, retired at the ſame time, and did not return to the walls till they had refreſhed themſelves with ſome hours reſt. They continued this practice for ſome time; but the conſul all on a ſudden ordered Sempronius to attack the citadel at three in the morning, not doubting but the noiſe would draw all the gariſon thither. Accordingly the Ætolians being waked, haſtened to the caſtle, and the Romans at the ſame time aſſaulted with great vigor the town, but were repulſed by the Ætolians in three ſucceſſive attacks. Acilius had ordered his legionaries to attack the town on all ſides, except that which joined the ſuburbs. There he had placed a ſtrong detachment among the ruins of the demoliſhed houſes, with orders not to ſtir till they heard the ſignal. He imagined, that the beſieged would draw off their men from that place, which was not attacked, to defend the others. And ſo it happened, the beſiegers left this place quite undefended, which the conſul perceiving, gave the ſignal agreed on, and the legionaries mounted the wall without any oppoſition. The beſieged hearing a ſhout on the rampart believed the city was taken, and fled with great precipitation to the citadel. Acilius ſuffered the city to be plundered, not ſo much out of a ſpirit of revenge, as to reward the ſoldiers, who had not as yet been allowed to plunder any of the cities they had taken. The pillaging of the city took them up from break of day till noon, when the conſul marched againſt the citadel, which, as it was not ſufficiently ſtocked with proviſions to maintain ſuch a number of men, women, and children, as had fled thither for refuge, ſoon ſurrendered at diſcretion. The Ætolians threw themſelves upon the clemency of the Romans, and by way of preliminary delivered up into the conſul's hands their leader Damocritus, who probably was ſent to Rome, with the other captives of the conquered nations [m].

From Heraclea the conſul marched to Lamia, a ſtrong place ſituated on a rock about ſeven miles diſtant. The troops of king Philip had begun the ſiege at the ſame time that the Romans ſet down before Heraclea. As the two cities were near each other, and Lamia ſtood on an eminence, the Macedonians and Romans could diſcover, each from their own camp, what progreſs was made in the other. Hence aroſe an emulation between the two armies, which ſhould reduce their city firſt. The works were carried on by both with the utmoſt vigor; but as the Macedonians could not, according to their cuſtom, undermine the walls, the city being placed on a rock, the Romans took Heraclea before the Macedonians had made any conſiderable progreſs in the ſiege of Lamia. Philip indeed did not at firſt aſſiſt in perſon, being prevented by an indiſpoſition; but he no ſooner recovered, than he went to pay a viſit to Acilius, who was then encamped at Thermopylæ, and congratulated him on his victory. From the conſul's camp Philip haſtened to Lamia to purſue the ſiege; but he had not the ſatisfaction of taking the place, the Lamians chuſing rather to ſubmit to the Romans, in hopes of recovering their liberty, than to receive the Macedonian yoke [n].

Before Heraclea and Lamia were beſieged, the Ætolians had ſent an embaſſy to Antiochus then at Epheſus. Thoas, who was at the head of it, endeavoured, purſuant to his inſtructions, to engage the king to draw together his troops, and return into Europe. He repreſented, that if the war was not carried on with vigor in Greece, he would ſoon ſee the Romans in the heart of his dominions. What he

he said was not improbable, and therefore determined Antiochus to send immediately into Ætolia considerable sums, and give orders for the assembling of his forces. Thoas he kept with him, who was very glad to continue at court, and there have an opportunity of pressing the king to fulfil his promises. Thus the Ætolians were wholly bent upon renewing the war before the taking of the two above-mentioned cities; but the reduction of these abated their ardor, and now nothing was talked of in their assemblies, but of concluding a peace. They sent embassadors to the consul to make proposals, but he received them with the air of a conqueror. "I have other business on my hands, said he, "than to hear you; go back to your diet at Hypata, "whither I will send Valerius Flaccus to treat with you: "make your proposals to him, and in the mean time I "grant you a ten days truce [o]."

Valerius and the embassadors set out together for Hypata, where the general assembly was held. The diet shewed him extraordinary honour; held their sessions at his house, and to shew that they reposed an entire confidence in him, they desired him to instruct them in what manner they should treat with the senate. Our alliance, said they, with the republic is very antient. By how many good offices have we shewn our attachment to Rome? Here Valerius stopped them, and desired they would not mention an alliance, which they had so often broken. An humble submission, said he, will have more effect on the consul and senate, than a vain ostentation of your services. The diet seemed to pay a great regard to the wholesome advice of Valerius, and their deputies, putting on an air of humiliation, presented themselves before the consul. Phæneas, who was their speaker, addressing the consul in a mournful tone, began his speech by telling him, that all Ætolia, repenting her late conduct, threw herself on the honour and clemency of the Romans. The consul, without suffering him to pursue his harangue, immediately replied; you say, Ætolia surrenders herself to the Romans; if so, deliver up the head of your nation, who was the author of your revolt; put into my hands Menetas the Epirot, Amynander king of Athamania, and such of the Athamanians as have revolted from us, and taken sanctuary in Ætolia. While he was yet speaking, Phæneas interrupting rupting him, anſwered with a quite different air and tone of voice; you demand more than we promiſed; we threw ourſelves upon your honour, but we did not deliver ourſelves up to ſlavery. What you require is neither conſiſtent with the honour of the Ætolian nation, nor with the laws and cuſtoms of Greece. What is that to me, replied Acilius haughtily, whether my demands are agreeable to your cuſtoms and laws, or not? They are agreeable to the will of the Romans, and that is enough. Phæneas was offering to ſpeak, when the conſul riſing up, What, ſaid he, do you refuſe to obey my orders, and plead your cuſtoms or laws with me? Then turning to the lictors, he ordered them to bring in iron chains and collars, and threatened to put the embaſſadors in irons that inſtant, and treat them like rebels and traitors, unleſs they promiſed to perform what he required. The ſight of the chains and the threats of the angry conſul ſo terrified them, that neither Phæneas nor his collegues durſt utter one word. Valerius, taking their part, deſired the conſul to remember that they were embaſſadors, and conſequently ought not to be treated with all the ſeverity, which their inſincerity perhaps might deſerve. This encouraged Phæneas to repreſent to the conſul in terms of great ſubmiſſion; That neither he, nor the council of the apocleti who had ſent him, could obey his orders, without the conſent and approbation of the general aſſembly of the whole nation; he therefore entreated him to grant them a further truce for ten days, during which time he promiſed to bring him a poſitive anſwer. Acilius heard him now with patience, and granted the ſuſpenſion of arms he required [p].

Upon the return of the embaſſadors, and the report which they made of the ſevere treatment they had met with, a general aſſembly was convened, to which all the cities of Ætolia ſent their deputies. Theſe were fired with indignation at the bare recital of the preliminaries propoſed by the Romans, and all cried out, We are then reduced to ſlavery: Is the king of Athamania our ſubject? Can we diſpoſe of him as we pleaſe, and deliver him up to the Romans? Warm debates aroſe, and the members of the council could neither agree with the prætor, nor among themſelves. On one ſide the Romans were a formidable enemy; but they had yet taken only two cities: on the other Antiochus

Antiochus was a wealthy prince, powerful by sea and land, and a declared enemy to the Romans. While they were in this uncertainty, a thing happened which determined them to chuse the worst part. One Nicander, an active and bustling man, had gone from Ætolia to Ephesus, where Antiochus resided, and returned home in twelve days. He brought large sums of money with him from the king of Syria, and assured the diet, that early in the spring all the forces of Syria would be sent to their assistance. He added, that the king of Macedon was highly dissatisfied with the conduct of the Romans, and would not fail to join them, when a fair opportunity offered of revolting from his new allies. What he said with relation to Philip had great appearance of truth, and therefore was of great weight with the assembly. Nicander on his return to Greece had been obliged to pass between the Roman and Macedonian camps, and keeping as far as he could from the Roman fell upon an advanced guard of the Macedonians, by whom he was taken and carried to the king. The prisoner expected no good treatment from Philip, and was under no small apprehension of being delivered up to the Romans. But, contrary to his expectation, he was received by the Macedonian in a very friendly manner, and even invited to sup with him. After the repast the king ordered the rest of the company to withdraw, and then addressed Nicander thus: "You are not in the power "of an enemy, but of a friend, and therefore divest your- "self of all fear. Are you not at last sensible, that the "Ætolians your countrymen are the authors of all our "misfortunes? They first brought the Romans into Greece, "and assisted them in the reduction of my dominions. "Then they grew weary of their new masters, and drew "drew Antiochus in these parts. However, I forget "all that is past, and will not insult you in your misery. "Only let the diet at Hypata know, that it is high time "for them to lay aside their hatred to me. As for you, "Nicander, remember, that I now give you your life, and "be grateful [q]." Accordingly Nicander acquainted the diet with the kind reception he had met with in Philip's camp, and the Ætolians inferred from thence, that the king might be easily drawn off from the Romans. This persuasion, with the money which Nicander brought from Asia, and the reports ports which he ſpread, that Antiochus was ready to paſs into Europe at the head of a powerful army, made ſuch impreſſions on the aſſembly, that all thoughts of peace vaniſhed, and nothing was now talked of but war. They reſolved to draw all their forces to Naupactus, and preſerve at all events that important city againſt the return of Antiochus [r].

Acilius on the other hand looked on the taking of Naupactus as the moſt fatal blow he could give the Ætolian nation, and therefore reſolved to attempt it. In the firſt place he ſent four thouſand men under the command of Appius Claudius to guard the roads through which the army was to paſs. The conſul did not begin his march, till he had implored the aſſiſtance of the gods, by offering a ſolemn ſacrifice to Hercules on the top of mount Oeta (Q). Having thus conſecrated his departure by an act of religion, he ſet out at the head of his army, and met with no difficulties in his march, till he came to Corax (R), the higheſt mountain of Ætolia, which he was obliged to climb over, with all the warlike machines and baggage of a numerous army. There great numbers of beaſts of burden and many of the ſoldiers were loſt in the precipices. Not one ſingle Ætolian appeared to diſpute this dangerous paſſage with the conſul, which might have been defended by an handful of men againſt an army, how numerous ſoever. At length the Romans got over it, and arrived greatly fatigued before Naupactus, which the conſul immediately inveſted. But as the Ætolians defended themſelves with incredible vigor and courage, the whole conſular army was employed here moſt part of the ſummer, while Philip and the Acnæans reduduced

[r] Liv. ibid. c. 30.

(Q) Mount Oeta was dedicated to Hercules, there being an old tradition in the country, that this hero ended his life and labours there. One of the ſummits of this mountain was called Pyra, that is a funeral pile, becauſe Hercules had there burnt himſelf, and was ever after reckoned among the gods. The fame of the place drew the conſul to it, and before his departure he offered ſacrifices to the deity there worſhipped.

(R) According to Ptolemy this mountain lay between mount Callidromus and mount Parnaſſus, Livy places it between Naupactus and Callipolis.

duced entire provinces. The former not only made himself master of Demetrias, but extended his conquests to Dolopia, Aperantia, and Perrhæbia (S); and thus by degrees recovered all the places that had been taken from him [t].

But Flaminius, who resided at Chalcis (T), not being at all pleased with the progress, which the consul suffered Philip to make contrary to the interest of Rome, hastened to Naupactus, which had already held out two months, but was reduced to great straits. On his arrival in the camp he was received by the consul, whom he abruptly addressed thus; Are you aware what prodigious pains you take to ruin the affairs of the republic? Acilius surprized at these words, desired him to explain his meaning; and then Flaminius told him, that ever since his victory at Thermopylæ he had spent his whole time in taking two cities, while Philip had not contented himself with the taking of cities but had reduced whole nations. "You are "endeavouring, continued Flaminius, to lessen the power "of Ætolia, and at the same time suffer a far more dan- "gerous

(S) Dolopia was part of Epirus, and bordered upon Thessaly, near mount Pindus. Aperantia was another province of Epirus, lying near the springs of the Achelous. Perrhæbia was properly the mountainous country about Olympus in Thessaly, extending from the city of Atrax as far as Tempe (7).

(T) Flaminius, after having conquered Philip, and settled the affairs of Greece, was long kept in that country by his republic on account of his great skill and address in negotiations. He had no title, but nevertheless was more respected than the consuls themselves. When any differences arose, the contending parties generally had recourse to Flaminius, referring the whole to his arbitration. He had chose Chalcis for the usual place of his residence. That city owed its safety to him; for Acilius, when it surrendered to him after the departure of Antiochus, was resolved to give it up to be plundered; but Flaminius had interest enough with the consul to appease his wrath, and save both the lives and estates of the inhabitants. From that time the Chalcidians carried their gratitude to excess; they built a temple, and instituted a festival in his honour, putting him upon the same level with Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules (8).

" gerous enemy to encreaſe his beyond meaſure: conſider
" better the true intereſt of Rome; raiſe this troubleſome
" ſiege, leave Naupactus, and deliver Greece from im" pending ſlavery [u].

As the authority of Flaminius was great at Rome, and his reaſoning very juſt, Acilius was unwilling to diſoblige him; but on the other hand he conſidered, that the raiſing of the ſiege of a town, which had already held out two months, might reflect no ſmall diſhonour on his conduct, and therefore was ſome time in ſuſpenſe, whether he ſhould follow the advice of Flaminius, or contrary to his opinion purſue the ſiege. But at length he yielded, Flaminius taking upon him to juſtify his conduct to the ſenate, and to perſuade the Ætolians to make ſome kind of ſubmiſſion. Accordingly he immediately ſhewed himſelf to the beſieged, who, running in crowds to the ramparts, implored his aſſiſtance with mournful cries. Flaminius ſeemed at firſt not to give ear to their entreaties, but as they redoubled their cries, beſeeching him, with tears in their eyes, to have compaſſion on an unfortunate people, who fled to him for protection, he gave them to underſtand, that they might ſend deputies to confer with him. Hereupon Phæneas and the chief men of the nation came out and threw themſelves proſtrate at his feet. Flaminius ſeeing them in this humble poſture,
" I will not inſult you, ſaid he, in this condition, nor ag" gravate your ſorrow with unreaſonable reproaches. Your " misfortunes are indeed affecting; but I forewarned you
" of them, and you have the further mortification to " know, that you have by your imprudent conduct brought " them upon yourſelves. But as I am appointed by the " gods to preſerve Greece, your ingratitude ſhall not get " the better of my propenſion to mercy. Go, throw " yourſelves at the conſul's feet, and beg a ſuſpenſion of " arms, in order to ſend embaſſadors to Rome to " negotiate a peace; I will intercede with the conſul in " your behalf." They followed the advice of Flaminius; embaſſadors were ſent to the Roman ſenate, and Acilius, breaking up the ſiege, marched his army back into Phocis [w]. The city of Naupactus muſt have been reduced to great ſtraits, ſince the beſieged ſued ſo earneſtly for the protection of Flaminius. But, on the other hand, if Acilius had believed he could carry it in a ſhort time, he would not have let it slip out of his hands; the whole flower of the Ætolian nation was shut up in the city, and the reducing of it would have made their submission more hearty and sincere.

Acilius, being disengaged from this troublesome siege, made the best use he could of the short time he was to stay in Greece. He gave audience to the embassadors of the Epirots, who came to excuse the steps he had taken with regard to Antiochus. They had not indeed sent any troops to his assistance, but were suspected to have supplied him with money and provisions. The consul told them, that he was in doubt, whether he should call them friends or enemies, but that the senate of Rome knew how to explain their mysterious and artful conduct. However, he granted them a truce for three months, enjoining them to clear themselves before the senate. At Rome they were received very coldly; but, as it did not appear that they had committed any hostilities, the senators chose rather to shew them mercy, than to draw new enemies upon the republic [x].

As for the Ætolian embassadors, the truce, which had been granted them, was near expiring, before they could obtain an audience of the senate. They were, however, admitted at last, and endeavoured to raise the compassion of the senate; they gave a long, but modest, account of the services they had rendered the republic, during their alliance with her, and begged, that in consideration of them the conscript fathers would forgive them their late conduct. Many questions were put to them; but the senators observed, that, instead of giving any positive and direct answer, they had recourse to supplications and entreaties. This made them suspect their sincerity. Wherefore they were ordered to withdraw; and warm debates arose among the fathers, some being for granting them a peace, and others for pursuing the war. Some days were spent in these disputes, and as the embassadors artfully declined giving satisfactory answers, the senate long continued in suspense between peace and war. At last the embassadors were told, that they must chuse one of these two conditions, viz. either to submit to the will of the senate, or to pay the republic a thousand talents, and neither make war nor peace peace with any other power, without the conſent and approbation of Rome. The Ætolians had not ſo much money; and, on the other hand, if they implicitly ſubmitted to the will of the ſenate, they were perſuaded, that Rome would not be contented with that which they were willing to grant. Wherefore they deſired to know in what points, and how far, they were to ſubmit to the will of the ſenate. But they could have no certain anſwer, and therefore openly declared, that they would not conſent to either of the conditions. So that the project of a peace was dropped, and the embaſſadors ordered to leave Rome that very day, and Italy in a fortnight [y].

The Ætolians, upon the return of their embaſſadors, finding, that there were no hopes left of concluding a peace, thought it neceſſary to guard Naupactus againſt a new attack. They were afraid, that Acilius, who continued in Greece, would again ſit down before the place and carry it. To prevent this, they poſted themſelves in the narrow paſſes of mount Corax, in order to ſtop his march. But this precaution only ſerved to make the conſul turn his arms againſt another city, of no leſs importance than Naupactus. Lamia, after having been the laſt year very near reduced by Philip, had ſubmitted to Acilius upon very honourable terms, and was allowed its liberty. But while the conſul was employed in the ſiege of Naupactus, that city declared anew againſt the Romans. Acilius, finding it impracticable to make any new attempts upon Naupactus, ſet out for Lamia, and appearing unexpectedly before the place, at break of day, ordered the walls to be ſcaled on all ſides; but the inhabitants made a more vigorous defence than had been expected; all ranks of people, even women and children, ran to the walls, and joined in defence of their country. Whereupon Acilius, deſpairing to take the city by aſſault, ſounded a retreat. The Romans returned to their camp; but the general told them, that he deſigned to renew the aſſault the next morning; Don't expect, ſaid he to his troops, to return to the camp till the city is taken. Accordingly they renewed the attack with ſuch vigor, that the beſieged, being tired out with the fatigues of the preceding day, were in a few hours overpowered, and the place taken. After the reduction of Lamia the conſul was for returning to Naupactus; but in a council of war, which was held on that occaſion, not one of the officers approved of ſo hazardous an attempt. A ſteep mountain covered the place, and the paſſes were all guarded by numerous bodies of Ætolians. The conſul therefore marched his troops with all poſſible expedition, his conſulate being ready to expire, to Amphiſſa, a city of Locris, which had joined the Ætolians (U). He did not attempt to take it by ſtorm, but beſieged it in form; the beſieged made a vigorous reſiſtance, and held out, till news was brought to Acilius, that L. Cornelius Scipio, the brother of Scipio Africanus, was landed at Apollonia, and marching through Epirus and Theſſaly to take upon him the command of the army. The new conſul brought with him an army of thirteen thouſand men, and the great Africanus ſerved under him in quality of his lieutenant (W). Cornelius viſited all the coaſts of Epirus quite to the Maliac gulf. From thence he ſent to ſummon Hypata, which was one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Theſſaly. But the inhabitants anſwering that they were not their own maſters, and that they could not ſurrender without the conſent of the Ætolian diet, he turned towards Amphiſſa, the citadel of which Acilius

(U) Amphiſſa was a city of the Locrians called Ozolæ, ſituated near the territories of Criſſa, diſtant a hundred and twenty furlongs from Delphos. It was ſo called, according to Pauſanias, becauſe it was ſurrounded with mountains on all ſides. Some modern geographers tell us, that it ſtill retains the ſame name; but Le Noir calls it Lambina (9).

(W) The conſuls choſen for this year were L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Lælius, the firſt the brother, the ſecond the friend, of the great Scipio Africanus. Lælius, being reckoned the beſt general, artfully propoſed to his collegue, that inſtead of drawing lots, as was uſual, they ſhould leave the matter to the determination of the conſcript fathers. L. Scipio knew not how to decline this offer; but he deſired time to conſider of it, and then conſulted his brother. Scipio Africanus deſired him without any heſitation to accept the propoſal; and when the ſenate ſeemed unwilling to determine the affair, he, to the great ſurprize of all, offered to ſerve under his brother in quality of his lieutenant. There needed no other argument; the ſenate immediately aſſigned Aſia to the two Scipios as their common province.

(9) Herodot. l. 8. Strabo. l. 9. Pauſan. in Phocicis.

Acilius was beſieging, having already taken the town. The conſul encamped eight miles from the town, and was ſoon viſited by deputies from Athens, who came to pay their reſpects to him, and intercede for the Ætolians. They firſt imparted the chief buſineſs, which they were come upon, to Scipio Africanus, remembering, that none of the nations conquered by him had ever repented putting their intereſts into his hands. Scipio told them, that he would intercede for the Ætolians with a great deal of pleaſure, and procure them the beſt terms he could. This raiſed the expectations of that unhappy nation; they immediately aſſembled a diet at Hypata, and ſent deputies to the conſul, not doubting, but Africanus would obtain favourable terms for them. But Cornelius, having conceived ſome ſort of jealouſy, in ſeeing that they all paid a greater deference to his brother than to himſelf, though veſted with the conſular dignity, gave the embaſſadors the ſame anſwer which the ſenate had given before. He again inſiſted, that the Ætolians ſhould either pay a thouſand talents, or implicitly ſubmit to the will of the Romans. This unexpected anſwer threw the whole nation into the utmoſt conſternation. However, they ſent new deputies to the two brothers jointly, begging, that they would either abate of the ſum demanded, or at leaſt that, if they ſubmitted to the will of the conſul, their lives in general ſhould be ſaved. But Cornelius was inexorable, and would grant neither. Hereupon Echedemus, the chief of the Athenian embaſſy, adviſed them to demand a ſix months truce, and once more apply to the ſenate. They followed his advice, and being backed in their requeſt, both by Echedemus and Scipio Africanus, they obtained at length the truce they deſired. The ſame embaſſadors who had been driven from Rome were ſent back thither, and the ſiege of the citadel of Amphiſſa was raiſed. Then Acilius, reſigning up the command of the army to the new conſul, left Greece, and returned to Rome. The Ætolians themſelves were not more overjoy'd at this truce than Scipio Africanus, who was impatient to paſs over into Aſia, and once more enter the liſts with Hannibal [z].

The Ætolians obtain a ſix months truce.

THE conſular army was ſcarce withdrawn from Greece, when the Ætolians, forgetting the danger they had been in, took the field with a deſign to reſtore king Amynander, their friend and ally, to his kingdom. This prince had sided with the Ætolians, and on that account had been driven out of his kingdom by Philip, whom the Romans had put in possession of all the banished king's dominions. They soon drove all the Macedonian garisons out of Athamania, and placed Amynander again on the throne of his ancestors.

The Ætolians invaded the territories of Philip, though in alliance with Rome.

But this did not content the restless Ætolians, instead of humbling themselves to Rome, as Amynander did, for dispossessing Philip of the dominions which had been allotted to him by the republic, they pursued their conquests, and entering Amphilochia, a province of Epirus, formerly subject to them, but now under the protection of Rome, reconquered almost the whole country. From thence they advanced to Aperantia, which had likewise belonged to them, and recovered it. Having now retaken what they had lost during the war, they fell upon Dolopia, a country which had always belonged to the kings of Macedon, and to which they could lay no claim. The Dolopians were easily prevailed upon to shake off the Macedonian yoke, and submit to the Ætolians. All these conquests were so many insults offered to the republic, in the person of a king, who was joined in alliance with Rome, and had rendered her eminent services during the late war. Thus the Ætolians employed the time which they had been allowed to negotiate a peace, and to appease, by their submission, the wrath of the sovereign republic.

However, when they heard that the senate, upon an embassy from Amynander, had confirmed him in the possession of his dominions, they resolved at last to apply to the senate not only for a peace, but for their consent to hold the provinces which they had lately reduced, hoping the republic would be no less favourable to them, than she had been to their ally Amynander. Their embassadors arrived at Rome soon after the election of the new consuls, M. Fulvius Nobilior and Cn. Manlius Vulso, and before the news of the famous victory at Magnesia had reached Italy. Wherefore, the better to succeed in their negotiations, they spread a report, that the two Scipios had been made prisoners by Antiochus at a conference, and that the Roman army was entirely defeated. Being questioned about their intelligence, they pretended to have received the account from some persons of their nation in the consul's camp, and putting on an air of confidence, they seemed rather to demand than beg a peace. But these bad appearances did not abate the pride of the ſenate, or bring them to ſhew any indulgence to Ætolia : the embaſſadors were diſmiſſed, and ordered not to return without the expreſs conſent of the generals, whom the republic ſhould ſend to carry on the war in their country [a].

THE conſuls having drawn lots for their provinces, Greece fell to M. Fulvius Nobilior, who immediately ſet out, and landing at Apollonia, a city of Macedon near the borders of Epirus, aſſembled there a council of the Epirots, to deliberate on the operations of the campaign. Theſe adviſed him to begin with the ſiege of Ambracia (X), which would open him a way into the very heart of Ætolia. Herein they conſulted their own intereſt ; for Ambracia belonged formerly to the Epirots, and was now to be reſtored to them. However, Fulvius followed their advice, and, croſſing Epirus, ſat down before Ambracia. He no ſooner ſaw the town, and obſerved its ſituation, but he concluded that it would be no eaſy matter to reduce it. It was defended on one ſide by a great river (Y), on the other by ſteep and craggy hills, and ſurrounded with a high and thick wall above three miles in compaſs. The conſul began the ſiege by forming two camps ſeparated by the river, but with a communication between them ; the Epirots were poſted in one, and the Romans the other. Then he threw up two lines, one of circumvallation, and the other of contravallation, and built over-againſt the citadel, which ſtood on a hill, a wooden tower in the form of a caſtle. When the Ætolians underſtood, that Fulvius had begun the ſiege of Ambracia, they aſſembled all their troops, and marched to the relief of a place, which was a key to their dominions. They appointed Stratos, a city of Acarnania on the banks of

(X) Ambracia was formerly one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Epirus. It ſtood at the bottom of the Ambracian bay, upon the river Aracthus, at a ſmall diſtance from the ſea. The ſituation of Arba in upper Albania agrees with that of this antient city (10).

(Y) The city of Ambracia ſtood on the Aracthus, which Livy here calls Arethon. Le Noir tells us, that the natives call this river Spagmagmuriſi.

of the Achelous, for the place of the general rendezvous. In a council of war, which was held there, Nicander the prætor and most of the officers were at first for attacking the Romans. But being afterwards informed, that though the camp was fortified, the works round the place were not finished, it was thought more advisable to throw troops into the city, and strengthen the garison. Eupolemus, a man of great resolution, took upon him to perform this, and succeeded in the attempt, entering Ambracia at the head of a thousand Ætolians, where the lines were not finished. As for Nicander, he marched against the Epirots, with a design to attack them in their camp; but, finding them strongly entrenched, he thought the attack would prove too dangerous, and therefore led his army into Acarnania, and laid waste the whole country. In the mean time, the Romans and Epirots began to batter the place. The consul ordered five attacks to be made at the same time, three on the side of Pyrrheum, a small fortress without the city, one over-against the temple of Æsculapius, and another on the side of the citadel. The rams shook the walls on all sides, and the Romans, from their moveable towers pulled down the battlements with a kind of scythes, which they fastened to long beams. This did not at all dishearten the Ætolians, who were night and day on the walls, and indefatigable in preventing the ill effects of the rams and scythes. As to the former, they invented a kind of pullies, by which they let down beams, large stones, and lumps of lead upon the rams, as they were in motion, and thereby deadened their strokes. They guarded themselves against the scythes by pulling the beams, to which they were fastened, into the city with large hooks contrived for that purpose [b].

While Fulvius was thus carrying on the siege, Nicander, after having pillaged Acarnania, returned to Stratos, and from thence detached five hundred men to reinforce the garison of the besieged city. These got safe in under the conduct of one Nicodemus, with whom Nicander agreed to attack the Roman camp at a time appointed, not doubting, but, if the garison within and the army without fell upon them at the same time, and in the night, the Romans might be obliged to abandon their camp, and retire from before the city. Nicodemus narrowly watched the time in which he was ordered to sally, and at the hour appointed, pointed, though Nicander did not appear, marched out at the head of the gariſon, armed with fire-brands and torches. The Roman centries were not a little ſurprized at this ſight, and running to wake their companions ſpread the alarm over the whole camp. The legionaries marched in whole bodies, as they happened to meet, to repulſe the enemy, whom they engaged in the three different places, where the attacks were made on the ſide of Pyrrheum. Two of the enemy's bodies were driven back, but the third, commanded by two Ætolian generals, maintained their ground, made a great ſlaughter of the Romans, ſet fire to their tents, and then, not finding themſelves ſeconded by Nicander, retired in good order into the city. If Nicander had at the ſame time attacked the Romans, as he agreed to do, the ſiege would have been probably raiſed; but he did not lend the beſieged the leaſt aſſiſtance, which ſome aſcribe to timorouſneſs, while others tell us, that he was obliged to march his army that very night againſt Perſes, who had invaded Dolopia [c].

NICANDER had ſo much to do elſewhere, that he could not bring any relief to the beſieged. On one hand Perſes was to be driven out of Dolopia; and on the other the coaſts of Ætolia were to be defended from the ravages of Pleuratus, king of Illyricum, who aſſiſted the Romans with a numerous fleet, and committed great devaſtations in the Ætolian territories. The beſieged being thus abandoned, and without any hopes of ſuccours, did not, however, deſpond, but defended themſelves with incredible vigor and reſolution. The Romans had no ſooner made a breach in the wall, but it was repaired, and a new wall built up behind it. The conſul therefore altered his meaſures, and inſtead of making breaches with the ram, began to undermine the wall in hopes of throwing down great part of it at once, and entering the city before the beſieged could have time to build a new wall. The miners began the work, and being covered were not obſerved by the gariſon, till the heaps of earth that were brought out of the mine gave them the alarm. They began then to countermine, and having dug a trench of the depth they ſuppoſed the mine to be, they carried it along the wall where they heard the ſtrokes of the pick-axes of the Romans. In a few hours they came to that part of the wall which the Romans

[c] Idem ibid. c. 5.

Romans had ſapped, and ſupported with wooden props. When the two mines met, a battle enſued under-ground, firſt with pick-axes and ſpades, and then with ſwords and ſpears. But this attack did not laſt long, each party making themſelves a kind of rampart with the looſe earth. But the Ætolians, in order to drive the enemy quite out of the mine, invented a machine, which they brought to the place where the two mines met. This was an hollow veſſel with an iron bottom, bored through in many places, and armed with ſpikes at proper diſtances to prevent the enemy from approaching it. This veſſel they filled with feathers, which they ſet on fire, and with bellows driving the ſmoke on the beſiegers, obliged them to leave the mine, through fear of being ſuffocated, and interrupt the work; which interruption they made uſe of to repair the foundations of the walls [d].

This vigorous reſiſtance did not raiſe the courage of the Ætolians in general; they knew, that by the gallant behaviour of their countrymen the taking of Ambracia was only delayed; on the other hand, their dominions were attacked by the Macedonians, Illyrians, and Achæans, and to reſiſt ſo many enemies at once ſeemed impoſſible. The prætor therefore thought it neceſſary to aſſemble the diet, that the heads of the nation might conſult together about the meaſures that were moſt proper in the preſent poſture of affairs. The members of the aſſembly were all unanimous, that a peace ought to be procured upon any tolerable terms. Our dependence, ſaid they, was on Antiochus; but, now that he is confined to the other ſide of mount Taurus, we can expect no aſſiſtance from him; let us then in time avert the evils which threaten, after his ruin, to overwhelm us. Accordingly a reſolution was taken to ſend Phæneas and Damoteles to the conſul with full power to conclude a peace. Fulvius received them with haughtineſs, but did not reject their requeſt. The preliminaries he inſiſted upon were, 1ſt, that they ſhould lay down their arms; 2dly, that they ſhould deliver up to him all the horſes of their army; 3dly, that they ſhould pay to the republic a thouſand talents, one half upon the ſpot, and the other at different payments. Theſe conditions ſeemed ſo hard, that the embaſſadors begged leave to return and conſult the diet before they accepted them. Upon their retur return they were checked by the aſſembly for leaving the conſul without ſigning the articles. We muſt have a peace, they all cried out, good or bad, conclude it therefore without giving Fulvius time to reflect. They therefore immediately ſet out again for the Roman camp, but on the road were ſurrounded and taken priſoners by a party of Acarnanians, who carried them to Tyrrheum a city of Acarnania. Fulvius, being informed of what had happened, ordered the Acarnanians to ſet them at liberty; and in the mean time, as he was deſirous to ſettle Ætolia in peace before his authority was expired, he gave ear to the interceſſions of the Athenians, Rhodians, and of king Amynander, in behalf of the Ambracians. As Amynander had great intereſt in Ambracia, having long reſided there, the conſul made uſe of him to perſuade the inhabitants to capitulate, which he did very dexterouſly, prevailing upon them to ſurrender on the following terms; that the Ætolian gariſon ſhould have leave to march out of the city; that the inhabitants ſhould pay five hundred talents, two hundred down, and the reſt at ſix equal payments; that they ſhould deliver up to the conſul all the priſoners and deſerters that were in the city. Theſe articles were agreed to by the Ambracians, and approved of by the Ætolian diet. Ambracia opened her gates to the conſul, and preſented him with a crown of gold, and many fine ſtatues and pictures, whereof there were great numbers in that city, which Pyrrhus had made his capital and inriched it with many valuable monuments [e].

Ambracia capitulates.

After the ſurrender of Ambracia, Fulvius entering Ætolia encamped at Argi, the capital of Amphilochia, then ſubject to the Ætolians, who had reduced all that province. There Phæneas and Damoteles, being ſet at liberty, acquainted him, that the Ætolian diet accepted the conditions which he had offered them. Nothing now remained but to get them ratified by the ſenate, and for this purpoſe Phæneas and Nicander ſet out attended by the embaſſadors of Athens and Rhodes, who went to intercede for them with the ſenate. In the mean time, the conſul granted the Ætolians a truce, and retired to the iſland of Cephalenia. When the embaſſadors arrived at Rome, they found both the ſenate and people highly exaſperated againſt the Ætolian nation. Philip of Macedon had repreſented to the ſenate, and

and magnified, the ravages they had committed in his territories, while he was in alliance with Rome, and bitterly complained of them for unjuſtly detaining from him Dolopia, Athamania, and Amphilochia. His complaints were of ſuch weight with the ſenate, that the embaſſadors were even refuſed an audience. But the Athenian deputies were received very favourably, and the ſpeech which Damis, who was at the head of them, made in favour of that unhappy nation, greatly abated the anger of the conſcript fathers. The good offices of Valerius likewiſe, who accompanied the Ætolian embaſſadors, did not a little contribute towards appeaſing the clamours which were everywhere heard againſt this reſtleſs people, and artfully fomented by the Macedonian deputies. Caius Valerius was brother to the conſul Fulvius, and the ſon of Lævinus, who concluded the firſt treaty of alliance between Rome and Ætolia. This Valerius remembered, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours to procure them a favourable reception. But nevertheleſs Phæneas and Nicander were kept a long time in a painful uncertainty, whether they ſhould obtain a peace or not. At length, by the aſſiduous and joint application of the Rhodians, Athenians, and Valerius, a peace was concluded. The only terms they could obtain were the following; 1ſt, The majeſty of the Roman people ſhall be revered in all Ætolia; 2dly, Ætolia ſhall not ſuffer the armies of ſuch as are at war with Rome to paſs thro' her territories, and the enemies of Rome ſhall be likewiſe enemies of Ætolia; 3dly, She ſhall in the ſpace of an hundred days put into the hands of the magiſtrates of Corcyra all the priſoners and deſerters ſhe has, whether of the Romans or their allies, except ſuch as have been taken twice, or during her alliance with Rome; 4thly, the Ætolians ſhall pay down in ready money to the Roman general in Ætolia two hundred Euboic talents of the ſame value as the Athenian talents, and engage to pay fifty talents more within the ſix years following; 5thly, They ſhall put into the hands of the conſul forty ſuch hoſtages as he ſhall chuſe, none of which ſhall be under twelve, or above forty, years of age; the prætor, the general of the horſe, and ſuch as have been already hoſtages at Rome, are excepted out of this number; 6thly, Ætolia ſhall renounce all pretenſions to the cities and territories which the Romans have conquered ſince the conſulate of Flaminius, though thoſe cities and territories had formerly belonged to the Ætolians; 7thly, The city of Oenias and its diſtrict ſhall continue ſubject to the the Acarnanians; 8thly, Cephalenia ſhall not be included in this treaty [f].

How treated by the Romans after the conqueſt of Macedon.

FROM theſe articles we may judge, how far the Ætolian republic was abridged of her antient liberties by this peace. However, after the conqueſt of Macedon by Paulus Æmilius, they were reduced to a much worſe condition. For not only thoſe among them, who had openly declared for Perſes, but ſuch as were only ſuſpected to have favoured him in their hearts, were ſent to Rome in order to clear themſelves before the ſenate. There they were detained, and never afterwards ſuffered to return into their native country. Five hundred and fifty of the chief men of the nation were barbarouſly aſſaſſinated by the partiſans of Rome, for no other crime but that of being ſuſpected to wiſh well to Perſes. The Ætolians appeared before Paulus Æmilius in mourning habits, and made loud complaints of ſuch inhuman treatment, but could obtain no redreſs; nay the ten commiſſioners, who had been ſent by the ſenate to ſettle the affairs of Greece, enacted a decree, declaring, that thoſe who were killed had ſuffered juſtly, ſince it appeared to them that they had favoured the Macedonian party. From this time thoſe only were raiſed to the chief honours and employments in the Ætolian republic, who were known to prefer the intereſt of Rome to that of their country. And as theſe alone were countenanced by the ſovereign republic, all the magiſtrates of Ætolia were her creatures, and mere tools of the Roman ſenate. In this ſtate of ſervile ſubjection they continued till the deſtruction of Corinth, and diſſolution of the Achæan league, when Ætolia, with the other free ſtates of Greece, was reduced to a Roman province, commonly called the province of Achaia. Nevertheleſs each ſtate and city was governed by its own laws, under the ſuperintendency of the prætor, whom Rome ſent annually to Achaia. The whole nation paid a certain tribute, and the rich were forbidden to poſſeſs lands any-where, but in their own country [g].

IN this ſtate, with little alteration, Ætolia continued under the emperors, till the reign of Conſtantine the Great, who, in his new partition of the provinces of the empire, divided the weſtern parts of Greece from the reſt, calling them new Epirus, and ſubjecting the whole country to the Præfectus Prætorio for Illyricum. Under the ſucceſſors of of Constantine Greece was parcelled out into several principalities, especially after the the taking of Constantinople by the western princes. At that time Theodorus Angelus, a noble Grecian of the imperial family, seized on Ætolia and Epirus; the former he left to Michael his son, who maintained it against Michael Palæologus, the first emperor of the Greeks after the expulsion of the Latines. Charles, the last prince of this family, dying in 1430, without lawful issue, bequeathed the last Ætolia to his brother's son named also Charles, and Acarnania to his natural sons Memnon, Turnus, and Hercules. But great disputes arising about this division, Amurath II. after the reduction of Thessalonica, laid hold of so favourable an opportunity, and drove them all out in 1432. The Mohammedans were afterwards dispossessed of this country by the famous prince of Epirus, George Castriot, commonly called Scanderbeg, who with a small army opposed the whole power of the Ottoman empire, having defeated those barbarians in twenty-two pitched battles, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. This hero at his death left great part of Ætolia to the Venetians; but they not being able to make head against such a mighty power, the whole country was soon reduced by Mohammed II. whose successors hold it to this day.

SECT. III.

The History of Athens, from the Achæan league, to the present time.

THE Athenians, having recovered their antient liberty by means of the brave Aratus, in the manner we have related elsewhere [h], were soon obliged to implore the assistance of a more powerful protector, to maintain their freedom against Philip of Macedon, a prince, who seemed to have inherited the ambition of the first Philip, and the bravery of Alexander. This warlike monarch had formed a design of subjecting all Greece, and afterwards extending his conquests into Italy. In prosecution of this scheme, he made use of the following pretence to carry the war into Attica.

Attica. Two young Acarnanians, who happened to be at Athens while the inhabitants were celebrating the myſteries of Ceres (Z), had entered the temple of the goddeſs with the

(Z) The feſtival of Ceres was the moſt celebrated and myſterious ſolemnity of any in Greece, whence it is often called by way of eminence the myſteries. The Sicilians claimed the glory of having firſt inſtituted this ſolemn worſhip, pretending, that they had been inſtructed by Ceres herſelf in the ſecret ceremonies, which were performed on this occaſion. This goddeſs, according to the tradition of the country, taught them the art of cultivating the earth, and united them in ſocieties to live under the influence of the wiſe laws which ſhe had given them. Whence twice a a year they renewed the remembrance of theſe ſignal benefits, worſhipping alternately the mother and her daughter Proſerpine; the former in the firſt ſeed-time, and the latter in the harveſt. After the example of the Sicilians the inhabitants of Attica, who had been likewiſe inriched with the gifts of Ceres, ſignalized their gratitude to this goddeſs, by inſtituting three feſtivals in her honour.

Of theſe the firſt was called Proeroſia, becauſe it preceded the ploughing-time and the ſeed-time. On this occaſion the Athenians, who celebrated this feſtival in the name of all the Greeks, offered a great many victims in hopes of obtaining a plentiful harveſt.

The ſecond feſtival was called Theſmophoria, this word alluding to the worſhip which was paid Ceres as a law-giver. Plutarch, Diodorus Siculus, and after them Theodoret, tell us, that the ſame ceremonies were performed on this occaſion in honour of Ceres, as were practiſed by the Egyptians in the myſteries of Iſis. The celebration of this feſtival laſted five days, and each day the women of the ten tribes, of which the republic of Athens conſiſted, choſe one from among themſelves to preſide over the ceremonies that were practiſed at this ſolemnity. The victims were offered by a prieſt, who officiated with a crown on his head; whence he was called Stephanophoros. Such women, as had had three talents to their portion, were intitled to demand of their huſbands the neceſſary ſums for the expences of the ſacrifices; every one being obliged to contribute to them according to their ability.

All the women that were to aſſiſt at the ceremonies being aſſembled in one place, they went in proceſſion from Athens to Eleuſis, a ſmall city in that neighbourhood, ſinging hymns in honour of the goddeſs, and carrying the books, which contained the ſecret myſteries of the ſolemnity, and the laws, for which Attica the croud. As it was not lawful for any person to assist at those mysteries, without being initiated, the Acarnanians, who Attica was indebted to Ceres. But this depositum was intrusted with such only as were of an unblemished character and famous for their virtue. A certain number of young women were brought up at the expence of the public, and with all imaginable care, in order to be employed in this office and in the other ceremonies performed at Eleusis. These were always kept confined in the Thesmophorion, a public building in Athens, appropriated for that use, and narrowly watched by persons set over them to guard their virtue. However, when they arrived at Eleusis, they prepared themselves for the offices of their priesthood, by passing a whole day, at the feet of the statue of Ceres, in fasting and prayer. This severity ended in a kind of comedy; for as Ceres had laughed at the sight of an old woman, who insulted her, so the young virgins endeavoured by innocent jokes to stir up one another to laughter. The following days were spent in lustrations and sacrifices, from which the men were not excluded; even the prisoners, who were initiated in the mysteries of Ceres, and not yet convicted of any crime, were indulged their liberty during the five days of the solemnity, that they might join in those religious practices.

The third festival instituted in honour of Ceres, was deemed the most holy and solemn, being called the mysteries. It is said by some to have been instituted by Ceres herself, after having supplied the Athenians with corn in a time of famine; others ascribe the institution of it to king Erectheus, and some to Musæus the father of Eumolpus, or to Eumolpus himself. The temple of Eleusis was the place where all those met who were admitted to these mysterious ceremonies; and thither the Greeks flocked from all parts about the month of August, the temple as Strabo informs us, being capable of holding an immense multitude. None were admitted to celebrate the great mysteries, till they had been purified at the lesser, which were used as preparative for the greater. The manner of the purification was as follows: After having kept themselves chaste and unpolluted nine days, they offered sacrifices and prayers with crowns and garlands on their heads, and the skin of a victim sacrificed to Jupiter under their feet. About a year after, having sacrificed a sow to Ceres, they were admitted to the greater mysteries, but not suffered to enter the sanctuary till five years after, assisting in the mean time at the sacred ceremonies, only in the porch of the temple. When the years of probation were expired, the secret rites, some few excepted, who had not been admitted with the uſual ceremonies, being diſcovered by their language to be ſtrangers, were carried excepted, which were reſerved for the prieſts alone, were frankly revealed to them; whence they changed the name of Muſtai, that is, perſons initiated for that of Epoptai, or eye-witneſſes. The manner of the initiation was thus: the candidates were admitted by night into the temple, wearing crowns of myrtle on their heads. At their entering the ſacred place, they purified themſelves by waſhing their hands in holy water; and at the ſame time were told, that the external cleanneſs of the body would not be accepted by the deity of the place, unleſs attended by the internal cleanneſs of an undefiled mind. After this the holy myſteries were read to them, the prieſt who initiated them, having firſt aſked them, whether they had performed all the conditions religion required. To theſe queſtions they returned anſwers in a ſet form, and then were led by the prieſt into the moſt holy part of the temple, a place of darkneſs and horror. Then all on a ſudden a ſtrong light darted in upon them, and diſcovered a ſtatue of Ceres, richly adorned, and a very indecent figure called Myllos. The light ſoon diſappeared, and then a terrible noiſe was heard like thunder; fire fell down like lightening, and dreadful monſters appeared, which by the glimmering light of continual flaſhes of fire ſtruck the trembling ſpectators with great terror. Neither could they recover themſelves from their fright, till they were ſhewn an agreeable meadow, which was walled in behind the temple. Laſtly, the prieſt, who attended at the initiation, and was therefore called Hierophantes, or revealer of holy things, took his leave of the initiated, with exhorting them to the practice of virtue. The Hierophantes was by birth an Athenian, and of the family of the Eumolpidæ. As he was the chief prieſt, and held his office for life, he was obliged to perpetual chaſtity, and forbidden even luſtful deſires. His name was ſo venerable, that it was not even mentioned in the preſence of the profane, that is, of ſuch as were not initiated. He had three aſſiſtants, the firſt of which was called from his office Dadouchos, or torch-bearer; the ſecond was ſtiled the ſacred herald; and it was his province to forbid on pain of death ſuch as were not initiated, or were conſcious of any crime, to enter the temple; the third miniſtered at the altar, imploring the protection of the gods. The ſuperintendant over theſe myſteries was ſtiled king; and it was his duty to offer prayers and ſacrifices, to ſee that no indecency or irregularity was committed and, after the celebration of the myſteries, to aſſemble the ſenate, he ried before the chief prieſt, and by him ſentenced to die, though it was well known, that they had offended purely out

he being one of the archons, and to take cognizance of all offenders in this kind. The king had four aſſiſtants under him called Epimeletai, who were elected by the people, one out of the family of the Eumolpidæ, another out of the Cryces, and the remaining two out of the families of other citizens.

This feſtival began on the fifteenth, and ended on the twenty-thi.d day of the month Boedromion; during which time it was unlawful to arreſt any perſon, or preſent any petition, and thoſe who were found guilty of ſuch practiſes, were, according to ſome, fined a thouſand drachma's, and, according to others, put to death. If any woman rode to Eleuſis in a chariot, ſhe was obliged to pay ſix thouſand drachmas. The end of this law, which was enacted by Lycurgus, was to prevent all odious diſtinctions between the rich and the poor.

The different ſhews, with which the ſpectators were entertained each day of the feaſt, where ſymbolical repreſentations of the travels of Ceres, and the chief incidents of her life. In this conſiſted the external pomp of the feſtival. The reſt was an impenetrable myſtery, which the Hierophantes diſcovered only to the initiated, after having bound them to inviolable ſecrecy by the moſt dreadful oaths. Whoever was convicted of divulging theſe myſteries, or any part of them, became the public curſe of the people, was excluded all civil ſociety, and avoided even by his neareſt relations, who were afraid to live with him under the ſame roof. But the ordinary puniſhment for ſuch a crime was immediate death. If any perſon, not lawfully initiated, did but, through ignorance or miſtake, chance to be preſent at the myſterious rites, he was to be put to death. Perſons of both ſexes and all ages were initiated, the neglect of this ceremony being looked upon as a crime of a very heinous nature; inſomuch, that it was one of the chief articles of impeachment againſt Socrates. However, ſuch as were convicted of any crime or had even involuntarily committed murder, were debarred from theſe myſteries.

If the teſtimony of profane authors may be admitted, theſe aſſemblies were ſchools of virtue and purity. Tully gives a very favourable account of them, ſaying, that men were there taught the art of living well, and confirmed in the hopes of a better life (11). Other writers call thoſe initiations a more ſtrict engageme out of ignorance. The Acarnanian nation resented this inhuman sentence, and made bitter complaints of it to the king of Macedon, with whom they were then joined in alliance. Philip, without demanding any satisfaction, proclaimed war against Athens, and sent a body of troops to join the Acarnanians and lay waste Attica, Achaia, Lacedæmon, and Corinth had entered into an alliance with Philip; and Athens was no-ways in a condition to make head against so many enemies at once. She resolved therefore to have recourse to Rome, and by a solemn embassy implore the protection of that powerful republic. The Romans were already well known at Athens, and had been honoured there many years before with particular marks of distinction. In the consulship of Sp. Carvilius and Q. Fabius gagement than ordinary to live according to the laws of equity, as they were dictated by the goddess. On the other hand, the fathers of the church tell us, that the Pagans under the venerable names of mysteries consecrated prostitutions, and other more heinous crimes, and call the assemblies of Ceres schools of abominations and debaucheries. Perhaps these ceremonies were at first such as the profane writers represent them to have been, but afterwards came by degrees to degenerate into libertinism and licentiousness, which gave the fathers occasion to exclaim against them. They were celebrated by the Athenians every fifth year at Eleusis, and from thence translated to Rome by the emperor Adrian, and never totally abolished till the reign of Theodosius the elder.

This is the general account which the antients have given us of the mysteries of Ceres. The respect, with which they were prepossessed in favour of these mysteries, did not permit them to be more particular.

The Ceres of the Greeks was, according to Sir Isaac (12) Newton, a woman of Sicily, who came into Attica, and taught Triptolemus, the son of Celeus king of Eleusis, to sow corn, about the thirtieth year of king David's reign, or the year before Christ 1030, she died, and was deified for this benefaction about the year before Christ 1007, by Celeus and Eumolpus, who instituted the Eleusina sacra with Egyptian ceremonies, and erected a sepulchre or temple to her in Eleusis.

bius Verrucosus, thirty two years before the æra we are now speaking of, Rome had sent embassadors to Athens, and several other free states of Greece, to make them sensible of the happiness which she had procured them by humbling the Illyrians, who with frequent piracies infested their coasts. The year before Cn. Fulvius Centumalus had forced the Illyrians to submit to a peace upon very hard conditions; one of which was, that they should not suffer above three of their ships of war at a time to sail beyond the city of Lyssus, which stood on the confines of Illyricum and Macedon, near the mouth of the river Drilon. This article was so agreeable to the Athenians, that they not only received the embassadors with great demonstrations of kindness, but from that time admitted the Romans in general to partake of the mysteries of Eleusis, (A), and of all the privileges which the citizens of Athens enjoyed. They did not therefore doubt in the least, but their embassadors would meet with a favourable reception, and obtain speedy succours against an enemy, whose views could not be unknown at Rome. Neither were they disappointed in their expectation; their embassadors were treated with great distinction, and assured, that a consular army should be sent without delay to their assistance [i].

The Athenians enter into an alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians against Philip.

In the mean time, the Macedonians and Acarnanians, after having ravaged great part of Attica, were drawing near to the capital. Their approach struck the citizens with no small terror; but their fears were soon dispelled by the unexpected arrival of the fleets of king Attalus and the Rhodians. These two powers were already at war with the king of Macedon, and therefore no sooner heard, that hostilities were begun between the Macedonians and Athenians, but

(A) In the primitive times, the Athenians excluded from the mysteries of Ceres all strangers, that is, all that were not members of their own commonwealth. Hence, when Hercules Castor, and Pollux desired to be initiated, they were first made citizens of Athens (13). In process of time, they admitted all persons, barbarians excepted, and at length these also, the Romans having been the first among the barbarians, as the Greeks called all other nations, who enjoyed this honour.

but they haſtened to Athens, with a deſign to engage that republic in their alliance, and protect their territories from the inſults of Philip. All the city went out to meet them, and among the reſt the prieſts in their religious habits, as if the gods themſelves had come to the relief of the city. The people aſſembled in the market-place to conclude the alliance, and expected that Attalus would come thither in perſon. But the king thought it more ſuitable to his dignity to treat with them by meſſengers, than by word of mouth; and was alſo willing to decline the acclamations and flatteries of a people, who were too laviſh of their praiſes. In a letter, which he wrote to the magiſtrates, he gave them a particular account of his exploits againſt Philip, and the good offices he had done the republic, expreſsly mentioning four ſhips, which he had very lately taken from the Macedonians, and reſtored to Athens. He concluded with exhorting them to take advantage of the ſuccours which both he and the Rhodians now offered them. The league was concluded, and the Athenians in their tranſports of joy paid extravagant compliments to the king and the Rhodians. To their ten tribes, each of which bore the name of one of their heroes, they added an eleventh, calling it Attalis in honour of king Attalus (B). As to the Rhodians, they preſented them with a crown of gold, and made all the inhabitants of Rhodes free of Athens [k]. The king of Pergamus and the Rhodians, better pleaſed with the treaty and the ſhouts of the people, returned on board their

[k] Idem, ibid. c. 14.

(B) The number of the tribes, of which the republic of Athens conſiſted, was not always the ſame, but varied as the number of the citizens increaſed. At firſt they were but four in all; ſoon after they were ſix; in the times of Æſchines and Demoſthenes they were encreaſed to ten. In after-ages the Athenians erected three more, viz. the tribes Ptolemais, Attalis, and Adrianis, in honour of Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, of king Attalus, and of the emperor Adrian. The ten firſt tribes took their names from ten Attic heroes; theſe were Acamas the ſon of Theſeus, Ajax the ſon of Telamon, Cecrops the founder and firſt king of Athens, Ægeus the ninth king of Athens and the father of Theſeus, Erectheus the ſixth king of Athens, Hippothoon the ſon of Neptune, Leo, who ſacrificed his daughters for the welfare of his country, Oeneus the ſon of Pandion, Pandion the fifth king of Athens, and Antiochus the ſon of Hercules.

ſhips and ſet ſail, the king for Ægina, where his fleet waited for him, and the Rhodians for their own iſland.

Philip no ſooner heard, that Attalus and the Rhodians were retired, but he ſent Philocles one of his generals, at the head of a ſtrong detachment, to ravage the territory of Athens, while he himſelf, with the reſt of his army, overran all the ſouthern parts of Thrace and the Thracian Cherſoneſus. From thence he paſſed over the Helleſpont into Aſia, and laid ſiege to Abydos, which city he took by ſtorm, but reaped no advantage by his conqueſt; the Abydenians, having maſſacred their wives and children, ſet fire to the town, burnt their effects, and killed one another; ſo that the conqueror made not one ſlave [l].

The news of the reduction of Abydos, and the repeated complaints of the Athenians, made the conſul Sulpicius at laſt leave Rome; he embarqued with his army at Brunduſium, and landed at the mouth of the Apſus between Dyrrachium and Apollonia. As he came too late in the year to attempt any thing on that ſide, he immediately detached Claudius Cento to Athens, with twenty gallies and ſome legionaries, to cover the Athenian territory from the ravages of Philocles. As ſoon as he appeared at Piræus, Athens got ſome reſpite; a ſtop was put to the devaſtations in the in-land countries, and the coaſt were delivered from the ravages of the Chalcidian pirates. But this was not enough for Cento; he reſolved to puniſh the Chalcidians for their piracies; and accoringly ſet ſail with the beſt part of his ſquadron, ſurprized Chalcis, pillaged it, maſſacred all the Macedonians and inhabitants that fell into his hands, broke all the ſtatues of king Philip, burnt his magazines, arſenals, and engines of war, and then returned with the ſpoil to Athens [m].

Athens attacked, and Attica ravaged by Philip.

As for Philip, early in the ſpring he aſſembled his ſea and land-forces at Demetrias, a maritime city of Theſſaly, which he had made the capital of his dominions. He had attempted in the cloſe of the late campaign to revenge himſelf on the Romans for the ſurprize of Chalcis, and to ſurprize them in their turn. But he came too late; the Romans had retired from Chalcis, and left nothing there but dead bodies, aſhes, and ruins. Now therefore he turned all his rage againſt Athens, and having croſſed the Euripus over a bridge, marched through Bæotia towards Attic, hoping to find Athens

Athens as ill guarded as the Romans had found Chalcis. But the Athenians had received notice of his approach, and were prepared. They kept conſtantly a certain number of men in pay, whoſe whole buſineſs was to fly continually from place to place in the neighbourhood of their dominions, and make what diſcoveries they could. One of theſe couriers, having diſcovered the Macedonian army, returned in haſte to Athens, and reaching the city at midnight, brought thither the news of the approach of the enemy. The negligence of the Athenians was not leſs than that of the Chalcidians; they were all aſleep, and both the gates and walls unguarded. But the trumpets ſoon rouſed them; both citizens and ſoldiers ran to arms, took their poſt, and put themſelves in a poſture of defence. Philip, finding he could not ſurprize the city, reſolved to attack it. He therefore ordered his troops to advance to the largeſt gate, called Dipulon. The ſtreet which led to it from the market-place, and continued through the ſuburbs, was of an extraordinary breadth; ſo that the beſieged and the beſiegers had room enough to draw up their troops in battalia. The Athenians did not wait till the king came to the gate; the beſt part of the gariſon, conſiſting of auxiliaries ſent by king Attalus, and a body of Athenians, commanded by one Dioxippus, marched out to meet the enemy. Philip, overjoyed at an opportunity of joining battle, encouraged his men with this ſhort exhortation; Fix your eyes on me, and do as I do. He then fell upon the Athenians with incredible fury, forced them to retire, and purſued them to the very gate. But he ſoon found he had ventured too far, ſuch ſhowers of darts were diſcharged upon him from the ramparts, that he was obliged to ſound a retreat. If the Athenians had not been afraid of wounding their men, who were mixed with the Macedonians, few of the latter would have eſcaped unhurt. The next day the beſieged, being reinforced with ſome Roman companies and the troops of Attalus which guarded Piræus, made another ſally with much greater advantage; ſo that Philip was obliged to decamp, and poſt himſelf about three miles from Athens. But before he retired, he vented his rage in a moſt barbarous manner in that neighbourhood. He ſpared neither temples, nor tombs, nor the Lycæum, nor ſacred groves, nor houſes of pleaſure; all were, without diſtinction, pillaged, and reduced to heaps of rubbiſh. Nay, he commanded his Macedonians to break in pieces the very ſtones, that they might not be ſerviceable to them in the reparation of the demoliſhed edifices. All theſe devaſtations, with a great many aggravations, were afterwards ſet forth before the Ætolian diet by the Athenian embaſſadors, in order to draw that nation into an alliance with Rome. And, indeed, the king's behaviour on this occaſion prejudiced many of the Greeks ſo ſtrongly againſt him, that they were afterwards eaſily gained over to the Roman intereſt, not knowing, that they were bringing into their country more haughty lords, or rather arbitrary tyrants, than Macedon had ever produced, or Greece ever ſeen [n].

The irruption of the Romans into Macedon, which ſoon after happened, obliged Philip to leave Attica and all Greece, and haſten to the defence of his own country. About the ſame time, Apuſtius, to whom the pro-conſul Sulpicius had given the command of the Roman fleet, having joined the naval forces of king Attalus off the coaſt of Argolis, ſailed from thence to the port of Athens. Theſe ſuccours ſo elevated the Athenians, that they expreſſed their reſentment againſt Philip in a moſt ridiculous manner. They had formerly erected ſtatues to Philip and his anceſtors of both ſexes, and even inſtituted ſacrifices and feſtivals, and appointed prieſts in their honour. But now, out of a childiſh revenge, they deſtroyed the idols which they had worſhipped, and paſſed a decree in their aſſembly, which leſſened their eſteem even in the opinion of their friends. The purport of this decree was, that all the ſtatues of Philip and his anceſtors ſhould be broke in pieces; that the inſcriptions in their commendation ſhould be every-where erazed; that their altars ſhould be overturned, their feſtivals aboliſhed, and their prieſts degraded; that even the places, where any monuments had been erected to them, ſhould be deemed accurſed, and no monuments ever after raiſed there; that the prieſts for the future ſhould in the religious aſſemblies pronounce curſes againſt Philip and the Macedonian armies; that if any citizen ſhould have the impudence to excuſe Philip, or ſpeak in his favour, he ſhould inſtantly be put to death; and laſtly, that Philip and his poſterity ſhould be treated in the ſame manner as Piſiſtratus and his family had formerly been [o]. Theſe were the only acts of hoſtility which the degenerate degenerate Athenians committed againſt Philip, the only revenge which they took of the dreadful havock he had lately made in their territory. The officers of the Roman fleet and king Attalus, who had put in at Pyræus, where witneſſes of theſe ſhameful proceedings, and at the ſame time ſurfeited with the fulſome praiſes of which the Athenians were no leſs laviſh on them, than of their curſes on the king of Macedon [p], Athens, heretofore ſo renowned in arms, was now become one of the moſt inſignificant cities of Greece: for during the whole courſe of this war with Philip, and of that which was afterwards carried on by the Romans and their allies againſt his ſon Perſes, to the utter deſtruction of the kingdom of Macedon, the Athenians performed nothing, which the antient writers have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. They continued, indeed, inviolably attached to the Roman intereſt, not haveing been even ſuſpected to favour the Macedonian party, while in the other ſtates of Greece the friends of Macedon were far more numerous than thoſe of Rome. This ſteadineſs gained them the affection of the Romans, who left them in the full poſſeſſion of their antient liberties, even after the deſtruction of Corinth and diſſolution of the Achæan league.

In this ſtate Athens continued without any remarkable alteration till the Mithridatic war, when that city openly declared againſt the Romans her patrons and allies, being induced thereto, by one Ariſtion an Athenian philoſopher of the ſect of Epicurus. Ariſtion was of a mean extraction, but greatly eſteemed among the followers of Epicurus, for his pretended contempt of power and riches. But theſe the hypocrite had only affected to deſpiſe, as afterwards appeared, in hopes of obtaining them more eaſily that way. For Archelaus, whom Mithridates had ſent with a numerous army into Greece to ſtir up the inhabitants againſt the Romans, found it no difficult taſk to gain over this deſpiſer of riches and honours, by promiſing to raiſe him to the chief employments of his republic. Archelaus having thus engaged him in the intereſts of his maſter, ſent him over to Aſia to confer there with the king himſelf, and concert meaſures about drawing Athens off from the Roman party, to which many of the citizens were greatly addicted. The ſcheme which they formed ſucceeded to their wiſh, but proved fatal to that unhappy city. Archelaus had ſome time before reduced the iſland of Delos, and plundered the rich temple of Apollo Delius. As this iſland had been formerly ſubject to the Athenians, Ariſtion adviſed the king to ſend the ſpoils of Athens, and with the preſent a ſtrong body of men under pretence of guarding it. The Athenians were taken with this bait, and admitted the troops to the number of two thouſand into the city. By the help of theſe Ariſtion, who accompanied them, took upon him to diſpoſe of all the employments at Athens, and reigned there with great authority. All thoſe who favoured the Romans were either cruelly murdered, or ſent priſoners to Mithridates. Nor did the friends of Rome fare better in the other countries of Greece; the Achæans, Lacedæmonians, Bœotians, &c. openly declared for Mithridates, and drove out ſuch of their countrymen as refuſed to come into their meaſures [q]. Theſpia was the only city of Greece that continued faithful to the Romans (C).

Upon the news of this general revolt, C. Sextius prætor of Macedon detached Bruttius Sura his lieutenant general, at the head of a thouſand men, to put a ſtop to the progreſs of Archelaus. The prætor could ſpare him no more, being in apprehenſion that Macedon might follow the example of Greece. With this ſmall body Bruttius penetrated into Bœotia, fought ſeveral battles with the joint forces of Ariſtion and Archelaus, and continued to haraſs them, till the Lacedæmonians, and Achæans taking the field joined the Aſiatics. Then Bruttius, not being able with a handful of men to make head againſt ſo many enemies at once, reimbarqued his troops, and with his ſmall ſquadron

When Theſpia was ſacked by the Thebans under the command of Epaminondas, many of the inhabitants fled to Athens, where they were kindly entertained. Whence the Theſpians had ever after ſuch a regard for the Athenians, that they never failed to come into their meaſures, till Athens declared againſt Rome (14).

ſquadron blocked up the port of Athens. While he continued here, the fleet of Mithridates commanded by Metrophanes drew near to Eubœa, with a deſign to ſeize that iſland. Whereupon Bruttius put to ſea, and with one ſingle ſquadron forced Metrophanes to ſail back into Aſia, ſunk ſome of his ſhips, and on his return to the port of Athens made a deſcent on the iſland of Sciathos, which the Aſiatics had ſeized. He recovered the iſland, crucified all the ſlaves he found there, and cut off the right arms of all the iſlanders that fell into his hands, both ſlaves and inhabitants having joined in the revolt, and treated the friends of the republic in a very barbarous manner. The brave Bruttius, having thus preſerved the iſland of Eubœa and recovered that of Sciathos, returned to the Pyrœus or port of Athens, in order to prevent the Athenians from receiving any ſuccours by ſea from the king of Pontus [r].

Such was the ſtate of affairs in Greece, when Sylla, who had been appointed to carry on the war againſt Mithridates, landed in Theſſaly, with five legions, ſome Italian cohorts, and a ſmall body of cavalry. With theſe he was to make head againſt the joint forces of Archelaus and the ſtates of Greece, amounting in all to an hundred and fifty thouſand men. Upon Sylla's arrival, the Greek cities returned to their duty, and opened their gates to the Roman general. Athens alone, which was held by the tyrant Ariſtion, perſiſted in the revolt, and would not hearken to any terms. Whereupon Sylla reſolved to reduce it by force, thinking it neceſſary to ſettle the affairs of the republics in Greece before he paſſed over into Aſia againſt Mithridates. This capital of Attica, or rather of all Greece, conſiſted at that time of two cities, the upper called Cecropia from Cecrops its firſt founder, and the lower named Athens from Athene, or Minerva, its tutelary goddeſs. Both theſe cities were ſurrounded by one common wall, but parted by another which lay a-croſs between them, both walls being defended by ſtrong towers raiſed at ſmall diſtances from each other. The two ports of Piræus and Munychia were no leſs fortified than the city itſelf, being incompaſſed with walls of an uncommon thickneſs, and forty cubits high. Both theſe ports were joined to the city, though forty furlongs diſtant from it, by a wall which Themiſtocles had cauſed to be built, in order to ſecure the removal of ſuch such effects as were brought by sea from the port to the city. Besides those two ports or citadels, Athens was defended on the east by the Cephisus, and by the Ilissus on the west, which two rivers, winding about the plain, rendered the access to the city very difficult [a]. However, Sylla undertook to reduce it with a far smaller army than that which had been brought from Asia to defend it. Upon his entering Attica he was met by Aristion and Archelaus, but he obliged them both to retire with a considerable loss, and shut themselves up in the two cities and citadels of Athens. Archelaus took upon him to defend Piræus, and Ariston to sustain the siege of Athens and Cecropia. On the other hand, the Roman general divided his troops into two bodies; one he sent to invest the city; with the other he marched in person to attack Piræus, hoping to take it by storm. But the besieged made such a vigorous defence, that he was obliged, after many unsuccessful attacks, to retire and take up his winter quarters at Eleusis and Megara. However, he did not drop the enterprize, having left a sufficient number of troops to keep the city and castle blocked up against his return in the beginning of the spring. The whole winter he spent in making preparations for besieging the place in form, assoon as the season of the year would allow him to take the field. Entire woods were cut down, and the timber employed in making the warlike engines which were then used in sieges. Nay, he did not spare the sacred groves, nor the trees in the walks of the academy and Lycæum, which were the finest in Attica. He caused the high walls that joined the port to the city to be demolished, making use of the ruins to raise the works, and carry on the approaches; and as the enemy had laid waste the whole country, which was barren of its own nature, twenty thousand mules were continually employed in bringing provisions from Bœotia and other countries of Greece. These extraordinary expences soon drained his military chest, which was but very indifferently furnished at his first setting out from Rome: neither had he any hopes of receiving supplies either of men or money from thence, the contrary faction, headed by Marius and Cinna, prevailing in Italy, and watching all opportunities of thwarting his attempts in the east. In this distress he had recourse to the sacred and inviolable inviolable treaſures of the temples, and wrote a letter to the Amphictyones (D) aſſembled at Delphos, deſiring them to ſend him the treaſures of Apollo, and promiſing in the moſt ſolemn manner, that he would return to the god, whom he himſelf revered, the value of whatever ſhould be ſent him. One Caphis, a native of Phocis, in whom Sylla confided, was charged to deliver this letter to the Amphictyones, and excuſe to the aſſembly a ſtep, which the Roman general was forced to take againſt his will. When Caphis arrived at Delphos, he wept in the preſence of the Amphictyones, and told them, that nothing but the utmoſt diſtreſs could have obliged Sylla to make ſuch a demand, or himſelf to be the meſſenger of it, and deſired that the god might be conſulted. The oracle indeed returned no anſwer, but the ſound of Apollo's lyre was heard from the inſide of the ſanctuary, and Caphis, whether he was really terrified with the pretended prodigy, or willing to ſave the treaſure by filling Sylla with a religious fear, would not meddle with the gifts conſecrated to the god, till he had acquainted the general with what had happened. But Sylla, deriding his ſimplicity, replied, that he was ſurpriſed he ſhould not comprehend that muſic was a mark of joy, and by no means a ſign of anger and reſentment; he therefore deſired him to take the treaſures, and be aſſured, that in ſo doing he acted agreeable to the will of the god. Purſuant to this order, all the gold, ſilver, and braſs, all the vaſes, preſents, and offerings, which the ſuperſtition of the neighbouring and moſt diſtant nations had brought thither, were loaded on carts, and, amidſt the lamentations and outcries of the Amphictyones and Delphians, ſent to the Roman camp, where the gold, ſilver, and braſs was coined by Sylla's orders. The perſon he employed to take care of the coinage was Lucullus one of his quæſtors, who made ſo beautiful a coin, that it was ever after highly valued, and known by the name of the Lucullian money.

(D) The Amphictyones were, as we have obſerved elſewhere, the deputies of the cities in Greece that enjoyed the Amphictyonic right. Theſe, before they were admitted into the aſſembly, bound themſelves by a moſt ſolemn oath, to preſerve the public peace, maintain the intereſts of religion, and to the utmoſt of their power ſecure the riches of the temple at Delphos. But they durſt not refuſe a demand, which was made at the head of a formidable army.

money. The treasures of the god Æsculapius at Epidaurus, not much inferior in value to those of Apollo at Delphos, were at the same time by Sylla's orders brought to the camp, and by his quæstor turned into money [t].

Sylla, being thus furnished with money to pay his troops, and engines to carry on the siege, took the field early in the spring, and shut up both the city and port more closely than before. As he could not possibly reduce the city by famine, so long as it received supplies of provisions by sea from the Pyræus, he began by making a breach in the wall, which secured the passage from the port to the city, and lodging in the breach a strong body of legionaries, so that nothing could be conveyed from one place to the other. Having thus cut off the communication between the city and the sea, he drew a line of circumvallation which prevented the inhabitants from abandoning their native country, or receiving any supplies from the neighbouring villages. The city being thus closely shut up, Sylla applied himself entirely to the reducing of Pyræus, hoping, that in the mean time the Athenians would be obliged by famine to shake off the tyrannical yoke of Aristion, and return to their duty. It was not easy to say, whether the attack of Pyræus or the defence was conducted with the most vigor, both the besiegers and besieged behaving with incredible courage and resolution. The sallies were frequent, and attended with almost formal battles, in which the slaughter was great, and the loss generally equal. In one of these Archelaus put the Romans to flight, set fire to their machines, and obliged them to retire at a greater distance from the place. They no sooner returned than he attacked them anew, and would have obtained the like advantage, had not Murena, a legionary tribune, encouraged the Romans, and brought them back to the charge with such fury, that the besieged in their turn were forced to give ground, and save themselves within their walls, after having lost two thousand men in the engagement. The Romans pursued them so close, that they would have entered pell-mell with the Asiatics, had not the gate been timely shut, and a considerable part of the garison left without the walls at the discretion of the enemy. Among these was Archelaus himself, who would have been taken prisoner with the others, had not the the ſoldiers on the ramparts obſerving his danger thrown him down a rope, and by that means drawn him up the wall [u].

THE diſadvantage of this action did not diſhearten the beſieged, who were ſtill numerous enough to defend the place. The treachery of two ſlaves that were in the the Pyræus proved far more prejudicial to them, than the attacks of the enemy. Theſe, either out of affection to the Roman party, or in hopes of recovering their liberty, if the place ſhould be taken, wrote upon leaden balls all that paſſed within, and threw them with ſlings into the Roman camp. By this means all the wiſe meaſures which Archelaus took were immediately communicated to the enemy, and none of his attempts attended with the uſual ſucceſs. He reſolved one night to ſally out againſt the enemy's works, and at the ſame time to ſend all his cavalry to fall upon their camp. But he no ſooner took this reſolution, than Sylla, who cauſed all the balls of lead to be carefully gathered, found one with this intelligence; To-night at ſuch an hour the foot will attack your works, and the cavalry your camp. He made uſe of this advice, and poſted his troops ſo, that the beſieged were ſoon forced to retire with conſiderable loſs. As the city began to be in great want, Archelaus deſigned to ſend a great quantity of proviſions to relieve the gariſon, and to convey it into the city by a ſtrong detachment, which might have eaſily broke through the body of Romans that guarded the paſſage. But Sylla, who was timely acquainted with this deſign by the two ſlaves, doubled the guard, placed his men in ambuſhes, intercepted the convoy, and cut in pieces moſt of the Aſiatics who eſcorted it [w].

NOTWITHSTANDING all theſe advantages, Archelaus ſtill held out, in hopes of being ſoon relieved by Taxiles, one of Mithridates's generals, who was marching through Epirus to his aſſiſtance at the head of a hundred thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe, with ninety chariots armed with ſcythes. As the approach of this formidable army, which had already reduced Thrace and Macedon, gave new courage to the beſieged, ſo it diſheartened the Romans. Whereupon Sylla exerted his utmoſt endeavours to take the place by ſtorm, before the arrival of ſo numerous an army. One night while the centinels on the walls were aſleep, he ordered ſome of the boldeſt among his legionaries to ſcale the ramparts, which they did accordingly, and drove off the enemies that were posted to guard them. But the rest of the garison taking the alarm, the Romans were obliged to save themselves by leaping down into the ditch, and retiring in great disorder. Archelaus took advantage of the confusion the Romans were in, and made a vigorous sally with a design to burn a tower which had been lately raised by Sylla, and from whence the Romans greatly galled the besieged on the walls. Sylla hastened to the defence of a work, which had cost him much time and labour; the engagement lasted from morning to night, many falling on both sides; but the tower was preserved entirely by the valour of Sylla, who on that occasion distinguished himself in a very eminent manner [x].

In the mean time, the two cities of Athens and Cecropia began to be greatly distressed for want of provisions; Archelaus had several times attempted to throw in convoys, but had always found on that occasion the Romans on their guard, and the detachment, which was posted between the post and the city, reinforced with new troops from the camp. He therefore began to suspect that he had traitors about him, but nevertheless resolved to attempt once more the relief of the city. He did not doubt but Sylla would be soon acquainted with his design, and in consequence of that intelligence send a considerable detachment from his camp to reinforce the legionaries that guarded the road. As the army would be greatly weakened by this detachment, he thought that would be a proper time to make a sally against the camp, and demolish the works. This design he imparted to none, and therefore the sally proved very successful, several of the enemy's machines being reduced to ashes; but the convoy was intercepted and most of the Asiatics that guarded it cut in pieces [y].

Sylla had raised many castles round the walls, from the several floors of which such showers of arrows were discharged against the besieged, that they could not, without great danger, appear on the ramparts. To obviate this inconvenience, Archelaus ordered his men to undermine the castles, which were raised on large foundations of stone, and by this means several of them were thrown down, and the Romans, who were lodged in them, either killed or dangerously wounded. While the besieged were thus busy under-ground, the Romans beat down with their rams great part of the wall, and thought themselves at last masters of the

the place. But in a general aſſault Archelaus repulſed the beſiegers with ſuch reſolution, that they were forced to abandon the enterprize, and apply all their thoughts to the widening of the breach, before they could entertain any hopes of taking the place by ſtorm. The Aſiatics had, in imitation of the Romans, raiſed wooden towers without the walls, which rendered the approach to them very difficult and dangerous. Sylla therefore altered his meaſures, and, inſtead of uſing the ram, ordered his men to dig a way to the bottom of the walls, and ſap their foundations, ſupporting them with large beams, leſt they ſhould be buried themſelves in the ruins. The wall being thus undermined, fire was ſet to the props, which being burnt, great part of the wall fell down with a dreadful noiſe, which ſtruck the beſieged, who did not expect it, with great terror. Sylla laid hold of this opportunity to mount the breach at the head of his beſt troops; but Archelaus oppoſed him with ſuch reſolution, that he was obliged to give ground. The Roman general returned thrice to the aſſault, but was as often repulſed; nay, in the laſt attack his men ſuffered ſo much, that he himſelf thought it adviſeable to give over the attempt, and lead his weary legions back to the camp. There they continued inactive for ſeveral days, and in the mean time Archelaus built another wall within that which the beſiegers had with ſo much pains and labour beat down. This new wall Sylla began to batter before it was dry; but the prodigious quantity of arrows and burning materials, which were from thence diſcharged upon the aggreſſors, obliged him not only to deſiſt from the attempt, but to retire with ſome precipitation [z].

And now Sylla gave over all thoughts of taking the place by aſſault, and therefore turned the ſiege into a blockade, in hopes of reducing it by famine. All the avenues both to the city and the port were guarded by ſtrong detachments, ſo that neither proviſions of any ſort could be carried in, nor any of the inhabitants find a way out. By this means the city, which was then one of the moſt populous of the world, was reduced to ſuch ſtraits, that a buſhel of barley was ſold for a thouſand drachmas. Many of the citizens had nothing elſe to maintain themſelves with but the roots and graſs, which they found growing about the walls. In this diſtreſs the ſenators and prieſts went to throw themſelves at the tyrant Ariſtion's feet, conjuring him to have pity on the city, and to ſubmit to the Romans upon any tolerable terms. But the tyrant was ſo far from being touched with their complaints, that he ordered his guards to diſcharge their arrows againſt them, and in that manner drove them from his preſence. In the midſt of the public miſery, Ariſtion and his accomplices in the tyranny were plentifully provided with all ſorts of proviſions; their tables were ſerved with the moſt exquiſite meats, while the common people and many of the nobility, after having conſumed their horſes, dogs, and all other animals, were forced to live upon leather, which they ſoftened by ſteeping it in water, and even upon human fleſh [a]. The tyrant was at laſt prevailed upon by the importunities of the people to ſend embaſſadors to the Roman camp; but as theſe made no propoſals, but only deſcants on the exploits of Theſeus, Eumolpus, and their anceſtors againſt the Medes and Perſians, Sylla interrupted them, deſiring the haranguers to keep their rhetorical flouriſhes for themſelves, ſince he was not come to Athens to be informed of the proweſs of their anceſtors, but to puniſh their rebellion. Ariſtion had ſent theſe declaimers with no other view but to quiet the people, and make them believe, that he was willing to ſave the city by capitulating with the Romans; but he ſtill depended on the ſuccours which were on full march to the relief of the city under the command of Taxiles; theſe he daily expected, and therefore, though, in compliance with the importunities of the people, he ſent out embaſſadors to Sylla, yet he had no mind to come to any agreement, nor even propoſed any terms, which he imagined the Roman general might accept [b].

SYLLA had ſpies in Athens, as well as in Pyræus, who were continually running about and intruding into all companies. One of theſe having one day over-heard ſome old men, that were walking in a place called Ceramicos (E), blaming the tyrant for not fortifying and guarding a certain part of the wall, where the enemy might eaſily ſurprize the city, upon his return to the camp acquainted

[a] Plut. in Sylla. [b] Appian. ibid.

(E) There were two places at Athens bearing this name, the one in the city, and the other in the ſuburbs; the former was a place of reſort for proſtitutes, and much frequented by reaſon of its walks. The other was appointed for the burying-place of great men, ſuch eſpecially as had died fighting for their country.

quainted Sylla with what he had heard. Upon this advice, the Roman went at midnight to take a view of the place, and finding that it might be eaſily ſcaled, ordered his legionaries without delay to apply their ladders, which they did accordingly with great chearfulneſs, being tired out with ſo long a ſiege, and entered the city ſword in hand. While the legionaries were engaged within the city, Sylla battered the walls ſo violently with his rams, that he opened a large breach, and, at the head of his whole army, came to the relief of thoſe who were fighting on the ramparts. The Athenians were ſtruck with terror when they ſaw the Romans advancing in good order within their walls, and, throwing away their arms, implored the clemency of the conqueror. But Sylla had been much provoked by the ſatyrical reflections of the Greeks, from their ramparts on himſelf and his wife (F), to grant them any quarter. He allowed his ſoldiers to plunder the city, and inhumanly to murder even the women and children. The ſlaughter was ſo mercileſs, that the very channels in the ſtreets flowed with blood. The next day all the ſlaves were ſold by auction, and liberty granted to the few citizens who had eſcaped the ſwords of the ſoldiers. A few days after the reduction of Athens, Cecropia, whither Ariſtion had retired, was likewiſe forced to ſurrender. The tyrant, his guards, and all who had been in any employment under him, were put to death; but the others by Sylla's orders ſpared. He would not ſuffer the city to be ſet on fire, ſaying, that he pardoned the children for the ſake of their fathers. The only puniſhment he inflicted upon the few citizens, who had the good luck to out-live that fatal day, was, that they ſhould not for the future have the power of chooſing their own magiſtrates, nor ever repair the breach which he had made in the wall. The firſt part of this puniſhment he ſoon remitted, and reſtored the city to the full enjoyment of its antient liberties. Some time after the reduction of Athens and Cecropia, Archelaus, having held out till his new wall was beat down, thought it adviſe-able to abandon the place, and accordingly, after a long and moſt glorious defence, embarqued his troops, and retired firſt to Munychia, and from thence advanced to join Taxiles[c]. Sylla having poſſeſſed himſelf of the Pyræus, to leave behind him ſome marks of his reſentment, deſtroyed moſt of the ſtately buildings, and amongſt others the magazines and the arſenal, which had been built by the celebrated architect Philo, and was reckoned a maſterpiece of art.

This ſtorm being blown over, the Athenians enjoyed a profound tranquility, till the civil war broke out between Cæſar and Pompey, when they ſided with the latter, and were therefore cloſely beſieged by Q. Fuſcius Calenus, Cæſar's lieutenant, who committed great devaſtations in Attica, deſtroyed ſeveral edifices which had been ſpared by Sylla, and reduced the city of Athens to great ſtraits. However, they held out ſo long as they had any hopes of being relieved by Pompey; but when news was brought them that he was entirely defeated, they ſurrounded at diſcretion, and met with a more kind treatment than they expected; for Cæſar not only pardoned them, but received their city under his protection, ſaying, that he ſpared the living for the ſake of the dead. But this kindneſs was not ſufficient to keep a people in obedience, that had an utter averſion to any that ſavoured of ſervitude; for they no ſooner heard of Cæſar's death, but they openly declared for his murderers, received Brutus and Caſſius into their city, and even erected ſtatues unto them, which they placed next to thoſe of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, who had aſſerted the liberty of their country againſt the tyrannical uſurpations of the ſons of Piſiſtratus. After the defeat of Brutus and Caſſius they ſided with Antony, who not only reſtored them to the full poſſeſſion of all the privileges they had enjoyed in the moſt flouriſhing times of their republic, but enlarged their dominions, by ſubjecting to Athens the iſlands of Cea, Sciathos, Peparethus, and Ægina[d]. After the defeat of Anthony, Auguſtus puniſhed their ingratitude to Julius Cæſar, by taking from them the iſland of Ægina, and forbidding them to ſell the freedom of their city. Towards the latter end of Auguſtus's reign they began to revolt, but were without much trouble reduced to their former obedience.

obedience. Germanicus, the adopted ſon of Tiberius, honoured them with the privilege of having a lictor, which was deemed a mark of ſovereign power; this grant was confirmed to them by Tiberius and his ſucceſſors, under whoſe protection they maintained their antient form of government till the reign of Veſpaſian, who reduced Attica, with the reſt of Greece, to a Roman province, ſaying, that the Greeks knew not how to enjoy their liberty. But the emperor Adrian, who had been archon of Athens before his acceſſion to the imperial throne, reſtored them to the full enjoyment of all their antient privileges, and beſtowed upon them a large ſum of money with an annual proviſion of corn. In his reign and at his charge the two ports of Pyræus and Munychia were repaired, and a whole region of new buildings added to the old city. This quarter was called Adrianopolis from Adrian, whom the Athenians, as appears from ſome ancient inſcriptions [e], not undeſervedly uſed to ſtile the ſecond founder of their city. All the privileges granted them by Adrian were not only confirmed, but extended, by his ſucceſſors M. Antoninus Pius and M. Antoninus the philoſopher; the latter of which allowed them handſome ſalaries for the maintenance of their public profeſſors. But Severus abridged them of a great many privileges, to revenge, as is ſuppoſed, an affront which he received at Athens while he ſtudied there [f]. Valerian was more favourable to them, and gave them leave to repair that part of the wall which had been thrown down by Sylla. In the reign of Gallienus, as Zoſimus informs us, or of Claudius, as Cedrenus will have it, the city was taken and plundered by the Goths, who were ſoon obliged by Cleodemus, who had eſcaped their fury, to abandon their new conqueſt, and ſave themſelves by a timely flight. Conſtantine the Great was a peculiar patron and benefactor of the Athenians, honouring their chief magiſtrate with the title of grand duke, and granting them many other privileges of greater conſequence, which were confirmed and enlarged by Conſtantius, who moreover put them in poſſeſſion of ſeveral iſlands in the Archipelago. In the time of Arcadius and Honorius they were cruelly haraſſed and pillaged by the Goths, who turned all the ſtately and magnificent ſtructures, that were ſtill ſtanding, into heaps of ruins. From this time there is ſcarce any mention made of Athens till the thirteenth century, when it was in the hands of Baldwin, as Nicetas informs us [g], and beſieged by one of the generals of the Greek emperor Theodorus Laſcares, who was forced to raiſe the ſiege after haveing ſuffered a conſiderable loſs. The ſame author tells us, that it was not long after beſieged and taken by the marquis Bonifacius. It fell afterwards into the hands of one Delves of the houſe of Arragon, upon whoſe death it was ſeized by Bajazet [h], who did not hold it long, being driven out by the Catalonians under the command of Andronicus Palæologus the elder. The Catalonians were in their turn diſpoſſeſſed of it by Reinerius Acciaioli a Florentine, who, having no lawful iſſue, left the ſtate or dukedom of Athens, as it was then called, to the Venetians, and Thebes with Bœotia to his natural ſon Anthony. Anthony made war on the Venetians, and in one campaign recovered the whole ſtate of Athens, which continued for ſome years under the government of the Acciaioli, but was at laſt reduced by the Turks in 1455. Francis Acciaioli, the laſt duke of Athens and prince of Achaia, ſeeing his country threatened with an invaſion by the Mohammedans under the conduct of Omares, and not being in a condition to make head againſt ſo numerous an army, had recourſe to the weſtern princes, called then the Latines; but theſe refuſed to aſſiſt him, unleſs he engaged his ſubjects to renounce all the articles wherein the Greek church differed from the Latin, which he not being able to perform, was forced to deliver up both himſelf and the city to the Barbarians, who firſt treated their captive with great humanity, but afterwards put him to death [k]. Athens remained ſubject to the Turks till the year 1687, when it was after a ſhort ſiege taken by the Venetians, and not many years after retaken by the Turks, who continue maſters of it to this day.

To what we have ſaid of the greater republics of Greece, we ſhall add ſomething relating to the ſmaller ſtates, namely, thoſe of Bœotia, Acarnania, and Epirus. The Bœotians, after having driven out their kings, as we have related above [l], formed themſelves into a republic, whereof the chief magiſtrates were the Prætor or Strategos, the Bœotarchi, and the Polemarchi. The prætor was

was always choſen from among the Bœotarchi, and his authority laſted only a year, it being death for the prætor, according to the laws of the republic, not to reſign his office before the firſt month, called Boucatios, of the new year was expired. His authority was much the ſame with that which was veſted in the prætors of Achaia and Ætolia. The province of the Bœotarchi was to aſſiſt the prætor with their advice, chiefly in war, and to command under him; they were the ſupreme court of the nation in what related to military affairs, the prætor himſelf, who was one of their body, not daring to act contrary to their determinations. As to their number we are in the dark, ſome authors mentioning ſeven, ſome nine, and ſome even eleven, all veſted with ſome command in the army. But their authority was not confined to military affairs only, they bore a great ſway in the civil adminiſtration, and were from thence ſtiled Bœotarchi, or governors of Bœotia. They were choſen yearly, and obliged by law, as well as the prætor, to lay down their employment on pain of death before the firſt month of the new year was expired. The Polemarchi were entirely civil magiſtrates, it being their province to maintain peace and concord at home, while the Bœotarchi were employed abroad in the wars of the republic. Beſides theſe magiſtrates there were four councils, in which the whole authority of the ſtate, as Thucydides informs us [m], conſiſted. Theſe were made up of the deputies that were ſent by all the cities of the Bœotian republic, and without their approbation the Bœotarchi could not declare war, make peace, conclude alliances, or tranſact any other buſineſs of importance, as appears from Thucydides [n], who tells us, that an alliance with ſome of the neighbouring ſtates, which had been approved by all the Bœotarchi, was rejected by a plurality of voices in the four great councils of the nation. At Thebes, the chief city of Bœotia, merchants, and even artificers, were admitted into the number of citizens, an honour which they enjoyed in no other city of Greece. However, they were excluded there, as in all the other Greek ſtates, from public employments, purſuant to a law which obtained all over Greece, and declared thoſe only qualified for the adminiſtration of public affairs, who had abſtained for the ſpace of ten years years from all manner of trade and traffic [o]. We find another of the Bœotian laws mentioned by the antients [p], which forbids on pain of death any parent to expose his child; if he had not wherewithal to maintain the infant, he was by the same law directed to put it into the hands of a magistrate, and the magistrate to dispose of it to any one that was willing to bring it up; but the child thus brought up was condemned to perpetual slavery, being entirely at the disposal of the person who had taken care of it during its childhood.

The Bœotians, and especially the Thebans, were continually harassed by the princes of Macedon, as we shall relate in the history of Alexander and his successors. Nevertheless they sided with Philip against the Romans, and could not be prevailed upon by the Athenians and Achæans to desert him and join the other states of Greece, till he was intirely defeated in the famous battle of Cynocephalæ. As they were then sensible, that the Romans would at last prevail, they thought it advisable to provide by time for their own safety, and accordingly sent deputies to Flaminius, imploring his protection. The proconsul received them with great humanity, and put them upon the same foot with the other allies of the republic in Greece. Not long after they offered a petition to Flaminius, which seemed reasonable. A great many Bœotians had served in the Macedonian army, and these the proconsul was desired to demand of Philip, who had then made a truce with the Romans. Flaminius complied with their request, and obtained what he desired of Philip, who immediately sent back the Bœotian troops, and with them one Brachyllas, who had been banished, for appearing too zealous in the cause of the Macedonians against the Romans. The Bœotians, though indebted to Flaminius alone for the return of their troops, thanked the king of Macedon only, and to shew their gratitude, in the first election they made of a prætor, they preferred Brachyllas, famous for his attachment to Philip and hatred to the Romans, to Zeuxippus and Pisistratus, who were both zealous partizans of Rome; nay, they had the confidence to make this impolitic election in the sight of the Roman camp. In like manner all the other employments were filled with such only as were enemies to Rome and friends to Macedon. These steps greatly exasperated Flaminius, and Zeuxippus and Pisistratus joined their their reſentment to that of the proconſul. Theſe two Bœotians foreſaw that Brachyllas would not fail to vent his rage upon them, as ſoon as the Roman troops were withdrawn from Greece, and therefore reſolved to be beforehand with him, while Flaminius continued there. All the friends of Rome concurred in this deſign, perſuading the proconſul, that neither their lives nor fortunes could be ſafe ſo long as Brachyllas was alive. Flaminius approved of their deſign, but refuſed to contribute to it himſelf. His approbation was ſufficient encouragement, Zeuxippus and Piſiſtratus, having hired three Ætolians and three Italians, fell upon Brachyllas, as he was one night returning home from an entertainment, and diſpatched him. Some of his companions, who were conducting him to his houſe from the banquet when the aſſaſſins attacked him, were at firſt the only perſons ſuſpected of the murder. But Zeuxippus appeared with an air of confidence in the aſſembly of the people, undertook the defence of the accuſed, and ſhewed, that it was not at all probable, that debauchees ſhould have courage enough to make any attempts on the life of the prætor. This aſſurance made ſome of the Bœotians believe, that Zeuxippus was no ways privy to the murder; but others took umbrage at ſeeing him ſo mighty ſolicitous in having thoſe cleared who were apprehended, and began to ſuſpect, that the prætor had been murdered by them, and the plot laid by Zeuxippus. On this ſuſpicion, thoſe who were in his company being put to the rack, though innocent, accuſed Zeuxippus and Piſiſtratus, purely upon the public ſuſpicions, without being able to bring any proofs of their accuſation. Hereupon Zeuxippus, who was conſcious to himſelf of the crime laid to his charge, changing his preſumption into fear, privately withdrew from Thebes, where the murder was committed, to Tanagra another city of Bœotia. Piſiſtratus continued in Thebes, not fearing the depoſition of men who had not been any ways privy to the crime; he was only under apprehenſion of being diſcovered by a ſlave, who had been employed in the aſſaſſination by Zeuxippus his maſter; he therefore wrote to Zeuxippus at Tanagra, deſiring him to diſpatch the ſlave, as one more fit to be employed in a bad action than to keep it a ſecret. The meſſenger was ordered to deliver the letter into Zeuxippus's own hands; but he, thinking the ſlave faithful and affectionate to his maſter, truſted it with him. The ſlave read it, and finding it contained ſentence of death againſt himſelf, left his master that instant and repaired to Thebes, where he discovered the whole affair. Pisistratus was apprehended and put to death ; but the odium of the murder fell entirely on the Romans. Zeuxippus retired to Athens, and lived there without any apprehension, being recommended to the magistrates of that city by his protectors the Romans.

The Bœotians were inclined to take up arms, but having no officer of experience to head them, and Philip refusing to lend them any assistance, they contented themselves with a private revenge, murdering all the Romans they found straggling about the fields ; insomuch, that they could no longer cross the country but in large bodies. At last Flaminius being informed that many of his men were missing, and that there were just grounds to suspect they had been murdered by the Bœotians, sent officers with troops to inquire into the matter, and apprehend the authors of such treacherous proceedings. The officers upon their return acquainted him, that great numbers of Romans had been murdered, and their bodies, to prevent discovery, thrown into the lake of Copias (G). He was at the same time assured, that the cities of Coronæa and Acræphia (H) had on that occasion signalized their hatred to the Romans. Upon this information the proconsul ordered the murderers to be delivered up to him, and as he had lost five hundred men, the Bœotians were condemned to pay five hundred talents ; troops were likewise sent to ravage the fields of Acræphia,

(G) This lake, which is the same with the lake called by Pausanias (15) the lake of Cephisus, took its name from the city of Copæ. It was in former times, as Strabo tells us (16), three hundred and seventy-one furlongs in compass ; but is now much less. It is fed by the river Cephisus, and the poets tell us, that Hercules made it by turning the Cephisus into the plain of Orchomenos. The people of this neighbourhood are said to have been the first inventors of oars, whence the city next to the lake was called Copæ from the Greek word κώπη.

(H) Coronæa, a city of Bœotia, stood on the river Cephisus, where it discharges itself into the lake Copias, not far from mount Helicon (17). It is famous on account of the victory which Agesilaus gained there over the Thebans and Athenians. The city of Acræphia stood between the springs of the Ismenus and the Asopus.

Acræphia, and lay ſiege to Coronæa. The Bœotians, who were conſcious to themſelves that they deſerved ſevere puniſhment, ſeeing the proconſul drawing together his troops, with a deſign to treat them as they deſerved, had recourſe to the Athenians and Achæans, whoſe mediation was of ſuch weight with Flaminius, that he immediately ordered the ſiege of Coronæa to be raiſed, and remitted four hundred and ſeventy talents of the fine he had laid upon the treacherous cities of Bœotia. He inſiſted only on their delivering up to him the murderers, who were accordingly apprehended and carried to the Roman camp, where they were brought to condign puniſhment. This mixture of mildneſs and ſeverity was highly extolled and applauded by the Bœotians, who ever afterwards continued faithful to the Romans. But as ſome of their leading men joined Perſes king of Macedon in his wars againſt the Romans, the whole country was on that ſcore treated with great ſeverity, Rome being at that time under no apprehenſion of an invaſion from Antiochus, as ſhe was when Flaminius ſuffered himſelf to be ſo eaſily appeaſed. At the diſſolution of the Achæan league Bœotia with the reſt of Greece was reduced to a Roman province [q].

ACARNANIA lay between Ætolia and Epirus, was a free ſtate, and governed by a prætor, a general aſſembly, and other ſubordinate magiſtrates of the ſame nature and authority as thoſe of the Achæans and Ætolians. The Acarnanians were above all the other Greeks addicted to the kings of Macedon, and chiefly to Philip, the father of Perſes. They alone adhered to him after the famous battle of Cynocephalæ, valuing themſelves upon an inviolable fidelity in the obſervation of treaties. However, Lucius Flaminius, brother to Titus Flaminius, took upon him to bring them over to the Romans, and deprive Philip of this his only ſupport. With this view he engaged the chief men of the nation to meet him in the iſland of Corcyra, whither they reſorted according to their appointment; but the reſult of this conference was to appoint another in the city of Leucas, the capital of Acarnania (I). In this ſecond interview

[q] Liv. l. xxxii, c. 7.

(I) Leucas was the capital of Acarnania, where the general aſſembly of the Acarnanians uſed to meet. The city gave its name to the whole iſland, which was called Leucadia, but is now known terview the leading men of the nation, after warm disputes, drew up the plan of a confederacy with the Romans, and were inclined to desert Philip. But some who had been bribed by the king, leaving the assembly with indignation, filled all the city with their complaints; the people joined them, and, as they were generally inclined to the princes of Macedon, who had often protected them against the Ætolians, the whole city was in an uproar. During this general commotion, Philip sent Echedemus and Androcles, two Acarnanians greatly esteemed in their own country, and steady friends to Macedon. These declaimed with great virulency against their slavish countrymen, who, without any regard to the faith of treaties, were betraying the interest of their country, in order to deliver up the whole nation to the mercy of an imperious republic. The people, already prepossessed against the Romans, backed the remonstrances of the two deputies, and openly protested, that they would not enter into any engagements prejudicial to the interest of Philip. Thus the decree, which had been drawn up in favour of the Romans, was unanimously rejected in the assembly, and Archelaus and Bianor, who were the authors of it, declared enemies to their country, and guilty of the blackest treachery. Zeuxidas, their prætor, was deposed, for no other reason, but because he had proposed the affair in the assembly. However, upon more mature deliberation, the sentence past against these three was disannulled, and they restored to their former honours. But at the same time their alliance with the king of Macedon was renewed, and the treaty, made by some private men with the known by the name of Santa Maura. It lies in the Ionian sea, and is now divided from the continent by a strait, which is not above fifty paces over. The Carthaginians are said to have settled a colony here, and to have formed this strait or canal; for Leucadia was formerly a peninsula, being joined to Acarnania by a neck of land. Near this city stood in antient times a stately temple consecrated to Apollo, and the famous rock, whence despairing lovers leaped into the sea. During the feast of Apollo the Leucadians yearly threw down from the top of this rock a criminal, who had been sentenced to die, imagining that the gods would load the criminal with all the evils that threatened the city. They fastened a great many birds and feathers to his body, believing they would make his fall less violent. If he happened not to be killed by the fall, his life was spared, but he was banished for ever.

the Romans, rejected with indignation. Lucius, who had in the beginning of the tumult retired from Leucas, reſolved to reduce the Acarnanians by force; and accordingly having made the neceſſary preparations, he ſailed from Corcyra with a deſign to lay ſiege to Leucas. He thought that the very ſight of the Roman troops would frighten the citizens into a compliance with his requeſt; but he was diſappointed; the Leucadians appeared on the walls, and prepared to make a vigorous reſiſtance. Whereupon the Roman general began his approaches, being reſolved to take the place by ſtorm. Leucadia, or the territory of Leucas, was at that time a peninſula, being joined to the weſtern part of Acarnania by a neck of land, about five hundred paces in length and a hundred and twenty in breadth; in after-ages, this iſthmus being dug through, Leucadia became an iſland. Lucius, having viewed the ſituation of the place, reſolved to attack it on that ſide which was waſhed by the ſea, and on that account the leaſt fortified; the water being very low near the walls, the earth was eaſily removed, and the wall without much trouble undermined, and thrown down. But the beſieged made ſuch a vigorous reſiſtance, that the Romans were repulſed in three ſucceſſive attacks, which obliged the general to allow them ſome reſt; and in the mean time the Leucadians raiſed a new wall ſtronger than the former. The ſiege would have been protracted to a great length, had not ſome Italian exiles, who were well acquainted with the place, brought a great many Romans privately into the city. Theſe, uniting themſelves into one body, marched ſtrait to the market-place, and while the inhabitants were engaged with them there, the reſt of the army ſcaled the walls, and marched in good order to the relief of their companions. The Acarnanians were ſurrounded, and thoſe who refuſed to ſubmit put to the ſword. The reduction of the capital ſtruck ſuch terror into the whole nation, that they deſerted Philip, and ſubmitted to the Romans, under whoſe protection they lived, according to their own laws, till the deſtruction of Corinth, when Acarnania became part of the province of Achaia[r].

EPIRUS was bounded on the eaſt by Ætolia, on the weſt by the Adriatic, on the north by Theſſaly and Macedon, and on the ſouth by the Ionian ſea. This country was anciently governed by its own princes, in which ſtate it made no ſmall figure, as we ſhall ſee in a more proper place. Epirus.

Deidamia,

Deidamia, great grand-daughter to the famous Pyrrhus, having no iſſue, gave the Epirots their liberty, who formed themſelves into a republic, which was governed by magiſtrates annually elected in a general aſſembly of the whole nation. Their neighbourhood to Macedon obliged them to be continually on their guard againſt thoſe princes, who made frequent incurſions into their country, took and pillaged their cities, and forced them to contribute, as if they had been their ſubjects, to all the charges of the wars they carried on with the other ſtates of Greece. The Romans, after having conquered Philip, reſtored them to their antient liberty; but they, forgetful of this favour, took up arms againſt their friends and benefactors and joined Perſes, which ſo provoked the Roman ſenate, that they diſpatched peremptory orders to Paulus Æmilius, after the reduction of Macedon, commanding him to plunder the cities of this ungrateful people, and level them with the ground. This decree drew tears from the eyes of Æmilius, but he could not decline the execution of it. He therefore ſet out at the head of his victorious army, and arriving on the confines of Epirus, ſent ſmall bodies of troops into all the cities under pretence of withdrawing the gariſons, that the Epirots might enjoy the ſame liberty which Rome had granted to Macedon. The Romans were received in all the cities of Epirus with great demonſtrations of joy; for Æmilius had not communicated his orders to any one for fear of terrifying the Epirots, who would not have failed to defend themſelves and their country with their uſual bravery. In the mean time, Paulus Æmilius ſent orders to the ten chiefs, who were diſperſed in the different provinces, and governed all Epirus, enjoining them to bring to his camp all the gold and ſilver they had in their reſpective diſtricts. The chiefs with great reluctance complied with his order, and by this means what was moſt valuable in Epirus was ſaved out of the hands of the greedy ſoldiers, and delivered to the quæſtors to be laid up in the public treaſury. All the reſt was given up as a prey to the ſoldiery. Though the conſular troops were cantoned in different places, the execution was made the ſame day and hour, the Roman ſoldiers falling every where with incredible fury on the houſes, which were abandoned to their mercy. The whole booty was ſold, and of the money raiſed by the ſale each foot ſoldier had two hundred denarii, that is 6 l. 9 s. 2 d. and each of the horſe the double of this ſum. An hundred and fifty thouſand men were made ſlaves, and ſold to the beſt bidder bidder for the benefit of the republic. Nor did the vengeance of Rome ſtop here; all the cities of Epirus, to the number of ſeventy, were diſmantled, and the chief men of the country carried to Rome, where they were tried, and moſt of them condemned to perpetual impriſonment [s]. After this fatal blow Epirus never recovered its antient ſplendor. Upon the diſſolution of the Achæan league, it was made part of the province of Macedon; but when Macedon became a dioceſe, Epirus was made a province of itſelf, called the province of Old Epirus, to diſtinguiſh it from New Epirus, another province lying to the eaſt of it. On the diviſion of the empire, it fell to the emperors of the eaſt, and continued under them till the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins, when Michael Angelus, a prince nearly related to the Greek emperor, ſeized on Ætolia and Epirus, of which he declared himſelf deſpote or prince, and was ſucceeded by his brother Theodorus, who took ſeveral towns from the Latins, and ſo far enlarged his dominions, that diſdaining the title of deſpote, he aſſumed that of emperor, and was crowned by Demetrius archbiſhop of Bulgaria. Charles, the laſt prince of this family, dying without lawful iſſue, bequeathed Epirus and Acarnania to his natural ſons, who were driven out, as we have related above, by Amurath the ſecond. Great part of Epirus was afterwards held by the noble family of the Caſtriots, who, though they were maſters of all Albania, yet ſtiled themſelves princes of Epirus. Upon the death of the famous George Caſtriot, Epirus fell to the Venetians, who were ſoon diſpoſſeſſed of it by the Turks, in whoſe hands it ſtill continues, being now known by the name of Albania, which comprehends the Albania of the antients, all Epirus, and that part of Dalmatia which is ſubject to the Turks.

THUS we have ſeen, through a ſeries of many ages, the riſe, progreſs, declenſion, and laſtly the final ruin, of the ſeveral ſtates of Greece. The firſt form of government introduced among them was monarchical, which, as Plato obſerves, is formed upon the model of paternal authority, and of that gentle and moderate dominion, which fathers exerciſe over their families. But as power, when lodged in one perſon, becomes often haughty, unjuſt, and oppreſſive, eſpecially if it is hereditary, the ſeveral ſtates of Greece, in proceſs of time, began to be weary of a kingly government, and to put the adminiſtration of public affairs into into many hands; so that monarchy every were, except in Macedon, gave way to a republican government, which was diversified into as many various forms as there had been different kingdoms, according to the different genius and peculiar character of each people. However, they all had liberty for their fundamental principle, but this liberty was prevented from degenerating into licentiousness by wise laws, which awed the people, and kept them to their duty. As every individual, at least in the early times of Greece, was capable of attaining the chief honours of his republic, he considered his country as his inheritance. The children were taught from their infancy to look upon their country as their common mother, to whom they more strictly appertained than to their parents, and not as private persons, who regard nothing but their own interest, and have no sense of the misfortunes of the state, but as they affect themselves. They studied above all things to maintain among the citizens and members of the state a great equality, without pride, luxury, or ostentation. Magistrates, who had bore a great sway during their office, became afterwards private men, and had no authority but what their experience gave them. Those who had commanded armies one year, served perhaps the very next as subalterns, and were not ashamed to perform the most common functions, either in the armies or fleets. The principles, which prevailed in all the states of Greece, were the love of poverty, contempt of riches, disregard of self-interest, concern for the public good, desire of glory, love for their country, and above all such a zeal for liberty as no danger could intimidate. So long as they adhered to these principles, they were invincible; we have seen them not only making head with a handful of men, against the innumerable armies of the Persians, but putting them to flight, and obliging the most powerful monarch then upon earth to submit to conditions of peace, as shameful to the conquered as they were glorious to the conquerors. But as soon as luxury and the love of riches prevailed among them, they began to degenerate, and in a short time became a quite different people. The Persians soon perceived this alteration, and, by bribing those who had the greatest share in the government, found means to make them turn their arms against themselves. These intestine divisions, carefully fomented by the Persians, so weakened them, that Philip of Macedon and his son Alexander ander met with no great oppoſition in reducing a people, that had for ſo many ages maintained their liberty, againſt the whole power of the Perſian monarchy. They made ſeveral attempts to reinſtate themſelves in their antient condition; but theſe efforts were ill-concerted, and only ſerved to increaſe their ſlavery. They were therefore at laſt obliged to have recourſe to the Romans, who after having gained them by attractive charms of liberty, which was their darling paſſion, and made uſe of them to deſtroy the Macedonian power, at laſt turned their arms againſt thoſe they were come to aſſiſt, and reduced to ſlavery the nations which they pretended to deliver. Greece, thus deprived of its antient power, ſtill retained another ſovereignty, to which the Romans themſelves could not help paying homage. Athens continued to be the ſchool of polite arts, and the center of refined taſte in all the productions of the mind. Rome, haughty as ſhe was, acknowledged this glorious empire, and ſent her moſt illuſtrious citizens to be finiſhed and refined in Greece. Cicero, already the admiration of the bar, did not think it below him to become the diſciple of the great maſters Greece then produced. The emperors themſelves, who were by more weighty affairs prevented from going into Greece, brought Greece in a manner home to themſelves, by receiving into their palaces the moſt celebrated philoſophers, for the education of their children and their own improvement. Thus by a new kind of victory Greece triumphed over Rome, and made the conquerors of the world ſubmit to her laws.

SECT. IV.

The Hiſtory of the GRECIAN States in ASIA MINOR.

The Hiſtory of IONIA.

IONIA, ſo called from the Ionians, who inhabited this part of Aſia Minor, was bounded on the north by Æolia, on the weſt by the Ægean and Icarian ſeas, on the ſouth by Caria, on the eaſt by Lydia and part of Caria. Name and diviſion of Ionia.

It

It lies between the 37th and 40th degrees of north latitude, and was but of a very small extent in longitude, which we shall not pretend to determine, there being a great disagreement among authors, as to the boundaries of the inland country.

Cities of Ionia.

The most remarkable cities of Ionia were, Phocæa, now Foggia, built, according to Velleius [a], by the Ionians,

according to Pausanias [b], by the Phocenses of Greece, and according to Strabo [c] by the Athenians. Some writers tell us, that while the foundations of this city were laying there appeared near the shore a great shole of sea-calves, whence it was called Phocæa, the word Phoca signifying in Greek a sea-calf. Ptolemy, who makes the river Hermus the boundary between Æolia and Ionia, places Phocæa in Æolis, but all other geographers [d] reckon it among the cities of Ionia. It stood on the sea-coast between Cuma to the north, and Smyrna to the south, not far from the Hermus, and was in former times one of the most wealthy and powerful cities of all Asia, but is now a poor beggarly village, though the see of a bishop. The Phocæans were, as Herodotus [e] informs us, expert mariners, and the first among the Greeks that undertook long voyages, which they performed in gallies of fifty oars. As they applied themselves to trade and navigation, they became acquainted pretty early with the coasts and islands of Europe, where they are said to have founded several cities, namely Velia in Italy, Alalia or rather Aleria in Corsica, Marseilles in Gaul [f], &c. Neither were they unacquainted with Spain; for Herodotus tells us [g], that in the time of Cyrus the Great, the Phocæans arriving at Sartessus a city in the bay of Cadiz, were treated with extraordinary kindness by Arganthonius king of that country, who hearing that they were under no small apprehension of the growing power of Cyrus, invited them to leave Ionia, and settle in what part of his kingdom they pleased. The Phocæans could not be prevailed upon to forsake their country; but accepted of a large sum of money, which that prince generously presented them with to defray the expence of building a strong wall round their city. The wall wall they built on their return, but it ſtood them in no ſtead againſt the mighty power of Cyrus, whoſe general Harpagus inveſting the city, with a numerous army, ſoon red ucedit to the utmoſt extremities. The Phocæans, having no hopes of any ſuccour, began to capitulate, but the conditionss, offered by Harpagus, ſeeming ſome-what hard, they begged he would allow them three days to deliberate, and in the mean time withdraw his forces, Harpagus, though not ignorant of their deſign, complyed with their requeſt, and the Phocæans taking advantage of this condeſcenſion put their wives, children, and all their moſt valuable effects on board ſeveral veſſels which they had ready equipt, and conveyed them ſafe to the iſland of Chios, leaving the Perſians in poſſeſſion of empty walls. Their deſign was to purchaſe the Œneſſian iſlands, which belonged to the Chians, and ſettle there: but the Chians not caring to have them ſo near, leſt they ſhould engroſs all the trade to themſelves as they were a ſea-faring people, they put to ſea again, and having taken Phocæa their native country by ſurprize, put all the Perſians they found in it to the ſword. As they were well appriſed that the Perſians would reſent ſuch inhuman proceedings, they re-imbarked with all expedition, ſteering their courſe towards Cyrnus now Corſica, where twenty years before they had built the city of Alaria or Calaris. Before they left Phocæa the ſecond time they uttered moſt dreadful imprecations againſt ſuch as ſhould ſtay behind, binding themſelves by a ſolemn oath never to return till a red-hot ball of iron, which on that occaſion they threw into the ſea, ſhould appear again unextinguiſhed. However, above half the fleet broke through all theſe engagements, and returned ſoon to Phocæa, the Perſians, who were deſirous the city ſhould be re peopled, offering a general pardon to ſuch as had been concerned in the maſſacre. The remaining part arrived ſafe at Alaria, where they continued five years, infeſting the neighbouring ſeas with piracies, and ravaging the coaſts of Italy, Gaul, and Carthage. Hereupon the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians, entering into an alliance againſt them, fitted out a fleet of 120 ſail, with a deſign to drive them from Cyrnus. The Phocæans, not at all diſmayed at the ſight of ſo powerful a fleet, engaged them in the ſea of Sardinia with half their number, and after a bloody engagement put them to flight. But the victory coſt them dear, forty of their ſhips being ſunk, and most of the rest quite disabled (A). Whereupon not finding themselves in a condition to stand a second shock, (and the enemies were preparing to attack them anew) they resolved to abandon the island, and retire with their wives and children to Rhegium; which they did accordingly, but soon left that place, and settled in Œnotria, now Ponza, a small island in the Tyrrhenian sea, over-against Velia in Lucania, which their ancestors had founded. Those who returned home lived in subjection either to the Persians or tyrants of their own. Among the latter we find mention made [h] of Laodamas, who attended Darius Hystaspis in his expedition against the Scythians, and of Dionysius, who joining Aristagoras, tyrant of Miletus and chief author of the Ionian rebellion, retired after the defeat of his country-men first to Phœnicia, where he made an immense booty, seizing on all the ships he met with trading to that country. From Phœnicia he sailed with immense riches to Sicily, where he committed great depredations on the Carthaginians and Tuscans; but is said never to have molested the Greeks [i]. In the Roman times the city of Phocæa sided with Antiochus the Great; whereupon it was besieged, taken, and plundered by the Roman general, but allowed to live according to its own laws. In the war, which Aristonicus, brother to Attalus king of Pergamus, [h] Herodot. l. 4. & 6. [i] Idem, ibid.

(A) Herodotus, tells us, that such of the Phocæans as had lost their ships in the engagement fell into the hands of the Carthaginians and Tyrrhenians, who attacked them as they came ashore in their small boats, and put them all to death. As this happened in the territory of Argilla in Tuscia, both the inhabitants and cattle of that district were seized with a dreadful distemper, which obliged the Argyllians to have recourse to the oracle of Delphos, being desirous to attone for the crime they had committed in what manner the god of that place should direct. The oracle enjoined them to commemorate yearly the death of the Phocæans, with great magnificence and gymnastic combats; which they did accordingly, beginning as soon as their deputies returned from Delphos, and were immediately delivered from the raging distemper. Out author adds, that they continued even in his time the same combats, and performed all the other rites which the oracle had prescribed on that occasion (1).

Pergamus, ſtirred up againſt the Romans, they aſſiſted the former to the utmoſt of their power, which ſo diſpleaſed the ſenate, that they commanded the town to be demoliſhed, and the whole race of the Phocæans utterly rooted out. This ſevere ſentence had been put in execution had not the Maſſilienſes, a Phocæan colony, interpoſed, and with much ado aſſwaged the anger of the ſenate [k]. Pompey declared Phocæa a free city, and reſtored the inhabitants to all the privileges they had ever enjoyed; whence under the firſt emperors it was reckoned one of the moſt flouriſhing cities of all Aſia Minor. This is all we have been able to gather from the antients, touching the particular hiſtory of Phocæa.

Smyrna, called by the Turks Iſmyr, is ſituated on the iſthmus of the Ionian peninſula, at the bottom of a bay, to which it gives name, and is reckoned one of the largeſt and richeſt cities of the Levant. Smyrna was not at firſt one of the twelve cities of the Ionian league, ſo often mentioned by the antients, but was in proceſs of time admitted into that confederacy by means of the Epheſians, who lived, as Strabo [l] informs us, for many years in the ſame diſtrict with the Smyrnæans; and hence it is, that Epheſus is ſometimes called Smyrna. Velleius Paterculus [m] reckons it among the cities of Æolis, wherein he agrees with Herodotus [n], who tells us, that Smyrna was built by the Æolians, but afterwards deſtroyed by the Ionians, who claimed the ground on which the city ſtood, and all the neighbouring country. Be that as it will, it muſt have been ſoon after rebuilt; for the ſame Herodotus, or whoever elſe is the author of Homer's life, deſcribes it as a famous empory in that poet's time, whither merchants reſorted from all parts. Pliny [o] is of opinion, that it was founded by an Amazon named Smyrna; and adds, that it was many ages after rebuilt and embelliſhed by Alexander. What he ſays of the Amazon is commonly looked upon as quite fabulous, though the preſent inhabitants pretend, that it borrowed its name of an Amazon, who, coming into Aſia at the head of a female army, poſſeſſed herſelf of this city. Neither was it rebuilt by Alexander, for Strabo, a writer far more exact, informs us [p], that Smyrna, four hundred years after it had been destroyed by the Lydians, during which time the Smyrnæans lived in villages, was begun to be rebuilt by Antigonus, but that Lysimachus put the last hand to the work. This new city was built, according to the same writer, twenty furlongs distance from the place where the old city stood; between the castle on the shore and the present city, as our best modern travellers conjecture [q] from the many ruins of edifices, that are still to be seen in that place (B). This new city, as it was most conveniently situated for trade, became in a short time one of the most populous and wealthy of all Asia, as is plain from several inscriptions, in which it is stiled, The metropolis, the first and chief city of Asia, The ornament of Ionia, &c [r]. But nothing can give us a greater idea of the magnificence of antient Smyrna, than the description of it we read in Strabo [s]. "It "is at present, says he, the finest city in Asia. One part "of it is built on a hill, but the finest edifices stand on a "plain not far from the sea, over-against the temple of "Cybele. The streets are the most beautiful that can be, "strait, wide, and paved with fine stone. It has many "stately buildings, magnificent porticoes, majestic tem-"ples, a public library, and a convenient harbour, which "may be shut up at pleasure." There are still to be seen many vestiges of the antient grandeur of Smyrna, namely, of a marble theatre, which was reckoned the finest in Asia, of a circus, of baths, temples, &c. for the description of which we refer our readers to Le Bruyn, Tournefort, Spon, and other modern travellers. Neither the circus, nor the theatre were built, it seems, in Strabo's time, else he

(B) A modern traveller (2), tells us, that many valuable pieces of antiquity have been found there, and mentions four antient statues that were dug up in that place, while he was at Constantinople, and are still to be seen at Versailles. Our author adds, that in 1671. an urn was discovered in the same place with this inscription, Marcus Fabius, the son of Marcus Fabius, of the Galerian family, sirnamed Junius, one and twenty years old. Upon opening the urn they discovered the bodies both of the father and son lying together in armour which was still entire.

he would have mentioned them among the other edifices that embelliſhed the city. The walls of Smyrna were waſhed by the Meles, a river of great note in the republic of letters, for Homer is ſaid to have been born near its banks; whence, as the name of his father was unknown, he was called Meleſigena. Some writers add [t], that he compoſed his inimitable poem in a cave near the ſpring of this river (C). Under the Roman emperors the city of Smyrna was at the height of its grandeur, and ever courted by them, as it was the fineſt harbour in Aſia, and diſtinguiſhed with titles, exemptions, and privileges above all the cities of Aſia, Epheſus alone excepted. Tiberius ſhewed on all occaſions a great eſteem for the Smyrnæans, and Marcus Aurelius rebuilt their city, after it had been almoſt quite ruined by an earthquake, and the ſucceeding emperors heaped ſuch favours on them as raiſed no ſmall jealouſy among the other Greeks of Aſia. The Smyrnæans on the other hand continued ever faithful to the Romans, and are ſaid to have been the firſt in Aſia that honoured Rome, under the title of Rome the Goddeſs, with a temple, prieſts, and ſacrifices; which they did while Carthage was at the higheſt pitch of its glory, and Aſia in great part poſſeſſed by powerful princes, who had not yet experienced the Roman valour.

As to the preſent city, it is ſituated on the ſhore at the foot of a hill which commands the port, and may be juſtly ſtiled the centre of trade to the Levant. Its convenient harbour and ſituation have ſaved it from undergoing the ſame fate which moſt cities in Aſia, though formerly of great note, have ſuffered. The great cities of Sardis ſo famous in the Greek hiſtory, of Pergamus, the capital of a rich kingdom, of Epheſus, the metropolis of all Aſia, are at preſent but ſmall villages: Thyatira, Philadelphia, Laodicea, &c. are known only by ſome antient inſcriptions; whereas whereas Smyrna, tho' often deſtroyed by earthquakes (D), is ſtill one of the richeſt and moſt populous cities in the eaſt, being reſorted to by all the trading nations of Europe, Aſia, and Africa. They reckon in the city fifteen thouſand Turks, ten thouſand Greeks, eighteen hundred Jews, two hundred Armenians, and as many Franks. Its territory is very fertile and pleaſant, abounding chiefly in vines and olive-trees; but the air is not reckoned very wholeſome. Smyrna was one of the ſeven churches mentioned in the revelations, and is the only one that ſtill remains in any reputation.

As for the particular hiſtory of the Smyrnæans; their city at firſt belonged to the Æolians, as we have hinted above, but was taken from them by the Ionians in the following manner. A great many of the inhabitants of Colophon, an Ionian city, being driven out on account of a ſedition they had raiſed at home, fled to the Smyrnæans, who received them with great kindneſs, which they requited with the utmoſt ingratitude. For not long after, while the inhabitants were performing certain religious ceremonies in honour of Bacchus without the walls, they ſhut the gates, and ſeized on the city. This alarmed all the Æolians, who haſtened to the aſſiſtance of their countrymen with what forces they could raiſe; but the Colophonians being ſupported by the other cities of Ionia, both parties came to an agreement, whereby it was ſtipulated, that the Ionians ſhould reſtore to the Smyrnæans all their effects, and the Æolians on their part ſhould quit their claim to the city. The Smyrnæans conſenting to theſe conditions were diſtributed among the other eleven Ionian cities, and allowed to enjoy the ſame privileges. The Colophonians continued in poſſeſſion of Smyrna, which was thenceforth reckoned among the twelve Ionian cities [u]. It was afterwards taken by Alyattes king of Lydia, and continued ſubject to the Lydians till the time of Cyrus, by whoſe whoſe general Harpagus it was brought under the Perſian yoke, with the other cities of Ionia. The Smyrnæans, according to the character Ariſtides gives them [w], followed their pleaſures, and lived in great luxury, but, what ſeldom happens, were at the ſame time ready to exert themſelves, when called upon, and behaved with great gallantry (E).

Clazomenæ. CLAZOMENÆ, now Vourla, as is commonly believed, was one of the twelve Ionian cities, and of great note in the flouriſhing times of Greece. The antient city, as Pauſanias [x] informs us, ſtood on the continent, and was by the Ionians fortified at a vaſt expence, in order to put a ſtop to the Perſian conqueſts. But the inhabitants were ſo terrified after the defeat of Crœſus and ſurrender of Sardis, that they abandoned the city on the continent, and withdrew all their effects to one of the neighbouring iſlands, where they built the city of Clazomenæ, ſo often mentioned in the Roman hiſtory. Alexander joined it to the continent by a cauſe-way two hundred and fifty paces long [y]; whence Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny, and moſt of the antient geographers count it among the cities on the continent. The Romans always treated the inhabitants with great kindneſs, knowing of what importance their city was for carrying on their conqueſts in Aſia; for they not only declared them a free people, but moreover put them in poſſeſſion of the iſland of Drymuſa, and often quarrelled with the princes of Aſia on their account [z]. Auguſtus repaired and embelliſhed their city with many ſtately buildings, whence on ſome medals he is ſtiled the founder of Clazomenæ (E); though

(E) Mr. Tournefort makes mention of a medal in the king of Pruſſia's cabinet, with the head of Auguſtus, and the inſcription, Founder of Clazomenæ. though this city was without all doubt founded by the Ionians, and from the very beginning one of the Ionian confederacy. Some antiquaries take Clazomenæ for the antient city of Grynium, which gave the epithet of Grynæus to Apollo; for there was in antient times a famous temple of Apollo in the neighbourhood of Clazomenæ; Cybele likewise was one of their chief deities, and also Diana, as we gather from several antient medals and inscriptions. The Clazomenians held out against the Lydians, after most of the other cities of Ionia were reduced by Alyattes, who besieged, but could not master, Clazomenæ. The Persians got possession of it in the time of Cyrus, who carried all before him, and thought it of such consequence, that they could not be induced to part with it at the famous peace of Antalcidas. Alexander reinstated them in their antient liberty and privileges, which were rather enlarged than diminished by the Romans, whom they assisted on all occasions with great fidelity.

Erithræ. ERITHRÆ, one of the twelve Ionian cities, is placed by some on the shore over-against the island of Chios, but by Strabo [a] on the peninsula, at the foot of mount Mimas, over-against the islands called by the antients Hippi. Erithræ was the seat of Herophile, one of the Sybils, thence called the Erithræan [b]. It had a spacious harbour called Cyssus, and a temple of Hercules, which was reckoned one of the most stately edifices of all Asia. Erithræ sided on all occasions with the Romans, who rewarded their fidelity with ample privileges, and considerably enlarged their territory [c].

Teos. TEOS, situated on the south side of the Ionian peninsula, was likewise one of the twelve cities. Anacreon was born here, and also Hecatæus the historian. The inhabitants, abandoning in Anacreon's time their native country, where they were grievously oppressed by the Persians, retired to Thrace, and settled in the city of Abdera [d], which Timesius of Clazomenæ had founded (F). They were the only among among the Ionians, as Herodotus obſerves [e], who preferred baniſhment to ſlavery, and are therefore greatly commended by that writer. Some of them returned afterwards to their antient habitation, for in the Roman times the city of Teos was of ſome note, and well peopled [f] Auguſtus in ſeveral medals is called the founder, which title he may have deſerved by repairing and embelliſhing that, as he did moſt other cities of Aſia. Pliny [g] counts Teos among the iſlands, wherein he is contradicted by all the antient geopraphers. The ſmall town of Eræ and Myonneſus, between Teos and Lebedus, were formerly ſubject to the Teians, who enjoyed a large territory, extending from their city to the neighbourhood of Lebedus.

LEBEDUS, counted by Mela, Strabo, and Herodotus among the twelve Ionian cities, ſtood on the iſthmus of the Ionian peninſula over-againſt Smyrna, and was famous in antient times for the ſports that were yearly performed in honour of Bacchus. Lyſimachus utterly ruined the city, and transferred the inhabitants to Epheſus [h]. Upon his death they left Epheſus and rebuilt Lebedus, which, however, never afterwards made any figure, being a village rather than a city [i]. Lebedus.

COLOPHON, now Altoboſco, or, as others will have it, Belvedere, was one of the chief cities of the Ionian league, ſeated on the coaſt, and not an inland city, as Pliny [k] calls it. It was deſtroyed by Lyſimachus, and the inhabitants ſent to people Epheſus; but after his death rebuilt in a more convenient ſituation. The Colophonians were ſo ſkilled in horſemanſhip, that thoſe they ſided with were always ſure of the victory, which gave riſe to the trite proverb [l] (G). Colophon was the birth-place of Nican- Colophon.

der, and one of the seven cities that claimed Homer, who lived there some time, as Herodotus informs us in the life of that great poet [m]. The antients mention a famous grove and temple of Apollo Clarius in the neighbourhood of this city [n]. Whence that fabulous deity borrowed the epithet of Clarius is uncertain, some pretending that his temple stood in a small town near Colophon called Claros, and others maintaining that he was so called from a mountain bearing that name. The small town of Notium on the same coast often mentioned by Livy belonged to the Colophonians, and was by the Romans allowed to enjoy the same privileges as Colophon itself [o].

Ephesus. Ephesus, called by the present inhabitants Aiasaloue, was in former times the metropolis of all Asia. Stephanus gives it the title of Epiphanestate, or most illustrious, Pliny stiles it the ornament of Asia, and Strabo the greatest and most frequented empory of that continent. How different was the antient Ephesus from the modern, which is but a sorry village inhabited by thirty or forty Greek families, who are not capable, as Spon observes, to understand the epistle St. Paul wrote to them! The antient city stood fifty miles south of Smyrna, near the mouth of the river Cayster and the shore of the Icarian sea, which is a bay of the Ægean; but as it has been so often destroyed and rebuilt, 'tis no easy matter to determine the precise place; most of the modern travellers are of opinion, that the antient city stood more to the south than the present, which they argue from the ruins that still remain. Ephesus was in antient times known by the names of Alopes, Ortygia, Morges, Smyrna Trachæa, Samornion, and Ptela [p]; it was called Ephesus, according to Heraclides [q], from the Greek word Ephesis, signifying permission, because Hercules, says he, permitted the Amazons to live and build a city in that place; others tell us, that Ephesus was the name of the Amazon that founded the city, for Pliny [r], Justin [s], and Orosius [t] unanimously affirm, that it was built by an Amazon, while others bestow this honour upon Androclus, son of Codrus, king of Athens, who was the chief of the Ionians that settled in Asia. But in matters of so early a date, it is impossible to come at the truth, and therefore not worth our while to dwell on such fruitless fruitleſs enquiries. What we know for certain is, that the city, which in the Roman times was the metropolis of all Aſia, acknowledged Lyſimachus for its founder; for that prince having cauſed the antient city to be entirely demoliſhed, rebuilt at a vaſt expence a new one in a place more convenient and nearer the temple. Strabo tells us, that, as the inhabitants ſhewed a great reluctance to quit their antient habitations, Lyſimachus cauſed all drains, that conveyed the water into the neighbouring fens and the Cayſter, to be privately ſtopt up; whereby the city being on the firſt violent rains in great part laid under water, and many of the inhabitants drowned, they were glad to abandon the antient, and retire to the new-city. This new Epheſus was greatly damaged by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, but by that emperor repaired and embelliſhed with ſeveral ſtately buildings, of which there are now but few ruins to be ſeen, and ſcarce any thing worthy of antient Epheſus. The aqueduct, part of which is ſtill ſtanding, is generally believed to have been the work of the Greek emperors; the pillars, which ſupport the arches, are of fine marble, and higher or lower as the level of the water required. This aqueduct ſerved to convey water into the city from the ſpring of Halitee mentioned by Pauſanias. The gate, now called by the inhabitants, for what reaſon we know not, the gate of the perſecution, is remarkable for three baſs-reliefs on the mould, of an exquiſite taſte. The port, of which ſo many medals have been ſtruck, is at preſent but an open road, and not much frequented. The Cayſter was formerly navigable, and afforded a ſafe place for ſhips to ride in, but is now almoſt choaked up with ſand.

The temple of Diana.

BUT the chief ornament of Epheſus was the ſo much celebrated temple of Diana, built at the common charge of all the ſtates in Aſia, and for its ſtructure, ſize, and furniture accounted among the wonders of the world. This great edifice was ſituate at the foot of a mountain, and at the head of a marſh, which place they choſe, if we believe Pliny, as leſs ſubject to earthquakes. This doubled the charges, for they were obliged to be at a vaſt expence in making drains to convey the water that came down the hill, into the moraſs and the Cayſter. Philo Byzantius, tells us, that in this work they uſed ſuch a quantity of ſtone, as almoſt emptied all the quarries in the country; and theſe drains or vaults are what the preſent inhabitants take cree forbidding any one to name him; but this prohibition ſerved only to make his name more memorable, ſuch a remarkable extravagance, or rather madneſs, being taken notice of by all the hiſtorians who have wrote of thoſe times. Alexander offered to rebuild the temple at his own expence, provided the Epheſians would agree to put his name on the front; but they rejected his offer in ſuch manner as was no-ways taken amiſs by that vain prince, telling him, that it was not fit one god ſhould build a temple to another [x]. The pillars and other materials that had been ſaved out of the flames were ſold, and alſo the jewels of the Epheſian women, who on that occaſion willingly parted with them, and the ſum raiſed from thence ſerved for the carrying on of the work till other contributions came in, which in a ſhort time amounted to an immenſe treaſure. And this is the temple which Pliny, Strabo, and other Roman writers ſpeak of. It ſtood between the city and the port, and was built, or rather finiſhed, as Livy [y] tells us, in the reign of king Servius. Of this wonderful ſtructure there is nothing at preſent remaining but ſome ruins, and a few broken pillars.

The Ionians firſt ſettled at Epheſus, under the conduct of Androclus, who drove out the Carians and Leleges, by whom thoſe places were poſſeſſed at his arrival. The city, whether built by him, as Strabo affirms, or by one Crœſus, or Epheſus, long before the Ionic migration, as others maintain, became ſoon the metropolis of Ionia. It was at firſt governed by Androclus and his deſcendants, who aſſumed the royal title, and exerciſed regal authority over the new colony; whence even in Strabo's time the poſterity of Androclus were ſtiled kings, and allowed to wear a ſcarlet robe, a ſceptre, and all the enſigns of the royal dignity. In proceſs of time a new form of government was introduced, and a ſenate eſtabliſhed, but when or on what occaſion, this change happened, we know not. This kind of government continued till the time of Pythagoras, who lived before Cyrus the Great, and was one of the moſt cruel and inhuman tyrants we read of in hiſtory; for having driven out the ſenate, and taken all the power into his own hands, he filled the city with blood and rapines, not ſparing even thoſe who fled to the temple of Diana for ſhelter [z]. Pythagoras was ſucceded by Pindarus, who bore the ſame ſway in the city, but treated the citizens with more humanity. In his time time Epheſus being beſieged by Crœſus king of Lydia, he adviſed the inhabitants to devote their city to Diana, and faſten the wall by a rope to the pillars of her temple. They followed her advice, and were, in regard of the goddeſs, not only treated with great kindneſs by Crœſus, but reſtored to their former liberty [a]. Pindarus, being obliged to reſign his power, retired to Peloponneſus. He was, according to Ælian [b], grandſon to Halyattes king of Lydia, and Crœſus's nephew. The other tyrants of Epheſus, mentioned in hiſtory, are Athenagoras, Comas, Ariſtarchus, and Hegeſias, of which the laſt was driven out by Alexander, who, coming to Epheſus after having defeated the Perſians on the banks of the Granicus, beſtowed upon Diana all the tributes which the Epheſians had paid to the Perſians, and eſtabliſhed a democracy in the city. In the war between Mithridates and the Romans they ſided with the former, and by his direction maſſacred all the Romans that reſided in their city; for which they were ſeverely fined and reduced almoſt to beggary by Sylla, but afterwards treated kindly, and ſuffered to live according to their own laws, as is plain from ſeveral antient inſcriptions and medals (I). The Epheſians were mightily given to ſuperſtition, ſorcery, and curious arts, as the ſcripture ſtiles them [c], whence came the proverb, Epheſian letters, ſignifying all ſorts of ſpells or charms (K).

(K) By the Epheſian letters were meant certain obſcure words, and incoherent ſentences, which ſuperſtitious bigots uſed to write on their girdles, and even imprint on their feet, and other parts of their bodies. To this purpoſe Suidas tells us, that a famous wreſtler of Miletus, having for a long time ſtruggled with an Epheſian without being able to conquer him, obſerved at laſt that his adverſary, who had already got the better of thirty robuſt and expert wreſtlers, was armed with the Epheſian letters, which he was no ſooner deprived of, than he fell to the ground, owning himſelf conquered (9).

places it at a great distance from the sea, but all other geographers count it among the maritime towns of Ionia.

Miletus. Miletus, now Palatschia, was formerly a city of great note, being stiled, by Pliny [d] and Pomponius Mela [e], the first city and metropolis of all Ionia. The same Pliny [f] mentions the antient and new Miletus, the former he calls Lelegeis, Pithyusa, and Anactoria, and Strabo tells us that it was built by the inhabitants of Crete [g]. The latter was founded, according to Strabo [h], by Neleus the son of Codrus king of Athens, when he first settled on that part of Asia. This great city stood on the south side of the river Mæander near the sea-coast. The inhabitants applied themselves very early to navigation, having founded, according to Pliny [i] eighty, according to Seneca [k] three hundred and eighty, colonies in different parts of the world. The city itself was no less famous for a temple and oracle of Apollo sirnamed Didymæus, than for the wealth and number of its citizens. This temple was burnt by Xerxes, but rebuilt by the Milesians to such an immense size, that it was accounted the greatest in the world, being equal in compass, as Strabo attests [l], to a village; whence it remained uncovered, but was surrounded with a thick grove, in which the priests dwelt who served the temple. Pliny places this temple and grove at a hundred and fifty-eight furlongs distance from the city, but Strabo says that it stood near the walls [m]. Our modern travellers tell us, that there are still large ruins of the temple to be seen, but that the town is reduced to a few shepherds cottages. Near Miletus stood mount Lathmus, where the moon, as the poets feigned, made her private visits to Endymion. Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, and the first that foretold an eclipse of the sun, was born in this city and thence surnamed the Milesian, to distinguish him from a famous Lyric poet bearing the same name.

Miletus was in a most flourishing condition in the time of Darius Hystaspis, and accounted the ornament of Ionia, as Herodotus informs us [n], though it had been strangely afflicted with domestic troubles for two generations

tions before, and almoſt reduced to the laſt extremities. Their differences were at laſt compoſed, as the ſame writer informs us [o], by the Parians, whom they had choſen from among all the Greeks for that purpoſe. Theſe arriving at Miletus, and obſerving that the fields round the city lay in great part uncultivated, told the Mileſians, that they deſigned to ſurvey their whole country; which they did accordingly, writing down the name of the owner where-ever they ſaw in that deſolate country any portion of land well cultivated. After they had thus viewed the whole territory, and found but a very ſmall part of it well kept, they returned to the city, and having called an aſſembly, put the government into the hands of thoſe whoſe lands they had found in good condition; not doubting but they would adminiſter the public affairs with the ſame care which they had taken of their own. They ſtrictly enjoined the reſt of the Mileſians, who till that time had been rent into parties and factions, to obey the magiſtrates they had appointed, and in this manner reformed the ſtate of the city [p], which thenceforth daily increaſed in wealth and power. In the time of Pſammiticus king of Egypt a colony of Mileſians ſettled in that country, and built a wall, as Strabo tells us, called by the Egyptians the Mileſian wall [q]. We may judge of the wealth, power, and flouriſhing condition of Miletus in thoſe days, from the long and expenſive war which they maintained againſt Gyges, Ardyes, Sadyattes, and Halyattes kings of Lydia, without being aſſiſted by any of the Ionians except the Chians, whom they had ſupported againſt the Erythræans. In what manner this war was carried on, and how Halyattes was at laſt obliged to ſue for peace, we have already related in the Hiſtory of Lydia [r]. After the defeat of Crœſus and taking of Sardis, all the Ionians ſent embaſſadors to Cyrus, offering to ſubmit to him on the ſame terms which had been granted them by Crœſus; but that prince, rejecting the propoſals of the others, admitted the Mileſians alone on the foot of their former agreement with the Lydians. By this indulgence of Cyrus, Miletus flouriſhed above all the cities of Ionia, till it fell into the hands of Hiſtiæus and Ariſtagoras, who brought ruin not only on their own country, but on all Ionia; for Miletus was beſieged, taken, and laid in aſhes by the Perſians, whom they had provoked, and the inhabitants transferred first to Susa, and thence to Ampæ, a city on the red sea, not far from the mouth of the Tigris. The Athenians were so grieved at their misfortune, that they mourned and shed tears when they first heard it, no otherwise than if the like calamity had happened to Athens itself; and some time after one Phrynicus, a dramatic poet, having wrote a tragedy on the destruction of Miletus, the whole theatre burst out into tears when it was exhibited, and the magistrate fined the author in a thousand drachmas for renewing the memory of a misfortune, which they looked upon as their own, ordering at the same time that the piece should never more be acted [s]. The Persians having thus utterly ruined Miletus, and transplanted the inhabitants, the lands about the town and level country they reserved for themselves, but bestowed the hilly and less fruitful parts on the Carians of Pedieis. This misfortune befel Miletus six years after the revolt of Aristagoras in the reign of Darius Hystaspis, and had been long before foretold, if we believe Herodotus, by the oracle of Apollo Didymæus (L). However, the Milesians were suffered afterwards to return and rebuild their city, which they did in a different place from that of the former, as we conjecture from the prediction of Thales related by Plutarch [t]; for that philosopher desired his body might be buried in an abandoned and solitary place at some distance from the city, saying, that it would one day become the market-place of the Milesians. The inhabitants never afterwards recovered their

(L) That author tells us (10), that the Argians having consulted the oracle touching the fate of their city, received a double answer, partly concerning themselves, and partly the Milesians; the answer relating to the Milesians was uttered in the following terms; "Miletus, source of evils, thy stores and wealth "shall serve to feast and inrich a multitude; men with long "hair shall sit and have their feet washed by thy virgins; Didy-"ma shall see her altars transferred to another place." What the oracle is said to have foretold was fulfilled; for the greater part of the men were put to the sword by the Persians, who wore long hair; the women and children were made slaves, and the temple in Didyma, with the grove and oracle, reduced to ashes.

(10) Herodot. l. vi.

their former power; for we find them eight years before the Peloponneſian war contending with the Samians for the ſovereignty of Priene, and obliged to call in the Athenians to their aſſiſtance, for which piece of ſervice they ſided with them in the Peloponneſian war, till they were perſuaded by Alcibiades, then in baniſhment, to join the Lacedæmonians [u]. In the time of Cyrus the younger they attempted to ſhake off the Perſian yoke, and join that prince againſt his brother Artaxerxes; but Tiſſaphernes, governor of that province, having timely notice of their deſign, put ſome of the chief conſpirators to death, baniſhed others, and reduced the city to a miſerable ſtate of ſlavery. At the famous peace of Antalcidas it was given up to the Perſians, and remained ſubject to them till the time of Alexander, who reſtored them to their antient liberty, notwithſtanding they had ſhut up their gates againſt him, and did not ſubmit till reduced to the laſt extremities [w]. By the Romans they were treated very kindly, and ſuffered to enjoy their liberty, eſpecially under the emperors.

The Mileſians, like the other ſtates of Ionia, when free from a foreign yoke, were often reduced to a miſerable ſtate of ſlavery by tyrants of their own, who governed them with an arbitrary ſway, and made them feel all the evils of a foreign ſubjection. The firſt, who uſurped this power over their fellow-citizens, were Thoas and Damaſenor, who, as Plutarch informs us [x], filled the city with blood and ſlaughter, and ſpared none but ſuch as ſubmitted to their uſurped authority. Theſe being deſtroyed, or driven out, Thraſybulus uſurped the ſovereignty, which he maintained to his death. In his time and by his means an end was put to the war, which had been for many years carried on between the Lydians and Mileſians, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Lydia [y]. He was ſo famous for his prudence in the adminiſtration of public affairs, that moſt of the petty tyrants of Greece courted his friendſhip, and governed themſelves in their unjuſt uſurpations by his advice. Among theſe Periander tyrant of Corinth is ſaid to have diſpatched a meſſenger to him, to enquire what methods he had purſued in ſo ſettling his authority among the Mileſians, that none of the citizens entertained any thoughts of ſhaking off the yoke which he had impoſed upon them. Thraſybulus, unwilling to ſend an anſwer either in writing or by word of mouth, took the ſlave into a corn-field, and there, as it were by way of amuſement, ſtruck off all the ears of corn that overtopped the reſt. Then he ſent back the meſſenger without any anſwer. Periander underſtood the hint, put all to death whoſe overgrown power gave him any umbrage, and thereby enjoyed, without diſturbance, the authority he had uſurped [z]. Upon the death of Thraſybulus ſeveral other tyrants roſe up, mentioned by Herodotus [a], Plutarch [b], and other writers [c]. Among theſe the moſt famous in hiſtory are Hiſtiæus and Ariſtagoras, who in attempting to ſhake off the yoke of the Perſian kings, by whom they were ſupported, brought utter deſtruction upon all the Greek colonies in Aſia, as we have related at length in the hiſtory of Perſia [d]. In the time of Antiochus II. king of Syria, we read of one Timarchus reigning in Miletus, and practiſing great cruelties on the citizens, till he was driven out by that prince, who was on that account honoured by the Mileſians with the ſirname of Theos or God [e]. Miletus gave birth to the celebrated philoſophers, Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Thales. The iſlands of Chios and Samos were likewiſe inhabited by the Ionians, and belonged to their confederacy; but we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of them in the following chapter, containing the hiſtory of the Greek iſlands.

Deſcription of Æolis.

ÆOLIS, ſo called from the Æolians, who ſettled in this part of Aſia, extended, according to Strabo [f], from the promontory Lectus to the river Hermus, and contained the following cities, Cyme, Lariſſa, Neontichos, Tenus, Cylla, Notion, Ægiræſſa, Pitane, Ægæa, Myrina, and in more antient times Smyrna, which, as we have related above, was taken from the Æolians by the Ionians. Theſe are the eleven antient cities of Æolis mentioned by Herodotus [g], Cyme ſtood on the ſea-coaſt, and was the laſt of the maritime cities of Æolis towards Ionia. Lariſſa belongs properly properly to Troas, and is placed by Strabo [h] between Achæum and Colonæ. In former times Æolis comprehended all Troas, and extended along the coaſt from Ionia to the Propontis. Neontichos, or Neon-Tichos is mentioned by Thucydides [i] as ſituate in the country of the Apodoti, who were a peculiar tribe of Æolians inhabiting the ſea-coaſt [k]. Tenus, called alſo Temnos, is placed by Pliny at the mouth of the Hermus, but by all other geographers in the inland parts of Æolis. Cylla was a colony of the Æolians on the ſea-coaſt of Myſia. Notion ſtood on the ſea-ſide about two miles from Colophon [l], and was in after-ages ſubject to the Colophonians. Authors do not agree about the preciſe ſituation of Ægiræſſa, ſome placing it on the coaſt, and others at a great diſtance from the ſea. Pitane was a conſiderable town not far from the mouth of the Caicus [m]. The inhabitants of this city are ſaid to have had the art of making bricks that floated, like wood, upon the water. Ægæa or Ægæ, bordered on the territory of Cyme, and is counted by Strabo [n] among the mediterranean cities of Æolis. Myrina, the moſt ancient city of all Æolis, ſtood on the coaſt, and had a very ſafe and capacious harbour. It was in after-ages called Sebaſtopolis in honour of Auguſtus. To theſe Pliny, Strabo, and Pomponius Mela add Grynium and Elæa; the former was about forty furlongs diſtant from Myrina, and famous for a temple and grove conſecrated to Apollo, whence the ſurname of Grynæus is often given by the poets to that deity [o]; the latter, which was the port of Pergamus, and the birth-place of Zeno the philoſopher, ſtood near the mouth of the Caicus [p]. Cyme, or as others write it, Cuma, was the metropolis of all Æolis.

Doris. DORIS, properly ſo called, was that large promontory of Caria, which runs into the ſea over-againſt the iſland of Telos. The chief cities of Doris were, Halicarnaſſus, formerly the capital of Caria, and famous for the Mauſoleum or tomb built by queen Artemiſia, in honour of her huſband Mauſolus, which was of ſo noble a ſtructure, that the ancients looked upon it as one of the wonders of the world. This city gave birth to the two celebrated hiſtorians, Herodotus and Dionyſius, and to the poets Heraclitus and Callimachus. It ſtood between the Ceramic and Jaſian bays, and and was reckoned one of the ſtrongeſt cities of Aſia [q]. It is now a heap of ruins, and known by the name of Neſi. Cnidus ſtood on the ſea called Triopium [r], having on the north the Ceramic, or as others call it the Ceraunian, bay, and on the ſouth the Rhodian ſea. This city was formerly famous for the Venus of Praxiteles; and as Venus was the tutelary goddeſs of the place, ſhe is thence often ſtiled by the poets, the Cnidian goddeſs [s]. Lindus, Jaliſſus, and Camrus, were likewiſe cities of the Dorians, as Herodotus informs us, but we find nothing relating to them worth mentioning [s].

Origin of the Ionians, Dorians and Æolians.

That the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians, who ſettled in Aſia Minor, were Greek nations, is not to be doubted. Profane writers give us the following account of their origin and firſt ſettling on the coaſt of Aſia. Deucalion, ſay they, who reigned in Theſſaly, and is famous for the flood that happened in his time, had by his wife Pyrrha two ſons, Helenus and Amphictyon. Helenus, who is ſuppoſed to have given the name of Helenes to the Greeks, had three ſons, Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. Æolus, who was the eldeſt, ſucceeded his father, and, beſides Theſſaly, had for his ſhare Locris and Bœotia. Many of his deſcendants went into Peloponneſus with Pelops the ſon of Tantalus king of Phrygia, and ſettled in Laconia. The country in the neighbourhood of mount Parnaſſus fell to Dorus, and was from him called Doris. Xuthus being obliged by his brothers to quit his native country, for appropriating part of his father's effects to himſelf without their knowledge, retired to Attica, where he married the daughter of Erectheus king of Athens, by whom he had two ſons, Achæus and Ion.

An involuntary murder committed by Achæus obliged him to retire to Peloponneſus, which was then called Ægialea or Ægialos; but the country, where he ſettled, ever after bore the name of Achaia. Some writers tell us, that he afterwards left Achaia, and recovered his grandfather's kingdom of Theſſaly. Ion commanded the Athenian forces againſt Eumolpus the Thracian, who had invaded Attica, and ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf on that occaſion, that the Athenians intruſted him with the government of their city, and were from that time called alſo Ionians. Though in proceſs of time they thought fit to lay aſide this name, yet it it was not altogether out of use in the time of Theseus, as appears from the pillar erected by him in the Isthmus, to shew the bounds of the Athenians on one side, and the Peloponnesians on the other; on the east side of the pillar was this inscription; This is not Peloponnesus, but Ionia, and on the south side; this is not Ionia, but Peloponnesus [t]. In the time that Ion governed Athens the citizens increased to such a degree, that their country, being not only unfruitful, but confined within narrow bounds, was no longer able to furnish them with necessary provisions. This forced them to contrive some means to disburden it, and therefore they sent colonies to settle in Peloponnesus, and these gave the name of Ionia to that part which they possessed. Thus all the inhabitants of Peloponnesus, though composed of different nations, were blended under the general names of Achæans and Ionians [u].

About fourscore years after the taking of Troy the Heraclidæ, or descendants of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus with a design to recover that country, which of right belonged to them. They were conducted in this enterprize by three chief leaders, the sons of Aristomachus, namely Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus; the last dying before the reduction of the country, his two sons Eurysthenes and Procles succeeded him. The expedition proved successful, and the Heraclidæ, having recovered the possession of their antient dominions, divided them among themselves; in which division Argos fell to Temenus, Messenia to Cresphontes, and Laconia to the two sons of Aristodemus [w].

Such of the Achæans as were descended from Æolus, and had inhabited Laconia, being driven from thence by the Dorians, who attended the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus, settled in that part of Asia Minor, which from them took the name of Æolis, and built there Smyrna with eleven other cities; but Smyrna, as we have related above, was afterwards seized by the Ionians. From Æolis they sent colonies to the island of Lesbos, and there founded several cities. The Achæans of Mycenæ and Argos, being expelled by the Heraclidæ, seized upon that part of Peloponnesus, which was held by the Ionians. The latter at first firſt returned to Athens, their original country, and ſoon after departed from thence under the conduct of Nileus and Androcles, the two ſons of Codrus, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the weſtern coaſt of Aſia Minor, lying between Caria and Lydia, which from them was named Ionia. There they built the cities, which we have deſcribed above .

THE power of the Athenians, who were then governed by Codrus, increaſing daily, the Heraclidæ thought proper to oppoſe their progreſs, but were defeated in a general engagement. Notwithſtanding this overthrow they maintained themſelves in poſſeſſion of Megaris, where they built the city of Megara, placing there the Dorians, who had aſſiſted them, in the room of the Ionians, whom they had driven out [y]. Of theſe Dorians ſome continued in Megara after the death of Codrus, others paſſed over into Crete; but the greateſt part, being perpetually haraſſed by the Athenians, abandoning their country, ſettling in that part of Aſia Minor, which was from them called Doris, and built there Halicarnaſſus, Cnidus, and the other cities mentioned above [z]. The Ionic migration is ſaid by all chronologers, except Euſebius and his followers, to have happened an hundred and forty years after the taking of Troy, and ſixty after the return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus, that is, about ſeven hundred and ninety four before the Chriſtian æra. The Æolic migration preceded the Ionic about fifty-two years, and that of the Dorians was poſterior to the Ionic near ſeventy.

THIS is the account, which profane writers give us of theſe migrations; but their authority in matters of ſo remote date is not much to be depended on. There were ſcarce any records in thoſe rude and illiterate ages, even among the Greeks; whence they have obſcured their origin with idle tales, and poetical fictions, there being ſcarce any thing related by their hiſtorians concerning their origin that deſerves credit, or carries in it the leaſt appearance of truth. Others, perhaps upon better grounds, take the Ionians to be deſcended from Javan, the fourth ſon of Japheth; and indeed the Greek tranſlators of the holy ſcripture inſtead of Javan read Jaon, and thoſe who are by other writers called led Iones, are by Homer named Iaones. Now Javan and Jaon found ſo like each other, that one may conclude they were the ſame. This opinion receives no ſmall confirmation from holy writ, where the name of Javan is uſed for Greece (M). Javan is ſaid to have come into Greece after the confuſion of Babel, and to have ſettled in Attica, whence the Attics were named Iaones and Iones. This name the inhabitants of Attica, as we have obſerved above, laid aſide, but theſe who paſſed into Aſia retained the ſame appellation. According to this opinion the Ionians were a colony from Attica; but Hecatæus, as quoted by Strabo [a], tells us, that the Athenians or Iones of Greece were a colony of thoſe in Aſia. As the parts of Aſia poſſeſſed by the Greeks lye directly in the way from the valley of Shinaar into Greece, it is not without foundation, that ſome have believed Javan to have firſt ſettled in Aſia, and from thence, not having room enough on the coaſt, to have ſent colonies into Greece, at that time uninhabited, under the conduct of his eldeſt ſon Eliſha, who founded, according to them, the city of Elis in Peloponneſus. From Eliſha Joſephus ſuppoſes the Æolians to be deſcended, and therefore calls them Eliſæi [b].

THE Ionians, Æolians, and Dorians were at firſt governed by kings, and divided into many petty kingdoms, the monarchical form of government prevailing, at the time of their migration, all over Greece. Beſides, Herodotus tells us in expreſs terms, that ſome of the Ionians choſe only Lycian kings of the race of Glaucus, others ſuch only as were ſprung from Codrus, and that ſome indifference- Their government.

rently raiſed to the throne princes of either of theſe families [c]. But the actions and very names of their kings are buried in oblivion. Monarchy gave way to a republican government, which was ſettled in almoſt all the Greek cities of Aſia Minor, each of them being governed by their own laws, and no ways dependent on one another. However in moſt of theſe ſtates ſome private citizens, without any right to the throne; either by birth or election, endeavoured to advance themſelves to it by cabal, treachery, and violence, ſacrificing to their own ſecurity all thoſe, whom merit, rank, zeal for liberty, or love of their country rendered obnoxious to them. It was this cruel and inhuman treatment that rendered theſe uſurpers ſo odious to the people, and furniſhed ſuch an ample matter for the declamations of orators, and the tragical repreſentations of the theatre.

The Ionians, on their arrival in Aſia, divided themſelves into twelve ſmall ſtates or cantons, having been thus divided, while they inhabited Peloponneſus, as were afterwards the Achæans who drove them out. Of theſe twelve ſtates conſiſted the Ionian confederacy, ſo often mentioned by the antients. The chief and moſt powerful city of the whole confederacy was Miletus. To thoſe we have already deſcribed Thucydides adds the cities of the Iſlands of Lemnos and Imbros [d], and Velleius [e], thoſe of Delos, Paros, Andros, Tenos, which were all, according to that writer, peopled by the Ionians. Some of the cities we have mentioned were built by the Ionians, others they poſſeſſed themſelves of after driving out the antient proprietors. As they brought no women with them out of Greece, they forced thoſe of Caria away from their parents, putting to death ſuch of their relations as oppoſed them; in revenge of which violence and cruelty the Carian women bound themſelves by an oath, which they tranſmitted as ſacred to their daughters, never to take any repaſt, with their huſbands, or call them by their names [f]. The Ionians being thus eſtabliſhed in the moſt fruitful and pleaſant part of all Aſia, their number ſoon increaſed, new adventurers joining them from other countries of Greece; the Abantes from Eubœa, who had nothing in common with the Ionians, were no inconſiderable part of this colony; the Mynian Orchomenians, the the Cadmæans, Dryopians, and Moloſſians, with the Pelaſgians of Arcadia, the Dorians, Epidaurians, and many others of the ſeveral ſtates of Greece, were, as Herodotus informs us [g], intermixed with the Athenians, who were ſent by the Prytanæan council. The latter, who were true and genuine Ionians, as deriving their original from Athens, built a temple, which from themſelves they called the Pan-Ionium (N). The privileges of this place they communicated to no other Ionians; neither did the others, as we read in Herodotus [g], ever deſire to be admitted, except the Smyrnæans, moſt of them being of the name of Ionians, that people having ſoon degenerated from the virtue of their anceſtors, and given themſelves up to all manner of vice. The Pan-Ionium was a ſacred place on the promontory of Mycale, dedicated by the Ionian confederacy to Neptune, ſirnamed Heliconius. Here the Ionians met to perform ſolemn exerciſes in honour of that deity, and to hold their general aſſemblies. This feſtival was peculiar to the Athenian Ionians; but the Apaturian ſolemnity (O) was com-

[g] Idem ibid.

(N) The temple was called Pan-Ionium, from the concourſe of people that flocked thither, from all the cities of Ionia. A feſtival was kept here by all the Ionians in honour of Neptune, ſirnamed Heliconius, from Helice, a city of Achaia, which afterwards periſhed by an earthquake. One thing was remarkable in this ſacrifice, viz. that if the bull offered happened to bellow, it was accounted a good omen, becauſe that ſound was thought to be acceptable to Neptune.

(O) This feſtival was firſt inſtituted at Athens, and from thence derived to the Aſiatic Ionians. It was ſo called from the Greek word ἀπάτη ſignifying deceit, having been firſt inſtituted in memory of a ſtratagem, by which Melanthius king of Athens overcame Xanthus king of Bœotia. For a controverſy ariſing between the Athenians and Bœotians about a piece of ground lying on the confines of Attica and Bœotia, Xanthus propoſed, that an end ſhould be put to the diſpute by a ſingle combat between himſelf and the Athenian king. Thymœtes, at that time king of Athens declined the fight, and was depoſed. In his room was choſen one Melanthius a Meſſenian, who, having accepted the challenge, met his enemy at the appointed place. But before they began the fight, Melanthius pretending to ſee one behind Xanthus, habited in a black goat's ſkin, cried out, that the articles were violated.

Upon

mon to all thoſe of the Ionian name, except the Epheſians and Colophonians, who were excluded under pretence of a murder committed in their cities [h].

The Dorians, on their arrival in Aſia, formed themſelves into ſix independent ſtates or ſmall republics, which were confined within the narrow bounds of ſo many cities; theſe were Lindus, Jalyſus, Camirus, Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnaſſus. Other cities in that tract, which was from them called Doris, belonged to their confederacy; but the inhabitants of theſe alone, as true and genuine Dorians, were admitted into their temple at Triope, where they exhibited ſolemn games in honour of Apollo Triopius. The prizes were tripods of braſs, which the victors were obliged to conſecrate to Apollo, and leave in the temple on an altar of gold. When Agaſicles of Halicarnaſſus won the prize, he tranſgreſſed this cuſtom, and carried the tripos to his own houſe: Wherefore the city of Halicarnaſſus was ever afterwards excluded from the Dorian confederacy; ſo that the Dorians were from that time known by the name of the five cities [i].

The Æolians were divided, like the Ionians and Dorians, into ſeveral ſmall ſtates or cantons, independent of each other, but united in one common confederacy or league. They poſſeſſed at firſt twelve cities; but Smyrna, as we have related above, was taken from them by the Ionians of Colophon. Their country was of greater extent than that of the Ionians, but far inferior to it in all other reſpects, Ionia being, in the opinion of Herodotus [k], the

Upon this Xanthus looking back was treacherouſly ſlain by his adverſary. In memory of this ſucceſs Jupiter was ſirnamed Ἀπατήνωρ, that is deceiver. Others tells us, that the Apaturian feſtival was ſo called from the Greek word ἀπατόρια, becauſe upon that ſolemnity children accompanied their fathers, to have their names entered into the public regiſter. Some are of opinion, that the Apaturion feſtival had its name from the Greek word ἀπάτορες, that is, without fathers, in a civil ſenſe, it not being till that ſolemnity publicly recorded, to whom they belonged. The Apaturia was celebrated in the month Pyanepſion, and laſted three days (14).

the moſt fruitful and agreeable region of all Aſia. The Dorians, beſides the cities which belonged to them on the continent, poſſeſſed five in the iſland of Leſbos, one in Tenedos, and another in the hundred iſlands, which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of in a more proper place. Thus the Greek ſtates in Aſia, were governed much after the ſame manner as thoſe in Europe, forming three different confederacies, of which the cities were governed by their own laws, and the three different confederacies by their reſpective general aſſemblies or diets.

Their religion, laws, &c.

THE religion and laws of the Greek colonies in Aſia were much the ſame with thoſe of Greece. Their principal deities were Ceres, Apollo, Diana, and Neptune. The Ionians, who came from Athens, celebrated every fifth year, the myſteries of Ceres Eleuſina, which we have already deſcribed [l]. The Mileſians worſhipped Apollo Didymæus as their tutelary god, whence he was likewiſe called Apollo Mileſius. Near the city of Miletus was a famous oracle of Apollo, called the oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and alſo the oracle of the Branchidæ; the former denomination it had from Apollo or the ſun, who was ſirnamed Didymæus, as Macrobius informs us [m], from the double light imparted by him to mankind; the one directly from his own body, and the other by reflection from the moon; the latter appellation was given both to the oracle and to Apollo himſelf, who was called Branchides, from one Branchus the reputed ſon of Macareus, but begotten, as was believed, by Apollo (P). This oracle was, as we are aſſured by Herodotus, very antient, and the beſt of all the Grecian oracles, except that

(P) Varro tells us, that the mother of Branchus, being with child, dreamed that the ſun entering into her mouth penetrated to her womb; and that from thence the child was called Branchus from Βραγχὸς, the throat, through which the god paſſed. Branchus received, when he grew up, a crown and ſcepter from Apollo, and began to propheſy, but ſoon diſappeared. Whereupon a magnificent temple was dedicated to him and Apollo Phileſius, ſo called that of Delphos [m]. In the Persian war the temple was burnt down to the ground, being betrayed to the Barbarians by the Branchidæ, or priests, who had care of it. Xerxes in requital of their service allowed them to settle, and build a city, in a remote part of Asia, where they thought themselves out of the reach of their angry countrymen. But for all this, their treachery did not escape condign punishment; for Alexander, having conquered Darius and possessed himself of all Asia, utterly demolished their city, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, revenging on the children the treachery of their forefathers [n].

An annual feast was celebrated by the Ionians in honour of Diana Triclaria, to appease whose wrath for an incest committed in her temple, men and women used to walk bare-footed to it. This solemnity was instituted by the Athenians, who till after the Trojan war used annually to sacrifice to the angry goddess a male and a female child.

Trade. Their trade we can only guess at from their situation, which very likely drew merchants from all the neighbouring parts to traffic in their country, as well for their own growth, as for foreign productions. Their country was stocked with many useful commodities, and abounded in all things necessary for life. They had a safe coast, convenient harbours, and whatever may incline us to think that they carried on a considerable trade. Besides, we know that they were very powerful by sea, maintained great fleets, and planted colonies, not only in the neighbouring islands, but even in Gaul, and beyond the pillars of Hercules.

Character. They soon degenerated from the valour of their ancestors, and became a most superstitious, effeminate, and voluptuous people; insomuch, that the Ionians, in the time of Herodotus, were looked upon as quite unfit for any called from φιλεῖν to kiss, because he was supposed to have imparted the spirit of prophecy to Branchus by a kiss. This temple was burnt by the Persians, but afterwards rebuilt with such magnificence, that it surpassed all the other Greek temples in bigness, being raised to such a bulk, that they were forced to let it remain uncovered, for it was no less than five furlongs in compass (15).

any military ſervice[o]. They are ſaid to have been the firſt who introduced the uſe of perfumes and garlands at banquets, and alſo of ſweet-meats or deſerts[p]. Maximus Tyrius, ſpeaking of the different affections and inclinations of the various Greek nations and colonies, tells us, that the Crotoniates loved the Olympic ſports, the Spartiates fine armour, the Cretans hunting, the Sybarites pompous dreſs, and the Ionians laſcivious dances[q]. The Æolians and Dorians, being planted in a leſs fruitful country, were not ſo ſoon debauched by the ſoft climate of Aſia; they were accounted no way inferior to the European Greeks, till they were ſubdued by the Perſians. But having loſt their liberty, they gave themſelves up to idleneſs, and in a ſhort time became quite unfit for action, and no leſs effeminate than the other Aſiatics.

Their hiſtory

THE Greek colonies ſettled in Aſia enjoyed their liberties, and lived according to their own laws, from the time of their migration to the reign of Crœſus king of Lydia, to whoſe ſuperior power they were forced to ſubmit, after having baffled all the attrmpts of his predeceſſors. They paid him a yearly tribute, furniſhed him with ſhips and marines, in time of war, and ſent their reſpective quotas of land-forces when required; but at the ſame time were free from all oppreſſion, and ſuffered to enjoy a profound tranquillity under his mild government[r]. This made them oppoſe Cyrus, when he firſt invaded Lydia, and reject the advantageous propoſals of that prince. But, after the defeat of Crœſus and taking of Sardis, they ſent embaſſadors to the conqueror, offering to ſubmit to him upon the ſame terms which had been formerly granted to them by Crœſus. Cyrus having heard them with attention, returned an anſwer in the following apologue: A piper ſeeing numerous ſholes of fiſh in the ſea, and imagining he might entice them aſhore by his muſic, began to play; but finding his hopes diſappointed, he threw a net into the water, and drew a great many of them to the land. When he ſaw the fiſh leaping on the ground, ſince you would not dance, ſaid he, to my pipe before, you may now forbear dancing at all. With this anſwer the Greek embaſſadors returned home, and having communicated it to their countrymen, they resolved in a general assembly to fortify their cities against any sudden attack, and send embassadors to sollicit succours from the Lacedæmonians. Pythermus, a Phocæan, was sent in the name of all the Greeks in Asia; but the Spartans could by no means be prevailed upon to lend them any assistance. However, they dispatched by sea some of their chief men to observe the motions of Cyrus, and interpose their good offices with him in behalf of their countrymen. These, putting in at Phocæa, sent Lacrines, the most considerable person among them, to Sardis, with instructions to acquaint Cyrus, that if he committed any hostilities against the Grecian cities, the republic of Lacedæmon would resent them as offered to herself. Cyrus, hearing them speak in this stile, inquired of the Greeks about him, who the Lacedæmonians were, and what number of men they could bring into the field? Being informed of these particulars, he answered the deputy, that he was no ways afraid of a people, who in the midst of their cities had a place of public resort, where they met to impose on each other by mutual oaths; and that if the gods preserved his life, they should have sufficient cause to be concerned for their own calamities, instead of troubling themselves about those of the Asiatics. These words then levelled at the Greeks in general, who had in their cities large squares, where they met to trade, a custom unknown to the Persians [s].

Year of the flood 2459. Before Christ 544.

Cyrus, having dismissed the Lacudæmonian embassador with this answer, left Sardis and setting out for Ecbatan, charged Mazares one of his lieutenants with the reduction of Æolis, Doris, and Ionia. Mazares, pursuant to his commission entering Ionia, took and destroyed the city of Priene, laid waste the fertile plains that were watered by the Mæander, and advancing to Magnesia, laid that city likewise in ashes. From Magnesia he marched to Phocæa, but before he made any attempts upon that important place, he fell sick and died. Upon his death Harpagus, being appointed to command the army in Ionia, laid close siege to Phocæa. The Phocæans, detesting slavery, chose rather to abandon their native country, than submit to the Persian yoke; and accordingly, having put their wives, children, and all their most valuable effects on board their vessels, they set sail for the island of Chios, leaving the Persians

Persians in possession of an empty city. The example of the Phocæans was followed by the Teians, who, after Harpagus had made himself master of their walls, went on board their ships, and conveyed themselves and their families to Thrace, where they settled in the city of Abdera, which had been founded by the Greeks of the Ionian confederacy, under the conduct of Timesius, a native of Clazomenæ. The other cities of Ionia were all reduced by Harpagus, and likewise the Dorians, Æolians, and all the inhabitants of the upper Asia, except the Milesians, who, distrusting their own strength and that of the Ionians, had made a separate peace with Cyrus, and by a timely submission obtained the same terms, which had been formerly granted them by Crœsus. The rapidity of these conquests struck the islanders with such terror, that they all submitted of their own accord. Thus all the Greek states, both in the islands and on the continent of Asia, were a second time conquered, and forced to live, under the Persian monarchs, in the state of greater subjection and dependency than they had ever proved before [t]. In the reign of Darius Hystaspis, they made an attempt towards the recovery of their antient liberty, and maintained a war against the whole power of the Persian monarchy, for the space of six years; but were again, in spite of their utmost efforts, brought under subjection, and punished with great severity by the haughty conqueror, for endeavouring to ascertain the rights which they had been unjustly deprived of. But of this war, and the many calamities which it drew upon the Greek states in Asia Minor, we have already given a particular and distinct account in the history of Persia [u], to which we refer the reader.

The Ionians assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Athens with an hundred ships; but as the king had undertaken this war for no other end but to be revenged on the Athenians, for having sent some ships to the assistance of the Ionians when they attempted to shake off the Persian yoke, Themistocles, who commanded the Athenian fleet, imagined, that the Ionians served in this expedition against their will, and might therefore be easily prevailed upon to desert the Persians, and join their antient allies and countrymen. But as no opportunity offered of conferring with them, or sending messengers, he failed in per-ſon to the place where they uſed to take in freſh water, and there engraved on the rocks the following words: "Men "of Ionia, you are guilty of a heinous crime in fighting "againſt your fathers, and helping to enſlave Greece. "Reſolve therefore to come over to us; or if you cannot "do that, withdraw your forces from the enemy, and per- "ſuade the Carians to imitate your example. But if both "theſe ways are impracticable, and you find yourſelves "under an abſolute neceſſity of continuing in the Perſian "fleet, favour us at leaſt when we come to an engagement; "and remember, that you are not only deſcended from us, "but are the original cauſe of the Barbarians enmity againſt "us." Themiſtocles had in ſo doing a double view; he believed that this invitation, if not diſcovered to the king, would induce the Ionians to come over to the Greeks; and on the other hand, if it ſhould come to the king's ears, he hoped it would make him diſtruſt the Ionians and diſmiſs them. The Ionians coming aſhore the next day; as uſual, read on the rocks the invitation of Themiſtocles, and reſolved to comply with it; purſuant to which reſolution when the two fleets engaged, the Ionians inſtead of falling upon the Athenians tacked about and made to ſea. Their flight, which was ſoon followed by that of the Phœnicians, contributed not a little to the famous victory gained by the Athenians at Salamis [w]. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the Ionians by means of a certain Samian gave private notice to the Athenians of all that paſſed in the enemy's fleet, aſſuring them, that aſſoon as the battle was joined they would deſert the Barbarians [x]. This, according to our author, ſo encouraged the Greeks, before diſheartened, that they attacked the Perſian fleet, contrary to their former determinations, and gained that victory which is ſo famous in hiſtory [y].

The ſame ſtratagem was uſed by Leotychides, commander of the Greek fleet, before the battle of Mycale. The Ionians, Dorians, Æolians, and the inhabitants of the iſlands made no ſmall part of the Perſian army, which was drawn up along ſhore in order to prevent the Greeks from making a deſcent into the country. Leotychides therefore, ſtanding in to the ſhore as near as he could, ordered a herald to ſpeak thus to the Ionians in his name: "Men of Ionia, hearken "with attention to my words, for the Perſians will not un- "derſtand

" derſtand the advice I give you; when the battle begins, " every one of you ought in the firſt place to remember li- " berty; and the next, that the word agreed upon is Hebe, " if any of you hear me not, let thoſe who hear inform " him." Theſe words had ſuch an effect on the Greeks, that in the heat of the engagement they deſerted the Perſians, and joined their countrymen, which occaſioned the total overthrow of the Perſian army. Before the engagement the Perſian generals had appointed the Mileſians to guard the paſſes leading to the eminences of Mycale, that they might have a ſafe retreat in caſe they were put to flight, and guides to conduct them over the mountains, the Mileſians being well acquainted with the country. But they, acting quite contrary to their orders brought back by other ways to the enemy ſuch as fled; by which means few Perſians eſcaped the general ſlaughter of that day [z]. Thus the Aſiatic Greeks revolted a ſecond time from the Perſians, and their behaviour on this occaſion was ſo pleaſing to the Lacedæmonians, that they were for tranſplanting them out of Aſia into Greece. For they were well appriſed, that if the Ionians continued in Aſia they would be in perpetual alarms from an enemy that far excelled them in ſtrength, and was near to them; whereas their friends, who were at a great diſtance, could not be aſſiſtant to them ſo opportunely, and at ſuch ſeaſons, as their neceſſity might require. The Peloponneſians propoſed to drive thoſe nations out of Greece, which had ſided with the Perſians, and to beſtow their territories and eſtates on the Ionians. Upon theſe promiſes the Ionians and Æolians were preparing to convey themſelves and their effects over into Europe. But the Athenians perſuaded them to remain in Aſia, faithfully promiſing to aſſiſt them on all occaſions to the utmoſt of their power. The Athenians were afraid that if the Ionians ſhould ſettle in Europe, by the common concurrence of the Greeks, they would not for the future own Athens as their metropolis, and place of their original. The Peloponneſians readily yielded to the Athenians, and the Ionians upon ſecond thoughts determined not to remove out of Aſia [a], but upon the concluſion of the peace between the Greeks and Perſians, which happened in the reign of Artaxerxes, one of the articles, ſworn to by both parties, was, that all the Greek

Greek states of Asia should be made free, and allowed to live according to their own laws [b].

The Ionians, being thus delivered from the Persian yoke, entered into an alliance with the Athenians, who came by degrees to treat them as subjects rather than allies, obliging them to contribute all the charges of the Peloponnesian war, no otherwise than if they had been their vassals. Nay, Euphemus, who was sent in the time of the Peloponnesian war to draw the Camarinæans into an alliance with Athens, owned, that the Athenians had subjected both the Ionians and islanders, for having joined, said he, the Persians against their mother city [c]. This was but a poor pretence, since the victory, which the Athenians gained at Salamis, was in great measure owing to the Ionians and other Greeks, who served on board the Persian fleet, as we have seen above. In the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, we find them again subject to the Persians, and governed by Tissaphernes, from whom they revolted to Cyrus the younger. Upon the death of Cyrus they sent embassadors to the Lacedæmonians, imploring their assistance and protection against Tissaphernes who was returning to his government at the head of a numerous army, with a design to punish them for their revolt. The Lacedæmonians, having now ended the long war which they had waged with the Athenians, laid hold of this opportunity of breaking again with the Persians, and sent first Thimbro, after him Dercyllidas, and lastly Agesilaus their king, to invade the Persian provinces in Asia, where they made great conquests, and would have endangered the whole empire, had not Darius, by distributing large sums among the leading men in Greece, found means to rekindle the war there, which obliged the Lacedæmonians to recall their king, and conclude a peace with the Persians equally disadvantageous and dishonourable to the Grecian name. For one of the articles was, that all the Greek cities in Asia should be subject to the king of Persia, and besides the islands of Cyprus and Clazomenæ. Thus were all the Greeks settled in Asia, with the utmost injustice and baseness, given up to the Persians [d], whose yoke they bore till they were delivered by Alexander, who restored all the Greeks in Asia to the enjoyment of their antient rights and privileges [e]. After the death of Alexander, as they had neither strength nor courage to defend themselves, they fell under the power of the the kings of Syria, and continued ſubject to them till the Romans, after having delivered Greece from the oppreſſions of Philip king of Macedon, obliged Antiochus III. ſurnamed the great, to grant the ſame liberty to the Greek colonies in Aſia, which they had procured for the Greek ſtates in Europe [f]. Being thus again reinſtated in their antient rights, moſt of the free cities entered into an alliance with Rome, and enjoyed ſuch liberty as the Romans uſed to grant, till they were again brought under ſubjection by the famous Mithridates king of Pontus, whom they joined againſt the Romans, partly out of fear, and partly out of hatred to Rome. By this order they maſſacred, without diſtinction, all the Romans and Italians, whom either trade or the ſweetneſs of the climate had drawn into Aſia. On this occaſion the Epheſians diſtinguiſhed themſelves above the reſt, not ſuffering even their famous temple of Diana to be an aſylum to ſuch Romans as fled to it. However, their ready compliance with the cruel and inhuman orders of Mithridates, did not exempt them from the moſt tyrannical oppreſſion. No wonder then, that upon Sylla's arrival in Aſia they abandoned Mithridates, and declared for the Romans. as they had formerly deſerted the Romans to ſide with Mithridates. Epheſus was the firſt that revolted, and the example of that metropolis was ſoon followed by Smyrna, Colophon, Sardis, Trallis, Hypæpene and Meſopolis. The revolt of theſe cities made the king change his conduct. In hopes of keeping the Greek cities ſteady in his intereſt, and ſupporting his faction on the coaſts of Aſia, he reſtored all the Greeks to the full enjoyment of their liberties, declaring that even the ſlaves ſhould have their ſhare of this univerſal freedom [g]. But they did not long enjoy the liberty, which the king out of a ſelfiſh policy beſtowed upon them. Sylla, having routed the ſeveral armies of Mithridates, and reduced all the Leſſer Aſia, revenged on the Aſiatics the death of ſo many thouſand Romans, whom they had inhumanly murdered, by depriving them of their liberty, and laying ſuch heavy taxes and fines on their cities, as reduced them to beggary. The city of Epheſus was treated with moſt ſeverity, Sylla having ſuffered his ſoldiers to live there at diſcretion, and obliged the inhabitants to pay every officer fifty drachmas, and every ſoldier ſixteen denarii a day. The whole ſum, which the revolted cities cities of Aſia paid Sylla, amounted to twenty thouſand talents, that is, 3875000l. ſterling, for the raiſing of which they were forced to ſell not only their moveables, but even great part of their lands [h]. This was the moſt fatal blow Aſia ever received, nor did the inhabitants ever after recover their antient ſplendor, notwithſtanding, the favour ſhewn them by many of the emperors, under whoſe protection they enjoyed, for many years at leaſt, ſome ſhew of liberty.

The Hiſtory of Sicily.

HAVING delivered in the foregoing volume the hiſtory of the European and Aſiatic Greeks inhabiting the continent, we ſhall now proceed to their various ſettlements in the adjacent iſlands, beginning with Sicily, the moſt conſiderable of all the iſlands in the Mediterranean, and in former times the theatre of many great and memorable events.

Name. THIS great and fruitful iſland, was antiently known by the name of Sicania, Sicilia, and Trinacria or Trinacra; the two former were borrowed from the Sicani and Siculi, who peopled a conſiderable part of the country, and the latter from its triangular figure, formed by the three famous promontories of Pelorum, Pachynum, and Lilybæum (A). Cape Pelorum is now called by the natives Capo di Faro, or Capo della torre di Faro. It took its antient name, if we believe Valerius Maximus [a] and Pomponius Mela [b], from the pilot Pelorus, who was killed by Hannibal. The Carthaginian ſeeing his ſhip brought into the

the ſtraits of Sicily, and fancying that the pilot deſigned to deliver her up to the Romans, put him to death; but being afterwards convinced of his innocence, he erected a ſtatue to him on the promontory, which from that time was called Pelorum, Pelorus, and Peloris. This fact is related by the above-mentioned hiſtorians; but their diſagreement in the circumſtances of the ſtory has made ſome writers doubt of the truth of this event. This promontory faces Italy, from which is divided by the ſtraits of Meſſina, reaching from the tower of the Faro, which is the moſt northern point of the iſland, to the Capo dell'-armi or Cape of arms, the moſt ſouthern part of Calabria. Theſe ſtraits, called by the Latins Fretum Siculum, by the Italians il Faro di Meſſina, and by us the Fare of Meſſina, are, according to Pliny [c], Strabo [d], and other geopraphers, between twelve and fifteen miles over in the broadeſt place, and in the narroweſt about a mile and a half; inſomuch, that when Meſſina was taken by the Carthaginians, many of the inhabitants are ſaid to have ſaved themſelves by ſwimming to the oppoſite coaſts of Italy. This narrowneſs gave riſe to an opinion, which once obtained among the antients, viz. that Sicily was originally joined to the continent of Italy by an iſthmus, which was in proceſs of time wore away by the fury of the waves and the violence of earthquakes. Pliny [e], with his uſual credulity, ſpeaks of this ſeparation as a thing not to be queſtioned. A modern writer of no mean character [f] goes farther, and even pretends to aſcertain the time of this memorable event, telling us, that it happened in the reign of Acaſtus, the ſon of Æolus, who was raiſed to the throne by the Siculi, about the time that the Iſraelites were delivered from the Egyptian bondage. He owns himſelf indebted for this remarkable diſcovery to Euſtathius, in his obſervations on Dionyſius Periegetes [g]. But the moſt judicious among the antients look upon this pretended ſeparation as fabulous, and ſpeak of it as a thing that is only ſaid to have happened [h] (B). The Fare of Meſſina is famous for the the rapidity of its currents, and the flowing and ebbing of the ſea, which is very irregular, and ſometimes ruſhes in with ſuch violence, that the ſhips riding at anchor are in danger. The famous Scylla and Charybdis, ſo much celebrated by the poets, are the north entrance into the ſtraits. The former is a rock on the coaſt of Italy, the latter a whirl-pool on the ſide of Sicily. The paſſage between theſe two was in antient times reckoned very dangerous [i]. The other two promontories are Pachynum facing Greece, and Lilybæum over-againſt Afric; the former is now known by the name of Capo Paſſaro, and the latter by that of Capo di Marſella, or Capo di Boeo (C).

Situation. This iſland lies between the 35th deg. 40 min. and the 38th 30 min. of north latitude, extending in longitude from 35 to 39 degrees. Its greateſt length from Pelorum to Lilybæum is two hundred miles, its breadth from Pachynum to the city of Cephalædium, now Cefalu, 180, and the whole circuit of the iſland 600.

Soil and climate. We need not inlarge on its fertility, it being well known, that Sicily was antiently called the granary of Rome, and that to this day, whatever deſirable things nature has frugally beſtowed here and there on other countries, are found in this as in their original ſeminary.

(C) Ælian, Pliny, Solinus, and Valerius Maximus tells us, that one, to whom they give the ſirname of Strabo, had ſuch an extraordinary ſight, that from a watch-tower on the promontory Lilybæum he diſcovered a fleet ſailing out of the port of Carthage, and acquainted the Lilybæans with their bigneſs and number; and yet Carthage is about 180 miles diſtant from the coaſt of Sicily.

Cities. Meſſana now Meſſina.

THE moſt remarkable cities on the eaſtern coaſt of Sicily, which faces Greece, and extends from Pelorum to Pachynum, are, Meſſana on the ſtraits of Sicily over-againſt Rhegium in Italy. This city was formerly called Zancle, which appellation ſome derive from the old Sicilian word Zanclos, ſignifying a hook, the ſhore on which it was built being of that ſhape [k]; others think it was ſo called from one Zanclus, who reigned in that part of the iſland [l]. But however that be, this city, according to the chronologiſts, was founded five hundred and thirty years before the ſiege of Troy, and nine hundred ſixty-four before Romulus laid the foundations of Rome. The inhabitants of this city, being greatly haraſſed by the pyrates of Cuma, had recourſe to the Meſſenians, a people of Greece, who, haſtening to the aſſiſtance of the Zancleans, cleared their coaſts, entered into an alliance with the citizens, and ſettled in their city, which was from them called by the Latins Meſſana [m]. Pauſanias [n] tells us, that Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, having entered into an alliance with the Meſſenians of Greece againſt the Zancleans, overthrew their forces, and with the aſſiſtance of his allies poſſeſſed himſelf of their city, which in compliment to the Meſſenians, who had aſſiſted him in this expedition, he called Meſſene. This event is mentioned alſo by Herodotus [o], who aſcribes all the glory of it to the Samians, the allies of Anaxilas, or, as he calls him, Anaxilaus. This city was afterwards ſeized by the Mamertini, as we ſhall relate anon, and made their capital, by which means it became one of the moſt wealthy and powerful cities of Sicily. It was the firſt town which the Romans poſſeſſed in the iſland, being put into their hands by the Mamertini. Tauromi- Tauromi-nium.
rominium, built on the ruins of the antient city of Naxos, which was deſtroyed by Dionyſius the tyrant, ſtood on the declivity of mount Taurus. The river Taurominius watered the territory of this city [p]; and its hills were famous for the excellent grapes they produced. It is now called Taorminan, and is ſtill a place of ſome conſideration. The coaſt on which it ſtood was antiently called Copria, that is dunghill, becauſe the ſea was ſuppoſed to diſcharge there there the wrecks of such ships as had been swallowed up by the Charybdis [q]. The river Taurominius, which gave its name to the city, is now called Cantara. Catana stood on a gulf of the Ionian sea called the gulf of Catana, and is commended by the antients as one of the richest and most powerful cities of Sicily. It was built and peopled by the inhabitants of Chalcis, and continued in great splendor for many ages [r]; but at last underwent the same fate as most of the other cities in the neighbourhood of mount Ætna, having been in great part consumed by the eruptions of that mountain, and buried in ruins by the dreadful earthquakes, which have often laid waste the whole neighbouring country. Its territory was watered by the river Amenes or Amenanus, now called the Judicello [s]. Murgentium, or Morgantia, was founded, according to Strabo [t], by the Morgetæ, a people of Italy, who crossed over into Sicily with the Siculi, and built this city, at a small distance from the mouth of the Symæthus, now La Jaretta. Thucydides [u], Scylax, and Pliny [w] place it near the conflux of the Chrysas, now the Dittaino, and the Symæthus. Fazellus is therefore mistaken in supposing Morgantia to have stood at the mouth of the river Terias, called by the natives Fiume di San Leonardo. Stephanus confounds this city with another in Samnium bearing the same name. There are now no footsteps remaining of either of these cities. Leontini stood about five miles distance from the coast, ten from Catana, and twenty from Syracuse. It was built by the Chalcidians, under the conduct of Theocles the Athenian, in the first year of the thirteenth olympiad, as Thucydides informs us [x]. The territory of Leontini was watered by the Lissus, which falls into the Terias at the distance of eight furlongs from the city [y]. Leontini was defended in the time of Thucydides [z] by two strong citadels, the one called the citadel of Phocia, the other the citadel of Bricinnia. At a small distance from the city was a lake abounding in fish, and about twenty miles in compass. The vapours arising from the marshes, made by the overflowing of the lake, greatly infected the air, which was there deemed very unwholesome; but to make amends for for this, the fields were ſo fruitful, that, according to Pliny, they yielded an hundred-fold [z]; whence the city of Leontini was called by Tully the grand magazine of Sicily [a]. The wines it produced were thought the moſt delicious of the whole iſland; but the inhabitants abuſed this benefit by their intemperance, which gave riſe to the proverb, The people of Leontini are always at their cups [b]. Dionyſius the tyrant, having made himſelf maſter of this city, removed the inhabitants to Syracuſe. Polybius gives a very exact and minute account of Leontini, and to him we refer our readers for a more particular deſcription of it [c]. The city of Hybla was built by the Sicani, who were driven out by a colony from Megaris in Greece. Theſe new-comers, having enlarged and embelliſhed the place, gave it the name of their native city [d]. The Hyblæan honey is, as every one knows, much celebrated by the Latin poets. The antient geographers mention three cities in Sicily bearing the name of Hybla; the city we are here ſpeaking of ſtood on the eaſtern coaſt, and gave name to the gulf which the preſent natives call the gulf of Auguſta, from the city of Auguſta or Aouſta on that bay. The ſecond city of Hybla was ſituate on an eminence in the ſame place where the ſmall town of Raguſi now ſtands, and was called the Little Hybla. The third, which was called the Great Hybla, is ſuppoſed to have ſtood between Catana and Hadranum in the territory of the preſent Paderno. Some pretend, that there are ſome traces of it ſtill to be ſeen near the mouth of the Cataro, formerly the Alabon or Alabis [e].

Megaris or Hybla.

Syracuſe.

Syracuse, once the metropolis of all Sicily and a moſt flouriſhing commonwealth, was, according to Tully [f], the greateſt and moſt wealthy of all the cities poſſeſſed by the Greeks. Thucydides equals it to Athens when that city was at the height of its glory [g], and Strabo calls it one of the moſt famous cities of the world for its advantageous ſituation, the ſtateline ſs of its buildings, and the immenſe wealth of its inhabitants [h]. It was built, according to Thucydides and Strabo [i], by Archias, one of the Heraclidæ, who came from Corinth into Sicily, in the ſecond year of the eleventh olympiad.

olympiad. The abridger of Stephanus and Marcianus of Heraclea tell us, that it borrowed the name of Syracuſe from a neighbouring marſh called Syraco. This ſtately city contained within its walls, which were eighteen miles in compaſs, four very conſiderable cities, as Strabo calls them, united into one, viz. Acradina, Tyche, Neapolis, and the iſland of Ortygia. In Acradina, the largeſt of the four, there was a vaſt ſquare, ſurrounded with porticoes a magnificent temple dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, the Prytaneum, where the public councils were held, and a ſpacious palace for the adminſtration of juſtice; not to mention ſeveral other buildings which were deemed maſter-pieces of architecture [k]. This quarter was ſituated on the ſea-ſide, and divided from Neapolis and Tyche by a wall of an extraordinary thickneſs and height. The ſecond city, called Tyche, ſtood between Acradina and the hill Epipolæ, haveing the former on the eaſt, and Neapolis on the ſouth. The chief ornaments of this diviſion were a ſpacious and beautiful gymnaſium, whither the youth reſorted to learn all ſorts of exerciſes, and ſeveral temples greatly admired for their inimitable ſtructure, eſpecially that of fortune, called by the Greeks Tyche, whence this diviſion borrowed its name [l]. The third quarter, called the iſland or Ortygia was joined to Acradina, Tyche, and Neapolis by a bridge; the moſt remarkable buildings in this part were the palace of Hiero, which afterwards became the habitation of the Roman prætors, and two magnificent temples, the one dedicated to Diana and the other to Minerva, the two tutelary goddeſſes of Syracuſe [m]. The laſt city was called Neapolis, or the new city, becauſe built after the other three; the chief ornaments of this city were a ſpacious amphitheatre, and two temples of wonderful architecture, conſecrated to Ceres and Libera, or Proſerpine. The ſtatue of Apollo Temnites, which was afterwards carried to Rome, is celebrated by Tully as the moſt valuable monument in Neapolis [n]. Of theſe four cities Ortygia alone is now remaining; there are indeed ſome footſteps ſtill to be ſeen of the antient Syracuſa in the ruins of the porticoes, temples, and palaces, which are deſcribed at length by Fazellus, to whom we refer refer the reader [o]. The famous fountain of Arethuſa (D) roſe in this iſland, but its ſpring is now dried up. Near the city ſtood a hill called Epipolæ, exceeding ſteep, and of very difficult acceſs. When the Athenians beſieged Syracuſe, this hill was not incloſed with a wall as in after-ages, but defended by a fort called Labdalon [p]. On Epipolæ was the famous priſon Latomiæ, which word properly ſignifies a quarry. Cicero gives us a minute account of this dreadful priſon, which was a cave one hundred and twenty-five paces long, and twenty foot broad, cut out of the rock to an incredible depth. It was the work of Dionyſius the tyrant, who cauſed thoſe to be ſhut up in it who had the misfortune to incur his diſpleaſure [q]. The whole city was environed with a treble wall, ſo flanked with towers and caſtles at proper diſtances, that it was deemed impregnable. It had two harbours at a ſmall diſtance from each other, being ſeparated only by the iſland, viz. the great harbour and the ſmall one, called otherwiſe Laccus; both were ſurrounded with ſtately edifices [r]. The great harbour was above five thouſand paces in circumference, and the entrance of it five hundred paces wide, being formed on one ſide by a point of the iſland Ortygia, and on the other by the little iſland and cape Plemmyrium, which was defended by a fort

(D) The poets, without the leaſt ſhadow of probability, ſuppoſed, that Alpheus, a river of Elis in Peloponneſus, rolled its waters either through, or under, the waves of the ſea, without mixing with them, as far as the fountain of Arethuſa, which gave occaſion to the following lines of Virgil:

a fort of the same name. Above Acradina was a third port, called the harbour of Trogilus. The river Anapis ran about a mile and half distance from the city, and emptied itself into the great harbour. Near the mouth of the river, and about five hundred paces from the city, stood a castle, called Olympia from the temple of Jupiter Olympius, which was the chief ornament of the place. Thucydides in his description of the city mentions only these three divisions, viz. the island, Acradina, and Tyche; whence it is plain, that Neapolis was added after his time [s]. Syracuse underwent several revolutions before it was taken by the Romans, as we shall have occasion to relate in the sequel of this history; but was always one of the most wealthy and powerful cities of those times; for Gelon, who had made himself master of Syracuse in the year of Rome 260, and the other tyrants his successors, were become formidable both to the Greeks, Africans, and Asiatics. Dionysius the younger, who governed this city, kept in constant pay 100000 foot and 10000 horse, besides a fleet of 400 sail. It is still a very considerable place, and well peopled, having two harbours, and a great many fine buildings.

Camarina. CAMARINA was formerly one of the most wealthy cities of Sicily. It stood between the rivers Oanus and Hipparis, now the Frascolari and Camarana, near the coast. Nothing now remains of this great city but some ruins, and the name of Camarana, which the natives give to a tower and a neighbouring marsh. Thucydides [t] and Strabo [u] tell us, that Camarina was founded by the Syracusians, who afterwards, upon some dispute between the two cities, took it by storm, and levelled it with the ground. It was rebuilt by Hypocrates, tyrant of Gela, and after many revolutions brought under subjection by the Romans in the first Punic war (E). This

(E) This city stood near a marsh, which infected the air with its pestilentious exhalations, and occasioned contagious distempers. Hence, though it was a defence to the city, the inhabitants drained it, contrary to the direction of the oracle which they had consulted. They had scarce finished the work, when the Syracusians attacking them on that side, took their city by assault, and utterly destroyed it. Hence the proverb Camarinam ne moveas, which

This is the firſt city of note on the ſouthern coaſt of Sicily, which lies oppoſite to Africa, and extends from cape Pachynum to Lilybæum. Next to Camarina ſtood Gela, a city once of great note, and ſaid by Thucydides [w] to have been founded by one Antiphemus, who had made a deſcent in the iſland, being aſſiſted in the enterprize by a body of two hundred Rhodians from the city of Lyndus. Theſe gave the name of Lyndus, their native city, to their new habitation. Some years after a body of Cretans, under the conduct of one Entimus, landing in this part of the iſland, joined the Rhodians, and together with them peopled the city. In proceſs of time the name of Lyndus was changed for that of the river Gela, called at preſent Fiume di Terra Nova, which watered the neighbouring territory [x]. This city is commonly thought to have ſtood at the mouth of the Gela, where Terra Nova now ſtands; but ſome place it in the neighbourhood of the preſent Alicate [y], Agrigentum or Agragas was once a city of great note, and no leſs famous for its buildings than Syracuſe itſelf. It is ſaid by Thucydides [z] to have been founded by the inhabitants of Gela, under the conduct of the duumviri Ariſto and Piſtillus, about the 99th olympiad. It ſtood between the rivers Agragas and Hypſa, of which the former is now called Fiume di Gergenti and Fiume di San Biaggio, the latter Fiume Drago. We may judge of the ſituation and ſplendor of the antient Agrigentum from the deſcription which Polybius gives us of it. "It exceeds, ſays he, moſt cities in "Sicily for its fortifications, beautiful appearance, and "magnificent buildings. It ſtands a hundred and eighteen "furlongs diſtance from the ſea, but can conveniently "import by water all ſorts of proviſions. It is by reaſon "of which was the anſwer of the oracle, and ſignifies that we ought not to expoſe ourſelves to a greater evil in order to avoid a leſs (4). The marſh was the ſame with the preſent Lago di Camarina. Ptolemy is certainly miſtaken in placing the city of Camarina ten miles diſtance from the ſea, and contradicts therein all the antient geographers.

The river, from " which it takes its name, covers it to the ſouth, and the " Hypſa to the weſt; to the eaſt it is defended by a for- " treſs built on the brink of a precipice which ſerves in- " ſtead of a ditch [a]." Among other remarkable buildings in it there were three temples greatly commended by the antients, viz. the temple of Minerva, the temple of Jupiter Olympius, and that of Jupiter Atabyris, ſo called from a mountain in the iſland of Rhodes, where that god was worſhipped: For Agrigentum, as we have obſerved above, was built by the inhabitants of Gela, who were compoſed of Rhodians and Cretans. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the citadel called Omphace, which ſtood at a little diſtance from the mouth of Agragas, was much more antient than the city itſelf [b]. The temple of Jupiter Olympius was one of the moſt magnificent in Sicily. It was, according to Diodorus [c], three hundred and forty foot in length, three-ſcore in breadth, and in heighth an hundred and twenty. This writer highly extols the beauty and ſize of the columns which ſupported the building, the admirable ſtructure of the porticoes, and the exquiſite taſte, with which the baſs-reliefs and painting were performed; and adds, that the laſt hand was never put to that ſtately edifice. We ſhall have occaſion hereafter to ſpeak of the immenſe and almoſt incredible wealth of the Agrigentines. Heraclea Minoa, ſo called, according to Diodorus [d], becauſe built by Minos king of Crete, ſtood on the banks of the Halycus, now the Platani, not far from the place which the natives call Caſtel Bianco. Some writers tell us, that this city was built before the Cretans arrived in Sicily, and was called Macara, which name was by the Cretans, who ſeized on the place, changed into that of Minoa in honour of their king Minos. Diodorus is not very coherent with himſelf in the account he gives of it; for in one place [e] he tells us, that it was built by Minos, and in another [f] that it was founded by the Cretans after their king's death. The Cretans were driven out by the Selinuntii, and theſe in their turn by a colony of Lacedæmonians under the command command of one of the Heraclidæ, from whom it borrowed the name Heraclea. There are ſtill extant ſome medals with the name of this city and the figure of Hercules, from whom the leader of the Lacedæmonians pretended to be deſcended.

Selinus. SELINUS was formerly a city of great note, and is ranked by the antients among the chief cities of Sicily. Ptolemy places it between the river Mazara and the promontory Lilybæum; but herein he differs from all the antient hiſtorians and geographers, who ſpeak of it as ſtanding between the Mazara and the Hypſa. Strabo [g] tells us, that it was built by the inhabitants of Megara in Sicily under the command of one Pammilus, about an hundred years after the foundation of their own city. Thucydides ſeems to allude to their origin when he calls them Selinuntians of Megara [h]. They had great quarrels with the inhabitants of Segeſta about their frontiers, which kindled a bloody war between the two cities. The Segeſtani, being overpowered by their adverſaries, had recourſe to Hannibal the ſon of Giſco, who was then in Sicily at the head of an hundred thouſand men. The Carthaginian did not let ſlip ſo fair an opportunity of puniſhing the Selinuntians for the inſults they had offered his father. For Giſco, being baniſhed Carthage, had taken refuge in Selinus, and periſhed there for want, the inhabitants refuſing to afford him any relief while he was in the utmoſt diſtreſs. Selinus, not being able to hold out againſt ſo formidable an army, was taken and razed, and moſt of the citizens inhumanly maſſacred, without regard to ſex or age. Some time after Hermocrates, the father-in-law of Dionyſius the elder, being expelled Syracuſe, joined the remains of the Selinuntii, who had eſcaped the rage of the Carthaginians, and repaired the city, which was ſubſiſting in the ſecond Punic war, but in Strabo's time quite deſerted [i]. Diogenes Laertius tells us, that near Selinus was a marſh, which with its peſtilentious vapour infected the whole neighbourhood; to prevent which evil, Empedocles turned the ſtreams of the two rivers Selinus and Hypſa into the marſh, and by that means carried off the ſtagnating waters. The ſame authors adds, that the citizens, in gratitude for ſo great a benefit, ordered divine honours to be paid Empedocles, and ſacrifices to be offered to Æſculapius.

The city borrowed its name from the river Selinus, and the river from the great quantity of ſmallage, called in Greek Selinon, which grew on its banks. The river Selinus is ſuppoſed to be the preſent Madiuni, and the city the place now called by the natives Terra delle pulci [k]. Theſe are the moſt noted cities on the ſouthern coaſt, which faces Africa. On that which lies over-againſt Italy, and is called by Ptolemy the weſtern, but ought to be rather called the northern, coaſt, were the following cities.

Lilybæum. LILYBÆUM, which gave name to the cape, was, according to Tully [l], one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt conſiderable cities of Sicily. There is nothing now remaining of it but the ruins of ſome aqueducts and temples, though it was ſtill ſtanding in Strabo's time [m]. The city of Marſala or Marſella, whence the cape is now called Capo di Marſella, is ſuppoſed to have been built out of its ruins. Lilybæum had a port, which was a ſafe retreat for ſhips even in Julius Cæſar's time [n]. The Romans indeed attempted ſeveral times to ſtop it up in their wars with Carthage; but their attempts proved unſucceſsful, the heaps of ſtones which they threw into it being too weak to reſiſt the violence of the ſeas and the ſtorms. The Carthaginians, as Diodorus informs us [o], laid the foundations of Lilybæum, after they had been driven from Motya by Dionyſius the tyrant; and, according to the ſame writer [p], Motya was taken by the tyrant the fourth year of the ninety-fifth olympiad. But Diodorus herein contradicts himſelf, as he has not but too often the misfortune to do; for he tells us elſewhere [q], that it was beſieged by the Carthaginians in the eighty-firſt olympiad, that is about fifty-two years before. The ſepulchre of the ſybil of Cumæ was formerly to be ſeen near this city [r]. Diodorus [s] ſpeaks of a well near Lilybæum, whereof the waters inſpired all thoſe who drank them with a prophetic enthuſiaſm; whence the inhabitants paid a particular worſhip to Apollo. Drepanum, now

Drepanum. Trapani, antiently a famous mart with a ſafe harbour, was ſo called from the Greek word Drepanos, ſignifying a ſcythe, ſuch being the ſhape of the ſhore on which it ſtood. It was incloſed with ſtrong walls, and fortified by Hamilcar, Hannibal's father, who kept it a conſiderable time, and made it the

the seat of war against the Romans, till by an order from Carthage he concluded a peace with Lutatius. Near Drepanum was the little island of Columbaria, which the inhabitants now call La Columbara. In Drepanum died Anchises, if Virgil is to be credited [t]. Eryx stood on the top of a hill, bearing the same name, at a small distance from the sea, and the place now called Trepano del Monte. The city borrowed its name from the mountain, and the mountain, as is supposed, from Eryx the son of Venus, who is said to have been killed there by Hercules. Mela tells us [u], that Æneas built a temple on the top of the mountain in honour of his mother Venus. It is certain, that the votaries of this goddess came in crouds from all parts of Greece, Italy, and Sicily, to make their offerings to her in this place; whence she was stiled Venus Erycina. Eryx was the seat of king Acestes, who so kindly entertained Æneas and his wandering Trojans. Hamilcar in the first year of the first Punic war razed the antient city of Eryx, and repaired Drepanum with materials brought from thence. It was soon after rebuilt, for we find it to have been the last city which the Carthaginians held in Sicily, and delivered up to the Romans at the end of the same war. In Strabo's time it was almost quite deserted, few people resorting to the temple, after the Romans had built a magnificent one to Venus Erycina at a small distance from the gate Collina [w]. Eryx.

Segesta. Segesta, called by the Greek writers Egesta, and sometimes Acesta, stood at a small distance from mount Eryx, and, according to an antient tradition, was built by Æneas, when he was by a storm driven on the coast of Sicily. Some writers add, that Egestus, or, as Virgil calls him, Acestes, was left in possession of the city by the founder, on his setting sail for Italy, and that from him it was called Egesta till it became subject to the Romans, who out of superstition changed the name of Egesta into that of Segesta (F). Others say, that it was built by Egestus before Æneas came came into Italy, and some are of opinion, that it was founded by one Elymus a Trojan, whence the inhabitants of this district were called Elymi [x]. Their territory was watered by the Scamander and the Simois, two names given these rivers by the Trojans, in memory of those in their native country; the former is now Il fiume di San Bartolomeo, and the latter a rivulet without name. This city was taken by Agathocles tyrant of Syracuse, by whose cruel command all the inhabitants were put to the sword, and even the antient name of the place changed into that of Dicæopolis, which it did not long retain. Tully tells us, that it was ruined by the Carthaginians before the reign of Agathocles, if therefore Diodorus's account be true, it must have been rebuilt. According to Strabo's description of it, it stood near the place where the town of Barbara was built many ages after, at a small distance from Castel a Mare.

Panormus. Panormus, now Palermo and the capital of Sicily, was built by the Phœnicians some time before the arrival of any Greeks in the island [y]. Its territory was watered by the Orethus and the Leutherus, the former is now called Amiraglio, and the latter Baiara. In the neighbourhood of this city stood antiently a strong fortress called Erƈta, which name was common to it with the hill, which the natives call Monte Pelegrino.

Himera. Himera was built by the inhabitants of Zancle or Messina, and utterly ruined by the Carthaginians [z]. It was afterwards rebuilt, and called by the Romans Thermæ Himeræ, from the hot baths in its neighbourhood. Tully speaks of this city as one of the most considerable in Sicily [a]. Himera was the birth-place of the famous poet Stesichorus. Tully tells us, that among the ruins of the old city two statues were dug up, which were deemed change was wholly founded on superstition. For the word Egesta is the same, all but one letter, as Egestas, which signifies in Latin poverty or want; and such names, as imported any thing that was bad, alarmed the superstitious Romans, who thought them omens of the dangers that threatened the person who pronounced them. Upon these groundless prejudices they changed the name of the city, which was first called Maleventum, into that of Beneventum, as they did that of Egesta into Segesta.

deemed maſter-pieces of art; the one repreſenting the city itſelf under the figure of a woman, and the other a ſtooping old man with a hook in his hand, ſuppoſed to be Steſichorus. The city borrowed its name from the river Himera, now fiume di Termini, which waſhed its walls (G). In the reign of Auguſtus it was made a Roman colony, as appears from ſome medals [b]. Alæſa, or Halaſa, was a very antient city of Sicily, and ſtood, as Fazellus conjectures, near the place where the city of Caronia ſtands at preſent, on the river Alæſus or fiume di Caſonia. Near Alæſa was a fountain, which, as Solinus would make us believe, uſed at the ſound of a flute to bubble up, ſo that it could not be kept within the baſon [c]. Agathyrna, which Strabo [d] calls Agathyrſum, and Antoninus's itinerary Agatinum, was, according to Diodorus, founded in the time of the Trojan war. Some think, that it ſtood near the place now called San Marco, at a ſmall diſtance from the promontory, which the Sicilians call Capo d'Orlando. Theſe are the chief cities we find mentioned by the antient geographers on the coaſts of Sicily. Among the inland cities, the following are the moſt remarkable.

Alæſa. Agathyrna.

ADRANUM, now Aderno, at the foot of mount Ætna, near a river formerly bearing the ſame name, as it does at preſent, being called Fiume d'Aderno. This city was built, according to Diodorus [e], by Dionyſius the elder, and was famous for the temple of Adranus, the tutelary god of the Siculi. Thither the inhabitants of the iſland and foreigners flocked at ſtated times of the year, to make their offerings and implore the protection of the deity of the place. Ælian tells us, that a thouſand large maſtiffs were conſtantly kept here, and that they were endowed with a particular inſtinct, which led them to fawn upon ſuch as brought preſents to the temple, to conduct drunken perſons home in the night, and

(G) There were two rivers in Sicily bearing this name; one running northward, and this is the river which gave the name to the city; the other runs ſouthward, and falls into the African ſea. The former is now called Fiume di Termini, and the latter Il Salſi or Salſo, which name agrees with what the antients ſay of it, viz. that its waters had a ſalt taſte, which they contracted by flowing through ſalt mines.

and fall furiouſly on thieves, and tear them in pieces [f]. Centuripe, formerly one of the richeſt cities in Sicily, is now but a ſmall village called by the natives Centrobe. It ſtood, according to Strabo [g], at the foot of mount Ætna, not far from the river Symæthus, now La Jareſta.

Enna. ENNA ſtood on an eminence in the middle of Sicily, as Strabo [h] informs us; whence it was called, according to Diodorus [i], the navel of Sicily. It was one of the ſtrongeſt places in the iſland, and remarkable for its beautiful plains, fruitful ſoil, and the many lakes and ſprings which watered its territory. A modern writer derives the name of Enna from the word Ennaam, which in the Phœnician language ſignifies a fountain of pleaſure [k], the waters of this place being highly commended by the antients for their limpidity and wholeſomeneſs. We are told by Diodorus [l], that Ceres was born in this diſtrict, and that ſhe firſt taught the inhabitants of Enna the art of agriculture. Diodorus adds, that the rape of Proſerpine by Pluto happened near Enna, while the young goddeſs was gathering flowers in a neighbouring meadow. This opinion obtained among the Ennæans, who ſhewed a large cavern, which opened of itſelf, as they believed, to make the god a way to his infernal kingdom. Hence the worſhip which the Sicilians paid theſe two divinities, the magnificent temple which Gelo erected to Ceres in this city, and the ſolemn feſtival, which the Syracuſians annually celebrated near the fountain Cyane, ſuppoſed to have ſprung up when the earth opened under Pluto's feet. The temple of Ceres was reſorted to from all parts of Italy, Greece, and Aſia, and was deemed one of the richeſt in Sicily. The antient city of Enna is ſuppoſed to have ſtood where Caſtro Janni now ſtands.

Engyum. Engyum or Enguyum ſtood near mount Maurus, which the inhabitants call Mandonia, near the ſprings of Aleſus. Cicero [m] ſpeaks of Engyum as one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Sicily. It was founded by the Cretans, and was famous for a temple dedicated to Ceres, in which it was conſtantly affirmed that certain goddeſſes, called the Mothers, appeared from time to time. This temple was, according to Plutarch, built by the Cretants, tans, and dedicated to the goddeſſes ſtiled the Mothers (H). That writers adds, that in the temple were lodged javelins and brazen helmets, which had been conſecrated to the goddeſſes of the place by Meriones and Ulyſſes. Theſe were the chief cities of Sicily in the ages we are to write of; the others we ſhall deſcribe in our notes, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of them in the ſequel of the hiſtory.

Mountains. Ætna.

ÆTNA, now mount Gibel, or in one word Mongibello, is the higheſt in Sicily, and famous for its frequent and dreadful eruptions, which have often deſtroyed the whole country to a great diſtance. It is ſaid to be eight miles in height and ſeventeen in circumference. The lower parts are very fruitful, the middle ſhaded with woods, and the top covered with ſnow great part of the year, notwithſtanding the flames and hot cinders it frequently throws up (I). The fire, which is continually burning in the bowels of this mountain, made the poets place here the forges of the Cyclopes under the direction of Vulcan, and the priſon of the giants who rebelled againſt Jupiter. Theſe fictions the vulgar ſoon took for truths, and looked on mount Ætna as the reſidence of Vulcan and the ſeat of his empire. Upon this ſuppoſition they erected a temple to him on the hill, in which was kept, as Ælian informs us [n], a perpetual fire, as in the temple of Veſta, this element being a ſymbol of Vulcan. Any extraordinary eruption was looked upon by the Romans as ominous, and two very

[n] Ælian. l. 11. de Animal.

(H) The Pagans gave the name of mothers to the goddeſſes of the firſt rank, namely, to Cybele, Juno, and Veſta. In the like manner the god, whoſe protection they implored, was often invoked by the name of father. Cicero ſpeaks of a famous temple erected in the city of Engyum to Cybele, who was ſtiled the Great Mother (6).

(I) This is elegantly expreſſed by Silius Italicus, in the following lines:

Summo cana jugo cohibet (mirabile dictu!)
Vicinam flammis glaciem, æternoque rigore.
Ardentes horrent ſcopuli: ſtat vertice celſi
Collis hyems, calidaque nivem tegit atra favilla (7).

very dreadful ones are said to have happened, the one not long before the breaking out of the servile war in Sicily, and the other soon after the death of Julius Cæsar, both portending the bloody wars that ensued. The most remarkable conflagrations we read of since those times were in the years of the Christian æra 1169, 1329, 1408, 1444, 1447, 1536, 1554, by the last of which Catana and the neighbouring countries were very near being utterly destroyed, as they were also in 1699. But we must refer the reader for the causes of those eruptions, and a particular account of them, to Fazellus, Cluverius, and Leontius in his Pyrologia Typographica. Next to Ætna in height and compass is mount Eryx, which we have spoke of above.

Rivers. The principal rivers were the Terius, now La Tavetta, the Himera, rising on mount Modenia and falling into the African sea; it is now called Salso for the reasons we have hinted above; the Halycus, called by the present inhabitants, Il Platani; it rises at a little distance from the small town Halce, antiently Halyciæ, and discharges itself into the Sicilian sea, near the ruins of Heraclea, about eighteen miles west of Agrigentum; the Anapus, which rises near Bussena, waters the territory of Syracuse, and empties itself into the Sicilian sea, &c.

The Æolian islands. No country has produced men more famed for learning than Sicily; but we need not enlarge on this subject, it being well known, that Æschylus, Diodorus, Siculus, Empedocles, Gorgias, Euclides, Archimedes, Epicarmus, Theocritus, &c. were natives of this island.

The Æolian islands lie off the north coast of Sicily, in the Tyrrhenian or Tuscan sea. They were so called from Æolus, who is supposed to have reigned there. They are also known by the name of the Vulcanian islands, because some of them vomited out flames like mount Ætna, and Vulcan was the tutelary god of all such places; for the same reason they were called by the Greeks Hephestiades. Strabo, Diodorus, Mela, and Pliny count seven of them, viz. Lipara, Hiera, Strongylæ, Evonymos, Didyme, Ericusa, Phenicusa. Lipara, now Lipari, is the best peopled and the largest of all the Æolian islands, being eighteen miles in compass. It is said to have borrowed its name from Liparus the son of Auson, who reigned in this island [e]. The soil is very fruitful, and the country furnished niſhed with great plenty of allom, ſulphur, and bitumen. It has many medicinal baths, which were formerly much frequented, whence it had the name of Thermeſſa. Strongylæ, now Strombolo, is about ten miles in compaſs; and the ſoil no leſs fruitful than that of Lipari, but the whole country is frequently laid waſte by the flames which a mountain in the iſland throws out. The other iſlands are no-ways conſiderable, moſt of them being uninhabited and mere rocks. Ptolemy reckons up fifteen of theſe iſlands; but, it is evident, he includes in that number ſeveral other little iſlands, which are too far diſtant from the Æolian iſlands to be comprehended under that denomination. They are diſtant about forty miles from the north coaſt of Sicily, and fifteen from the neareſt part of the farther Calabria.

The iſlands Ægates.

THE iſlands, called Ægates or Ægades, lie north of cape Lilybæum, and are three in number, viz. Phorbantia, or Buccina as Pliny calls it, Æguſa or Capraria, and Hiera, which is alſo called Maritima. The firſt is now called Levenzo, the ſecond Favignana, and the third Maretano.

The inhabitants. The Cyclopes and Læſtrigones

THE Cyclopes and Læſtrigones were, according to Juſtin, Pliny, Solinus, and Thucydides, the firſt inhabitants of Sicily. They are ſaid to have ſettled in the territory of Leontium and the countries in the neighbourhood of mount Ætna; but of their origin we know nothing, except what we are told by the poets. That there were formerly Cyclopes, or giants, ſome moderns have endeavoured to prove from the remains of ſome dead bodies of a gigantic ſize, which have been found in ſeveral parts of this iſland. They pretend, that theſe giants were deſcended from Japhet, and that they came into Sicily after the confuſion of languages [p]. Their inhumanity towards ſtrangers, and the flames which mount Ætna, a part of their territory, was conſtantly vomiting out, gave occaſion to many fictions of the poets, eſpecially that the Cyclopes fed on human fleſh, and that they were employed by Vulcan to make thunderbolts for Jupiter.

The Sicani.

THE moſt antient inhabitants after the Cyclopes were the Sicani, who, as Diodorus informs us [q], called themſelves

[p] Vide Thom. Fazell. Decad. 1. l. c. 7. & Marian. Valguarne a de primis incolis Siciliæ.

ſelves the original inhabitants of the iſland. But Thucydides [r], Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus [s], Philiſtus as quoted by Diodorus [t], Solinus [u], and the poet Silius [w] tell us, that they came from a country in Spain, watered by the river Sicanus which Servius [x], upon very weak conjectures, takes to be the Segro. Some writers will have them to have been called Sicani from the river Sicanus; others from their leader, under whoſe conduct they ſettled in Sicily, and gave their name to the iſland, which before was called Trinacria. Diodorus is of opinion, that the Sicani were the original inhabitants of Sicily, and ſupports his aſſertion with the authority of Timæus, who wrote the hiſtory of Sicily from the earlieſt ages. According to that antient writer, the Sicanians at firſt enjoyed the whole iſland, and applied themſelves to cultivate and improve the ground in the neighbourhood of mount Ætna, the moſt fruitful part of the iſland: they built ſeveral ſmall towns and villages on the hills to ſecure themſelves againſt thieves and robbers, and were governed not by one common prince, but each city and diſtrict by its own king. Thus they continued to live, till Ætna began to throw out flames, and lay waſte the whole country; and then they abandoned their antient habitations, and retired to the weſtern parts of the iſland, which they ſtill inhabited in the time of Thucydides [y]. Some Trojans, after the deſtruction of their city landing in Sicily, ſettled among the Sicani, built the cities of Eryx and Egeſta, and became one people with them, taking the general name of Elymi or Elymæi. They were afterwards joined by ſome Phocenſes, who ſettled here on their return from the ſiege of Troy.

The Siculi.

The people properly called Siculi, or Sicilians, came over into Sicily, after the Sicani had for many ages enjoyed an undiſturbed poſſeſſion of the whole iſland. They were, according to Hellanicus of Leſbos, the antient inhabitants of Auſonia, properly ſo called; but being driven from thence by the Opici, they took refuge in Sicily, and ſettled in that part of the iſland, which the Sicani had forſaken. As they were not contented with the narrow bounds which the Sicani allowed them, they began to encroach upon their neighbours; whereupon a bloody battle enſued, in which the Sicani were utterly defeated, feated, and confined to a corner of the iſland. The Siculi, now maſters of the greater part of the country, changed the antient name of Sicania into that of Sicily [z]. Philiſtus, as quoted by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, tells us, that the Siculi were originally Ligures, and that they oppoſed Hercules, when, on his return from Spain, he attempted to croſs the Alps out of Gaul into Italy. Notwithſtanding their oppoſition, that great conqueror got ſafe into Italy, ſubdued the Ligures, and having incorporated them into his army, carried them over into Sicily, it being his cuſtom, as the ſame author acquaints us, to recruit his army with the people he had conquered, and after they had aſſiſted him in making new conqueſts, to reward them with new ſeats [a]. The Phœnicians likewiſe ſettled on the coaſt, and in the adjacent iſlands, for the conveniency of trade; but upon the arrival of the Greeks retired into the country of the Elymi, in order to be nearer Carthage [b].

The Greeks.

ABOUT three hundred years after the arrival of the Siculi, the iſland began to be known to the Greeks. Of theſe the firſt that went thither were the Chalcidians of Eubœa, under the conduct of Thucles, who built Naxus, and a famous altar of Apollo, which, as Thucydides tells us, was ſtill ſtanding in his time without the city [c]. The year after, which was, according to Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus [d], the third of the ſeventeenth olympiad, Archias the Corinthian, one of the Heraclidæ, laid the foundations of Syracuſe. Seven years after a new colony of Chalcidians founded Leontini and Catana, after having driven out the Siculi who inhabited that tract. About the ſame time, Lamis with a colony from Megara, a city of Achaia, ſettled on the river Pantacius at a place called Trotilum, where his adventurers lived ſome time in common with the Chalcidians of Leontini; but being driven from thence by the Leontines, he built the city of Thapſus, where he died. Upon his death, the colony left Thapſus, and, under the conduct of Hyblon king of the Siculi, founded Megara Hyblæa, where they reſided two hundred and forty-five years, till they were driven out by Gelon, tyrant of Syracuſe. During their abode at Megara, they ſent one Pammilus, Pammilus, who was come from Megara in Achaia their original city, to build Selinus. This city was founded about a hundred years after the foundation of Megara. Antiphemus and Entimus, the former a Rhodian the other a Cretan, led each a colony of their countrymen, and jointly built the city of Gela on a river of the same name, establishing in their new settlement the Doric customs, about forty-five years after the founding of Syracuse. The inhabitants of Gela founded Agrigentum, an hundred and eight years after their arrival in Sicily, and introduced the same customs there. A few years after, Zancle was built by the pirates of Cumæ in Italy, but chiefly peopled by the Chalcidians, Samians, and Ionians, who chose rather to seek new settlements than live under the Persian yoke. Some time after, Anaxiles, tyrant of Rhegium, drove out the ancient proprietors, and, dividing their lands among his followers, called the city Messana or Messene, which was the name of his native city in Peloponnesus. The city of Himera was founded by the Zancleans under the direction of Eucleides, Simus, and Sacon; but peopled by the Chalcidians, and some Syracusian exiles, who had been driven out by the contrary faction. The Syracusians built Acræ, Chasmenæ, and Camarina; the first seventy years, the second ninety, and the third one hundred and thirty-five after the foundation of their own city. This is the account which Thucydides, a most judicious and exact writer, gives us of the various nations, whether Greeks or Barbarians, who settled in Sicily [c]. He takes no notice of a colony from Crete, which, if Diodorus is to be credited, settled in Sicily long before the Greeks got any footing in that island. According to this writer, Minos, king of Crete, having invaded Sicily in pursuit of Dædalus, was there treacherously put to death by Cocalus king of the Sicani. The Cretans, who had attended him in this expedition, having lost their leader, and likewise their ships which were all burnt by Cocalus, resolved to settle in the island, and build a city; which they did accordingly, calling it from the name of their king Minoa. Some time after, the inhabitants of Minoa, possessing themselves of a place strong by nature, in the heart of the country, built there the city of Engyum. After the destruction of Troy, Merion with other

other Cretans being caſt away on the coaſts of Sicily, were kindly entertained by their countrymen there, and admitted to ſhare all the privileges of their city. Their power being thus increaſed with their numbers, they began to make frequent inroads into the neighbouring territories, and conſiderably extended their confines. In proceſs of time they became one of the moſt wealthy colonies of Sicily, and built a moſt magnificent temple in honour of the Curetes or Corybantes, called in Crete the Mother Goddeſſes [f]. Strabo counts among the antient inhabitants of Sicily the Morgetes, who, being driven out of Italy by the Œnotrians, ſettled in that part of the iſland, where the antient city of Morgantium ſtood [g]. The Campani, who aſſumed the name of Mamertini, that is, invincible warriors, and the Carthaginians, who ſettled very early in Sicily, ought likewiſe to be counted among the antient inhabitants of the iſland; but of theſe we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

The History of the Sicani and Siculi.

As the authors who have wrote the hiſtory of Sicily from the earlieſt times, and to whom both Diodorus and Thucydides refer us for a more full account of what they only hint at, have not, to the irreparable loſs of the learned world, reached our times, we cannot pretend to give any ſatisfactory or connected hiſtory of thoſe nations, that inhabited the iſland, before the arrival of the Greeks (K). Of

(K) The authors who wrote the hiſtory of Sicily from the earlieſt ages are Timæus, Philiſtus, Antiochus of Syracuſe, Hipys, and Theopompus. Timæus was contemporary with Plato, wrote the hiſtory of Sicily, and is often quoted and followed by Diodorus Siculus. Philiſtus flouriſhed under the two Dionyſiuſes, and wrote a complete hiſtory of Sicily from the earlieſt ages to his time. He was a native of Naucratis, but paſſed great part of his life at Syracuſe, where he aſſiſted Dionyſius in the eſtabliſhing of his authority. He married the niece of Dionyſius, unknown to him, and was on that account baniſhed Sicily. He is often quoted by Joſephus, and ſeems to have been an accurate writer (18). Antiochus of Syracuſe is quoted by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus as an author of great credit; he flouriſhed about the 90th olympiad, and

(18) Vide Plut. in Dio, Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi.

Of the Læſtrigones and Cyclopes we know nothing but what we read in the poets, and is beneath the dignity of hiſtory to take notice of. We ſhall only ſay, that ſome writers have, not without good grounds, imagined, that the Læſtrigones and Sicani were one and the ſame people [h]. As to the Sicani, they had at firſt as many kings as cities, but were in proceſs of time brought under ſubjection to one common prince. Of all their kings we find two only mentioned in hiſtory, viz. Cocalus and Teutus; all we know of the latter is, that in his time the Sicani, being at variance among themſelves, were ſubdued by Phalaris tyrant of Agrigentum, and Teutus himſelf taken by treachery in Veſſa his capital [i]. Cocalus reigned long before him, and was, according to Diodorus, contemporary with Minos king of Crete, and wrote the hiſtory of Sicily in nine books, which began with the reign of Cocalus, and ended with the ſtate of Sicily in the reign of Darius Nothus king of Perſia. Pauſanias mentions this author in theſe words; Antiochus ſon of Xenophanes, a Syracuſan, ſays in his hiſtory of Sicily, &c. He is alſo quoted by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, who tells us, that he extracted his hiſtory from antient and authentic monuments. Strabo, Heſychius, and Feſtus ſeem to pay a great deference to the authority of this writer. Hipys flouriſhed either in the reign of Darius, or that of Xerxes, and was the firſt who wrote the hiſtory of Sicily, which hiſtory was afterwards abridged by one Myes. He is frequently quoted by Plutarch, Suidas, the ſcholiaſt on Aratus, and others. Theopompus, a native of the iſle of Chios, flouriſhed in the reigns of Artaxerxes Ochus of Perſia, and Philip the father of Alexander of Macedon. He was the diſciple of Iſocrates, and, in the opinion of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, far excelled his maſter. Athenæus cites and commends him as a lover of truth, and one who ſpared no pains in the ſearch of it. Beſides many other excellent performances, he wrote the hiſtory of Philip, the father of Alexander, in three books; in one of which he gave an account of the affairs of Sicily, from the beginning of the reign of Dionyſius the elder, to the expulſion of Dionyſius the younger (19). As the works of theſe authors have not reached us, we are left quite in the dark as to ſome of the moſt material points in the hiſtory of Sicily.

Crete, who being highly incenſed againſt Dædalus for helping his queen Paſiphae to ſatisfy her unnatural luſt, equipt a powerful fleet, and purſued him into Sicily, where Cocalus then reigned. Upon his arrival he ſent meſſengers to Cocalus, requiring him to deliver up Dædalus. The Sicanian ſhewed himſelf diſpoſed to comply with his requeſt, entertained him very ſplendidly, and invited him to his palace, where he cauſed him to be privately ſtifled in a hot bath. The Cretans, who had attended him into Sicily, raiſed a ſtately monument to their deceaſed king, whoſe bones were many ages after dug up in laying the foundations of Agrigentum, and ſent into Crete by Thero ſovereign of that diſtrict [k]. In the time of the Peloponneſian war, the Sicani ſided with the Lacedæmonians; and afterwards with Dionyſius, tyrant of Syracuſe, againſt the Carthaginians; but were at laſt entirely ſubdued by the latter, and held in ſubjection till the Romans in the firſt Punic war reſcued them from that bondage [l].

THE Siculi were in like manner firſt ſubject to many, and afterwards to one common prince. Æolus, according to Diodorus [m] and Juſtin [n], was their firſt king, and ſucceeded by Butes, as Butes was was by Eryx. But the moſt renowned among their princes was Ducetius, who governed the Siculi with great wiſdom, built the city of Palicon (L), and

(L) The city was ſo called from a neighbouring temple dedicated to the gods Palici, who were ſuppoſed to be two twin-brothers, and ſons of Jupiter by the nymph Thalia. The temple was very famous for the wonders that were related of it; but far more for the ſacredneſs of the oaths that were taken there, the violation of which was ſaid to be always attended with ſudden and exemplary puniſhment. This ſacred place was a ſecure aſylum for all perſons, who were oppreſſed by a ſuperior power; and eſpecially for ſlaves, who were unjuſtly abuſed, or too cruelly treated by their maſters. They continued ſafe in the temple till ſuch time as they had made their peace by the the interpoſition of mediators choſen by both parties; and there was not a ſingle inſtance of a maſter's having forfeited the promiſe and removed that of Neas, the place of his birth, from the hills to the champain country °. He engaged in a war with the Syracusans, by whom he was routed, and surrendering himself to them, was set at liberty, upon condition that he should leave Sicily, and lead a private life at Corinth (M). The promise he had made to pardon his slaves; so greatly revered were the gods who presided in the temple for the severe vengeance they were believed to take on those who violated their oaths (20).

(M) Ducetius, according to Diodorus Siculus, united all the Siculi, the inhabitants of Hybla excepted, into one body; by which means he became very powerful, and gained several considerable victories over the Syracusans, who began to give no small umbrage to the inhabitants of Sicily. But after many glorious successes, Ducetius was defeated in a pitched battle, and abandoned by the greatest part of his forces. The consternation, into which so sudden and general a desertion threw him, prompted him to take a resolution, which nothing but the utmost despair could suggest. He withdrew in the night to Syracuse, advanced as far as the great square in the middle of the city, and there falling prostrate at the foot of the altar, abandoned his life and dominions to the mercy of the Syracusans his professed enemies. Such a sight drew the whole city into the square, and the orators endeavoured to inflame the people thus assembled against the suppliant, whom providence had put into their hands, that they might revenge and punish by his death all the injuries he had done the republic. Such speeches incensed the multitude, who were ready to fall upon him even at the foot of the altar; but, an assembly being convened, the wisest of the senators represented, that they were not to consider what punishment Ducetius might deserve, but how it behoved the Syracusans to behave on that occasion; that they ought not to look upon him any longer as an enemy, but as a suppliant, by which character his person was become sacred and inviolable; that it was worthy the goodness natural to the Syracusans to exert their clemency even towards those who least deserved it, &c. The people was greatly affected with this speech, and all to a man voted for sparing Ducetius's life. However, he was banished Sicily, and ordered to reside at Corinth, the original city of the Syracusans, who took upon them to furnish the exile

(20) Diodor. Sicul. ibid. c. 22.

The Syracuſans, having thus got rid of a powerful rival, reduced the whole country of the Siculi, except the city of Trinacria alone, which refuſed to admit the Syracuſans within the walls. This city was at that time the metropolis of the Siculi, and its inhabitants were accounted the beſt warriors of the whole nation. The Syracuſans therefore, having drawn together all their troops, marched out againſt the Trinacrians, who met them at ſome diſtance from their city, and offered them battle. Both armies engaged with the utmoſt fury, and the victory was long doubtful. But at laſt the Trinacrians were overpowered with numbers, and thinking it beneath them either to beg quarter or to fly, were all to a man killed on the ſpot. Such of them as were wounded, preferring death to captivity, diſpatched themſelves. The Syracuſans, having gained ſo complete a victory over a people never before ſubdued, levelled the city with the ground, ſold all the women and children for ſlaves, and ſent the ſpoils by way of thankſgiving to the temple of Apollo at Delphos [p]. Thus were the Siculi reduced by the Syracuſans; but they did not long continue ſubject to them; for in the war which not long after broke out between the Syracuſans and Athenians, under the conduct of Nicias, we find the former ſoliciting the Siculi to join them againſt a foreign enemy, and eſpouſe the cauſe of Syracuſe as their own. But the Siculi were ſo far from complying with their requeſt, that they ſent powerful ſuccours to the Athenians, and cut in pieces a body of Spartans that was marching to the relief of Syracuſe [q]. In the war which was ſoon after kindled between Carthage and Syracuſe, they aſſiſted the Carthaginians with an army of twenty thouſand men [r]. But in the war which Dionyſius the elder made upon the Carthaginians with a deſign to ile with all things neceſſary to ſupport himſelf ſuitable to his dignity. Ducetius, however, returned ſome years after into Sicily, under pretence of founding a new colony, and endeavoured to deliver his countrymen from the oppreſſion they groaned under, but was prevented by death from accompliſhing his deſign (21).

drive them out of the iſland, they aſſiſted the Syracuſans to the utmoſt of their power. The Carthaginians prevailed in this war, and the Siculi, notwithſtanding the aſſiſtance they had lent Dionyſius, were by him abandoned, and given up to the Carthaginians, whoſe yoke they bore till the time of Timoleon the Corinthian, who reſtored moſt of the cities belonging to the Siculi to the full enjoyment of their antient liberties [s], as we ſhall have occaſion to relate at length in the ſequel of this hiſtory. This is what we have been able to gather relating to the firſt inhabitants of Sicily, from the few fragments that are ſtill remaining of the authors, who have wrote at length on that ſubject. We ſhall now proceed to the hiſtory of the Greek colonies in Sicily, beginning with that of Syracuſe, the moſt powerful ſtate and eminent city in the whole iſland.

SECT. II.

The Hiſtory of Syracuse.

WHAT kind of government firſt prevailed in the city of Syracuſe is not well known. We find one Polis, mentioned by Athenæus [t] and Ælian [u], as reigning there in the earlieſt times; whence ſome have concluded, that the city was firſt governed by kings. It is certain, that monarchical government, if firſt introduced, was not of long continuance, being ſoon changed into a democracy, as is manifeſt from Ariſtotle [w], Diodorus Siculus [x], and Juſtin [y]. But as the hiſtory of that republic is for the ſpace of two hundred years overcaſt with an impenetrable miſt for want of records, we ſhall begin with the reign of Gelon, in whoſe time Syracuſe began to make a very conſiderable figure, and thenceforward furniſhes many great and memorable events for the ſpace of above two hundred years. During all that time it exhibits a perpetual alternative of ſlavery under tyrants, and liberty under a popular government, government, till it was at length reduced by the Romans, and made part of their empire.

GELON was born in the city of Gela, whence he probably took his name (N). He signalized himself in the wars, which Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, carried on against the neighbouring states, most of which he reduced, and was very near making himself master of Syracuse, after having defeated the Syracusans in a battle fought on the banks of the Florus; however, he obliged them to deliver up to Hippocrates the city of Camarina, which they had ever possessed to that time. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon, under pretence of defending the rights of the tyrant's children, his wards, took up arms against his own citizens, and, having overcome them in a battle, seized on the sovereignty for himself. After this success, he undertook to restore some Syracusans, who had been expelled the city by the contrary faction. With these exiles he marched from Casmene to Syracuse, where he was received by the populace with loud acclamations, and put in possession of the city. Being now master of so wealthy a place, he gave the government of Gela to his brother Hiero, and bent all his thoughts on the embellishing of Syracuse, and extending the limits of that state. His first care was to people it well, and therefore, having destroyed the city of Camarina, he transferred the inhabitants to Syracuse. He had soon after some disputes with the Megareans, who were supported by all the Eubœans that inhabited Sicily.

Gelon. Year of the flood 2514. Before Christ 485.

(N) The first of Gelon's ancestors we find mentioned in his history was one Oecetor, who was born in the island of Telus, but went to settle at Gela, whence he was driven with the other inhabitants by Antiophemes and the Lyndians of Rhodes, when they possessed themselves of that city. In process of time, one of his descendants by name Telines was created by the inhabitants of Gela high-priest of the infernal gods. At what time the family returned to Gela is not known. Herodotus (22) informs us, that Telines was the first of the descendants of Oecetor, who made any figure, and that some of the inhabitants of Gela being expelled in a sedition, he by the authority of his function brought them back to their native country, for which good office the priesthoood was continued in his family.

(22) Herodot. l. vii.

Sicily. But their joint forces were not able to cope with Gelon, who drove them out of the field, took and razed their cities, and transplanted the most wealthy among the inhabitants to his favourite city, allowing them to enjoy the same rights and privileges as the natives. The common people, though they had no part in promoting the war against him, he sold for slaves, obliging those who purchased them to transport them out of Sicily, saying, that it was more easy to govern a thousand men of substance, than one who had nothing to lose [a]. By this means the power of Syracuse rose in a short time to a very great height, and the friendship of Gelon was courted, not only by the neighbouring states, but by those of Greece, namely of Athens and Lacedæmon, who jointly sent embassadors into Sicily, inviting him to enter into an alliance with them against Xerxes king of Persia, who was ready to invade Greece with a formidable army. Gelon, it seems, had been, before this time, engaged in a war with the Carthaginians, and on that occasion had implored in vain the assistance of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, for he upbraided the embassadors with the contempt Athens and Lacedæmon had shewn him, when he solicited succours from them against the Carthaginians. However, he declared at the same time, that he was so far from retaliating such an ungenerous treatment, that, on the contrary, he was ready to supply them with two hundred gallies, twenty thousand completely armed, two thousand horse, two thousand bow-men, two thousand slingers, two thousand light-horse, and besides to furnish the whole Greek army with corn during all the time of the war, upon condition they would appoint him commander in chief of all their forces. This proposal was rejected by the embassadors with indignation, who told him, that if he was willing to succour Greece under the conduct of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, they would willingly enter into a confederacy with him against the common enemy, but, if he disdained to obey their orders, they did not care for his assistance. Gelon replied with a great deal of temper, that he could not help thinking he had a better claim to the supreme command, than either the Lacedæmonians or Athenians, since he had a far greater number both of sea and land forces; but, however, he would abate something of his first pretensions, and be satisfied with the command either of the fleet or the army, and allow them to chuse which of the two they liked best. The embassadors, notwithstanding the straits their respective countries countries were in, would hearken to no ſuch propoſals; whereupon they were commanded by Gelon to depart forthwith his dominions [b].

In the mean time, Gelon being informed, that Xerxes had already croſſed the Helleſpont, and apprehending that the Greeks would not be able to reſiſt ſo formidable a power, diſpatched to Delphos one Cadmus, a perſon whom he could confide in (O), with rich preſents, enjoining him to wait the event of a battle, and in caſe Xerxes ſhould conquer to preſent him with the treaſure, and pay him homage in his name; but if the Greeks ſhould get the better of the Barbarian, to bring back the preſents to Sicily (P) [c]. Gelon, it ſeems, was at this time quite ignorant of the

(O) Cadmus had been formerly lord of Cos, the dominion of which iſland he had received by inheritance from his anceſtors; but becauſe they had uſurped that ſovereignty, and unjuſtly deprived the inhabitants of their liberty, Cadmus voluntarily reſigned his authority, reſtored the Coans to their antient rights and priviledges, and retired to the city of Zancle in Sicily where he lived a private life. Gelon, who was well acquainted with his character, ſent him to Delphos on this occaſion, entruſting him with preſents of an immenſe value. Neither was he deceived in the opinion which he had conceived of his integrity; for Cadmus no ſooner heard that the Perſians had been defeated, and that Xerxes was retiring with his forces, than he returned to Sicily, and delivered up to Gelon the treaſures he had entruſted him with, though he might with impunity have appropriated them to himſelf (23).

(P) The Sicilian writers, as Herodotus informs us, vary in ſome particulars of this account, and ſay, that Gelon, having at laſt prevailed with himſelf to ſerve under the Lacedæmonians, would have aſſiſted Greece in her diſtreſs, if his own dominions had not been invaded by the Carthaginians. Theſe authors make no mention of any alliance concluded between the Perſians and Carthaginians; but tell us, that the Carthaginians were invited into Sicily by Terillus, who had been tyrant of Himera, but diſpoſſeſſed of his government by Theron tyrant of Agrigentum, to revenge which injury, at the inſtigation of Anaxilas tyrant of Rhegium, who had married his daughter, he had recourſe to the Carthaginians, not doubting, but they would gladly embrace ſo favourable an opportunity of invading Sicily (24).

(23) Herodot. ibid. (24) Idem, ibid.

the alliance which Xerxes had concluded with the Carthaginians before he undertook his expedition into Greece. By that treaty it was agreed, that while the Persians invaded Greece, the Carthaginians should fall on those who were of the Greek name in Sicily and Italy, that they might be diverted from assisting one another. Pursuant to this agreement, the Carthaginians made vast preparations with a view to recover the places which they had formerly possessed in Sicily. It is not exactly known, at what time the Carthaginians first carried their arms into Sicily; all we are certain of is, that they were possessed of some part of it as early as the first year after the expulsion of king Tarquin at Rome; for in the time of the first consuls Brutus and Valerius the Romans and Carthaginians entered into a treaty, chiefly in relation to navigation and commerce, whereby it was expresly stipulated among other things, that the Romans, who should touch at Sardinia, or that part of Sicily which belonged to the Carthaginians, should be received there in the same manner as the Carthaginians themselves [d]. Hence it is manifest, that the Carthaginians were already masters of Sardinia and part of Sicily. This treaty was concluded about twenty-eight years before Xerxes invaded Greece; but at the time of that expedition the Carthaginians had not a foot of ground in Sicily, having been driven out by Gelon, as appears from that prince's speech to the Athenian and Spartan embassadors related at length by Herodotus [e]. No wonder then, that the Carthaginians readily embraced so favourable an opportunity of recovering their dominions in Sicily, and joined in alliance with Xerxes, who was an irreconcileable enemy to the whole Greek nation. The preparations for this war are said to have been continued for three years, during which time Hamilcar the son of Hanno, who was charged with the management of it, not only raised what forces he could in Africa, but also with the money sent him by Xerxes hired a great number of mercenaries in Spain, Gaul, and Italy; so that his army amounted to three hundred thousand men, and his fleet to two thousand ships of war and three thousand transports. With this formidable army Hamilcar sailed from Carthage, and landing without opposition at Panormus, laid siege to Himera a maritime city in that neighbourhood. Theron, tyrant tyrant of Agrigentum, whoſe daughter Gelon had married, was then in poſſeſſion of Himera, having driven from thence Terillus to whom that city of right belonged. The tyrant ſeeing his city all on a ſudden inveſted with ſo numerous an army, diſpatched meſſenger after meſſenger to his ſon-in-law, imploring a ſpeedy ſuccour. Gelon, upon the firſt notice he had of the ſtraits Theron was in, drew together an army of fifty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe, and marched with all poſſible expedition to his relief. Hamilcar on his ſitting down before Himera, which was a town of great ſtrength, had cauſed two large camps to be well fortified; in one of which he lodged his land army; and his ſhips, which he had cauſed to be drawn aſhore, in the other, placing there all the marines for their defence. Gelon, on his arrival at Himera, intercepted a courier, carrying letters from the inhabitants of Selinus, confederates of the Carthaginians, to Hamilcar, whereby he underſtood, that Hamilcar was to offer the next morning in the camp of the marines a ſolemn ſacrifice to Neptune, and that he had appointed the Selinuntine cavalry to join him the ſame day in the ſaid camp. Gelon, taking advantage of this intelligence, drew out an equal number of his own horſe, ordering them to advance to the enemy's camp about the time agreed on, as if they were the Selinuntines. His orders were put in execution, and the body of cavalry admitted without the leaſt ſuſpicion into the camp. Hamilcar, was then buſy in ſacrificing, and the greater part of the ſoldiery attending him without arms. The Syracuſans therefore, without the leaſt oppoſition, making up to Hamilcar, killed him, purſuant to their general's orders, cut in pieces moſt of his marines, and ſet fire to the ſhips. In this cricitcal conjuncture, Gelon, who had notice of the ſucceſs by a ſignal given him from the top of a neighbouring hill, drew out his army and attacked the other camp. The Carthaginians at firſt made a gallant reſiſtance; but when news was brought them of their general's death, and at the ſame time ſeeing all their fleet in a blaze, they had no longer courage to ſtand their ground, but betook themſelves to a precipitous flight; and then the ſlaughter was dreadful. We are told, that no fewer than an hundred and fifty thouſand were killed in the purſuit; the reſt retired to an eminence, where they made head againſt the enemy; but being ſurrounded on all ſides without any hopes of relief, they were obliged, for want of proviſions, to ſurrender at diſcretion; ſo that of this mighty army, the greateſt that ever had been raiſed in thoſe weſtern parts, not one ſingle man made his eſcape [f]. Herodotus tells us, that this battle was fought the ſame day as that of Salamis, but Diodorus Siculus will have the Carthaginians to have been defeated the ſame day that Leonidas was killed at Thermoplyæ. After the battle Gelon amply rewarded all thoſe who had ſignalized themſelves in the action, eſpecially the body of horſe, to whom he was chiefly indebted for the victory. The greateſt part of the ſpoils, which were of an immenſe value, he offered to the gods, adorning with them the temples of Syracuſe and Himera. The captives he ſhared with his allies, who employed them in public works for the common good; and ſo many were taken, that all Africa, as our author ſays, ſeeemed to have been tranſplanted into Sicily. Some of the private citizens of Agrigentum, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves above the reſt, had five hundred a-piece. They were all put in irons, and ſet apart for the public ſervice; and on this occaſion it was, that the Agrigentines built their famous temple, and made thoſe conduits, which were ſo much admired by the antients, and called Pheaces from one Pheax, who was the overſeer of the work [g].

Of the two thouſand ſhips of war and three thouſand tranſports, of which the Carthaginian fleet conſiſted, eight ſhips only, which happened to be cut out at ſea when the camp of the marines was taken, made their eſcape, and ſailed to Carthage; but before they reached that place they were all caſt away, a few men only being ſaved in a ſmall boat. Theſe arriving at Carthage brought the diſmal news of the entire defeat of their army and the loſs of their fleet. The grief, conſternation, and deſpair, which ſuch an unexpected diſaſter occaſioned in the city, is not to be expreſſed. As the Carthaginians in all great reverſes of fortune ever loſt their courage, and ſunk into deſpair, they looked upon themſelves as utterly ruined, expecting every moment to ſee the victorious army land at Carthage. In this fright, they immediately diſpatched embaſſadors into Sicily, enjoining them to ſtrike up a peace with Gelon upon any terms. The embaſſadors without delay put to ſea, and landing at Syracuſe threw themſelves at the conqueror's conqueror's feet, and with many tears begged him to receive their city into favour, and grant them a peace upon what conditions he should think fit to prescribe. Gelon heard them with great humanity, and, being touched with compassion, granted them a peace upon the following conditions; viz. that they should pay two thousand talents of silver to defray the expences they had put him to, build two temples, where the articles of the treaty should be lodged and kept as sacred, and for the future abstain from offering human sacrifices. This last article shews the humanity of Gelon's temper; and indeed, no prince ever gave more instances of good nature, than he after his authority was once established. Some acts of severity, which he is said to have practised before he was firmly seated on the throne, are generally ascribed to his counsellors, who prompted him to them against the natural bent of his humane temper. The Carthaginians did not think this a dear purchase of a peace, which was absolutely necessary for their affairs, and which they hardly durst hope for. They shewed their gratitude to Damarata, Gelon's wife, who had been chiefly instrumental in procuring them so favourable a peace, by sending her a crown of gold, which was valued at an hundred talents of gold. This crown Gelon turned into money, and coined pieces called from his wife's name Damaretia, each of them being worth ten Attic drachmas [h].

Gelon, after the conclusion of the peace, having nothing to fear from Africa, resolved to embark his troops, and passing over into Greece, join his countrymen there against the Persians. Upon second thoughts he had changed his mind, and resolved rather to serve under the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, than suffer the barbarians to insult over those of the Greek name. But while all things were in a readiness for this expedition, a messenger from Corinth brought him the joyful news of the victory, which the Greeks had gained at Salamis, and at the same time acquainted him, that Xerxes with a great part of his army had left Europe. Hereupon he disbanded his army, after having commended his soldiers and officers for the forwardness they had shewn to assist their countrymen in Greece, and given each of them some token of his favour. He commanded the allies to return to their respective homes, and

and the mercenaries he quartered in places at a great diſtance from Syracuſe his metropolis. And now having no troops within, or near, the city, he ſummoned a general aſſembly of all the inhabitants of Syracuſe, commanding them to come armed, as if they were to encounter an enemy. When they were met, he himſelf repaired to the aſſembly without arms or guards, and there gave them an account of his whole conduct, ſhewing to what uſes he had applyed the ſeveral ſums with which he had been entruſted, and in what manner he had employed his authority; adding, that he had never any thing elſe in view but the public welfare; but, however, if he had through ignorance done any thing amiſs, they were at full liberty to inflict upon him what puniſhment they thought fit, ſince they were all well-armed, and he without arms or guards to ſcreen himſelf from their vengeance. The numerous aſſembly ſtruck with ſo unexpected a ſpeech, and ſtill more with the unuſual confidence he repoſed in them, anſwered with loud acclamations, calling him their great benefactor, their deliverer, their king. This laſt title Gelon had ever declined, ſtiling himſelf only prætor of Syracuſe; but the Syracuſans obliged him, before he left the aſſembly, to accept of it, and with one conſent inveſted him with the ſupreme authority [i]. Their gratitude did not ſtop here; a decree was paſſed, without oppoſition, ſettling the crown, after his death, on his two brothers, Hiero and Thraſybulus. And becauſe he had, by coming without arms or guards into the aſſembly, put his life into their hands, the aſſembly commanded a ſtatue to be erected repreſenting him ſimply in the habit of a citizen, hoping thereby to tranſmit the memory of ſo remarkable an action to the lateſt poſterity (Q) [k].

The

(Q) This ſtatue met afterwards with a very ſingular fate. About a hundred and thirty years after it had been ſet up, Timoleon, having reſtored the Syracuſans to their antient liberty, thought it adviſeable to ſell all the ſtatues of the princes, who had governed till that time, in order to eraze the leaſt footſteps of tyranny, and at the ſame time to relieve the wants of the people. But firſt he brought them to a trial as ſo many criminals, hearing the depoſitions and witneſſes againſt them. They were all condemned with one voice, the ſtatue of Gelon excepted, which found

THE Syracuſans had no cauſe to repent their having entruſted him with the ſovereign power; for he employed the ſhort time he reigned in the truly royal care of makeing his people happy. He was the firſt man, as our author obſerves [l], who became more virtuous by being raiſed to the throne. Before his power was eſtabliſhed, he was, contrary to his natural diſpoſition, obliged to uſe ſome ſeverity; but when the ſupreme authority was by the common conſent of the citizens put into his hands, he made it his only ſtudy to oblige all, and ſerve the public to the utmoſt of his power, without any regard to his private eaſe or advantage. The firſt thing he did, after his acceſſion to the throne, was, to beſtow on ten thouſand foreigners, who had ſerved under him, all the rights and privileges of the Syracuſan citizens. This he did with a view to people his capital, to encreaſe the power of the ſtate, and reward the ſervices of ſo many brave men, who had expoſed their lives for the defence of the city [m]. He was, as Plutarch informs us [n], particularly famous for his honeſty, truth, and ſincerity; for he is ſaid never to have willfully wronged the meaneſt of his ſubjects, and never to have promiſed a thing which he did not perform. Happening once to be in great want of money for the carrying on of an expedition, and, on the other ſide, not caring to load his ſubjects with extraordinary taxes, he convened the people, laid before them the ſtate of his finances, and deſired them to contribute voluntarily what every one could afford, and ſhould think proper. The Syracuſans, who were not yet well acquainted with Gelon's character, for this happened before his victory over the Carthaginians, ſeemed unwilling to be at any expence on account of the expedition, for which the money was deſigned. He therefore entreated them to lend him the neceſſary ſum, aſſuring them, that though it was to be employed for the public good, they ſhould be reimburſed as ſoon as the war was ended. He was then furniſhed with the money he wanted, which he not only repaid paid at the time agreed on, but divided great part of the booty, which he got in that expedition, among thoſe who had lent him it [o].

One of the chief objects of his attention was the encouraging of agriculture, which he took great pains to make his ſubjects look upon as an honourable employment. He animated the huſbandmen by his preſence, and took delight in employing his ſpare hours in working with them in the fields. His deſign in ſo doing was not, ſays Plutarch [p], merely to render the country rich and fruitful, but to inure his ſubjects to toils, and by that means preſerve them from a thouſand diſorders, which inevitably accompany a ſoft and indolent life. He was a profeſſed enemy to all luxury, pomp, and oſtentation; and ever uſed his utmoſt endeavours to baniſh from his dominions all ſuch callings as had a natural tendency to debauch the manners, and enervate the courage of his ſubjects. From his infancy he ſhewed a great diſinclination to muſic, which was at that time in great requeſt among the Greeks; whence, while he was one day at an entertainment, a lyre being preſented, according to a cuſtom that then prevailed, to each of the gueſts, when it was Gelon's turn to play, he, inſtead of ſounding the inſtrument as the reſt had done, cauſed his horſe to be brought, and mounting him with wonderful agility and grace, ſhewed that he had learnt a more noble and manly exerciſe, than that of playing on the lyre [q].

Ever ſince the defeat of the Carthaginians the ſeveral cities of Sicily enjoyed a profound peace; ſuch as had ſided with the enemy were, upon their firſt application, generouſly pardoned by the conqueror, and ſuffered quietly to enjoy their antient liberties. The Syracuſans, above all others, were happy under the auſpicious government of ſo good and beneficent a prince. Their republic, indeed, was changed into a monarchy; but the laws, and not the monarch, bore the whole ſway. Their properties were as ſafe, their liberties as extenſive, as when they were their own maſters, and their city in a far more flouriſhing condition than ever. Their king aſſumed no part of the kingly office, but the toils and cares of it, and the ſatisfaction of procuring happineſs to others, which of all ſatisfactions is the greateſt. He was often heard to ſay, that the Syracuſans in placing the crown upon his head could have no other ther view than to engage him, by ſo ſignal a favour, to defend the ſtate, to preſerve order in all things, to protect innocence and juſtice, and to exhibit, by his ſimple, modeſt, frugal, and regular life, a pattern of all civil vertues to his ſubjects. And this deſign he anſwered above any prince that ever had ſwayed a ſcepter before him; his whole life being taken up in promoting the worſhip of the gods, the obſervance of the laws, and the welfare of his ſubjects. But his reign was ſhort, heaven having only ſhewn, we may ſay, to the world, that thoſe, who in after-ages were to be ſet over others, might in him have a perfect pattern of all the virtues that are becoming ſo eminent a ſtation. He died of a dropſy, in the ſeventh year of his reign, and the grief of his ſubjects for the loſs of their common father, and beſt friend, as they not undeſervedly ſtiled him, was equal to the love and eſteem they had always bore him. Even on his death-bed he gave an inſtance of his reſpect for the laws; the Syracuſans had enacted one againſt the extravagant pomp of funerals, and Gelon, always willing to confirm with his exemple what the people agreed on, begged his brother Hiero, who was to ſucceed him, to take care that this law was ſtrictly obſerved in his funeral. The whole city accompanied the body of their beloved king to the place where it was to be interred, though it was above twenty miles diſtant from Syracuſe. The people, in token of their gratitude and affection for ſo loving a prince, erected in the place, where he was buried, a magnificent mauſoleum, ſurrounded with nine towers, of a ſurprizing height and exquiſite ſtructure, and decreed him thoſe honours, which were then paid to the demi-gods or heroes. The Carthaginians afterwards demoliſhed the mauſoleum, and Agathocles the towers; but ſays our hiſtorian, neither violence, envy, nor time, which deſtroys all other things, could efface the glory of his name, or aboliſh the memory of his exalted virtues and noble actions, which love and gratitude had engraved in the hearts of his ſubjects [r] (R).

After Gelon's death, the sceptre continued near twelve years in his family. He was succeeded by Hiero his eldest brother, who is commended by some of the antients as an excellent prince, and by others represented as a covetous, headstrong, and cruel tyrant. To reconcile these writers we must distinguish the periods. In the beginning of his reign he behaved more like an unjust tyrant, than a lawful prince; he thought himself above the laws, despised his subjects, and, led by his covetous temper, impoverished the people to enrich himself. His conduct, so unlike that of his predecessor, soon made him the object of the public hatred; but the Syracusans bore with his vices, out of the great veneration they had for his brother's memory, which was the only thing that restrained them from rising in open rebellion. He was extremely jealous of his brother Polyzelus, whose great interest and credit among the citizens made him suspect, that he designed to drive him from the throne. He therefore employed only foreigners and mercenaries about him, suffering no Syracusan to set foot in his palace. In order to get rid of Polyzelus, he resolved to put him at the head of a great army, which he was going to send to the assistance of the Sybarites against the Crotoniates, hoping he might lose his life in that expedition. But Polyzelus, being well apprized of his design, refused the command, which so exasperated the tyrant, that he would have caused him to be put to death, had he not by a timely flight saved himself in the territories of Theron, king of Agrigentum, who had married his daughter. Hiero demanded him, but Theron could not by any threats be prevailed upon to deliver up his father-in-law, who had taken sanctuary in his dominions. This gave rise to a war, which lasted many years, between the kings of Syracuse and Agrigentum, and was at last ended in the following manner. The inhabitants of Himera, being grievously oppressed by their governor Thrasydeus the son of Theron, and not daring to complain to his father, sent embassadors to Hiero, offering to deliver up to him their city, and join him against his rival Theron. But Hiero, detesting the body of his deceased master to the funeral pile, and throwing himself into the flame, was with it reduced to ashes (26).

(26) Plin. l. 6. c. 4.

ing their treachery, discovered the whole plot to Theron, who out of gratitude offered to conclude a peace upon terms that were highly advantageous to Hiero. The conditions were accordingly agreed to by the contending parties, and the two kings reconciled. On this occasion Theron, interposing his good offices in behalf of Polyzelus, prevailed upon Hiero to receive him again into favour. To make the reconciliation between the two kings more lasting, they cemented it with a new alliance, Hiero marrying Theron's sister, after which there was during Theron's reign a perfect harmony between the states of Syracuse and Agrigentum [t].

Hiero, having thus concluded a peace with the king of Agrigentum, turned his arms against the inhabitants of Catana and Naxus, whom he drove from their country, and in their room settled a colony of Syracusans and Peloponnesians. This he did with a view to be honoured after his death as the founder of those cities, for all cities paid their founders such honours as were bestowed on heroes. The Cataneans and Naxians he transplanted to the city of Leontini, incorporating them with the antient inhabitants. The same year he obtained a signal victory over the Hetruscans of Tyrrhenia, who infested the neighbouring coasts, sunk most of their ships, burnt others, and cleared the seas of those pirates [u]. He found himself soon after engaged in a war with the Agrigentines under the conduct of Thrasydeus, who had succeeded his father Theron, but was very unlike that good and generous prince; for, going astray from the path which Theron had pointed out to him, he no sooner ascended the throne, but, throwing aside all restraint of the laws, he began to oppress his subjects in a most tyrannical manner. Hiero, out of the respect he bore to his father's memory, advised him to use his subjects with more humanity, lest they should conspire against him, and drive him from the throne as one not fit to be entrusted with their lives and fortunes. This wholsome advice so provoked Thrasydeus, who was of a violent temper, that he entered the Syracusan territories in an hostile manner, laid waste the country, and even threatened the metropolis with a siege, having under his standards above twenty thousand men. Hiero seeing himself insulted at the very gates of his metropolis, raised an equal number of forces, and marched out against the unjust aggressor. Thrasydeus did not decline the engagement, which was very bloody, most of the troops on both sides being killed on the spot. But the Syracusans carried the day, and Thrasydeus, out of despair abdicating the government, fled to the city of Megara, where he laid violent hands on himself. Upon his abdication the Agrientines recovered their liberty, and entered into an alliance with Hiero [w].

Hiero, a little before his death, invited into Sicily the sons of Anaxilas, formerly tyrant of Rhegium, and a great friend of his brother Gelon, and advised them, as they were come to years of maturity, to take the sovereign power into their own hands, and call to an account Micythus, who had been left their guardian. Hiero, who had contracted a bad state of health, was mighty desirous to see the children of his brother's friend in possession of their dominions before he left the world. The two young men loaded with rich presents set out from the court of Syracuse, and arriving at Rhegium commanded Micythus to give an account of his administration, which he did in the presence of their friends and relations, no one finding any thing to object to him, but, on the contrary, all admiring and extolling his prudence, his integrity, and justice, for it appeared, says our author, that no man had ever discharged a trust with more honesty and disinterestedness. The young princes, repenting the steps they had taken, earnestly pressed him to resume the government, promising to respect him as if he were their father, and pay him a filial obedience till the hour of his death. But Micythus could not by any means be prevailed upon to accept their offer, and was equally pressing with them to take the reins of the government into their own hands; which they no sooner consented to do, but Micythus took his leave of them, and embarked for Greece, his native country, being attended to the shore by the whole city in the utmost grief for so great a loss. He afterwards led a private life at Tegea in Arcadia, where he was no less esteemed and loved, than he had been at Rhegium [x]. Soon after Hiero died at Catana, which city he had repeopled, and was there buried with great pomp and magnificence. Diodorus * tells us in one place, that he reigned only eleven eleven years, and in another, that he reigned twelve years and eight months [y]. But Ariſtotle will have him to have ſwayed the ſcepter only ten years [z].

THERE is a ſtrange diſagreement among authors with relation to Hiero's character. Diodorus tells us, that he was of a covetous, cruel, and tyrannical temper, and an utter ſtranger to the candor and ſincerity of his brother Gelon; that out of jealouſy he attempted to make away with his brother Polyzelus, and that he oppreſſed his ſubjects to ſuch a degree, that they would have depoſed him, had they not been reſtrained by the remembrance of Gelon's generoſity and general kindneſs to all his ſubjects [a]. On the other hand, Ælian [b] commends him as a juſt, generous, and good-natured prince, and adds, that the moſt needy were not more ready to crave than he was to give, that his generoſity knew no bounds, that he was a great admirer of learning, and a bountiful encourager of the learned, that he was a prince of great candour and ſincerity, and that he lived in perfect harmony with his brothers, without ever entertaining any ſort of jealouſy againſt them. This account is, ſeemingly, in each particular a direct contradiction to the former. However, ſome writers have endeavoured to reconcile both teſtimonies, as we have hinted above. For Hiero, as the ſame Ælian informs us elſewhere [c], in the beginning of his reign betrayed a fierce, ſavage, and untractable temper; by falling afterwards into a lingering diſtemper, which confined him to his palace, and thereby gave him an opportunity of reflecting ſeriouſly on the conduct of his life, he ſeemed, as it were, to have changed his nature. During his illneſs, his only delight was to converſe with men of learning, whom he invited to his court from all parts, amply rewarding them for the relief their entertaining converſation afforded him. Among theſe were Simonides, Pindar, Æſchylus, Bacchylides, and Epicharmus. The converſation of theſe great men did not a little contribute to the ſoftening of Hiero's inhuman temper; for they were not only excellent poets, but alſo poſſeſſed of a great fund of learning, and conſulted as the ſages of their age. Simonides in particular had a great aſcendant over the king's mind, and the only uſe he made of it was, to inſpire him with ſentiments worthy of a prince. He frequently conversed with him on philosophical subjects, and in one of these conversations it was, that Hiero, as we read in Tully [d], asked him his opinion of the nature and attributes of the deity; to which question Simonides answered, that he must have one day to consider on it; the next day he asked two, and went on increasing in the same proportion; when Hiero pressed him to give the reason of these delays, he confessed, that the subject was above his comprehension, and that the more he dived into it, the more obscure it appeared to him. Several of the sayings of Hiero, related by Plutarch [e] and Athenæus [f], shew, that he profited greatly by the instructions of Simonides. Among others they tell us, that he used often to say, that a king's palace and ears ought to be always open to every man, who would speak truth without disguise. It is well known, that Pindar in his odes bestows the highest encomiums on Hiero, not only for the victory he won in the Olympic games, but also for his eminent virtues, calling him a prince, in whom centered all the great and truly princely qualities. We shall not take upon us to say, how far we may depend on the praises which Pindar gives Hiero, since poets are not always sincere in the elogiums they bestow upon princes. However, it is certain, that Hiero's court was a place of resort for all men of wit and learning, and that he invited them to it by his affability, courteous treatment, and much more by his liberality. He was passionately fond of the Olympic games, and did not disdain to enter the lists with persons of the lowest rank; on which account he is censured by Xenophon in the inimitable treatise he has left us on the art of governing well, which is intitled Hiero, and writ by way of dialogue between this prince and Simonides. It is said, that Themistocles, seeing Hiero arrive at Olympia with a splendid equipage in order to assist at the games, was for excluding him from that diversion, for not having succoured the Greeks against the common enemy [g]. This motion was commended by all, but seconded by none. Hiero was a powerful and resolute prince, and would not have easily put up such an affront.

Thrasybulus

Hiero was succeeded by his brother Thrasybulus, a most cruel and bloody tyrant. He practised all sorts of cruelty on his subjects, fancying, says our author, that he

he was of a different nature from them, and that he had been set over them, only that he might with safety trample them under his feet. All those who gave him the least umbrage were barbarously murdered; the most wealthy, upon frivolous pretences, either put to death or condemned to perpetual banishment; and, in short, the city turned into a shambles. Such inhuman proceedings grew soon insupportable to the Syracusans, who entering into an association took up arms, and declared Thrasybulus an enemy to his country. The tyrant, seeing the whole city in arms, though he kept always in his pay above fifteen thousand mercenaries, attempted at first to appease the tumult with fair words, but finding that the incensed citizens were not to be imposed upon, he possessed himself of that part of the city which was called Acradina, and of the island, and thence made frequent sallies on the enemy, who were masters of the quarter called Tyche. The Syracusans sent embassadors to Gela, Agrigentum, Selinus, Himera, and the other cities, desiring them to join in the common cause, and send speedy succours to the relief of Syracuse, since on the fate of the metropolis depended that of the other cities. Upon this embassy they all ran to arms, and joining the Syracusans, put them in a condition to venture a general engagement, which was attended with the desired success; for the tyrant was entirely defeated, and closely besieged in Acradina, whence he sent deputies to capitulate with the people. The only terms he could obtain were, that his life should be spared, on condition he resigned his authority and retired out of Sicily. These he was obliged to comply with, and accordingly, after having divested himself of all power, he withdrew to the city of Locros in Italy, where he led a private life after a short reign of ten months [h]. Upon his resignation, Syracuse, and the other cities that had been subject to him, were declared free, and the popular government every-where re-established, and maintained till the reign of Dionysius the tyrant, that is for the space of threescore years.

Thrasybulus driven out, and a popular government introduced at Syracuse.

The Syracusans, being thus restored to their former liberty, called a general assembly, where it was unanimously decreed, that a statue should be erected to Jupiter the deliverer, of the size of a colossus, and that on the anniversary of the happy day they had regained their liberty solemn ſolemn games ſhould be exhibited, and four hundred and fifty bulls ſacrificed, by way of thankſgiving, to the gods, and all the people therewith entertained and feaſted, as on a day of general rejoycing [i]. It was at the ſame time decreed, that all the magiſtrates, according to antient cuſtom, ſhould be choſen from among the chief citizens, and that none of the ſtrangers, who had been made denizens by Gelon, ſhould be admitted to any employment of truſt. This decree incenſed the foreigners, who could not brook ſuch an odious diſtinction, after they had been by Gelon put upon the ſame foot with the beſt of the Citizens. Having therefore complained in vain of ſuch a hardſhip, they at laſt joined together to the number of ſeven thouſand, and ſeizing on Acradina and the iſland annoyed from thence the other quarters of the town, reſolved to obtain by force of arms what they could not get by any other means. They fortified themſelves ſo ſtrongly in their poſts, that the Syracuſans, though far ſuperior to them in number, could not diſlodge them. Wherefore they determined to ſhut them up ſo cloſe on all ſides that no proviſions ſhould be carried in, and thus force them by famine either to ſurrender, or venture an engagement; the beſieged choſe the latter, and were moſt of them cut in pieces, after having made a great ſlaughter of the Syracuſans. After the example of Syracuſe all the other Greek cities in Sicily entered into an alliance againſt the mercenaries and foreigners, who had been enriched with lands and houſes by Gelon and Hiero, drove them from their poſſeſſions, and reſtored the antient proprietors to their eſtates and former habitations. Thus were all the cities of the iſland freed from foreigners, and reſtored to that form of popular government which had prevailed before the reign of Gelon [k].

New tumults in Syracuſe.

THOUGH the tyrants, and thoſe who were ſuſpected to be their abettors, were thus every-where driven out, yet there lay concealed in the minds of many a ſecret leven, as we may call it, of tyranny, which frequently diſturbed the harmony of the public peace and tranquillity, and occaſioned ſeveral tumults and commotions. In Syracuſe one Tyndarides, having gained by his largeſſes a conſiderable party among the populace, attempted to aſſume the ſovereign power; but both he and his accomplices were ſeized and put to death. Their puniſhment did not deter others from the like attempt; for no ſooner had any citizen acquired quired a conſiderable fortune, but he began to entertain thoughts of wearing a diadem, and, with that view, to court the favour of the people. To prevent therefore the many evils daily ariſing from thence, and to bring down the aſpiring minds of the wealthy citizens, the Syracuſans were at length forced to make a law not unlike that of the Athenian oſtraciſm; for as at Athens every citizen was to write on a ſhell the name of the perſon, whom they conceived to be the moſt capable, on account of his wealth and adherents, of aſpiring to the crown; ſo at Syracuſe they were to write on a leaf the names of ſuch as they apprehended powerful enough to uſurp the ſovereignty. When the leaves were counted, he, who had moſt ſuffrages againſt him, was, without any further enquiry, baniſhed for five years. This new-contrived method of impairing the eſtates, and weakening the intereſt of the overgrown citizens, was called Petaliſm from the Greek word Petalon, which ſignifies a leaf. This law was attended with many evil conſequences; for thoſe who were moſt capable of governing the commonwealth, were driven out, and the adminiſtration of public affairs committed to the meaneſt of the people; nay, many of the chief citizens, who were able to do their country great ſervice, fearing to fall under the laſh of this law, withdrew from the city, and lived private in the country, not concerning themſelves with public affairs. Whence all the employments being filled with men of no merit or experience, the republic was on the brink of ruin, and ready to fall into a ſtate of anarchy and confuſion. The law therefore of petaliſm, upon more mature deliberation, was repealed, ſoon after it had been firſt enacted, and the reins of the government again put into the hands of men, who knew how to manage them [1].

Petaliſm introduced at Syracuſe.

In the mean time, Ducetius, prince of the Siculi, who inhabited the inland parts of the iſland, having raiſed a powerful army, laid ſiege to Enna, which he took by ſtorm, and advanced to Agrigentum, with a deſign to drive the Greeks from all the cities, which had been formerly poſſeſſed by his countrymen. The Agrigentines went out to meet him, but their army was overthrown, and the city threatened with a ſiege. Hereupon they had recourſe to the Syracuſans, who ſent them a ſtrong reinforcement under the command of one Bilco. Ducetius, who was then beſieging Motyum, a ſtrong hold belonging to the Agrigentines, leaving part of his forces before the place, led the reſt againſt the united troops troops of the Syracuſans and Agrigentines, put them to flight, and returning before Motyum, made himſelf maſter of that city. The Syracuſan general upon his return was tried for the loſs of his army, for moſt of the Syracuſans were cut in pieces in the engagement, and being convicted of holding a ſecret correſpondence with the enemy was put to death, and a worthy citizen, whom the hiſtorians do not name, inveſted with the command. This new general was attended with all the ſucceſs they could wiſh, for he entirely defeated the Siculi, reduced all their cities, and brought Ducetius to ſuch ſtraits, that he was obliged to ſubmit to the Syracuſans, and throw himſelf upon their mercy, as we have related above [m].

After the reduction of the Siculi, the Syracuſans became ſo powerful, that they gave, in ſome degree, law to the whole iſland. The Greek cities indeed enjoyed a perfect liberty, but at the ſame time acknowledged Syracuſe as their metropolis. If that wealthy city had been contented with the reſpect, which all the Greek colonies in Sicily willingly paid her, as the moſt able to protect them againſt any foreign invaſion, the iſland would have enjoyed a laſting tranquillity; but ſhe began by degrees to aſſume the authority of a ſovereign over cities that were no leſs free than herſelf, which gave riſe to the wars which we are now to relate. She began with the Leontines, and invading, on what pretence we know not, their territory, laid waſte that fruitful country, and reduced the city of Leontini to great ſtraits. The inhabitants, not being able to make head againſt the ſuperior forces of the Syracuſans, had recourſe to the Athenians, from whom they were originally deſcended; for the Leontines came from Chalcis, which was an Athenian colony. On this occaſion they employed one Gorgias, the moſt famous orator of his time, and who is ſaid to have been the firſt that taught the rules of rhetoric. Gorgias arriving at Athens made an oration to the people on the grievances their countrymen ſuffered from the Syracuſans, and the advantages that would accrue to them from ſending a powerful army into Sicily, in which he diſplayed ſo much eloquence, and ſuch an eloquent diction, that the Athenians, though themſelves men of great learning, were ſtruck with admiration, and greatly affected with the beauties and charms of his ſpeech. But there needed no great eloquence to perperſuade the Athenians to concern themſelves with the affairs of Sicily. Ever ſince the time of Pericles they had meditated the conqueſt of that iſland. Pericles indeed had always endeavoured to check this ambitious and wild project, remonſtrating that by living in peace, and contenting themſelves with the conqueſts they had already made, without engaging in hazardous enterprizes, they would raiſe their city to a flouriſhing condition. The authority he had at that time over the people, though it kept them from invading Sicily, yet could not ſuppreſs the deſire they had to conquer it. At the time we are now ſpeaking of they were maſters at ſea, and every-where ſucceſsful, they had many confederates, a numerous army, experienced commanders, and in ready money above ten thouſand talents. With theſe advantages they did not doubt but they ſhould be able to overcome the Lacedæmonians, with whom they were then at war, and at the ſame time reduce the iſland of Sicily. This, and not the gingling oratory of Gorgias, was what induced them to eſpouſe the cauſe of the oppreſſed Leontines. Accordingly they ſent without delay an hundred ſail of ſhips well manned, under the command of Lachetes and Chabrias, enjoining them to make a deſcent on the territories of Syracuſe. Theſe arriving at Rhegium were there joined by a hundred more from the Athenian colonies. With this reinforcement they ravaged the Æolian iſlands, at that time in confederacy with Syracuſe, defeated the Myleans, as they were marching to join the Syracuſans, took their city, and committed great devaſtations in the enemy's country. However, the Athenians, not ſatisfied with the progreſs their arms made in Sicily, ſent forty ſhips more to reinforce their ſquadron, which now conſiſted of two hundred and fifty ſail. But, in the mean time, the Leontines, being ſenſible that the Athenians aimed at nothing leſs than the ſovereignty of the whole iſland, concluded a ſeparate peace with the Syracuſans, and were all made free of Syracuſe. The Athenians, being by this agreement diſappointed in their hopes of conquering Sicily, vented their rage, according to the cuſtom of popular governments, upon thoſe who had commanded in that unſucceſsful expedition. Pythodorus and Sophocles were baniſhed, and Eurymedon ſentenced to pay a heavy fine. The Athenians were at that time, which was the ſixth year of the Peloponnesian war, so blinded by their prosperity, that they believed no power was able to resist them [n].

War between the Syracusans and Athenians.

About ten years after broke out the most memorable war that had ever to that time been waged in Sicily. It was occasioned by a dispute arising between the inhabitants of Egesta and Selinus concerning their borders. The territories of the two cities were divided by a river, which the Selinuntines crossed, and possessed themselves of the lands lying next to it, pretending, that they had formerly belonged to them. This provoked the Egestines, who, after having endeavoured in vain to recover their property by fair means, took up arms, and drove out the intruders by force. The Selinuntines, on the other hand, unwilling to part with those hands, though they could not make good their claim to them, raised an army, entered the territories of the Egestines in a hostile manner, and laid waste the whole country. The Egestines took up arms in their own defence, but were entirely defeated, and forced to shelter themselves within their walls. In this condition they sent embassadors to solicit succours from Agrigentum, Syracuse, and even from Carthage; but none of these states would concern themselves with their disputes. It was therefore at last resolved in their general assembly, that embassadors should be sent to Athens to implore the assistance of that republic, and withal to promise, that they in their turn would help the Athenians to the utmost of their power, whenever they should stand in need of their assistance. Their embassadors, arriving at Athens, represented among other things, that should they be abandoned, the Syracusans, who under-hand supported the Selinuntines, would not fail to possess themselves of their city, and by degrees become masters of the whole island; in which case they would be able to send powerful succours to the Lacedæmonians, who were their founders. The Athenians were overjoyed to have a new opportunity of meddling with the affairs of Sicily. However, they thought it advisable first to send deputies into Sicily to inquire into the state of the island, and particularly of the Egestines; for they had promised to pay all the troops that should be sent to their assistance. Upon the arrival of the embassadors, the Egestines, having borrowed from the neighbouring nations a great many gold and silver ſilver veſſels, made a vain ſhew of them to the Athenians, telling them, that they had gold and ſilver enough to defray the whole charges of the war. When the embaſſadors were returned to Athens, and the great wealth of the Egeſtines noiſed abroad, an aſſembly of the people was called to deliberate on the war which was to be waged in Sicily. Nicias, a man of no ſmall authority among the people, argued with great prudence againſt the war, ſhewing, that it was impoſſible to contend with the Lacedæmonians, and at the ſame time ſend ſo great a force, as they muſt needs do, into Sicily; that it was a kind of madneſs to entertain thoughts of ſubduing ſo powerful an iſland, when they had not yet been able to reduce Greece; that they ought firſt to humble the enemies they had at their doors, before they went in ſearch of others at a diſtance, &c. Many other things he ſaid, which were well ſuited to the occaſion, and are related at length by Thucydides[o] and Diodorus[p]; but the contrary opinion, which was ſupported by Alcibiades, the moſt eloquent ſpeaker at that time in Athens, prevailed by a great majority. It being now determined to purſue this wild enterprize at all events, Alcibiades, Nicias, and Lamachus were appointed to command the fleet, with full power not only to ſuccour Egeſta, but to regulate the affairs in Sicily in ſuch a manner as they judged beſt for the intereſt of the republic. This commiſſion Nicias accepted much againſt his will, being firmly perſuaded, that it could not be attended with ſucceſs, and dreading to have Alcibiades for his collegue. But the Athenians could not be prevailed upon to commit the whole management of the war to Alcibiades, judging wiſely, that his ardor and intrepidity wanted to be tempered with the warineſs and prudence of Nicias[q].

at in carrying it on. But all he could alledge, instead of cooling the ardour of the people, served only to inflame it the more. Nay, an Athenian standing up in the assembly and addressing Nicias, desiring him not to shift off or delay the business any longer, but declare there before them all what forces he would have the Athenians decree him. Nicias answered, that he could not exactly tell before he advised with his fellow-commanders, but as far as he could judge, an hundred gallies and five thousand land-forces, at least, would be requisite. Hereupon full power was unanimously granted him to raise what forces and fit out what ships he thought necessary; and accordingly the levies were carried on in Athens and the confederate cities, with such success and expedition, that in a few days the number of troops he had required was raised, and the gallies manned and equipt. When all things were ready for their departure, the officers, before they went on board, had a private conference with the senate concerning the administration of affairs in Sicily, for they did not at all doubt but they should reduce the island. In this conference it was determined, that the Syracusans and the Selinuntines their allies should be carried away and sold for slaves, and the rest obliged to pay an annual tribute, and live according to the laws of Athens [r]. The next day the army, consisting of seven thousand chosen men, marched from the city to the Pyræeus, where the fleet lay, and there taking leave of their friends and relations went on board the transports amidst the shouts and acclamations of an immense multitude that had attended them from the city. When the troops were imbarqued, and the fleet ready to put off, the trumpet sounded, and solemn prayers were offered up for the success of the expedition, gold and silver cups filled with wine were carried about to the whole army, both soldiers and officers drinking, according to custom, success to the undertaking (S). The usual libations being poured out, and the ceremonies monies appointed by law for ſuch occaſions duly performed, the ſhips began to ſail out of the harbour one after another, the people, who lined the ſhore, ſhouting at the ſame time, and lifting up their hands to heaven to wiſh their fellow-citizens a good voyage and a ſafe return. They firſt ſailed to the iſland of Ægina, and from thence to Corcyra, which they had appointed the place of rendezvous for their allies and the tranſports. Upon the arrival of their confederates at Corcyra they put to ſea again, and made for Tarentum; but meeting there with a very indifferent reception, they ſailed along the coaſt of Italy till they came to Rhegium, where they made ſome ſtay with a view to prevail upon the inhabitants to ſuccour the Leontines, who were originally Chalcideans, as well as themſelves. But the Rhegians anſwered, that they were determined to ſtand neuter, and to undertake nothing but in concert with the other Greek ſtates in Italy. During their ſtay here they ſent ſome ſhips to cruiſe off the coaſt of Sicily in order to find out ſome proper and convenient place for landing the troops, and at the ſame time to know what treaſure the Egeſtines could contribute towards carrying on the war, which had been undertaken for their ſake. Theſe on their return acquainted the generals, that the Egeſtines had impoſed upon them, and abuſed their credulity, ſince they were a poor indigent people, and had only thirty talents in the public treaſury. Hereupon a council of war being called, Nicias was of opinion that they ſhould ſail to Selinus, which had been the firſt occaſion of this expedition, and then, if the Egeſtines performed their promiſe, and ſupplied the army with a month's pay, to oblige the Selinuntines and Egeſtines to come to an agreement, and ſo return to Athens without engaging their country in ſo expenſive a war. By this means Athens, ſaid he, will ſhew her readineſs to aſſiſt her friends, and at the ſame time ſave her men and treaſure for ſome more promiſing enterprize. Alcibiades, on the other hand, thinking it highly diſhonourable to return home without making any conqueſts, after they had ſet out with ſuch a parade, was of opinion, that they ſhould ſolicit the cities of Sicily to a confederacy againſt the Syracuſans and Selinuntines; and in caſe they found them diſpoſed to come into their meaſures, to attack either Syracuſe or Selinus, the former, if they refuſed to reſtore the inhabitants of Leontini to their city, and the latter, if they did not conclude a peace with the Egeſtines. Lamachus offered a third opinion, on, which perhaps was the most prudent; he was for sailing directly to Syracuse, and laying siege to the city before the inhabitants had time to prepare for their defence. But the opinion of Alcibiades prevailing, they set sail for Sicily [s].

ADVICE of this expedition coming to Syracuse from all quarters, it was thought so improbable there, that no one would give credit to it. But as it was daily more and more confirmed, the Syracusans began seriously to think in what manner they should oppose so great a power. They sent deputies to every part of the island asking succours against an enemy, who, as was evident from so great preparations, could have nothing less in view than the subjecting of the whole island; they garisoned all the forts and castles in the country, reviewed their troops, made ready their arms and engines, and in short prepared all things, as though the enemy had been already in the heart of their country [t].

IN the mean time, the Athenian fleet arriving in Sicily, the land-forces were put ashore near Catana, which city they took by surprize, Naxus opened its gates to them, Hyccara, a small town belonging to the Sicanians, was taken by storm, and all the inhabitants sold for slaves. These were the only exploits of this campaign, which being ended and the winter now drawing on, the Athenian generals thought it advisable to take up their quarters in some place near Syracuse, that they might be in a readiness to undertake the siege of that place early in the spring. But, in the mean time, Alcibiades, as we have already related [u], being called home to take his trial, the command of the army was left to Nicias and Lamachus. These advancing towards Syracuse possessed themselves of an advantageous post by the following stratagem. They sent a person, on whose fidelity they could depend, to Syracuse, enjoining him to acquaint the Syracusans, as if he been dispatched from their friends in Catana, that the Cataneans had conspired to fall upon the Athenians, who were quartered within the city, in the night; and that if the Syracusans would advance to the Athenian camp with all their forces, they might easily possess themselves of it in that confusion. The Syracusans, not suspecting any deceit, appointed pointed a night, and at the time agreed on marched out with the flower of their troops to join the Cataneans. But the Athenians, in the mean time, having imbarqued their forces and ammunition, ſet ſail for Syracuſe, and without any oppoſition landed near Olympicum, where they fortified their camp with ſtrong intrenchments, before the Syracuſan forces returned from Catana. The Syracuſans, finding themſelves thus ſhamefully impoſed upon, marched back to Syracuſe with great expedition, and the very next day drew up their army in battle-array before the enemy's camp. Nicias marched out of his trenches to give them battle, which was fought with incredible bravery on both ſides. Victory was a long time doubtful; but a very heavy ſhower of rain, accompanied with thunder and lightening, falling unexpectedly, ſo terrified the Syracuſans, the greateſt part of whom had never before carried arms, that they began to retire. The Athenians durſt not purſue them, becauſe their horſe, who were ſtill in a body, and had not been defeated, covered their retreat. They therefore withdrew in good order, after having thrown a detachment into the temple of Olympicum to prevent its being plundered [w].

AFTER this battle, the Athenians, who were not yet in a condition to attack Syracuſe, retired with their fleet to Naxus and Catana to winter there, and in the mean time procure new ſupplies both from Athens and their confederates in Sicily. The meſſengers they ſent to Athens ſoon returned with three hundred talents and ſome troops of horſe; the Egeſtines likewiſe and the Siculi ſent them a reinforcement of cavalry, and furniſhed their army with all ſorts of proviſions. On the other hand, the Syracuſans diſpatched embaſſadors to Corinth, whence they originally came, and alſo to Lacedæmon, to implore their aſſiſtance againſt an enemy, who aimed not only at the ſovereignty of Sicily, but of all Greece. The embaſſadors were kindly received in both places, eſpecially at Lacedæmon, where Alcibiades, who had taken ſanctuary in that city, enforced their demand with all his credit and eloquence. At his perſuaſion Gylippus, an officer of great experience, was appointed to command the reinforcement, which was deſigned for Sicily, and troops raiſed with a deſign to invade the the territories of Athens, and thereby make a powerful diversion. But, before any supplies arrived in Sicily, Nicias leaving his winter quarters set sail for Syracuse, and arriving there in the night, before the Syracusans had any notice of his departure from Catana, possessed himself of the important post of Epipolæ (T). The Syracusans attempted to dislodge him, but after a sharp engagement were driven back into the city, with the loss of three hundred men. Nicias encouraged with this success began to build a wall round the city, in order to cut off from the besieged all communication with the neighbouring country. This work was carried on with such vigor and expedition as quite terrified the Syracusans, who indeed made frequent sallies, but were always repulsed with great loss. The wall was at last finished, and the city blocked up on all sides. However, the besieged were not so far disheartened as not to annoy the enemy with vigorous sallies, in one of which they put the Athenians to flight, demolished great part of their works, and made a great slaughter of those who defended them; among the rest Lamachus, one of their chief and best commanders, was slain, and several other officers of distinction. Notwithstanding this advantage gained by the Syracusans, Nicias, who was now the sole general, pursued the siege, and after repairing his works began a wall of circumvallation, in order to prevent any succours from being thrown into the place. He caused also the canals to be cut by which water was conveyed into the place, which soon brought the Syracusans to the utmost distress. Seeing themselves therefore on the brink of ruin, and without any hopes of relief, they began to think of capitulating; and accordingly an assembly was held to settle the articles in order to send them to Nicias. But before they came to any determination, an officer, by name Gongylus, arriving from Corinth on board a galley, brought them the joyful news of the approach of Gylippus, with a force sufficient to dispel all their fears, and oblige the enemy to raise the siege. (T) Epipolæ was a hill which stood without the city, and commanded it. It was exceeding steep, and of very difficult access. At the time of the siege we are speaking of, it was not surrounded with walls, as in after-ages. The pass leading to it was called Euryelus. On the top of the hill was a fort called Labdalon (27).

(27) Thucyd. l. vi.

The joy, which this news so unexpected occasioned in the city, is not to be expressed. They passed from one extreme to the other, and instead of capitulating began to prepare themselves for new sallies, in order to facilitate Gylippus's entrance into the city. While they were making these preparations, Gylippus appeared at the head of three thousand foot and two hundred horse, and making directly for Epipolæ, where Nicias had fortified himself in a castle called Labdalon, drew up his small army under the walls, and then sent a herald to Nicias to let him know, that he would allow him only five days to leave Sicily. Nicias did not condescend to return any answer to this proposal; whereupon Gylippus attacking the fort, carried it by storm, and put all the Athenians, who were in it, to the sword. This opened him a way into the city, where he was received with loud acclamations, and honoured as the deliverer of the city. Having allowed his troops a few days rest, he marched out, with his own and the Syracusan forces, to demolish the enemy's works; whereupon a sharp engagement ensued, in which many were killed on both sides: But at length the Athenians carried the day. Their victory was chiefly owing to the narrowness of the place, which made the Syracusan cavalry and bow-men quite unserviceable. Gylippus, to encourage his soldiers, reproached himself with the ill success they had met with, and publickly declared, that he, not they, had occasioned the late defeat. However, he promised to give them very soon an opportunity of retrieving both their honour and his, and accordingly the very next day he led them against the enemy, and gained a very considerable victory [x]. Gylippus enters Syracuse.

AFTER this success thirteen gallies arrived from Corinth, with considerable supplies both of men and money for the Syracusans; and Gylippus, not content to send embassadors to the cities of Sicily, went himself from town to town, soliciting them to join him. By this means he raised above three thousand men, and with these fresh supplies returned to Syracuse. Nicias, on the other hand, finding his troops lessen daily in proportion as those of the enemy's increased, began to be disheartened, and wrote to the Athenians in the strongest terms, shewing, that, without powerful supplies

plies both by sea and land, the enterprize would prove abortive, and the small army remaining be lost. His letter made a great impression on the minds of the Athenians, who immediately nominated two officers, who served under him, Menander and Euthydemus, to assist him till other generals should be sent; for he had desired, on account of his bad state of health, a collegue to bear part of the burden and care of the war. Eurymedon and Demosthenes were chosen to succeed Lamachus and Alcibiades. The former set out immediately, with ten gallies and a considerable sum of money, to assure Nicias, that a speedy succour should be sent him; the latter was employed in raising troops and equipping ships, in order to set sail the following spring.

On the other side, the Lacedæmonians, having at the instigation of Alcibiades broke the truce they had made with the Athenians, invaded Attica under the conduct of Agis and Alcibiades, in order to divert them from sending any supplies into Sicily. But they were so infatuated with the Sicilian expedition, that, notwithstanding the straits they were in at home, they decreed fourscore gallies and five thousand land-forces to be sent into that island. The Syracusans, hearing that the enemy was soon to be reinforced with such powerful supplies, fitted out a fleet with all possible expedition, in order to venture a sea-engagement, and destroy the Athenian ships that blocked up the city by sea, before they were joined by the squadron, which Demosthenes was bringing over into Sicily. With this view they sailed out with a fleet of fourscore sail well manned, and being met by the Athenian fleet, consisting of sixty sail, a sharp engagement ensued, which drew the Athenians from their posts to the sea-side. But while they were standing on the shore idle spectators of the combat, Gylippus, who foresaw this, attacked the forts unexpectedly, and as great part of the garisons had flocked to the shore, he possessed himself of them without great opposition, and made a dreadful slaughter of those who hastened from the shore to the assistance of their companions. Hereupon a great noise and tumult arising in the camp, the Athenians engaged at sea were struck with terror, and made what haste they could to gain the shore, and there assist their land-forces in the defence of the forts. But finding, as they drew near, that Gylippus was already in possession of the posts they were coming to defend, they tacked about, and with their whole fleet in line of battle fell upon the Syracusans, who were pursuing them in disorder, order, ſunk eleven of their veſſels, killed great numbers of their marines, and made ample amends for the battle they had loſt by land, with a complete victory by ſea. After the fight both parties ſet up trophies; the Athenians for their victory by ſea, and the Syracuſans for their ſucceſs by land. The Athenians loſt in the forts that were taken all their treaſure, and great part of their proviſions and military ſtores.

THE Syracuſans, notwithſtanding the loſs they had ſuſtained by ſea, were determined to attempt a ſecond engagement both by ſea and land, before the ſuccours, which Demoſthenes was bringing, ſhould arrive. In order therefore to provoke them to a fight, they daily drew up their fleet in line of battle before the great harbour, where the Athenian fleet was anchored, and, with biting jokes and rallery, put their patience to the utmoſt trial. Nicias was averſe from venturing a ſecond battle; ſaying, that as he expected a freſh fleet every moment and a great reinforcement, it would betray the greateſt want of judgment, ſhould he hazard a battle without being forced to it, when his troops were inferior in number to thoſe of the enemy, and already fatigued. On the other hand, Menander and Euthydemus, who had been appointed to ſhare the command with him till the arrival of Demoſthenes, wanting to perform ſome mighty exploit before they reſigned their commiſſion, repreſented to Nicias, that, ſhould they ſhun a battle, the reputation of the Athenian arms would be forfeited, and they forſaken by all their allies in Sicily. They were ſo preſſing with Nicias that they forced him at laſt to compliance, and accordingly the fleet conſiſting of ſeventy-five gallies ſailed out of the harbour. The firſt day the two fleets continued in ſight of each other without engagement; the ſecond ſome veſſels engaged, but neither ſide gained any conſiderable advantage; the third day, the Syracuſans drew up their navy earlier than uſual, and having continued ſo till the day was far ſpent, they withdrew as they had done the day before. The Athenians ſuppoſed they were not to return that day, and therefore began to retire without obſerving any order, when all on a ſudden the enemy's fleet, ſailing out of the little harbour, fell upon the Athenians before they had time to draw up in line of battle. Victory did not long continue in ſuſpenſe; the Athenians were put to flight, after having loſt ſeven gallies and a great many men, ſome being killed, and others taken priſoners [y]. Another ſea-fight.

This loss threw Nicias into the utmost consternation, and renewed the memory of all the misfortunes he had met with since his first coming into Sicily. But while he was revolving in his mind these gloomy ideas, Demosthenes's fleet appeared advancing to the great haven with such pomp and assurance of victory as filled the enemy with dread. This fleet consisted of seventy-three gallies, having on board eight thousand men, besides marines, and great store of provisions and warlike engines to be employed in the siege. All the gallies were richly trimmed, and their prows adorned with costly streamers: They were manned with chosen rowers, commanded by experienced officers, and furnished at a vast expence with all sorts of warlike machines used then in sea-engagements. As they approached the shore, the sound of the trumpets, mixed with repeated shouts and loud acclamations, both from the fleet and the camp, made all the city resound. This air of pomp and triumph Demosthenes affected purposely to strike terror into the enemy. And truly the besieged, notwithstanding their late advantages, began now to be quite disheartened, finding they had to do with an enemy, who could send such powerful succours abroad, while they had so troublesome a war on their hands at home. The common people were for putting an end to their calamities by capitulating, before the city was reduced to the last extremity, and while they could hope for tolerable terms. But Demosthenes did not give them time to come to any resolution; thinking it adviseable to take advantage of the general consternation, which his arrival had occasioned, he prepared to attack the city the same day he arrived, being determined either to put a speedy end to the war, or raise the siege, and return to the relief of Athens, which was in a manner blocked up by the Lacedæmonians. Nicias, terrified at this bold and precipitate resolution, conjured him not to be over hasty, but to take time to weigh things maturely, that he might have no cause to repent when it would be too late. He observed to him, that the enemy would be ruined by delays, that they were in great want of money and provisions, that their allies were ready to abandon them, and that they would be soon forced to surrender, as they had before resolved to do. This Nicias said, because he had certain advice sent him daily of whatever was transacted in the city. But his remonstrances were construedan effect of the dilatoriousness, with which he had always been reproached. And indeed it was peculiar to him to start difficulties on all occasions, and deaden the vivacity of the troops by delays, diſtruſts, and timorous precautions. All the officers therefore came over to the opinion of Demoſthenes, and Nicias himſelf was forced to acquieſce in it [z].

A GENERAL aſſault being reſolved on, Demoſthenes marched in the dead of the night to attack the important poſt of Epipolæ, and was at firſt attended with ſucceſs, having made himſelf maſter of the caſtle, and cut the gariſon in pieces. Gylippus at the firſt alarm haſtened to the relief of the place; but his troops, being ſeized with a panic, which was increaſed by the darkneſs of the night, were eaſily repulſed and put to flight. But as the Athenians advanced in diſorder to prevent their rallying, they met with a body of Bœotians under the command of Hermocrates, an officer of great courage and experience, and were by them ſtopt, till the Syracuſans, who had fled, had time to recover from their ſurprize. Then Gylippus encouraging his men, brought them back to the charge, and the fight was renewed. The Athenians, though in diſorder, ſtood their ground for ſome time, but at laſt, freſh troops continually arriving from the city, they were forced to give way, and not knowing the roads many of them either fell from the tops of the rocks, and were daſhed in pieces, or were ſlain the next day, as they were ſtraggling from one another up and down the fields and woods. Two thouſand Athenians were killed on this occaſion, and a great many arms and warlike engines taken.

The Athenians defeated before Syracuſe.

AFTER this overthrow Demoſthenes was for returning to Athens, eſpecially as the ſeaſon was not too far advanced for croſſing the ſea, and they had ſhips enow to force their paſſage, in caſe the enemy ſhould diſpute it. He declared, that in his opinion it would be of far greater advantage to oblige the Lacedæmonians to raiſe the blockade of Athens, than to continue that of Syracuſe, in which they ſpent their ſtrength to no purpoſe. But Nicias had ſtill hopes of becoming maſter of the city, which he knew to be in great want of all things, and beſides was under great apprehenſions of the people of Athens, who had baniſhed two generals in former times for returning from Sicily, though they had acted a very prudent part in ſo doing. He ſaid, that as thoſe who were to judge him had not been eye-witneſſes of the state of affairs, they would be of a different opinion; and that those very men, who then exclaimed against the difficulties they laboured under, would perhaps change their note, and accuse them of having been bribed to raise the siege. He concluded by declaring, that as for himself he chose rather to fall gloriously by the enemy's sword, than be ignominiously condemned by the suffrages of the populace. These reasons were not able to convince Demosthenes, who was still of opinion, that the only way left to save themselves was to quit the country. However, as he had been unsuccessful in his former advice, he was afraid of insisting upon this, and yielded to Nicias [a].

In the mean time, the Syracusans were reinforced with powerful supplies from the Siculi, Selinuntines, Geleans, and Camarineans; which encouraged them, as much as it disheartened the Athenians, in whose army a violent plague broke out, occasioned by the unwholsome air of the fens and marshes, near which they were encamped. This calamity, added to many others, made Nicias alter his opinion, and orders were privately issued enjoining the officers of the fleet to be in a readiness to set sail at a minute's warning. The soldiers were commanded to ship all their baggage, and be ready to go on board upon a signal that should be given. But when all things were ready, and most part of the soldiers embarked, without the Syracusans having the least suspicion of their design, the moon was suddenly eclipsed, which so terrified Nicias, who was naturally superstitious, that he would needs consult the soothsayers before he suffered the rest of the soldiers to go on board. It was customary on such occasions to suspend the enterprize, that was in hand, for three days. But the soothsayers, whom Nicias consulted, pronounced, that he must not set sail, till three times nine days were past; which, without all doubt, was a mysterious number in the opinion of the people [b].

The Syracusans, in the mean time, receiving notice of the intended departure of the Athenians, took fresh courage, and resolved to attack them both by sea and land. Pursuant to this resolution, they sailed out with threescore gallies against the Athenian fleet consisting of fourscore and six. Eurymedon

Eurymedon, who commanded the right of the Athenian fleet, extended his line, as he had more ſhips, in order to ſurround the oppoſite wing of the enemy. But being in this attempt ſeparated from the reſt of the fleet, he was driven by Agatharcus, the Syracuſan admiral, into the gulf called Daſion, and there killed with great part of his men. The death of the admiral diſheartened both the ſoldiers and officers, who now every-where gave way, and being chaſed by the enemy ſheltered themſelves within the haven; which, as we ſhall ſee anon, proved fatal to them. In this engagement the Athenians loſt eighteen ſhips and two thouſand men. Gylippus, who commanded the land-army, ſeeing the enemy's gallies forced aſhore, advanced with part of his troops to fall upon ſuch as landed, but was repulſed by the Tuſcans, who guarded that quarter, and driven into the marſh called Lyſimelia, where many of his men were killed by the Tuſcans and Athenians, who flew to their aſſiſtance. Each party erected trophies, the Syracuſans for their victory by ſea, and the Athenians for the advantage they had gained by land. But the minds of the two nations were differently diſpoſed. The Syracuſans, who had been ſo terrified at the arrival of Demoſthenes, ſeeing themſelves victorious in a naval engagement, took freſh courage. On the contrary, the Athenians, overcome by ſea contrary to their expectation, loſt all hopes, and only thought of retiring.

THE enemy, to prevent their eſcaping by ſea, blocked up the mouth of the great harbour, which was about five hundred paces wide, with ſhips and gallies, joined and faſtened together with anchors and iron chains. The Athenians, ſeeing themſelves thus penned up on all ſides, held a council of war, in which it was unanimouſly reſolved, that they ſhould attempt, at all adventures, to break through the fleet, that ſhut up the harbour, and retire with all their forces on board to Catana; but if they ſhould not ſucceed in this bold undertaking, to ſet fire to their ſhips, and march by land to the neareſt city belonging to their allies. Purſuant to this reſolution the flower of the troops, and the moſt experienced among the officers, were put on board an hundred and fifteen gallies, and the reſt of the army drawn up in battalia on the ſhore. On the other ſide the Syracuſans fitted out ſeventy-four gallies, which they placed with many other veſſels behind thoſe that ſtopped up the harbour, to the end, that if any of the latter were ſunk, or the chains, which joined them, broken, the Athenians might yet find themſelves a ſecond time ſtopped and entangled. As this engagement was to determine the fate of Syracuſe, the walls of the harbour, and every eminence within the city was filled with crouds of ſpectators. The commanders on both ſides employed all their eloquence to animate their men. Nicias, leaving his poſt on the ſhore, went on board a veſſel, and, ſailing round the Athenian fleet, exhorted the commander of each galley in particular to behave like an Athenian, putting them in mind, that on their valour, in the fight now approaching, depended the ſafety and preſervation of their wives, their children, and their country, as well as their own. Nicias was ſcarce returned to his poſt, when the trumpets ſounded the charge, and the Athenian fleet advanced with great violence, to break the blockade at the mouth of the harbour. But the Syracuſan gallies, which had been left within the veſſels chained together, on purpoſe to ſtop the courſe and fury of the enemy, rowed up againſt them with ſuch impetuoſity, that they put both their own and the enemy's fleet in confuſion. In this diſorder the lines on both ſides being broken, and the veſſels diſperſed, they engaged here and there in ſmall ſquadrons. However, the fight was obſtinate on both ſides. The Athenians, ſeeing they were utterly loſt, unleſs with an invincible reſolution they forced their paſſage, deſpiſed all dangers, and fought like men in a deſperate condition. On the other ſide, the Syracuſans, knowing that they were obſerved by their parents and children, exerted their utmoſt efforts in defence of their country. The fight was no leſs dreadful than the confuſion, and the ſlaughter great on both ſides: The lamentable outcries of the wounded, and thoſe who were periſhing in the water, the noiſe of the oars, and the loud ſhouts from the ramparts and the ſhore, where both armies were drawn up, prevented any orders from being heard or attended to. As the battle was fought under the very walls of the city, parents were eye-witneſſes of the death of their children, wives of the miſerable end of their huſbands, and one friend beheld another wallowing in his blood, without being able to lend him any relief. After the battle had laſted many hours, and both parties were quite tired out, and no more able to manage either their arms or their oars, yet if any of them offered to fly to the ſhore, they were driven back with bitter reproaches by their countrymen countrymen under whose eyes they fought. The Athenians asked those who made to the shore, whether they intended to sail to Athens by land, and obliged them, though covered over with wounds, to return to the charge. The Syracusans met with no better treatment from their countrymen, who prevented even those from landing, whose ships were quite disabled and ready to sink, bidding them save their lives by boarding the enemy's ships, or die an honourable death in defence of their country. Thus the battle was continued the whole day, and it was by far the most bloody and obstinate which had ever been fought in those seas. At length the Athenians were, in spite of their utmost endeavours, driven ashore, and the city immediately acquainted with the victory by an universal shout from the fleet, which was answered by loud acclamations of joy from the army on the shore and the spectators on the walls. The Athenians, who escaped, leapt out of the broken and shattered ships, and fled to the land army. The Syracusans lost on this occasion eight ships, and had eleven disabled; the Athenians lost threescore, and most of the rest were rendered quite unserviceable [c].

The Athenians defeated.

In this desperate condition the Athenian officers met to consider what measures they should take in so critical a conjuncture. Demosthenes was for manning with fresh soldiers the few gallies that remained, and while the Syracusans were under no apprehensions on account of their late victory, to fall upon them again, and force their way out of the harbour. This was no ill advice, but Nicias opposed it; others say, that the soldiers refused to obey, alledging, that it would be impossible for them to sustain a second engagement. It was thereupon determined to abandon the ships, and retire that very night by land to the cities of their confederates. But Hermocrates, commander in chief of the Syracusan forces, suspecting their design, ordered all his troops to be immediately drawn out, with a design to stop all the passes and prevent their retreat. The Syracusans were then in the height of their rejoycings, and thinking of nothing but how to divert themselves after the toils they had sustained. They therefore unanimously declared, that they would not, upon any account whatsoever, take up arms again till they had been allowed some days rest. Hereupon Hermo-

Hermocrates, thinking it of the utmoſt importance not to ſuffer ſo great a body of forces to make their eſcapé, ſince they might fortify themſelves in ſome corner of the iſland, and there begin a new war, deviſed the following ſtratagem to gain time. He ſent ſome horſemen to the Athenian camp, who were to paſs for friends, and adviſe Nicias not to quit his camp, which was well fortified, ſince the Syracuſans lay in ambuſh for him, and had ſeized on all the paſſes leading to the cities of their allies. This falſe advice ſtopt Nicias at once, and he did not even ſet out the next day, that his ſoldiers might have more time to refreſh themſelves, and carry off whatever might be neceſſary for their ſubſiſtance. He might have paſſed with great ſafety, had he not been thus deluded. The next day Hermocrates, having prevailed upon his men to march out, poſſeſſed himſelf of the moſt difficult paſſes, fortified the avenues leading to the places where the rivers were fordable, broke down the bridges, and ſpread detachments of horſe up and down the plains; ſo that there was not one outlet, through which the Athenians were not obliged to fight their way. However, as they could no longer ſubſiſt in their camp, the third day after the battle they ſet out to the number of forty thouſand men, leaving behind them all their gallies, and great part of their baggage. The whole army was in the utmoſt conſternation in ſeeing ſuch great numbers of men, either dead or dying, abandoned to wild beaſts or the cruelty of the enemy. Some who were ſick or wounded, hanging on the necks of their friends and companions, conjured them with many tears, to take them along with the army; others dragging themſelves after them, followed as far as their ſtrength allowed them, and, when this failed, had recourſe to tears and ſighs, calling upon the gods as well as men to revenge the cruelty they met with; ſo that every place ecchoed with groans and mournful lamentations. But the moſt melancholy part of the ſpectacle, and which moſt deſerved compaſſion, was Nicias himſelf. That great man, dejected and worn out with a tedious illneſs, deſtitute of all neceſſary things when his age and infirmities required them moſt, tormented not only with his own grief, but with the affliction of others, thought of nothing but how he might beſt comfort his ſoldiers, and rouſe his courage; he ran from one part of the army to the other, exhorting his men to pluck up their ſpirits, by repreſenting to them, that matters were not yet deſperate, ſince other armies had eſcaped far greater dangers; that they ought not to grieve too immoderately for misfortunes which they had not occaſioned; that if they had offended any god, his vengeance muſt be ſatiated by this time; that fortune, after having ſo long favoured the enemy, would at laſt be tired of perſecuting them, &c. Above all, he inſiſted upon their marching in good order, ſince by a prudent and courageous retreat, which was now become their only reſource, they might not only ſave themſelves, but their country, and enable it to recover its former ſplendor [d].

THE hopes of the deſponding army being ſomewhat revived by this ſpeech, they marched out in two bodies, both drawn up in the form of a phalanx; the van was led by Nicias, and the rear by Demoſthenes, with the baggage in the centre. They forced their paſſage over the river Anapis, notwithſtanding the vigorous oppoſition they met with. But being every day haraſſed by the Syracuſan horſe and bowmen, who were continually diſcharging ſhowers of darts upon them, and finding all the outlets guarded, ſo that they were obliged to diſpute every inch of their way, they began again to deſpond. Nicias offered the enemy battle, but Hermocrates and Gylippus, not caring to engage men whom deſpair made invincible, retired as ſoon as they ſaw them drawn up in battalia, but when they began to proceed in their march, they then fell upon their rear with the utmoſt fury.

DEMOSTHENES and Nicias, ſeeing the miſerable condition to which the army was reduced; for many were daily wounded, and beſides, they were in great want of proviſions, the enemy having laid waſte the whole country through which they were to paſs, reſolved to alter their rout, and, inſtead of purſuing their march to Catana, to turn towards the ſea, and make the beſt of their way for Camarina and Gela. Accordingly having lighted a great many fires in their camp, they retired in the dead of the night. The van-guard led by Nicias kept together and advanced in good order; but half the rear, commanded by Demoſthenes, fell into great confuſion and loſt their way. However, they got early in the morning to the ſea-ſide, but could have no advice of the reſt of the army. In the mean time, the Syracuſans, having intelligence of their march, by break of day made after them with all poſſible expedition, and came up with Demoſthenes about noon. The Athenians were then in ſome diſorder, as not ſuſpecting the enemy could overtake overtake them so soon. The Syracusans did not fail to take advantage of their confusion, and immediately charging them with their cavalry, they forced them into a narrow pass, and there surrounded them on all sides. Demosthenes, seeing there was no hopes of escaping, after having fought from noon to night, thought it advisable to save the lives of so many brave men by capitulating. Accordingly having stipulated, that neither he nor any of his men should be put to death, or sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, they all, to the number of six thousand, laid down their arms and surrendered [e].

Nicias arrived the same evening at the river Erineus, which he crossed, and encamped on an eminence, where the enemy came up with him the next day, and summoned him to surrender as Demosthenes had done. Nicias, not believing what they told him of his collegue, obtained leave to send a horseman to enquire of the truth. Upon the return of the messenger, being informed that Demosthenes had really surrendered, he sent a herald to the enemy's camp, offering to pay the whole charges of the war, upon condition that he was allowed to leave the country with all his forces. But this proposal being rejected, the enemy attacked him with great vigor, and the Athenians, though quite tired out with their long marches and faint with hunger, stood their ground, till night put an end to the combat. When all things seemed quiet, Nicias commanded his men to file off in silence, for he was there in absolute want of all necessaries. But they no sooner took up their arms, than the advanced guards of the Syracusans gave the alarm. Whereupon the Athenians, seeing themselves discovered, remained there all night. However, three hundred of them broke through the enemy's guards, and marched as far as they could that night. At break of day Nicias pursued his march, being galled all the way by showers of darts from all sides. When they arived at the river Asinarus, they rushed into it without any order, every one striving to get over the first, and in that confusion the Syracusan cavalry advancing full gallop into the river, trod many of them down with their horses, cut others in pieces, and made such a dreadful havock of those unfortunate men, while they were not in a condition to make any resistance, that the Asinarus was for many miles died with their blood. Our historian tells us, that the Athenians were were ſo tormented with drought, occaſioned by their long and quick march, that, unmindful of their preſent danger, they ſeemed more intent on quenching their thirſt than ſaving their lives, though what they drank was rather the blood of their companions than the waters of the ſtream. On this occaſion above eighteen thouſand Athenians were by the mercileſs Syracuſans inhumanly butchered. Nicias with a ſmall body, which eſcaped the ſlaughter and kept together, being hemmed in on all ſides, ſurrendered, not to the Syracuſans, but to Gylippus, hoping to meet with better treatment from him than from the Syracuſans. The only condition he aſked was, that their lives ſhould be ſpared, which being granted, they threw down their arms and ſurrendered. After this the Syracuſans detached ſeveral ſmall bodies of horſe to all parts, and theſe took the the three hundred, who had forced their way through the guards the night before, with many others whom they found ſtraggling in the fields; ſo that out of ſo numerous an army very few had the good fortune to eſcape either death or ſervitude [f].

THE Athenians, it ſeems, were diſpleaſed with their general for ſurrendering in this manner, ſince his name was omitted on a public monument, where the names were engraved of thoſe commanders who had loſt their lives in the ſervice of their country [g].

THE Syracuſans, upon this happy ſucceſs, having erected two trophies, and fixed to them the arms of the two captive generals, returned to the city, which they entered in triumph among the loud and joyful acclamations of their fellow-citizens, who flocked from all quarters to be ſpectators of ſo glorious a ſight. The whole city returned thanks to the gods, in the moſt ſolemn manner, for having auſpiciouſly ended the greateſt war they had ever been engaged in, and put a period to their calamities with a ſignal and complete victory [h].

THE next day an aſſembly was called to determine the fate of the captives, when one Diocles, a man of great eſteem and authority among the people, was of opinion, that the two Athenian generals ſhould be firſt whipt with rods, and then put to death, that the reſt ſhould be ſhut up in the quarries, and there allowed only two ſmall meaſures measures of flour and one of water a day, and that the inhabitants of the island, who had joined them, should be sold for slaves. This opinion was strenuously opposed by Hermocrates, to whom the Syracusans were chiefly indebted for their late victory; he was a man highly esteemed for his eminent probity and justice; but nevertheless, so incensed was the multitude against the Athenians, that they would not suffer him to continue his speech. Hermocrates being thus interrupted by the shouts and clamours which ecchoed from all parts of the assembly, a venerable old man, by name Nicholaus, who had lost in this war two sons, the only heirs to his name and estate, rose up, supported by two of his servants. He no sooner offered to speak, but a profound silence was made, no one doubting, but he would make a bitter invective against the prisoners. Nicholaus, seeing the eyes of the whole multitude fixed upon him, spoke thus: "Dear countrymen, you see me "now appear here supported by the hands of my slaves, "who formerly made my appearance supported by those "of my beloved children; but they are now gone, and I "deprived of the only comfort of my old age. How-"ever, though I am every day desiring they were alive, yet I "cannot help thinking them happy for having sacrificed in "defence of their country that life, which they must have "one day parted with by the law of nature. They are "happy, and I alone miserable, who have lost my child-"ren, and with them all hopes of posterity. And since "I have bore so great a part in the calamities of this war, "I shall ever hate and detest the Athenians, who, with-"out any provocation, kindled it in the very heart of our "country. They, indeed, deserve the severest treat-"ment; but have not the gods, the just avengers of "crimes, already punished their injustice, and revenged "our sufferings sufficiently? They invaded us with a fleet "of two hundred sail, and an army of forty thousand "men, and not one ship, not one man, has made his "escape to carry home the news of their destruction. "Have they not therefore suffered already above the de-"gree and measure of their offence? and will you, C "Syracusans, be so hard-hearted as to insult them in thei "distress, and treat them inhumanly while they lie prostrat "at your feet? You have shewn your bravery and valou "in reducing them to the state they are now in; let you "mercy and compassion exert themselves, as much as you

" courage has done. But what do I ſay, mercy and com-" paſſion? you are bound in juſtice to treat them with " humanity, and reject with horror the very thought of " putting them to death. When their generals laid down " their arms and ſurrendered, did you not promiſe to
" ſpare their lives? and if we put them to death, ſhall we " not be eternally branded with the juſt reproach of have-
" ing violated the law of nations, and diſhonoured our " victory with the blackeſt treachery? What then, you " will aſk, is to be done with the captives? My opinion " is, and I hope it will not ſeem ſtrange to any here preſent,
" that they will all be diſmiſſed, and ſuffered to return
" unhurt to their country. Let it be ſaid in all nations, " that we have overcome the Athenians, not only in arms,
" but in mercy and humanity. Thus our enemies will not " only be cenſured by others, but will even condemn them-
" ſelves for having attempted to deſtroy men of ſo merciful
" a temper. To uſe that ſeverity, which ſome unthinking " men have adviſed, is intailing the hatred of ſo great and " powerful a nation on our poſterity, which is no-ways ſafe,
" the iſſues of war being uncertain, that the conquerors are " often by a ſudden change of fortune brought lower than " the conquered, as the event of this war has ſhewn. Thoſe
" who beſieged us in our capital are by the unexpected
" turn of fortune become our priſoners. It is therefore " great prudence to ſhew compaſſion in the miſeries of o" thers, if we expect to find the ſame ourſelves in their con" dition. As for Nicias, you all know, that he pleaded your
" cauſe in the aſſembly of the Athenians, and did all that " lay in his power to diſſuade his countrymen from this " expedition. How baſe then and ungenerous would it " be, to condemn this worthy man to death for obeying
" the commands of his ſuperiors, though contrary to his " own opinion and inclinations? How hard-hearted muſt
" that man be, whoſe anger is not aſſuaged in ſeeing ſo re" nowned a general, lately the admiration of Greece,
" loaded with irons, and ſuffering under the miſerable con" dition of a ſlave, as if fortune in his life gloried to ſhew
" the greatneſs of her power? Since therefore under her " kind auſpices we have triumphed over our enemies, let " us carry it with humanity and moderation, and not inſult,
" with the cruelty of barbarians, over thoſe who are of the
" ſame ſtock with ourſelves."

THE people ſeemed moved to compaſſion by this ſpeech, eſpecially as they expected to hear this venerable old man

cry aloud for vengeance, on thoſe who had brought all his calamities upon him; inſtead of which he earneſtly ſued for their pardon. But the enemies of the Athenians expatiating on their inveterate hatred to the Syracuſans, and the many calamities which they had brought upon them, the people returned to their former reſolution, and followed the advice of Diocles. The generals were firſt whipt, and then put to death, all compaſſionate men bewailing the hard lot of two ſuch illuſtrious perſonages, eſpecially of Nicias, who, as our author tells us, of all men of his time leaſt deſerved to be brought to ſo great a degree of miſery. Thucydides ſays, that Gylippus pleaded their cauſe with a great deal of eloquence, out of gratitude with regard to Nicias, who, after the overthrow which the Lacedæmonians received at Pylus, had perſuaded the Athenians to reſtore the captives to their liberty; out of generoſity with reſpect to Demoſthenes, who had ever been a profeſſed enemy to the Spartans. On the other hand, Diodorus Siculus tells us, that Gylippus, ſeeing the people greately affected by the ſpeech of Nicholaus, and inclined to pardon the captives, effaced the good impreſſions he had made in their minds, and by a moſt bitter invective againſt the Athenians, which our hiſtorian ſets down at length, ſo prejudiced the aſſembly againſt the generals, that they were immediately put to death. The other priſoners were thruſt down into the quarries, where, crouded upon one another, they ſuffered inexpreſſible miſeries for the ſpace of eight months. They were there ever expoſed to the inclemencies of the air and alteration of the weather; ſcorched in the day-time by the burning rays of the ſun, and frozen in the night by the colds of autumn; poiſoned by the ſtench of their own excrements, and the bodies of thoſe who died of their wounds and of diſeaſes, and lay together in heaps; in fine tormented with hunger and thirſt, their allowance being ſcarce ſufficient to keep them alive. Moſt of them died of the hardſhips they ſuffered; others were taken out of the quarries, and being ſold for ſlaves met with a moſt generous treatment from their maſters, who, moved with compaſſion, and thinking they had already ſufficiently atoned for any fault they could be guilty of, reſtored them to their antient liberty [k].

SUCH was the iſſue of this war after it had laſted near three years, and coſt the Athenians an immenſe treaſure, without their repaying any thing by it but ſhame and diſhonour. The Syracuſans rewarded their allies, eſpecially the Lacedæmonians, with great part of the ſpoils; what remained was divided among their own ſoldiers, and hung up in their temples, as monuments of the victory they had obtained by the powerful aſſiſtance of the deities worſhipped there. Gylippus, on his return to Lacedæmon, was accompanied by five and thirty Syracuſan gallies to be employed under the conduct of Hermocrates againſt the Athenians. But this fleet was entirely deſtroyed in a ſea engagement near Abydus, and the commanders obliged to return to the defence of their own country, which was ſoon involved in a new war. Year of the flood 2591. Before Chriſt 413.

THE Egeſtines, who had called the Athenians into Sicily, and conſtantly adhered to them during the whole courſe of the war, dreading the reſentment of the Syracuſans, and being anew attacked by the Selinuntines, who laid claim to great part of their territories, had recourſe to the Carthaginians, offering to put their city into their hands, and declaring that they had rather live ſubject to Carthage than to Syracuſe. After their embaſſadors had delivered this meſſage to the ſenate, the Carthaginians were greatly perplexed what to reſolve. On one ſide, they were deſirous of getting footing anew in Sicily, and poſſeſſing themſelves of a city, which lay ſo convenient for them; on the other, they feared the power of the Syracuſans, who had lately obtained ſo ſignal a victory over the Athenians, and would not fail to aſſiſt their antient allies the Selinuntines. At laſt the deſire of enlarging their dominions prevailed, and the Egeſtines were promiſed ſuccours. But before the Carthaginians came to an open rupture, they attempted to ſow ſeeds of diviſion between the Selinuntines and Syracuſans. With this view they ſent embaſſadors to Syracuſe, entreating that city to compoſe the differences of the contending parties in an amicable manner, and oblige the Selinuntines to content themſelves with that portion of the lands in queſtion, which they ſhould think fit to allow them. They hoped, that if the Selinuntines ſhould decline the arbitration of the Syracuſans, that would breed a miſunderſtanding between the two cities; whence the Syracuſans would not think themſelves obliged to lend any aſſiſtance to the Selinuntines, who had refuſed to ſtand to The Carthaginian war.

their arbitration, nor the Selinuntines have the confidence to recur to them after they had thus affronted them by rejecting their mediation. But this trick of Punic policy did not succeed; the Syracusans indeed interposed their good offices, but finding the Selinuntines unwilling to come to an accommodation upon the terms they proposed, and remembering their eminent services during the late war, they would neither compel them to it, nor, for so slight a cause, renounce their alliance. Hereupon the Carthaginians, being resolved at all events to get possession of Egesta, sent to the Egestines five thousand men from Africa and eight hundred from Campania. The latter had been hired by the Chalcidians to assist the Athenians against the Syracusans; but after their overthrow sailing back into Campania, stayed there, in hopes that some state might soon stand in need of their assistance. Accordingly the Carthaginians took them into their service, bought them horses, and placed them in garison at Egesta. These, in conjunction with the five thousand Africans, falling unexpectedly upon the Selinuntines, put them to flight, killed a thousand on the spot, and took all their baggage. Upon this open rupture between the two cities, both dispatched embassadors to solicit succours from their confederates, the Selinuntines from the Syracusans, and the Egestines from the Carthaginians, which being promised on both sides, a most dreadful war broke out between the Egestines and Carthaginians on one hand, and the Selinuntines and Syracusans on the other. The Carthaginians, foreseeing the greatness of the undertaking they were to imbark in, committed the whole management of the war to Hannibal, impowering him to raise what forces he thought fit. He was grandson to Hamilcar, who had been defeated and killed by Gelon before Himera, as we have related above, and son to Gisco, who being banished his country had retired to Selinus, where he died for want of necessaries. As he bore therefore a natural hatred to all the Greeks, and was desirous to wipe off by his own valour the disgrace of that defeat, which he considered as a stain upon his family, he was indefatigable all that summer and the ensuing winter in raising forces, not only in Africa, but in Spain and Italy, and making the other necessary preparations; insomuch, that in the beginning of the spring he had no fewer than three hundred thousand men under his standard. These with an immenſe ſtore of proviſions, engines, arms, and all other things neceſſary for ſuch an undertaking, he put on board threeſcore long gallies and fifteen hundred tranſports, and ſetting ſail, aſſoon as the ſeaſon would allow, croſſed the ſea and landed ſafe at a place called the well of Lilybæum, where the city of Lilybæum was afterwards built. After he had landed his forces, he cauſed all his ſhips to be drawn aſhore for fear of giving umbrage to the Syracuſans, and then, being joined by the Egeſtines, marched ſtrait to Selinus, which city he inveſted, and began to batter the walls with incredible fury. The Selinuntines, who had been the only people in Sicily that had ſided with the Carthaginians againſt Gelon, did not think they would have come to ſuch extremities, and therefore were at firſt ſtruck with great terror. However, as they were not altogether without hopes, but expected ſpeedy ſuccours from Syracuſe and other confederate cities, they all joined as one man, and made a vigorous defence; even the women and children regardleſs of danger appeared on the ramparts, ready to ſacrifice their lives in the defence of their country [1].

Selinus beſieged by the Carthaginians.

As the walls were inceſſantly battered day and night by the rams and other warlike engines, a breach was ſoon opened, and the firſt who entered it were the Campanians out of an ambition of diſtinguiſhing themſelves above the reſt; but they were repulſed with great loſs, as were the Africans and Spaniards, whom Hannibal ſent to ſupport them. The fight laſted from noon to night, when Hannibal ſounded the retreat. In the mean time, the Selinuntines ſent expreſſes to Agrigentum, Gela, and Syracuſe, acquainting them with the ſtate of affairs. The Agrigentines and Geleans immediately armed their troops, but waited for the Syracuſan auxiliaries with a deſign to fall upon the enemy with united forces. The Syracuſans likewiſe without delay drew together what forces they could, but as they did not think them ſufficient to relieve effectually the beſieged, whom they apprehended to be in no imminent danger, they put off their march for ſome days till they got together a ſtronger force. But Hannibal, aſſoon as it was light, renewing the aſſault, poſſeſſed himſelf of the breach which had been made the day before, and of another which his rams had opened near it, and from thence charging the besieged, obliged them to give ground, but could not put them in disorder, nor enter the city. Many fell on both sides; but the Carthaginians were constantly supplied with fresh men; whereas the Selinuntines had none to relieve them, being all employed at once in defending the breaches. Thus the assault was daily renewed for the space of nine days with incredible slaughter. At length the besieged being quite tired out, the Iberians after a long contest lodged on the ramparts; from thence they advanced into the city, but finding all the streets and passages barricaded, and being at the same time sorely galled by showers of tiles and stones thrown by the women from the tops of the houses, they were obliged to retire to the ramparts. The next day they returned to the charge very early, and by continually pouring fresh men into the city forced the Selinuntines to abandon the narrow streets, and pursued them into a market-place, where they made a stand, and were all to a man cut in pieces. Two thousand six hundred had by the favour of the night made their escape to Agrigentum before the enemy had forced the narrow passes; so that now there was not one single man left alive in the city. The Carthaginians therefore, raging in all parts without restraint, rifled the houses, and then set fire to them, and either threw into the flames the women and children they found in them, or, dragging them into the streets, put them all, without distinction, to the sword. Neither did this satiate their inhuman cruelty, which they carried so far as to mangle in a barbarous manner even the dead bodies, some of them carrying about with them numbers of hands tied round their girdles, and others out of ostentation bearing the heads of the slain on the points of their swords and spears. The city was razed two hundred and fifty years after it had been built, and the few women and children, who outlived this fatal day, carried away captives. Those who fled to Agrigentum were received there with great humanity and tenderness, and abundantly supplied with all necessaries out of the public stores (U) [m].

(U) A few days after the city was taken, three thousand Syracusans arrived at Agrigentum on their march to the relief of Selinus. But understanding that the city was taken, they sent embassadors to Hannibal to treat of the redemption of the captives, and to beg

HANNIBAL, having thus taken and demolished Selinus, marched with all his army to Himera, extremely desirous to revenge on that city the death of his grandfather Hamilcar, who had been slain there by Gelon with an hundred and fifty thousand Carthaginians. On his march he was joined by twenty thousand Siculi and Sicani, whom he sent with the main body of the army to lay siege to the city, while he with a body of forty thousand men encamped on a rising ground at a small distance from it. The Syracusans had sent four thousand men to the assistance of the Himereans, under the conduct of Diocles, before the city was invested, and the other confederates had likewise sent what troops they could well spare. Wherefore the inhabitants, encouraged by these succours, and dreading to undergo the same fate as the Selinuntines, made a most vigorous defence. The Carthaginians made several breaches in the walls but were constantly repulsed for several days successively, without being able to gain an inch of ground. This did not a little discourage the enemy, notwithstanding their late success at Selinus; which the Himereans observing made a sally with ten thousand men, cut many of the Carthaginians in pieces, and put the whole army to flight pursuing them with great slaughter to the hill, where Hannibal was encamped. That general seeing his army in confusion, hastened to their relief; upon which the battle was begun anew, and continued for some hours, victory inclining to neither side. At length the Himereans, being overpowered with numbers, gave ground; but three thou-beg of him that he would at least spare the temples. Hannibal returned answer, that since the Selinuntines had not been able to defend their own liberty, they deserved to be treated like slaves; and that the gods, provoked at their wickedness, had forsaken both the city and the temples; whence it would be no sacrilege to strip them of their ornaments. The Syracusans, not satisfied with this answer, sent a second embassy, and on that occasion employed one Empediones of Selinus, who had always been of the Carthaginian party, and advised the citizens to open their gates to them, when they first appeared before the city. Hannibal received him with great demonstrations of kindness, restored him his estate, pardoned all those prisoners who were any ways related to him, and permitted the others, who had fled to Agrigentum, to return and people the city anew, upon paying to the Carthaginians an annual tribute.

stand of them kept their posts, and covered the retreat of their companions, sustaining the shock of the whole Carthaginian army till they all died upon the spot.

After this engagement five and twenty gallies appeared off of Himera, and a report was spread all over the city and the enemy's camp, that the Syracusans with all their forces were coming to the relief of the city. Hereupon, Hannibal, having put the flower of his troops on board his gallies, prepared to sail for Syracuse, hoping to surprize the city, now that it wanted, as he supposed, sufficient forces to defend it. But those gallies proved to be the fleet, which the Syracusans had sent some time before to the aid of the Lacedæmonians, returning home. As they touched at Himera, Diocles, commander in chief of the Syracusan auxiliaries there, advised them to sail with all speed to Syracuse, lest Hannibal should make any attempt upon that city. He thought it also adviseable to leave Himera for a while, and with one half of his forces to return to Syracuse, on the gallies, leaving the other half behind him, which he thought sufficient to hold out till he, after putting his own city in a state of defence, should return. This the besieged took very ill, but could not prevail upon Diocles to alter his measures. Upon his departure the Carthaginians doubled their attacks, and battered the walls night and day without intermission. On the other hand the besieged, believing the ships would return speedily, were indefatigable in defending the walls, repairing the breaches, and repulsing the enemy. Thus they held out against the repeated assaults and utmost efforts of above three hundred thousand men till the very day the fleet appeared, when the Carthaginians, summoning all their courage and resolution, gave a general assault, and with their numbers bearing all down before them, drove the citizens from the ramparts, and, in spite of their utmost efforts, entered the city sword in hand. There is no sort of cruelty which the barbarous Carthaginians and Iberians did not practise on this occasion; all they met, without regard to sex or age, were inhumanly butchered; the slaughter was so merciless, that the very channels in the streets flowed with blood. After they had plundered the temples and houses, and levelled the city with the ground, Hannibal caused three thousand of the captives to be carried to the place, where his grandfather had been defeated and killed by Gelon's cavalry, and there first exposed them them to the inſults of his barbarians, and then cauſed them to be maſſacred [n].

THUS ended this campaign, after which Hannibal, diſmiſſing the Siculi and confederates, and diſbanding the Campanians, imbarked his troops, and ſet ſail for Africa. When he arrived at Carthage, the whole city went out to meet him, and received him with loud and joyful acclamations, as a general that had performed greater things in ſo ſhort a time than any ever before him.

ABOUT this time ſome diſturbances aroſe in Syracuſe, occaſioned by the return of Hermocrates. This brave officer had ſignalized himſelf in the war againſt the Athenians, and had been afterwards ſent with a fleet of thirty-five gallies to the aid of the Lacedæmonians. During his abſence, the contrary faction, headed by Diocles (W), prevailing Hermocrates baniſhed.

(W) Diocles was a man of great authority among the people. By his advice the form of government was altered after the firſt Carthaginian war, and the magiſtrates, contrary to the antient cuſtom, choſen by lot. He alſo inſtituted laws for the Syracuſans, which were obſerved, not only in the city of Syracuſe, but in moſt of the free ſtates of Sicily, Diocles being highly eſteemed by all for his wiſdom and probity. Others after his time made laws, namely, Cephalus, who flouriſhed under Timoleon, and Polydorus, who was contemporary with Hiero; but theſe were only called interpreters of the law, which was written in ſuch obſolete language as was hardly underſtood; the title of law-giver was beſtowed upon none but Diocles. He is ſaid to have been a man of an inexorable nature and great ſeverity. Among the many laws he made one was, that if any man came armed into the court, where the public aſſemblies were held, he ſhould be put to death, even though he had done it inadvertently. Not long after the publication of this law, ſome of the neighbouring people having invaded the territories of Syracuſe, Diocles put on his armour to march out againſt them; but in the mean time a tumult ariſing in the court, he haſtened thither to appeaſe it with his ſword by his ſide; which one there preſent obſerving, cried out, that he trangreſſed the laws which he himſelf had made. Whereupon Diocles drawing his ſword, anſwered, that he would confirm them with his blood, and ran himſelf through in the court. After his death divine honours were paid to him, and a temple vailing at home, he was tried and without ſo much as being heard, condemned to baniſhment. As he was a man of great probity, and had on all occaſions been very ſerviceable to his country, many of the citizens ſought to have him recalled, knowing that his enemies had prevailed on the ungrateful multitude to baniſh him merely on account of his virtue, which gave them no ſmall umbrage. But all their endeavours proving unſucceſsful, Hermocrates himſelf returned into Sicily, and having raiſed an army of ſix thouſand men, by the advice of his friends he advanced to Syracuſe, and ſurpriſed one of the gates of the city. But the adverſe party running to arms, and falling furiouſly upon his ſmall army, cut moſt of them in pieces, and ſlew Hermocrates himſelf. All thoſe who had declared in his favour, were condemned to perpetual baniſhment, and among the reſt his ſon-in-law Dionyſius, who made the Syracuſans pay dear for the exceſſes they committed on this occaſion, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of the hiſtory °.

The Carthaginians return to Sicily.

The late ſucceſs of the Carthaginians in Sicily revived the deſign which they had ever entertained of ſubduing the whole iſland. With this view they began to make new preparations and raiſe another army, committing the whole management of the war to the ſame Hannibal. But as he pleaded his great age, and ſhewed himſelf unwilling to take upon him the command and return to Sicily, they joined in commiſſion with him Imilcar the ſon of Hanno, one of the ſame family. Theſe two generals being plentifully ſupplied with money, and impowered to raiſe what forces they thought neceſſary for ſo great an undertaking, not only made great levies at home, but ſent officers with large ſums into Spain, Italy, Lybia, Sardinia, and the Balearic iſlands to hire numerous bodies of mercenaries. When all their forces were muſtered at Carthage, the army was found to conſiſt of three hundred thouſand choſen men, as Ephorus temple erected to his memory, which was afterwards pulled down by Dionyſius, when he ſurrounded the city with a new wall (28).

(28) Diodor. Sicul. l. xiii. c. 4.

Ephorus informs us ; but Timæus ſays, that they amounted only to an hundred and twenty thouſand, or thereabouts. All things being got ready, the troops were embarked on a thouſand tranſports, which under the convoy of a numerous ſquadron of gallies, arriving ſafe in Sicily, landed on the coaſt of Agrigentum, and marched ſtrait to that city [P].

THE Syracuſans and their confederates had ſent embaſſadors to Carthage to complain of the late hoſtilities practiſed upon them by Hannibal, and perſuade the ſenate to forbear ſending any troops into Sicily. But the Carthaginians returning a doubtful anſwer to this embaſſy, the Syracuſans had put themſelves in a poſture of defence, and were prepared to give the enemy a warm reception. The Agrigentines eſpecially, expecting this great ſtorm would firſt diſcharge itſelf upon them, had carefully provided all things neceſſary for the ſuſtaining of a long ſiege, following therein the directions of Dexippus the Lacedæmonian, an officer of great courage and experience. Hannibal, on his arrival before the city, ſent embaſſadors to the Agrigentines, inviting them either to join him, or ſtand neuter, declaring he would be well ſatisfied with either, and forbear all hoſtilities, if they only agreed to a treaty of amity and friendſhip. But both propoſals being rejected, Imilcar and Hannibal, after having viewed the walls, and found a place, where they thought it would be no hard matter to make a breach, began to batter them with incredible fury. But the defence was no leſs vigorous than the attack ; the beſieged, in the firſt ſally they made, burnt all the enemies engines, deſtroyed the towers they had raiſed againſt the city, and after having made a great ſlaughter in the camp, returned in good order into the city. Hereupon Hannibal commanded all the tombs and ſtately monuments, ſtanding round the city, to be demoliſhed, and mounts to be raiſed with the rubbiſh as high as the walls. Soon after the plague broke out in the army, and in a ſhort time carried off a great number of the ſoldiers and the general himſelf. The Carthaginian ſooth-ſayers interpreted this diſaſter, as a puniſhment inflicted by the gods in revenge of the injuries done to the dead ; wherefore Imilcar, in whom the whole power was now veſted, ordered ſupplications to be made according to the practice of Carthage, and a boy to be ſacrificed to Saturn, in compliance with a cuſtom which had long long obtained among the Carthaginians; by his orders Neptune likewiſe was appeaſed, and ſeveral prieſts thrown into the ſea, as the moſt pleaſing victims to that deity. Imilcar having, as he imagined, by theſe cruelties atoned for the ſacrileges of Hannibal and pacified the gods, the aſſaults were renewed with more vigor than ever, and the city reduced to great ſtraits.

In the mean time, the Syracuſans having raiſed an army of above thirty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe, ſent them to the relief of the beſieged under the command of one Daphneus. Imilcar, upon intelligence of their approach, detached all the Iberians and Campanians with forty thouſand Carthaginians, enjoining them to engage the enemy in the plains of the river Himera. Purſuant to his orders the Syracuſans were attacked a few hours after they had paſſed the river, as they were advancing in good order through thoſe large plains towards Agrigentum. The diſpute was ſharp, and the victory a long time doubtful, the enemies being far ſuperior in number to the Syracuſans. But at length the latter carried the day, and purſued the Carthaginians, with great ſlaughter, to the very walls of Agrigentum. Upon the approach of the Syracuſans, that body which was carrying on the ſiege, abandoning their poſts, ſaved themſelves by flight to Imilcar's camp, which was pitched on the neighbouring hills. Daphneus purſued them in good order with a deſign to attack the camp; but finding it ſtrongly fortified, he thought it more adviſeable to guard all the avenues leading to it with his cavalry, and by that means oblige the enemy either to periſh with famine, or come out of their lines and venture an engagement. Accordingly all the paſſages being blocked up, and the convoys intercepted, that numerous army was ſoon brought to ſuch ſtraits, that the Campanians and other mercenaries began to mutiny, and going in a body to Imilcar's tent, threatened to join the enemy if they had not their uſual allowance of bread. The general, with much ado, prevailed upon them to bear patiently their preſent want for a few days, aſſuring them, they ſhould be very ſoon plentifully ſupplied with all ſorts of proviſions. He had been informed, that the Syracuſans were then loading many ſhips with corn to be ſent to Agrigentum, and did not the leaſt doubt but he ſhould intercept the convoy, the Syracuſans not ſuſpecting that he would attempt any thing by ſea. Accordingly he diſpatched meſſengers to Motya and Panormus where his fleet lay, enjoining joining the commanders to man the gallies with all poſſible expedition, and lye in wait at an appointed place, for the ſhips that were to bring the proviſions. His orders were put in execution, and forty gallies being ſpeedily equipped, the Syracuſan fleet, conſiſting of threeſcore tranſports, laden with corn and all ſorts of proviſions, was intercepted. As this unexpected relief gave the Carthaginians freſh courage, ſo it greatly diſheartened the Agrigentines, who, having already held out for the ſpace of eight months, were in great want of all things, and without hopes of being relieved ſo quickly as their preſent neceſſity required. Eight hundred Campanians, who had formerly ſerved under Hannibal, but were now in the ſervice of the Agrigentines, obſerving the deſperate condition the city was reduced to, went all over in a body to the Carthaginians; Dexippus, the Lacedæmonian, was ſaid to have been bribed with fifteen talents by the Carthaginians, and to have adviſed the Campanians and other Italian mercenaries to deſert, ſince they were likely to be ſtarved in the city, without the leaſt proſpect of rendering any ſervice to thoſe who had hired them. Thus the mercenaries falling off, and the inhabitants deſponding for want of neceſſaries, a council of war was ſummoned, when it was judged abſolutely impoſſible to hold out any longer, there not being proviſions enough in the public ſtores to ſupport the ſoldiery and people two days longer. Some were therefore for attacking the Carthaginians in their camp, others for abandoning the city, and conveying the inhabitants to ſome place of ſafety; this opinion prevailed, and the following night was fixed for their departure. This reſolution, when publicly known, threw the whole city into the utmoſt conſternation; lamentable outcries were heard in every houſe, and the grief and dread they were all ſeized with, in ſeeing themſelves obliged to abandon their native country, their goods, and eſtates, is not to be expreſſed. They were inconſolable in ſeeing themſelves ſtript at once of all their riches, but as life was ſtill dearer, and they expected no mercy from ſo cruel an enemy, they complied with the reſolution which had been taken in the council. What above all grieved them was the neceſſity they were under of leaving behind them the aged and ſick, who, they knew, would be treated by the enemy with the utmoſt cruelty. Many, not finding in their heart to abandon their ſick parents and relations, ſtayed behind to comfort them at their death, and then die by them. The reſt, being guarded

ed by the Syracuſan troops, marched out and arrived ſafe at Gela, where they were received with great kindneſs and humanity, and plentifully ſupplied with all neceſſaries at the expence of the public. The Syracuſans afterwards granted them the city of Leontini and its rich territory.

The Syracuſan army was no ſooner retired, but Imilcar, marching out of his trenches, entered the city, not without ſome fear and jealouſy, and put all thoſe he found in it to the ſword, not ſparing even ſuch as had fled to the temples. Among theſe was Gellias (X), a citizen famous for his wealth and integrity, who ſeeing that the Carthaginians, without reſpecting the gods, plundered their temples, and murdered thoſe who had taken ſanctuary in them, ſet fire to the temple of Minerva, and conſumed in the flames both himſelf and the immenſe riches of that ſtately edifice. However, the booty, which the enemy found in the place, was immenſely rich, ſuch as might be expected in one of the moſt opulent cities of Sicily, which contained two hundred thouſand inhabitants, and had never before been plundered, or even beſieged. An incredible number of pictures, vaſes, and ſtatues, done by the greateſt maſters of thoſe times, fell into the enemy's hands, the Agrigentines having an exquiſite

(X) Gellias was the richeſt citizen of Agrigentum, and is ſaid to have built ſeveral rooms in his houſe of an extraordinary ſize for public entertainments, placing his ſervants at the gates, and charging them to invite all thoſe who went by to be his gueſts. Five hundred horſemen from Gela happening to paſs through Agrigentum in winter-time, he not only entertained them with great magnificence, but furniſhed them all on their departure, as it was rainy weather, with cloaks and coats out of his wardrobe. Polyclitus the hiſtorian, as quoted by Diodorus, tells us, that when he ſerved among the troops of Agrigentum, he ſaw a wine-cellar in his houſe, which contained three hundred veſſels full of wine, each of which held an hundred amphoræ. This Gellias, as our author informs us, was of a very mean preſence, but was endowed with extraordinary parts. Being once ſent with the character of embaſſador to the Centuripines, when he appeared in the aſſembly, all who were preſent burſt out into a loud laugh; ſo ridiculous was his aſpect. But Gellias told them, that they ought not to be ſurprized at his mean figure and appearance, ſince the Agrigentines always ſent the moſt comely and handſome men ſite taſte for the polite arts. Among other curioſities was the famous bull of Phalaris, which was ſent to Carthage (Y) q.

Imilcar having thus gained the city after an eight months ſiege, a little before the winter ſolſtice, did not preſently raze it, but there took up his winter quarters to give his army the neceſſary refreſhment. In the mean time, the deplorable fate of Agrigentum being publicly known, the whole iſland was ſtruck with terror, and many of the inhabitants, forſaking their native cities, fled to Syracuſe, or retired with their families and effects to Italy. Thoſe who took ſanctuary in Syracuſe were treated with extraordinary kindneſs, and the chief men among them made free of the city. Among them were many Agrigentines, who filled the city with their complaints againſt the Syracuſan commanders, as if they had betrayed Agrigentum into the enemy's hands. This raiſed ſuch diſturbances in Syracuſe, as gave Dionyſius a fair opportunity of ſeizing on the ſovereign power, and depriving the inhabitants of that liberty which they had long abuſed, and by degrees turned into an unbridled licentiouſneſs. The power of the populace was ſo great, that the moſt worthy citizens had either abandoned their native country, or led at home a private life, through fear of giving them any jealouſy, or incurring their diſpleaſure. The eminent ſervices of their beſt commanders were often rewarded with death or baniſhment, the capricious multitude being led, by their groundleſs ſuſpicions, to treat as enemies even thoſe to whom they were indebted for their lives and ſafety. But Dionyſius found means to curb men to the nobleſt cities, but to thoſe that were inſignificant and and of no account ſuch as himſelf (29).

(Y) Timæus endeavoured to prove in his hiſtory, as our author tells us, that there never had been any ſuch bull, and bitterly inveighed againſt thoſe hiſtorians who were ſo credulous as to believe ſuch a fable. But the truth of their accounts was afterwards made plain; for Scipio Africanus, when he razed Carthage, about two hundred and threeſcore years after the deſtruction of Agrigentum, found among other things this very bull, and reſtored it to the inhabitants of Agrigentum, where it was was ſtill to be ſeen when Diodorus wrote his hiſtory, that is in the reign of Auguſtus (30).

(29) Diodor. Sicul. l. xiii. c. 12. (30) Idem, ibid. c. 13.

curb their insolence, and punish both their cruelty towards strangers and their ingratitude towards their own citizens.

Dionysius stirs up the people.

Dionysius was a native of Syracuse, born, according to some, of a noble and illustrious family; according to others of a mean extraction. He was one of those who accompanied Hermocrates, when he attempted to return to Syracuse by force of arms, after he had been banished through the intrigues of his enemies. Hermocrates was killed in the attempt, and many of his friends afterward publicly executed. Dionysius was dangerously wounded, and the report of his death, purposely spread abroad by his relations, saved his life. When the war, we are now speaking of, broke out, he was by the intercession of his friends recalled, and distinguished himself at the battle fought near Agrigentum in a very particular manner. When the Agrigentines charged the Syracusan officers with treachery, as if they had been gained over by the Carthaginians with bribes to betray their country, Dionysius backed their accusations, and even impeached the magistrates as keeping a secret intelligence with the enemy, and attempting to introduce an oligarchy. His speech, which was entirely levelled against the wealthy and poweful citizens, and therefore agreeable to the humour of the people, set all the assembly in a flame; the people, already incensed against their commanders, being more exasperated by the speech of Dionysius, forthwith deprived them of their commands, and named others in their room, among whom was Dionysius, now as much esteemed and favoured by the populace as he had been lately persecuted and hated. Having gained this step to preferment, he began to consider with himself how he might have his collegues turned out, and the whole command of the army lodged in himself. With this view he never joined in any council of war with the other commanders, nor imparted to them his resolutions, giving out that he durst not trust them, and that they had more at heart their own interest, than the welfare of their country. While he was thus by degrees paving his way to the throne the most prudent among the citizens, being well apprised of his wicked designs, complained of his proceedings to the senate and magistrates, who fined him as a disturber of the public peace. According to the laws the fine was to be paid before he could speak in public, and Dionysius was not in a condition to discharge it. Hereupon Philistus the historian, a man of great wealth, not only paid the fine for him, but encouraged him to ſpeak his mind freely, as it became a zealous citizen to do, offering to pay all the fines they ſhould lay upon him. Dionyſius, being thus ſupported by the wealth of a rich citizen and the favour of the people, as he was an eloquent ſpeaker, bitterly inveighed againſt all thoſe, who on account of their power or intereſt were in a condition to obſtruct his deſigns, and by degrees brought them into diſgrace with the people [q].

Gets the Syracuſan exiles recalled.

ANOTHER ſcheme, which he formed, was attended with all the ſucceſs he could have wiſhed, and greatly ſtrengthened his party. There were at that time a great many Syracuſan exiles diſperſed up and down Sicily, whom the faction of the nobility had baniſhed, at different times and under various pretences. Theſe Dionyſius looked upon as the moſt proper tools for the execution of his deſigns; for he did not doubt but their gratitude towards him, and their hatred againſt thoſe who had occaſioned their misfortunes, would unalterably attach them to his party and intereſt. Wherefore in one of the aſſemblies, that were then frequently held to deliberate on the ſtate of affairs, he applied with his uſual addreſs to the people in behalf of the exiles. A decree had paſſed for the raiſing a numerous body of troops to oppoſe the progreſs of the Carthaginians, and the people were very uneaſy on account of the expence which the new levies would amount to. Dionyſius took advantage of this favourable conjuncture and diſpoſition of the people. He repreſented, that it was abſurd and impolitic to bring troops from Italy and Peloponneſus at a vaſt charge, when they might be ſupplied with excellent forces, without being at any expence at all; that if they recalled their own countrymen, who were diſperſed all over Sicily, they would by that kindneſs oblige them to ſacrifice willingly their lives in defence of thoſe who reſtored them to their former condition, &c. His ſpeech had ſuch an effect on the people, that a decree was immediately paſſed in favour of the exiles. Many plainly perceived what he had in view, but none durſt contradict him, knowing that he had gained ſuch an aſcendant over the people, that their oppoſition would not only prove ineffectual, but incenſe the multitude againſt them, and raiſe the reputation of Dionyſius, to whom alone the exiles would be indebted for their return.

The

The decree was no sooner published, but the exiles flocked from all parts to Syracuse [r].

Gains the soldiery.

In the mean time, the inhabitants of Gela, falling out among themselves, implored the protection of Syracuse, lest the common enemy should take advantage of their disagreement, and by the assistance of one party possess themselves of the city. Dionysius immediately marched thither with two thousand foot and four hundred horse, and finding the city in an uproar occasioned by the unjust pretensions of the nobility over the people, he sided with the latter, and caused those to be put to death, whom the people condemned in their assembly. Their estates he confiscated and sold, and with the money arising from the sale paid the soldiers, who were there in garison under Dexippus, their arrears, distributing the overplus among the troops that came with him from Syracuse. At the same time he assured them all, that their pay should be doubled, which gained him the hearts of the soldiery. The Geleans treated him with the highest marks of distinction, and even sent embassadors to Syracuse to return their thanks for the important service that city had done them in sending thither Dionysius.

During his stay at Gela, he endeavoured to gain over to his views Dexippus; but not being able to persuade the Lacedæmonian to come into his measures, he marched back to Syracuse with all his forces, promising to return soon with a more numerous army. He arrived at Syracuse just as the people were coming out of the theatre, who thronging about him enquired what news he brought concerning the Carthaginians. He answered with a sad and dejected air, that the city had not so much cause to be afraid of them, as of her own officers and magistrates, who, instead of making the necessary preparations against the approach of so formidable an enemy, lulled the people asleep with trivial amusements and idle shews, and suffered the troops to want necessaries, converting their pay to their private uses; that he had long suspected, but now saw plainly, what they aimed at; that Imilcar had sent an officer to him under pretence of redeeming some captives, but in truth to persuade him not to pry too narrowly into the conduct of his collegues, and if he would not enter into their measures, at least not to obstruct them; that he was come determined to lay down his commission, that he might

THIS ſpeech being divulged about the city and among the troops, the very next day an aſſembly was convened, when Dionyſius renewed his complaints againſt the generals, and was heard with univerſal applauſe. At length ſome in the aſſembly cried out, that it was neceſſary to appoint him generaliſſimo, and that the thing ought not to be put off till the enemy was battering the walls; that the greatneſs of the war required ſuch a commander; and that Gelon was choſen generaliſſimo on the like occaſion, and defeated the Carthaginian army conſiſting of three hundred thouſand men. As for the traitors, their cauſe might be referred to another day, but the preſent affair would admit of no delay. Nor was it deferred in effect, for the people, who, as the hiſtorian obſerves, are always apt to cloſe with the worſt advice, elected that inſtant Dionyſius commander in chief, with an abſolute and unbounded power. Made generaliſſimo.

ALL things ſucceeding thus according to his wiſh, he cauſed a decree to be paſſed, ordering, that for the future the ſoldiers pay ſhould be doubled, alledging, that they would be thereby encouraged to fight more chearfully in defence of their country. When the aſſembly broke up, the Syracuſans upon ſecond thoughts began to repent of what they had done, being ſenſible, they had acted imprudently in putting the whole power into the hands of one man, which was in effect giving themſelves a maſter, who might, if he pleaſed, lord it over them without controll. Dionyſius therefore, to prevent the change of the people's minds, began to contrive how he might procure a guard for his perſon; if he could but gain this point, he concluded he might eaſily uſurp the ſovereignty. With this view he commanded all, that were able to bear arms, and under forty years of age, to march with thirty days proviſions to the city of Leontini, which belonged to the Syracuſans, and was full of foreigners and exiles, perſons very fit for the execution of his deſign. He encamped the firſt night on the plains of Leontini where he cauſed a great noiſe and clamour to be made in the dead of the night by his ſervants and attendants, as if his enemies had attempted to aſſaſſinate him in his tent. In this alarm he fled to the caſtle of Leontini, where he paſſed the reſt of the night, after having cauſed a great many fires to be lighted, and drawn off with him ſuch of the troops as he moſt confided in. Procures a guard.

At break of day he acquainted the people of Leontini with the danger he pretended to be in, and feigning to be still under great apprehension, he demanded leave to chuse himself a guard of six hundred men for the security of his person. His demand seemed very reasonable, and was accordingly complied with. He chose out a thousand men for his guard upon the spot, armed them completely, and encouraged them with great promises. He also attached the mercenaries to his interest in a peculiar manner, by addressing them with great freedom and affability. He then made several alterations and removals in the troops, giving commissions to such as he could rely upon, and turning out those whom he distrusted. Among the latter was Dexippus the Lacedæmonian, whom he sent back into Greece, not doubting but the Syracusans would chuse him for their general, if they should attempt the recovery of their liberty, for he was an officer of great experience, and could not by any offers be prevailed upon to fall in with Dionysius. At the same time he sent orders to the garison of Gela to join him, and assembled from all quarters fugitives, exiles, debtors, and criminals [s].

Seizes on the citadel, and declares himself king of Syracuse. Year of the flood 2600. Before Christ 404.

With this train he returned to Syracuse, which trembled at his approach. But the people were no longer in a condition to oppose his designs, or dispute his authority; the city being full of mercenaries, who were in arms, and the Carthaginians with a mighty army on the frontiers. The first thing he did after his return to Syracuse was to possess himself of the citadel, where the arms and provisions were lodged; which he no sooner saw himself master of than, bidding defiance to his opposers, he publicly declared himself king of Syracuse, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. To strengthen himself the more in the tyranny, he married the daughter of Hermocrates, whose family was the most powerful of Syracuse, and gave his own sister in marriage to Polyxenes, brother-in-law to Hermocrates. Afterwards he called an assembly, in which he caused Daphnæus and Demarchus, who had been the most active in opposing him, to be condemned. Thus Dionysius, from a simple notary, as Diodorus informs us, raised himself to the sovereignty of the greatest and most opulent city of Sicily [t].

In the mean time, the Carthaginians, under the command of Imilcar, having on the return of the ſpring razed the city of Agrigentum, marched with all their forces againſt Gela, and ſitting down before that place, fortified their camp with a deep ditch and a wall, not doubting, but Dionyſius would come to the relief of the beſieged with a powerful army. The Geleans in the beginning of the ſiege were for ſending their wives and children to ſome place of ſafety; but not one of them could be prevailed upon to retire, they all proteſting that they would undergo the ſame fate as their huſbands and parents. This reſolution encouraged the Geleans to exert themſelves in the defence of perſons ſo dear to them, and to whom they were ſo dear. They made ſeveral ſallies, and cut great numbers of the enemy in pieces. No ſooner was a breach opened in the wall, but the inhabitants repaired it, being indefatigable night and day on the ramparts, where their wives and children chearfully ſhared with them the labour and danger. Thus they held out a long time, though their city was very indifferently fortified, againſt an army of above three hundred thouſand men, without receiving any aid from their allies. At length Dionyſius advanced to their relief at the head of fifty thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe; but, after ſome unſucceſsful attempts, not caring to put all to the iſſue of a battle, he perſuaded the inhabitants to abandon their country, as the only means to ſave their lives, and covered their retreat with the forces he had brought to relieve the place. The Carthaginians immediately entered the city, and either put to the ſword or crucified all thoſe they found in it. From Gela they advanced to Camarina, whither the Geleans had retired; and Dionyſius being informed of their march, obliged the Camarineans likewiſe to remove from their native city, and withdrew with their wives and children to Syracuſe. The moving ſight of aged perſons, matrons, and tender infants, hurried on beyond their ſtrength from two ſeveral cities in one and the ſame country, and ſtript of all their wealth and poſſeſſions, raiſed compaſſion in the breaſts of Dionyſius's ſoldiers, and incenſed them againſt the tyrant. They ſuſpected him to act in concert with the Carthaginians; the more becauſe they did not offer to purſue him, and none of his mercenaries had been killed in the attacks he made on the enemy's camp before Gela. The Italians therefore left his camp in a body, and marched homewards through the heart of the country. The Syracuſan cavalry, after having attempted to kill him on the march, clapt spurs to their horses, and rode full gallop to Syracuse, where they entered the citadel without opposition, the guards being quite ignorant of what had happened at Gela and Camarina. Upon their arrival they forced his palace, ransacked his treasures, carried off all his rich furniture, and abused his wife so cruelly, that through grief and shame she poisoned herself. In the mean time, Dionysius, suspecting their design, followed them with all possible expedition, and, having marched fifty miles without ever halting, arrived at midnight with an hundred horse and five hundred foot at the gate of Acradina, which he found shut against him. He immediately caused the gate to be burnt down, and having thus opened himself a way into the city, he cut in pieces a body of the most wealthy and noble citizens, who, without waiting for the people, had hastened to the defence of the gate. Being now master of the city, he scoured the streets, putting all those to the sword that came in his way, and even entering the houses of such as he took to be his enemies, and cutting them off with their whole families. Next morning at break of day the whole body of his troops arrived; but the unhappy fugitives from Gela and Camarina, incensed against the tyrant, retired to Leontini.

He possesses himself of the city.

In the mean time, a plague breaking out in the Carthaginian camp, Imilcar, not finding himself in a condition to carry on the war, sent a herald to Syracuse to offer terms of peace to the conquered. His unexpected arrival was very acceptable to Dionysius, and peace was immediately struck upon the following terms: That the Carthaginians, besides their antient acquisitions in Sicily, should still possess the countries of the Sicani, and the dismantled cities of Selinus, Agrigentum, and Himera with their territories; that the Gelcans and Camarineans should be suffered to return to their respective countries and live there, paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians; that the Leontines, Messenians, and all the other inhabitants of Sicily should live according to their own laws, and enjoy their liberties, except the Syracusans, who should continue subject to Dionysius. These articles being agreed to by both parties, Imilcar embarked his troops, and set sail for Carthage, after having lost above the half of his army by the plague, which afterwards made a dreadful havock in Africa [a].

A peace between the Carthaginians and Dionysius.

Dionysius

[a] Diodor. Sicul. ibid.

Dionyſius, foreſeeing that the Syracuſans, would not fail to take advantage of the peace with the Carthaginians to attempt the recovery of their liberty, neglected nothing on his ſide in ſupport of his power. He fortified the iſland, which was very ſtrong by nature, and divided it from the reſt of the city with a thick wall, which was at due diſtances flanked with ſtrong towers. He built likewiſe at a vaſt expence a caſtle, which commanded the city, to ſerve him for a retreat in caſe of any ſudden commotion. As to the lands, he choſe the moſt fertile for himſelf and his friends, the reſt he equally diſtributed among the citizens, including in that number the ſlaves, whom he made free, and called Neopolites, or new citizens. In the ſame manner he divided the houſes, except thoſe in the iſland, which he beſtowed on his mercenaries, and ſuch friends as he could confide in [w].

HAVING taken theſe precautions for his own ſecurity, and thinking his authority ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, he began to think of extending his dominions, and ſubjecting ſeveral free ſtates of Sicily, which had ſided with the Carthaginians. He marched firſt againſt the city of Herbeſſus; but while he was employed in the ſiege of that place, the Syracuſans, who had been liſted for that expedition, ſeeing their ſwords reſtored to them, thought it their duty to employ them in the recovery of their liberty. One of the tyrant's officers, endeavouring to prevent their meeting together in private cabals, was killed on the ſpot, and his death ſerved as a ſignal for the reſt to take up arms and join the common cauſe. They ſent immediately to Ætna for the horſe, for they had retired thither, and poſſeſſed themſelves of that caſtle when Dionyſius firſt uſurped the ſovereignty. Dionyſius alarmed at theſe commotions broke up the ſiege, and haſtening to Syracuſe made himſelf maſter of that city, before the news of the revolt in the army had reached it. The revolters being joined by the cavalry from Ætna, followed him cloſe, and encamping on Epipolæ, cut off all communication with the country. At the ſame time they diſpatched meſſengers to Rhegium and Meſſina, ſoliciting their aid by ſea for the recovery of their liberty. The meſſengers were kindly received in both places, and four-ſcore gallies well-manned ſent with all poſſible expedition to ſupport ſupport ſo good a cauſe. Being thus reinforced, they promiſed by the common crier, a great reward to any one that ſhould kill the tyrant, and the freedom of the city to all foreigners, who ſhould abandon him and come over to them. A great number of Dionyſius's mercenaries allured by theſe promiſes forſook him, and were immediately made free of Syracuſe, and beſides rewarded with large ſums, which ſo encouraged them, that in a few days the tyrant ſaw himſelf quite abandoned by thoſe in whom he chiefly confided. And now the Syracuſans, having prepared engines for the battering down of the wall, with repeated aſſaults ſo haraſſed thoſe few that ſtill kept with the tyrant, that they were ſoon reduced to the utmoſt extremity. In this deſperate condition Dionyſius aſſembled his friends, to conſult with them rather by what kind of death he ſhould put an end to his career, than by what means he might ſave his life or maintain the ſovereignty. They were divided in their opinions. Heloris adviſed him to lay violent hands on himſelf before he was forced to reſign the ſovereign power, telling him, that the royal title would be the greateſt ornament of his ſepulchre. Polyxenus would have him attempt to break through the enemy's camp, on the ſwifteſt horſe he had, and retiring to thoſe places, which were ſubject to the Carthaginians, implore the aſſiſtance of the Campanians, whom Imilcar had left to defend his conqueſts in Sicily. But Philiſtus the hiſtorian oppoſed this advice, telling Dionyſius, that he ought not to fly from the crown, but hold it to the laſt gaſp with both his hands. Dionyſius cloſed with that advice, and reſolved to part with his life, rather than with the power he had acquired. However, to gain time, he ſent deputies to the Syracuſans, demanding permiſſion to depart the city with his friends and adherents, which was granted; and five ſhips were allowed him to tranſport his men and effects. In the mean time, he ſent privately diſpatches to the Campanians, who gariſoned the places in the poſſeſſion of the Carthaginians, with great offers, if they would haſten to his relief [x].

The Syracuſans, believing they had now got the better of the tyrant, and truſting to the treaty, diſarmed part of their troops, and ſuffered the others to rove about in the fields, as if there were nothing further to be feared. In the mean time, the Campanians, encouraged by Dionyſius's nysius's generous promises, arrived unexpectedly at Syracuse, and, having killed all who opposed them, broke through into the port, where he was shut up. At the same time three hundred mercenaries more came to his assistance. The face of affairs was then entirely altered; and Dionysius, taking advantage of the consternation and distraction that reigned in the enemy's camp, made a vigorous sally, and drove them as far as that part of the city, which was called Neapolis. The slaughter was not great, Dionysius, to ingratiate himself with the Syracusans, having given orders to spare those that fled. With the same view he caused the dead to be buried, which had so good an effect on the minds of the simple populace, that above seven thousand of them joined him. But the Syracusan cavalry could not by any offers be prevailed upon to side with him; wherefore seeing all lost they retired anew to their strong castle of Ætna, waiting there for another opportunity of pulling down the tyrant. Dionysius sent frequent messages to them, exhorting them to lay aside their animosities, and return to their country; but the only answer they returned was, that they had rather live free in exile, than in their own country subject to a tyrant. All the rest returned home, and again acknowledged Dionysius for their sovereign, who treated them for some time with great kindness and humanity. When all things were again quiet, he discharged the Campanians with great rewards, not daring to trust their fickle and unconstant humour. These arriving at the city of Entella prevailed with the citizens to receive them within their walls; which favour they requited by murdering in the night all the townsmen, and possessing themselves of the city, they married the wives of the deceased, and maintained themselves for many years in possession of the place.

He disarms the Syracusans.

DIONYSIUS being now convinced by experience, that he could not by any means trust the Syracusans, resolved to disarm them all, and because that, if done with open violence, might occasion great commotions, he waited till most part of the inhabitants had left the city, and were employed abroad in gathering in their harvest. He then searched narrowly every house, and seized on all the arms he could find. Afterwards he enclosed the citadel with another wall, fitted out a powerful fleet, hired a great many foreigners, and took all possible measures to secure himself against the attemps of the Syracusans.

HAVING

HAVING ſufficiently provided for his ſafety at home, he began to extend his conqueſts abroad, not only with a view of enlarging his dominions, and encreaſing his revenues, but in order to divert his ſubjects from the ſenſe of the evils attending ſlavery by employing them in military expeditions, to which the hopes of riches and plunder would ſtir them up. Having therefore muſtered his troops, he took the field, and in the very firſt campaign poſſeſſed himſelf of Naxos, Catana, Leontini, Ætna, Enna, and other cities. Some of them he treated with great clemency, to gain the eſteem and affection of the people, others he plundered, and ſold the inhabitants for ſlaves, to ſtrike terror into the country.

THESE conqueſts alarmed the neighbouring cities, that ſaw themſelves threatened with the ſame danger. Rhegium, ſituate on the oppoſite coaſt of the ſtrait which divides Sicily from Italy, taking umbrage at the great naval preparations carried on at Syracuſe, entered into an alliance with Meſſana, on the Sicilian ſide of the ſtrait, and, having raiſed a conſiderable army, ſent a meſſenger to the Syracuſans, acquainting them, that if they were deſirous of ſhaking off the yoke they groaned under, they ſhould be aſſiſted with a numerous fleet and powerful army. The Syracuſans readily promiſed to perform their part; but while the joint forces of Meſſana and Rhegium were upon the point of marching againſt the tyrant, diſputes ariſing among the troops and officers of the two armies, the enterprize was dropped, and the mighty preparations for war ended in a treaty of peace and alliance between Dionyſius and the two cities.

Prepares to make war on the Carthaginians.

DIONYSIUS had concluded the late peace with the Carthaginians, with no other view, but to gain time to eſtabliſh his authority: He therefore no ſooner ſaw himſelf firmly ſeated on the throne, but he began to make the neceſſary preparations for renewing the war, deſigning nothing leſs than to drive them quite out of Sicily. As he was very ſenſible how formidable the power of the Carthaginians was at that time, he made preparations ſuitable to the undertaking he was going upon. His firſt care was to bring to Syracuſe, from all parts of Sicily, Greece, and Italy, great numbers of workmen, whom he employed in forging all ſorts of arms. Not only the porches of the temples, but the ſchools, walks, piazzas about the forum, and every public place, nay even private houſes were filled with workmen. The great wages, which Dionyſius paid them, them, induced the beſt artificers in every profeſſion to quit their own country, and flock to Syracuſe. Dionyſius himſelf was continually among them, encouraging them with great rewards to diſpatch the work in hand. Such as diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their ingenuity or application, were ſure to receive ſome particular marks of his favour. He even invited them to dine with him, and took pleaſure in entertaining them with all the freedom and kindneſs of a friend. The artificers thus encouraged were indefatigable, ſtriving to outvie one another; inſomuch, that in a ſhort time an hundred and forty thouſand complete ſuits of armour were finiſhed. He then applied himſelf entirely to the fitting out of a fleet, capable of diſputing with the Carthaginians the ſovereignty of the ſea. The timber for building his gallies he brought at a great expence from Italy, where it was drawn on carriages to the ſea-ſide, and then ſhipped for Syracuſe. Having provided the neceſſary materials, he employed ſuch a vaſt number of workmen, that a fleet of two hundred ſail was ſoon ready to put to ſea; to theſe he added an hundred and ten old gallies, which he cauſed to be made as ſerviceable as the new ones. The preparations he made both by ſea and land were ſo great and expenſive, that one would have taken them, as our author obſerves, to have been the utmoſt effort of the whole iſland. The fleet was manned with an equal number of citizens and foreigners. Syracuſe, and the cities in its dependence, ſupplied him with great part of his land-forces: many came from Italy and Greece, the great pay he offered inducing them to flock over in crouds and liſt in his ſervice. Being ſenſible of what importance it is for a general to gain the affection of his troops, he applied himſelf in a particular manner to oblige all, eſpecially the Syracuſans. With this view he entirely changed his behaviour for ſome time; kindneſs, civility, a diſpoſition to do good, and an inſinuating condeſcenſion, took place of that imperious air and inhuman temper, which had rendered him ſo odious.

Dionysius, ſeeing his great preparations now complete, and the army in a condition to take the field, aſſembled the Syracuſans, and acquainted them with his deſign, which was, he ſaid, to make war upon the moſt implacable enemy the Greeks had; he repreſented to them, in a pathetic ſpeech, the many calamities which the Carthaginians had brought upon Sicily, adding that the plague, which had lately wasted Carthage, offered them a fair opportunity of being revenged on them, for the inhuman cruelties they had practised on their countrymen. The assembly readily concurred in his opinion; the antient hatred they bore the Carthaginians, their rage against them for having brought their city under the power of a tyrant, and the hopes they entertained of finding some opportunity of recovering their former liberty, united them in their suffrages, and war was unanimously resolved on. Upon the breaking up of the assembly, Dionysius granted leave to the people to seize on all the goods and estates of the Carthaginians, who, upon the faith of treaties, had settled at Syracuse, and there carried on a considerable trade [y].

Dionysius declares war against the Carthaginians.

Dionysius, finding the Syracusans no less desirous of the war than himself, dispatched an herald to Carthage, with a letter to the senate and people, notifying to them, that if they did not forthwith withdraw their garisons from all the Greek cities in Sicily, the people of Syracuse would treat them as enemies. This letter, being read first in the senate, and afterwards in the assembly of the people, occasioned a general alarm at Carthage, which the plague had reduced to a miserable condition. However, they were not dismayed, but sent officers into all parts with considerable sums to raise troops with the utmost diligence, and appointed Imilcar commander in chief of their forces.

Dionysius on his side lost no time; without waiting for the answer of the Carthaginians he took the field, and his army was daily increased by the arrival of new troops, which, out of hatred to the Carthaginians, flocked to him from all parts: It amounted to fourscore thousand foot and three thousand horse. The fleet consisted of two hundred long gallies, and five hundred transports, laden with warlike engines and all sorts of provisions. He opened the campaign with the siege of Motya, where the Carthaginians kept all their stores and provisions. This city stood near mount Eryx, in a small island about a mile from the shore, to which it was joined by a small neck of land; this the besieged immediately cut off to prevent the approaches of the enemy on that side. Dionysius after having taken a view of the place with his engineers commanded the canal between the city and the shore to be filled up with rubbish, and his gallies to anchor at the mouth of the harbour. Having given these orders he left his brother Leptines, commander in chief of the fleet, to carry on the siege, while he with his land forces went to reduce the cities in alliance with the Carthaginians, which, terrified at the approach of so great an army, all submitted, except five, viz. Ancyra, Solas, Egesta, Panormus, and Entella. The two last he besieged, but not being able to reduce them in so short a time as he expected, he returned with his whole army to Motya, not doubting, but all other places would surrender assoon as they saw him master of this [z].

In the mean time, Imilcar, who was busy in raising men and making other preparations for the war in Sicily, ordered his admiral to set sail from Carthage with ten gallies, and making strait to Syracuse, to destroy all the vessels he should find in that harbour. What he proposed by this was to divide the enemy's forces, and oblige Dionysius to send part of his fleet to the defence of Syracuse. The admiral, pursuant to his orders, entered the harbour in the night, and having sunk most of the ships he found there, sailed back to Carthage without the loss of a single man.

Dionysius, on his return to Motya, having set more hands at work, speedily filled up the canal with heaps of stone and rubbish, so that he could make his approaches as on the dry land. He then brought forward his engines, battered the place with his rams, advanced to the walls towers six stories high rolled upon wheels, and from thence galled the besieged with continual vollies of arrows and stones discharged from his catapults, an engine at that time of late invention. The place was attacked and defended with the utmost vigor. After the aggressors had opened And taken.
several breaches in the walls, and entered the city sword in hand, the besieged still persisted in defending the narrow streets and passages with incredible valour, so that they were drove from street to street, till, being quite tired out and overpowered with numbers, they were all cut in pieces. The soldiers, enraged at so obstinate a defence, put all to the sword without distinction of sex or age, those only excepted, who took sanctuary in the temples. The city was given given up to be plundered, Dionysius being glad to have such an opportunity of gaining the affection of the troops by the allurement of gain and booty. He rewarded one Archylus, who first mounted the wall, with an hundred minas, and all the rest in proportion to their merit. Such of the Motyans as were left alive he sold for slaves; but commanded Diamenes, and all the Greeks who had joined the Carthaginians, to be crucified. Having thus reduced the strongest city in Sicily subject to Carthage, and placed a numerous garison in it, under the command of one Bito a Syracusan, and ordered Leptines with an hundred and twenty gallies to watch the Carthaginians at sea, summer now drawing to an end, he returned with his army to Syracuse.

Great preparations of the Carthaginians against Dionysius.

In the mean time, the Carthaginians, having certain intelligence of the strength of Dionysius, resolved to surpass him in numbers both of men and ships; and accordingly, having made an extraordinary effort, they raised an army of three hundred thousand foot and four thousand horse. Their fleet, under the command of Mago, consisted of four hundred gallies, and upwards of six hundred ships of burden laden with provisions and engines of war. The troops being imbarked, and the fleet ready to set sail, Imilcar delivered his orders to the commanders of the fleet sealed up, enjoining them not to open them till they were out at sea, and then to observe them with all strictness. This precaution he took (and it is the first time we find it used) to prevent spies from informing the enemy of his designs. The orders were, that they should make strait to Panormus, which was appointed the place of the general rendezvous, and thither they steered their course with a fair wind. But the transports, having outsailed the gallies, were attacked off the coast of Panormus by Leptines, who sunk fifty of them, in which five thousand men and two hundred chariots were lost; the rest tacking about had the good luck to escape. Assoon as the gallies appeared Leptines retired, and Imilcar, having landed his troops, marched directly against the enemy, commanding the fleet to sail along the coast near the army. On his march he took Eryx by treachery, and hastening to Motya, reduced that important place, before Dionysius, who was then besieging Egesta, could send any forces to its relief. The Syracusans and their confederates were for venturing a battle a battle, but Dionyſius thought it more adviſeable to retire to Syracuſe, and abandon all the open country to the mercy of the Carthaginians, who, flushed with their ſucceſs, marched ſtrait to Meſſana. Imilcar was deſirous to poſſeſs himſelf of that city on account of its ſituation; for being once maſter of it, he could eaſily intercept all ſuccours ſent to the enemy either from Italy or Greece; and beſides, the haven was capable of receiving his whole fleet, which conſiſted of five hundred ſail and upwards. When the inhabitants heard of the approach of the enemy, they could not agree among themſelves about the meaſures to be taken on that occaſion. Some, alarmed at the great ſtrength of the Carthaginians, and ſeeing themſelves deſerted by their confederates, were for ſubmiting to the enemy; others were reſolved to hold out to the laſt, and chearfully ſacrifice their lives in the defence of their liberties. They were encouraged to this reſolution by an antient prophecy, whereby it was foretold, that the Carthaginians ſhould be one day carriers of water in that city. This they interpreted as if the Carthaginians ſhould be ſlaves in Meſſana, and therefore, having ſent away their wives and children with all their treaſures to the neighbouring cities, they began to make the neceſſary preparations. But, in the mean time, the Carthaginian fleet having, by the favour of a ſtrong gale, entered the harbour, and with a great number of engines battered down the walls on that ſide, the inhabitants haſtened in crouds to defend the breaches, leaving the other parts of the wall quite unguarded. Imilcar took advantage of this confuſion, and attacking the city on the land ſide entered it without oppoſition. All thoſe, who were on the ramparts, died valiantly on the ſpot; the others either fled to the neighbouring cities, or threw themſelves into the ſea, and made their eſcape to the oppoſite ſhore of Italy. Imilcar entering Meſſana with his whole army, and conſidering that it was too far diſtant from the cities held by the Carthaginians, ordered his ſoldiers to raze it to the ground, and his orders were executed with ſuch ſeverity, that there was not one houſe left ſtanding in the whole city; nay, our hiſtorian tells, that, after the departure of the Carthaginians, it was hard to tell where Meſſana had ſtood, the very rubbiſh being carried away and thrown into the ſea, which diſcovered the implacable hatred Imilcar bore to the Greeks.

Meſſana taken by the Carthaginians.

And razed to the ground.

THE fame of theſe ſucceſſes being ſpread over all the iſland, moſt of the inhabitants, who hated Dionyſius in their hearts, hearts, and had only been reconciled to him in appearance and out of fear, took this opportunity to quit his party and join the Carthaginians. He raiſed new forces, and giving the ſlaves their liberty, manned with them threeſcore gallies. His whole army amounted to thirty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, and his fleet to an hundred and eighty gallies. With theſe he took the field, and removed about twenty miles from Syracuſe. Imilcar upon advice of his march advanced to meet him, his land army being attended by the fleet, which kept near the coaſt. When the Carthaginians arrived at Naxos, they could not continue any longer their march by the ſea-ſide, but were obliged to take a long compaſs round mount Ætna, which by a violent eruption had covered all the neighbouring country with burning aſhes. Imilcar therefore ordered Mago to ſail to Catana, and there wait, till he, marching through the heart of the country, ſhould rejoin him with the land forces. Dionyſius, appriſed of this, haſtened with all ſpeed to Catana with a deſign to attack Mago, before Imilcar's army came up; he hoped that his land-forces drawn up on the ſhore would greatly encourage his own mariners and diſcourage the enemy's: beſides, if his fleet were worſted, both ſhips and men had a place of ſafety to retire to.

A fight at ſea between Mago and Leptines.

Having therefore drawn up his land-forces on the ſhore, he ſent out Leptines with the whole fleet againſt the enemy, commanding him to engage in cloſe order, and not to break his line upon any account whatſoever. The Carthaginians, ſeeing the Greek troops drawn up on the ſhore, and the navy advancing in good order againſt them, were ſtruck with terror, and began to make to the ſhore with a deſign to ſave themſelves over land and join Imilcar; but recollecting that this was equally, if not more, dangerous, they reſolved to try their fortune by ſea; and accordingly drawing themſelves up in a line, they waited for the enemy. Leptines inconſiderately advancing with thirty of his beſt gallies, contrary to the expreſs command of Dionyſius, ſunk ſeveral of the enemy's ſhips, but was himſelf ſurrounded, and, after having fought for ſome hours hand to hand with the enemy as if in a battle on land, was obliged to fly. The flight of the admiral diſheartened the Syracuſans, and gave the enemy freſh courage; the former fled to the ſhore where their land-forces were drawn up, but were cloſely purſued by the Carthaginians. Many abandoning their ſhips threw themſelves into the ſea, hoping to ſave their lives by ſwimming to the ſhore; but the Carthaginian tranſports, which lay near the ſhore, having manned their boats, made a dreadful havock of thoſe unhappy men, when they were not in a condition to make any reſiſtance. The land-army ſaw them periſh, without being able to give them the leaſt relief. In this engagement above an hundred of the Syracuſan gallies were either ſunk or taken, and more than twenty thouſand of their men killed in the battle or purſuit.

Upon this misfortune the land-forces, under the command of Dionyſius, ſolicited their generals to lead them againſt Imilcar, alledging, that their unexpected arrival would ſtrike terror into the enemy, and give them a fair opportunity of retrieving their late loſs, while the enemy's troops were fatigued with their long and haſty march. This propoſal pleaſed Dionyſius at firſt; but while he was preparing to march, ſome of his friends remonſtrating to him, that Mago in the mean time with his victorious fleet might poſſeſs himſelf of Syracuſe, he altered his reſolution, and haſtened with his whole army to the defence of that metropolis. Many of the Sicilians, being unwilling to undergo the fatigues and hardſhips of a ſiege, deſerted, and either joined the enemy, or withdrew to their reſpective homes [a]. Dionyſius marches back to Syracuſe.

Imilcar in two days march arrived at Catana, where he halted ſome time to refreſh his troops, and then, animated with the good ſucceſs that attended his arms, marched ſtrait to Syracuſe with a deſign to beſiege it; while his fleet, under the command of Mago, ſailed along the coaſt, carrying great plenty of proviſions for the ſubſiſtance of ſo numerous an army. The arrival of the enemy threw the city into the utmoſt conſternation. Above two hundred gallies, adorned with the ſpoils of the enemy, entered in a kind of triumph the great haven of Syracuſe, and were followed by a thouſand tranſports; ſo that the harbour, capacious as it was, could hardly contain ſo great a navy. The fleet had ſcarce caſt anchor, when the army appeared on the other ſide, conſiſting of three hundred thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe. Imilcar took up his quarters in the temple of Jupiter, and the reſt of the army encamped round Syracuſe beſieged.

round it, about twelve furlongs from the city. The next morning the Carthaginian general, advancing with his army in battalia to the very walls of the city, offered the inhabitants battle. But as they were not ſo imprudent as to accept the challenge, he returned to his camp, well ſatisfied at his having extorted from theSyracuſans a tacit confeſſion of their own weakneſs and his ſuperiority. At the ſame time he ordered an hundred of his beſt gallies to enter the two other harbours, viz. the little port, and that of Trogilus, to ſtrike more terror into the Syracuſans, and convince them that the Carthaginians were likewiſe maſters at ſea. As he met with no oppoſition, he ſent out parties for thirty days together to lay waſte the country, cutting down groves, and deſtroying all before him. He took by aſſault the quarter of the town called Acradina, where he plundered the rich temples of Ceres and Proſerpine. He conſidered the city as a ſure prey, which could not poſſibly eſcape him, but at the ſame time foreſeeing, that the ſiege would be long and tedious, he ſurrounded his camp with a trench, and encloſed it with ſtrong walls, after having demoliſhed for that purpoſe all the tombs which ſtood round the city, and amongſt others that of Gelon and his wife Demarata, which was a monument of great magnificence. He built three forts near the ſea at equal diſtances from each other, one at Plemmyrium, another about the middle of the port, and the third near the temple of Jupiter, laying up in theſe great ſtores of proviſion. He ſent likewiſe tranſports to Sardinia and Africa to bring from thence corn and other neceſſaries.

The Syracuſans defeat theCarthaginians by ſea

In the mean time, Polyxenus, whom Dionyſius had diſpatched into Italy and Greece with great ſums of money to raiſe what forces he could, arrived with a fleet of thirty ſhips under the command of Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian. This reinforcement came very ſeaſonable, and ſomewhat raiſed the courage of the diſpirited Syracuſans, who, ſpying a large veſſel laden with proviſions for the enemy, ventured out with five gallies and took it. As they were ſailing away with their prize, the Carthaginians gave them chaſe with forty ſail, againſt which they advanced with their whole fleet, and engaging them took the admiral galley, and twenty-four more, damaged others, and purſued the reſt to the place where their whole fleet rode, offering them battle a ſecond time. The Carthaginians, diſcouraged with this unexpected overthrow, kept within the harbour, though their fleet fleet was three times more numerous than the enemy's who challenged them [b].

THE Syracuſans, animated by this ſucceſs, which could only be aſcribed to their own valour, for both Dionyſius and Leptines were then abſent, began to encourage each other to ſhake off the ſhameful yoke of ſervitude, and reſume their antient liberty. What exploits, ſaid they, have we atchieved under the conduct of the tyrant? Have we not been always ſhamefully overcome by the Carthaginians? But now, that we did not fight under the unlucky auſpices of Dionyſius, we have gained a glorious victory, and are returned conquerors. Why then do we not exert the ſame courage againſt a domeſtic tyrant, which we have ſhewn againſt a foreign enemy? We have again got ſwords in our hands; let us imploy them againſt him who has injured us more than the Carthaginians themſelves. While theſe ſpeeches were whiſpered about the town, Dionyſius, who had been out at ſea with a ſmall ſquadron to procure proviſions, landed at the port, and having ſummoned an aſſembly he congratulated the Syracuſans on their late victory, promiſing in a ſhort time to put an end to the war, and deliver them from their preſent calamities. When the aſſembly was ready to break up, one Theodorus, a Syracuſan of great authority among the nobility, and who had done eminent ſervices to his country, ſtood up and boldly ſpoke thus: "Although Dionyſius has advanced many "falſhoods in his ſpeech, yet what he ſaid in the cloſe of it, "viz. that he would put a ſpeedy end to the war, he may "truly perform, if he himſelf, who has always been "overcome, reſigns the command, and reſtores us to liber-"ty. For none of us care to venture our lives in the "field againſt a ſovereign enemy, while we know, that, "notwithſtanding our victory, we are to be treated like "ſlaves by a domeſtic tyrant. If the Carthaginians pre-"vail, by paying an annual tribute, we ſhall be allowed to "enjoy our liberties; but if Dionyſius ſhould conquer, "he would not fail to rob our temples, plunder our "houſes, ſeize our eſtates, take away our lives, and "deprive us of all that is moſt dear to us. Let us there-"fore get rid of the tyrant within our walls, before we "attempt

" Shall we, who have lately engaged thousands and put

When Theodorus had ended his speech, the Syracusans, much perplexed in their minds, and not knowing what to resolve on, looked earnestly on their allies, especially on the Spartans there present; when Pharacidas, who commanded the Lacedæmonian fleet, rose up. Every one expected that a citizen of Sparta would declare in favour of liberty; but they were disappointed in their hopes, for he told them, that he had been sent by his republic to assist the Syracusans and Dionysius against the Carthaginians, and not to make war upon Dionysius, or subvert his authority. This unexpected answer put a stop to any further attempts of the Syracusans; and the tyrant's mercenaries arriving at the same time, the assembly broke up. However, Dionysius was under no small apprehension, and from that time left no stone unturned to ingratiate himself with the people affecting on all occasions to treat them with great kindness and familiarity [c].

Polyxenus, who had married Thesta, Dionysius's sister declared against him on this occasion, and not thinking himself safe in Sicily, privately withdrew into Italy. When Dionysius was informed of his flight, he sent for his sister and bitterly reproached her for not giving him notice of her husband's retreat, since she could not be ignorant of it. Thesta reply'd, without expressing the least fear or concern. Have I appeared to be so bad a wife to you, and so mean-spirited, as to have abandoned my husband in his flight? No, I was quite unacquainted with his design but if he had imparted it to me, I should not have discovered it to you, but shared with him his dangers and misfortunes fortunes, reckoning myſelf more happy in being called the wife of Polyxenus the exile, than the ſiſter of Dionyſius the tyrant. Dionyſius, though highly incenſed againſt his ſiſter, yet could not help commending the affection ſhe ſhewed for her huſband; and the Syracuſans were ſo charmed with the love ſhe ſhewed for her country on this and all other occaſions, that after the tyranny was ſuppreſſed, the ſame honours, equipage, and train, which ſhe had before, were continued to her, during her life. After her death the whole city attended her funeral, which was performed at the expence of the public, with extraordinary pomp and ſplendor [d].

A plague in the Carthaginian army.

BUT to return to the Carthaginians, their ſucceſſes were not laſting. They had committed an irretrievable error in not attacking Syracuſe upon their arrival, when the ſight of a mighty fleet and a formidable army had occaſioned an univerſal conſternation in the city; and now a plague, breaking out in their camp, prevented them from making any attempts towards the reduction of the place. This infection was looked upon as a puniſhment inflicted upon them by the gods for plundering the temples, and demoliſhing the tombs round the city, but was in effect occaſioned by the unwholeſome exhalations of the fens and marſhes joining their camp; for the Athenians, who ſpared both temples and tombs, had been, not long before, afflicted with the ſame calamity. The plague began among the Africans, and ſoon ſpread through the whole army. Care was taken at firſt to inter the dead, but their numbers increaſing daily, they were left unburied, and this, as it was then the midſt of ſummer, and the heat that year exceſſive, aggravated the evil beyond meaſure. This infection was attended with very uncommon ſymptoms, ſuch as violent dyſenteries, raging fevers, acute pains in all the parts of the body, &c. ſome were even ſeized with madneſs and fury, falling upon all thoſe that came in their way, and tearing them to pieces. The plague was ſo violent, that in a ſhort time it ſwept away above an hundred thouſand men, all remedies proving unſucceſsful, by reaſon of the incredible violence of the diſtemper, and the quick diſpatch it made of ſuch as were ſeized with it.

DIONYSIUS reſolved not to let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of attacking the enemy. Having therefore manned fourſcore gallies, he ordered Pharacidas and Leptines to fall upon the enemy's fleet at break of day, while he attacked the land-forces in the camp. With this view having commanded his troops to be ready to march by midnight, he ſet out at the head of ten thouſand choſen men at the time appointed, and without being diſcovered arrived at the enemy's camp. He then detached a ſtrong body of cavalry, and a thouſand of the mercenary foot, with orders to fall upon that part of the camp which lay at the greateſt diſtance, pretending that the enemy there kept no guard. But his real deſign was to get rid of that body of mercenaries, they having in the late diſturbances ſeemed to favour the faction which oppoſed him. Accordingly he gave private inſtructions to the officers of the horſe to retire as ſoon as the infantry was engaged; his orders were obeyed, and the mercenaries, being ſurrounded on all ſides, were cut off all to a man. Upon the return of the cavalry, Dionyſius at the ſame time attacked the camp and the forts, which the enemy had built near the ſhore. Two of the forts were taken at the firſt onſet, which gave the Syracuſans an opportunity of entering the great haven with all their fleet, and falling furiouſly on the enemy's gallies anchored there. The Carthaginians in the camp made at firſt a vigorous reſiſtance, but ſeeing the two forts, which defended the harbour, poſſeſſed by the enemy, and their navy in imminent danger of being utterly deſtroyed, many of them abandoning the defence of the camp, haſtened to the ſhore to the relief of their companions on board the veſſels. This occaſioned a great confuſion in the army, which Dionyſius taking advantage of, broke into the camp, and made a dreadful havock, putting all to the ſword who oppoſed him. The ſurprize, terror, and even haſte they were in to put themſelves into a poſture of defence, threw them into greater confuſion and diſorder. They knew not on what ſide to ſend relief, all being equally in danger. Many of their veſſels were ſunk, others quite diſabled, and a great many burnt and taken. The inhabitants of Syracuſe, crouded on the walls and eminences, were eye-witneſſes of that ſcene of horror, and, lifting up their hands to heaven, thanked the tutelary gods of the city, for revenging in ſo ſignal a manner the many ſacrileges, which the Carthaginians had committed ſince their arrival in Sicily. The ſlaughter in the camp and on board the veſſels was great and dreadful, and ended only when night obliged the conquerors to retire. Dionyſius encamped at the temple of Jupiter, near the enemy, with a deſign to renew the fight early next morning. But Imilcar, taking the opportunity of this ſhort reſpite, ſent embaſſadors privately to Dionyſius, offering him three hundred talents, if he would remit the remains of his ſhattered army to withdraw unmoleſted. Dionyſius was unwilling utterly to deſtroy the Carthaginians, leſt the Syracuſans, when free from the apprehenſion of ſo formidable an enemy, ſhould ſeek to regain their antient liberty; but on the other ſide he knew, that neither the Syracuſans nor their confederates would ſuffer him to grant the enemy ſuch terms. He therefore anſwered, that it was not in his power to permit them all to retire, but that he would allow Imilcar with all the citizens of Carthage to depart in the night upon his paying three hundred talents. This being agreed on, Dionyſius retired with his forces into the city, whither Imilcar privately ſent him the promiſed ſum, and then began to make the neceſſary preparations for his departure. The Carthaginians were put on board forty gallies and ready to ſet ſail, when the Corinthians, who ſerved under Dionyſius, diſcovering from the noiſe and motion of the veſſels that Imilcar was making off, ſent to acquaint the tyrant with their flight, who immediately ordered ſome gallies to be manned, as if he deſigned to prevent their retreat. But as his orders were but ſlowly executed, the Corinthians without his command purſued them, and ſunk ſeveral veſſels in the rear. Dionyſius then marched out with his troops againſt thoſe, whom Imilcar had left behind to the mercy of the conqueror; but before his arrival the Sicilians in the Carthaginian ſervice had retired to their reſpective countries; the reſt, ſeeing themſelves abandoned by the Sicilians and betrayed by the Carthaginians, at the approach of Dionyſius's army betook themſelves to flight; but being cloſely purſued were either cut in pieces, or taken priſoners; only the Iberians kept together in a body, and ſent a herald to capitulate with Dionyſius, who took them into his ſervice. Such was the fate of the Carthaginians in Sicily, which ſhews, ſays our hiſtorian, that thoſe, who are too much elated with power and ſucceſs, may ſoon be forced to confeſs their weakneſs and vanity. Thoſe haughty conquerors, maſters of almoſt all Sicily, who looked upon Syracuſe as their own, and entered at firſt triumphant into the harbour, inſulting the citizens, are now reduced to fly ſhamefully in the night, dragging away with them the ſad ruins and miſerable remains of their ſhattered fleet and army, after having left an hundred and fifty thouſand men lying unburied in the enemy's country [e].

Imilcar lays violent hands on himſelf.

Imilcar upon his arrival at Carthage, which he found overwhelmed with grief and deſpair, went directly to his own houſe, and ſhutting the doors againſt the citizens and even his own children, laid violent hands on himſelf, to ſhew that he did not ſurvive his countrymen, who periſhed in Sicily, out of a fondneſs for life, but merely to preſerve the troops, which had eſcaped the plague, from the fury of the enemy, to which his more early death would have expoſed them. When it was publicly known in Africa, that Imilcar had ſaved only the citizens of Carthage, leaveing the confederates behind to the mercy of the enemy, the cities and ſtates, which had ſent them auxiliaries, were incenſed to ſuch a degree, that taking up arms they marched directly to Carthage, being two hundred thouſand men and upwards. But as they wanted a leader of experience, and had neither warlike engines nor proviſions to ſupport ſo numerous an army, they ſoon diſperſed, and, retiring to their reſpective countries, freed Carthage from a dreadful alarm.

The Rhegians defeated by Dionyſius.

The Carthaginians being thus intirely defeated in Sicily, all thoſe who had abandoned their country, through dread of ſo formidable an enemy, returned to their antient habitations. Dionyſius cauſed the city of Meſſana to be rebuilt, and peopled it with a thouſand Locrians and four thouſand Medimneans. This gave no ſmall jealouſy to the inhabitants of Rhegium in Italy, who receiving into their protection all thoſe that were driven out by Dionyſius, or hated his government, formed a conſiderable army, which they ſent under the conduct of Heloris to beſiege Meſſana. But Dionyſius unexpectedly falling upon them, cut moſt of the Rhegian forces in pieces, and obliged the reſt to retire to their veſſels and abandon the iſland. He had ſcarce obtained this victory over the Rhegians, but Mago the Carthaginian, whom Imilcar had left to ſettle the affairs of Carthage in Sicily, [e] Idem, ibid.

Sicily, appeared before Meſſana at the head of a numerous army; but was attended with no better ſucceſs, being in a pitched battle driven out of the field with the loſs of above eight hundred men. Dionyſius, animated by theſe two victories, reſolved to make an attempt upon Rhegium, and accordingly having manned an hundred gallies, arrived unperceived before the city, ſet fire to the gates, and in the confuſion, which his arrival occaſioned, was very near carrying the city by aſſault, the inhabitants being more intent upon extinguiſhing the fire, than repulſing the enemy. But Heloris, perceiving the danger the city was in, ordered the inhabitants to give over quenching the flames, and haſten to the walls; by which means the place was ſaved, for ſome of Dionyſius's men had already by the help of their ſcaling ladders got into the city, but the reſt being timely prevented from following them, they were either put to the ſword, or made priſoners. Dionyſius being thus diſappointed in his deſign, laid waſte the territory of Rhegium, and then retired to Syracuſe.

Mago concludes a peace with Dionyſius.

THE Carthaginians, however diſheartened by their late loſſes, yet could not forbear making new attempts upon Sicily. They ſent Mago fourſcore thouſand men, enjoining him to make war upon Dionyſius, and promiſing to ſend him ſoon new ſupplies both of men, money, and ſhips. But Mago, being ſoon reduced to great ſtraits for want of proviſions, ſent embaſſadors to Dionyſius to treat of a peace, which was concluded before either ſide had loſt one man. By this treaty Taurominium, a Carthaginian colony, was given up to Dionyſius, who driving from thence the antient proprietors, placed the choiceſt of his mercenaries in their room. As for Mago, as ſoon as the treaty was ſigned, he returned to Carthage, leaving his allies in Sicily to ſhift for themſelves.

Dionyſius attacks Rhegium.

AND now Dionyſius, being under no apprehenſion of the Carthaginians, bent all his thoughts on the reduction of Rhegium, which was the key of Italy, with a deſign to bring under his power all the Greek cities there. He had then under his command an army of twenty thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, beſides an hundred and twenty gallies well manned and equipt. With theſe he paſſed over into Italy, and having laid waſte the country of the Locrians, he advanced to Rhegium. But, in the mean time, the Italians, being well apprized of his deſigns, raiſed forces in all their cities, and having fitted out a fleet of threeſcore gallies, ſent them to the relief of Rhegium. They were met by a ſquadron of Dionyſius's fleet conſiſting of fifty gallies; whereupon a ſharp engagement enſued, in which Dionyſius loſt ſeven gallies, and fifteen hundred men. The fleets were parted by a violent ſtorm, which driving many of the Syracuſan veſſels upon the Rhegian ſhore, the mariners were either cut in pieces by the inhabitants, or taken priſoners, Dionyſius himſelf having narrowly eſcaped in a ſmall veſſel, and with much ado landed at midnight at the port of Meſſana.

Stirs up the Lucanians againſt the Greeks in Italy.

THIS diſappointment did not make Dionyſius lay aſide his deſigns upon the Greek cities in Italy; he reinforced his armies with new levies, equipt a greater number of ſhips, and made vaſt preparations both by ſea and land in order to renew the war. In the mean time, he entered into alliance with the Lucanians, engaging them with great promiſes to fall upon the Greek cities in Italy, hoping to find them thereby on his return ſo weakened that he might eaſily accompliſh his deſign. The Lucanians, agreeable to their engagement, entered the country of the Thurians, put all to fire and ſword, and having joined battle with the confederate Greeks, killed above ten thouſand of them on the ſpot. Thoſe, who eſcaped the ſlaughter, fled to a hill near the ſea ſide, whence they diſcovered a ſquadron of ſhips making to the Italian ſhore, and hoping that they were ſent from Rhegium to their aſſiſtance, out of eagerneſs to ſave themſelves from the Lucanians, who purſued them, leapt into the ſea and ſwam to the ſhips. But this fleet proved to be a ſquadron ſent by Dionyſius to the aſſiſtance of the Lucanians, under the command of his brother Leptines. However, that commander not only received them generouſly into his ſhips, but prevailed upon the Lucanians to accept for each man, they being a thouſand in all, a mina, and ſuffer them to return unmoleſted into their own country. This ſum, which was very conſiderable, Leptines himſelf diſburſed, being moved thereunto by his own generoſity and natural inclination to pity even an enemy in diſtreſs. Such a generous behaviour gained him the affection of all the Greeks, but highly diſpleaſed Dionyſius, who immediately diſcharged him, and appointed Thearides, his other brother, admiral in his room [f].

[f] Diodor. Sicul. ibid. c. 12.

AND now Dionysius, having made the necessary preparations for his expedition into Italy, set sail from Syracuse with an army of above twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse, and a fleet of forty long gallies, and three hundred transports, loaded with provisions and all sorts of warlike engines. The fifth day after his departure from Syracuse he arrived at Messana, whence he sent his brother Thearides to the Lipari islands, upon advice brought him that ten ships of Rhegium were anchored there. Thearides found the ships, and returned with them and their crews to Dionysius, who delivered the prisoners loaded with chains to the care and custody of the magistrates of Messana, and then set sail for Italy. The first place he attacked was Caulonia or Caulum, a strong city in Locris, which, though battered night and day without intermission, held out, till the Italians, having raised an army of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse, drew near the city in order to relieve it. These were commanded by Heloris, a native of Syracuse, whence he had been banished by Dionysius, and therefore bore him an implacable hatred. Heloris, as he drew near the besieged city, advanced with a detachment of five hundred chosen men to observe the ground on which the enemy was incamped. But Dionysius upon advice of his approach breaking up the siege, marched with all speed against him, and arriving by break of day where Heloris was encamped with his small detachment, fell upon him with his whole army. Heloris kept his ground, in spite of the utmost efforts of an army so much superior in number, till the rest of his forces came up. But as they arrived by parties, every one making what haste he could to relieve their general, they were after a long and obstinate dispute put to flight. Heloris and his party still kept their posts, and were killed on the spot. Those, who escaped fled to a neighbouring mountain, and there made a stand. But as they wanted water, and were hemmed in all sides by the enemy, they sent an herald to Dionysius, offering to surrender, provided he would allow them to retire unmolested; but he insisting upon their delivering themselves up at discretion, they held out till they were ready to perish with hunger and thirst, and then complied with his proposal. They were above ten thousand, and expected no quarter from so cruel an enemy. But Dionysius, contrary to their expectation, pectation, treated them with great humanity, discharging them all without ransom, and suffering them to live in their respective countries according to their own laws. This, as our historian observes, was the only commendable action he ever performed in the whole course of his life. The captives on their return to their respective cities greatly extolled his clemency and good nature, and acknowledged his kindness to them by presenting him with crowns of gold g.

Rhegium besieged.

Dionysius, having by this generous action acquired the good opinion of all the inhabitants of the country, and from enemies made them his friends and allies, turned his arms again upon the city of Rhegium. He was highly incensed against the Rhegians, on account of their having refused to give him the daughter of one of their citizens in marriage, and much more for the insolent answer, with which their refusal was attended (Z). The besieged finding themselves abandoned by their allies, whom Dionysius had gained over by his late kindness, and expecting no quarter if the city should be taken by storm, sent embassadors to treat of a surrender. Dionysius offered them peace, upon condition that they paid him three hundred talents, delivered up all their vessels, which were seventy in

g Idem, ibid.

(Z) Dionysius in the beginning of his reign did all that lay in his power to oblige the two powerful cities of Rhegium and Messana, lest they should enter into an alliance with the Syrcusans, among whom his authority was not then well established. The inhabitants of Messana he presented with some lands in their neighbourhood, which lay very conveniently for them. To give the people of Rhegium an instance of his esteem and regard for them, he sent embassadors to desire them to give him the daughter of one of their citizens in marriage. Upon the arrival of the embassadors the people of Rhegium, having called a council to take his demand into consideration, took a resolution not to contract any alliance with a tyrant, and for their final answer charged the embassadors to acquaint the tyrant, that they had only the hangman's daughter to give him. This gross abuse Dionysius never put up, but continually studied how to revenge it (13).

(13) Idem, ibid. c. 12.

in number, and put an hundred hoſtages into his hands. Theſe terms the inhabitants agreed to, and the ſiege was raiſed. It was not out of kindneſs or good nature he acted in this manner, but with a view to deprive them of their fleet, knowing that it would be impoſſible for the Rhegians to hold out, if they received no aſſiſtance by ſea. He therefore put off from day to day his march, waiting for ſome colourable pretence to break the treaty lately concluded with the Rhegians. With this view having drawn all his forces together, as if he intended to leave Italy, he deſired the Rhegians to ſupply his army with proviſions, promiſing to defray the charges they ſhould be at aſſoon as he got to Syracuſe. His deſign in this was, that if they refuſed to ſupply him he might have a pretence to attack their city anew; and if they complied with his demand, after their proviſions were all ſpent, he might eaſily poſſeſs himſelf of the place. The Rhegians not ſuſpecting his deſign, ſupplied him for ſome days very plentifully. But as he put off his departure from day to day, ſometimes pretending ſickneſs, at other times alledging other frivolous excuſes, they at length ſaw into his real deſign, and forbore ſending him any further proviſions. Hereupon Dionyſius, pretending to be highly affronted, ſent them back their hoſtages, and beſieged them again with all his forces. Both parties acted with the utmoſt vigor. The deſire of revenge on one ſide, and the fear of inhuman cruelties on the other, animated the troops. The Rhegians were under the command of Phyto, an officer of long experience and extraordinary valour. He made frequent ſallies, in one of which Dionyſius, while he was encouraging his troops to ſtand their ground, was ſo dangerouſly wounded that his life was deſpaired of. However, he recovered, and renewed the ſiege, with more fury than ever, the walls trembling all round the city at the repeated ſhocks of almoſt innumerable warlike engines, no otherwiſe, as our hiſtorian expreſſes it, than as if they had been ſhaken by a dreadful earthquake. But notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts of the aggreſſors, the ſiege went on but very ſlowly, their works being often demoliſhed and their engines burnt by the beſieged, who in each ſally gained very conſiderable advantages. Thus they held out for the ſpace of eleven months againſt the whole force of Dionyſius, but were at length for want of proviſions reduced to the utmoſt extremity. A buſhel of wheat was sold for five minas, (that is 15 l. 12 s. 6 d.) and the famine was so great, that after they had consumed all their horses and beasts of burden, they supported themselves with boiled skins and leather; which also failing, they daily went out of the town to feed, like beasts, on the grass that grew under the walls. But Dionysius, to deprive them even of this poor support, sent his horses under a strong guard to graze where they used to feed. The besieged being thus overcome by famine were at length forced to surrender at discretion. Dionysius himself when he entered the city was struck with terror, finding every-where heaps of dead bodies lying in the streets, and those who survived rather skeletons than men. However, he got together about six thousand prisoners, whom he sent to Syracuse, where such as were not able to redeem themselves with a mina, were sold for slaves. Dionysius vented his rage and revenge chiefly on the brave Phyto, who had made so gallant a defence; he caused his son to be thrown headlong into the sea and drowned. The next day he ordered Phyto to be loaded with chains, and fastened to the top of one of his highest engines, that he might be exposed to the view of the whole army. In that condition he sent one of his guards to tell him that his son had been drowned the day before; Then the son, replied Phyto, is by one day happier than the father. He afterwards caused him to be whipt through the city, and undergo innumerable other cruelties, whilst a crier walking before him proclaimed, that the perfidious traitor was treated in that manner, for having stirred up the people of Rhegium to war. But Phyto, with an undaunted courage, cried out, that he thus suffered, because he would not betray his country to a tyrant. His heroic behaviour, and the indignities he suffered, raised compassion even in the breast of the tyrant's soldiers, who began to mutiny, and would have rescued him, had not Dionysius immediately ordered him to be thrown into the sea. Thus suffered a man, whose probity, courage, and disinterested zeal for the good of his country, deserved a more glorious end. His death was lamented by all the Greeks, and became the subject of many elegant and affecting elegies [h].

DIONYSIUS after the taking of Rhegium allowed both himſelf and his troops ſome reſpite. In the intervals of leiſure he loved to unbend his mind with the ſtudy of the liberal arts and ſciences, eſpecially of poetry, piquing himſelf upon the excellence of his genius and the elegancy of his performances. As he excelled all others in power, ſo, in his own conceit, he ſurpaſſed them in wit and humour, and was more pleaſed to hear his poetical compoſures commended, than his victories and conqueſts. The flatterers, who abounded in his as in all other courts, greatly contributed to the high opinion he had of himſelf, crying his poems up to the ſkies, and preferring them to the works of all who had wrote before him. He often uſed to invite the learned men and poets of that age to dine at his table, and on that occaſion never failed to entertain them with ſome new compoſition of his own, which always met with great approbation; all was great, noble, majeſtic, and divine. Philoxenus was the only one who attempted to undeceive him in the favourable opinion he had of his own abilities, but narrowly eſcaped paying dear for his ſincerity. As Philoxenus was himſelf an excellent poet, Dionyſius one day, after having read to him ſome of his verſes, preſſed him to give his opinion of them, which he doing with great freedom, Dionyſius, aſcribing the liberty he had taken to envy, commanded his guards to carry the poet forthwith to the quarries or common jail; however, he was the next day, at the earneſt entreaties of all Dionyſius's friends, ſet at liberty and reſtored to favour. On this occaſion Dionyſius, as it were to ratify the pardon, made a noble entertainment, inviting to it all his own and the poet's friends. When the gueſts began to be merry, the prince did not fail to recite ſome verſes he had lately made, chuſing out ſome lines, which he had taken extraordinary pains in compoſing, and looked upon as maſter-ſtrokes, as was apparent from the ſelf-ſatisfaction he expreſſed in rehearſing them. As he ſet a great value on Philoxenus's approbation, who was not apt to be laviſh of his praiſes, he deſired him again to diveſt himſelf of all envy, and ſpeak his real ſentiments. What had paſſed the day before might have ſerved as a leſſon for the poet; but he could not diſſemble, and therefore, without making any anſwer to Dionyſius, he turned to the guards, who always ſtood round the table, and with a ſerious, but humourous, air, deſired them to carry him back to the quarries. This pleaſantry

Dionyſius

Dionysius took in good part, saying, that the wit of the poet had atoned for his freedom. Antiphon, finding that Dionysius was pleased with witty expressions, told him several truths in a very humourous manner, which he took no offence at; but having one day provoked him with too biting a jest, he paid dear for it. The prince in a conversation, asked which was the best kind of brass, to which question Antiphon answered, that the best brass was that of which the statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton were made. These were two famous patriots, who had defended the liberty of their country against the tyranny of Pisistratus's sons [i].

Dionysius, notwithstanding, all Philoxenus had said to undeceive him, still fancied himself the best poet of his age, and sent his brother Thearides to the Olympic games, to dispute, in his name, the prizes of poetry and the the chariot-races. When Thearides arrived at Olympia, the richness and number of his chariots, the extraordinary magnificence of his pavilion embroidered with gold and silver, and the sumptuous apparel of his numerous attendants, attracted the eyes and admiration of all the spectators. Their ears were no less charmed at first when the poems of Dionysius began to be read. He had chosen for that purpose persons of sweet and harmonious voices, who were heard far and distinctly, and knew how to give a just emphasis to the verses they repeated. But when that numerous assembly began to mind no more the delivery, but the sense and composition, they all burst out in a loud laugh, and hissed them off the stage, and even, to express their indignation, tore the rich pavilion in pieces. Lysias, the celebrated orator, who was then at Olympia, undertook to prove, that it was inconsistent with the honour of Greece and sacredness of the sports, to admit such an impious tyrant to share in those diversions. This speech was stiled the Olympic Oration. When the races began, Dionysius's chariots were either by an headlong impetuosity diven out of the place, or dashed in pieces against one another. Neither did the vessel, which carried Thearides and his retinue prosper better, being by a violent storm driven on the coast of Tarentum, whence with much ado they got to Syracuse. Upon their return they ascribed all the misfortunes they had met with, both by sea and land, to the badneſs of Dionyſius verſes. But that did not cure him of his folly, or, as the hiſtorian ſtiles it, of his madneſs for verſification; he entertained the ſame high opinion of his poetical vein, aſcribing ſuch injurious treatment to envy, and ſaying, that they would one day admire what they then deſpiſed. He ſent his poems a ſecond time to Olympia, here they were treated with the ſame contempt as before; which threw him into a deep melancholy and kind of madneſs. This grew daily upon him, till at length he fancied that even his beſt friends were plotting againſt his life and reputation, crying out like a phrenetic, that every one envyed him, that both friends and foes conſpired to his ruin. In theſe fits of melancholy and madneſs, he put many of his friends to death, and baniſhed others; among the latter were Leptines his brother and Philiſtus, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his power. They retired to Thurium in Italy, whence they were ſoon recalled and re-inſtated in their former places of power and authority [k].

To remove his melancholy for the ill ſucceſs of his verſes, he had again recourſe to arms, and formed a deſign of driving the Carthaginians quite out of Sicily. But as he wanted money for ſo expenſive an undertaking, he reſolved to attack Epirus, and make himſelf maſter of the immenſe treaſures, which had been for many ages amaſſing in the temple of Delphos. With this view he ſettled powerful colonies in that part of Italy which faces Greece, and made an alliance with the Illyrians, ſending them two thouſand men and a great quantity of arms, to be employed againſt the Moloſſians, with whom they were then at war. But the Illyrians afterwards falling out with Dionyſius, on account of his building the city of Lyſſus in the iſland of Pharos, he laid aſide for the preſent all thoughts of plundering the temple of Delphos, and purſued another project of the ſame kind, which he eaſily accompliſhed. For having fitted out threeſcore gallies, under colour of clearing the ſeas of pyrates, he made a deſcent in Hetruria, and plundered a rich temple in the ſuburbs of Agylla, carrying away, beſides the rich moveables and furniture, above a thouſand talents in money. Five hundred talents more he raiſed by the ſale of the ſpoils, and with this money money set on foot a numerous army, and made other preparations, as if he intended to attempt again the reduction of the Greek cities in Italy. But the Carthaginians suspecting his real design, upon the first notice they had of these extraordinary preparations, sent Mago over into Sicily with a powerful army. Dionysius attacked him soon after he was landed, killed him with ten thousand of his men, took five thousand prisoners, and forced the rest to save themselves on a neighbouring hill, where he surrounded them on all sides, and brought them to such straits that they were forced to sue for a peace. Dionysius answered the embassadors they sent him with great haughtiness, that there was only one way left for them to make peace with him, and that was, forthwith to evacuate Sicily, and to defray all the expences of the war. The Carthaginians pretended to accept the peace on the terms it was offered, but representing that it was not in their power to deliver up the cities they possessed in Sicily, without the express orders of their republic, they obtained a truce, which was to last till the return of an express sent to Carthage. During this interval they buried Mago with great pomp and magnificence, and appointed his son to command the troops in his room. This new general, who was very young, but had on all occasions given proofs of an extraordinary valour and prudence, in the time of the truce raised and disciplined new troops, and improved so well the short time which was allowed him, that at the return of the express from Carthage he took the field, gave the enemy battle, and killed above fourteen thousand Syracusans on the spot, and among the rest Leptines, Dionysius's brother, who was greatly regretted even by those who hated the tyrant. He was a brave and experienced officer, and though ever faithful to Dionysius, yet an enemy to all manner of oppression. Dionysius with the remains of his shattered army fled to Syracuse, where he expected to be soon besieged by the victorious enemy. But the Carthaginian general used his victory with great moderation, and, instead of pursuing the routed enrmy, retired to Panormus, whence he sent embassadors to Dionysius offering him terms of peace, which he readily embraced; and a treaty was concluded on the following conditions, viz. that both parties should keep what they had at the breaking out of the war, save only that Dionysius should deliver up to the Carthaginians the city and territory of Selinus, and part of the territory territory of Agrigentum, and besides pay a thousand talents to defray the expences of the war [l].

A VICTORY of a very different kind made amends, or at least lessened his concern, for the ill success of his arms; he had caused a tragedy wrote by himself to be acted at Athens, for the prize of poetry at the celebrated feast of Bacchus, and was proclaimed victor. As the Athenians were the best judges of this kind of literature, and no-ways biassed in favour of Dionysius, who had on all occasions assisted the Lacedæmonians, we cannot help thinking, that the contemptuous sentence passed upon his poems in the Olympic games was chiefly owing to the hatred and aversion, which the spectators bore him. But, however that be, Dionysius received the news of his victory with such transports of joy as are not to be expressed; he amply rewarded the person that brought him the agreeable tidings, caused costly sacrifices to be offered to the gods, and, believing himself arrived at the highest pitch of glory, set no bounds to his generosity; he entertained the whole city with extraordinary magnificence, and spent an immense treasure in public feasts and banquets, which lasted several days. On this occasion Dionysius drinking to excess and overcharging nature, a fault which he had never before been guilty of, was seized with violent pains, which were attended with uneasy and restless nights. Having therefore asked of his physicians a soporative, they gave him so strong a dose as quite stupified his senses, and laid him in a sleep, out of which he never awaked. He had been formerly forewarned by an oracle, that he should die when he had overcome those who were better than himself. This prediction he applied to the Carthaginians, who were more powerful than himself; and therefore would never own that he had gained any victory over them, but used to say, that the advantage, all things well considered, was pretty equal on both sides. However, he could not avoid his destiny, says the historian; for though he was but a bad poet, yet, in the opinion of the Athenians, he gained the victory over those who far excelled him in that art [m]. He died after he had reigned thirty-eight years. An account of Dionysius's death.

Dionysius was, without all doubt, a prince of extraordinary abilities, both in his political and military capacity, having raised himself, in spight of the utmost efforts of a pow- His character.

erful people, from a mean condition to ſo high a ſtation, and tranſmitted the ſovereignty to a ſucceſſor of his own iſſue and election, who, notwithſtanding the ſlenderneſs of his parts, held it for the ſpace of twelve years. This ſhews, that Dionyſius had eſtabliſhed his power and authority upon a ſolid foundation, which could not be effected, in a city ſo fond of liberty, without great prudence and forecaſt. But what abilities could atone for the vices, which rendered him the object of the public hatred? His ambition knew no bounds; his avarice ſpared not the moſt ſacred perſons or places; and his cruelty, when awaked by jealouſy or ſuſpicion, made no diſtinction between friend and foe. He deſpiſed not only his fellow creatures, but the gods themſelves, glorying in his open and profeſſed impiety, whereof the antients relate the following inſtances. On his return from Locris, where he had plundered the temple of Proſerpine, the wind being favourable, he turned to his friends, and with a contemptuous ſmile, See, ſaid he, how the immortal gods favour the ſacrilegious[n]. Being in great want of money to carry on the war againſt the Carthaginians, he rifled the temple of Jupiter, and amongſt other things ſtript the god of a robe of gold, which Hiero had preſented him with out of the ſpoils of the Carthaginians, ſaying, that a robe of gold was too heavy in ſummer and too cold in winter, and at the ſame time ordered one of wool to be thrown over the god's ſhoulders, adding, that ſuch an habit would be far more proper for all ſeaſons. He ordered the golden beard of Æſculapius to be taken off, ſaying, that it was very inconſiſtent for the ſon to have a beard, when the father had none; for Apollo is always repreſented as a beardleſs young man[o]. Several of the ſtatues of the gods held cups and crowns of gold in their hands, which he made no ſcruple to carry off, ſaying, that the gods offered them to him, and that it was very ſimple to be continually importuning the gods for good things, and then refuſe them when they themſelves preſented them to their votaries. Theſe ſpoils were by orders carried to the market-place, and there ſold by auction. But the very next day pretending to be ſorry for having plundered the temples, he cauſed a proclamation to be iſſued, commanding all thoſe, who had any thing in their cuſtody belonging to the immortal gods, to reſtore it to the the templeswithin a limited time; but did not himſelf return the money to the buyers.

THE amazing precautions, which he made uſe of to ſecure his life, ſhew both his ſuſpicious temper, and the inquietude to which he was abandoned. He never harangued the people but from the top of a high tower. Not daring to truſt his friends and neareſt relations, he committed the guard of his perſon to ſlaves and foreigners, and, though ſurrounded by theſe, ſcarce ever ventured out of his palace [p]. A jeſt, that eſcaped his barber, who boaſted in a merry humour that he often held a razor at the king's throat, being related to Dionyſius coſt the man his life, and from that time he employed his daughters, then very young, in that mean office. When they were grown up, he did not care to truſt them with razors or ſciſſars, but only allowed them nut-ſhells, and at laſt was reduced by his apprehenſions to do that office himſelf. He never went into the appartment of his wives before it was ſearched with the utmoſt care, leſt any weapons ſhould lie there concealed. His bed was ſurrounded with a deep broad trench, and a drawbridge over it. After having faſtened the doors of his apartment with ſtrong bolts, he drew up the bridge, and then took ſome reſt, which was interrupted by the leaſt noiſe he heard, either in the ſtreets or his palace. Neither his ſon nor his brother were admitted to his preſence, without being ſearched by the guards and obliged to change their garments [q]. Thus at the height of his grandeur he led a more miſerable life than the meaneſt of his ſlaves, as he himſelf ingeniouſly owned (A).

(A) As one of his courtiers, named Damocles, was perpetually repeating that never was man happier than Dionyſius, and extolling the magnificence of his palaces, the extent of his dominions, the number of his troops, the richneſs of his treaſures, &c. Dionyſius aſked him whether he would for a ſhort time have a taſte of his happineſs? Damocles accepted the offer with joy, and, being invited to dinner by Dionyſius, was accordingly placed on a bed of gold, covered with carpets of an ineſtimable value; the table was ſpread with dainties of all ſorts and the moſt beautiful ſlaves in pompous habits ordered to wait on Damocles, and watch the leaſt ſignal to ſerve him. The courtier was tranſported with joy, and ſaid, that if he could always live in that manner he ſhould look upon himſelf as the happieſt of mortals. He had ſcarce ſpoke, when, unfortunately caſting,

His good qualities.

Dionysius was, without all doubt, an ambitious and inhuman tyrant; but at the same time had some good qualities, which ought not to be disguised or misrepresented, the impartiality of an historian requiring that justice should be done to the most wicked. The kindness and respect which he ever shewed for his two wives (B); the mildness with which he suffered the freedom of young Dion (C); the casting up his eyes, he beheld over his head a naked sword hanging from the ceiling by a single horse hair. At this sight he was immediately taken with a cold sweat; every thing disappeared in an instant, except the sword; he could think of nothing else; and the danger, he was threatened with, throwing him into agonies of death, he desired permission to retire, declaring he would be happy no langer. A lively representation of the unhappy life, which a tyrant must lead, when hated by his subjects (32).

(B) Dionysius married two wives at the same time, viz. Doris and Aristomache; Doris was the daughter of one of the most illustrious citizens of Locris in Italy, whence he caused her to be brought in a quinqueremis, adorned in a most magnificent manner. Aristomache was the daughter of Hipparinus, the most wealthy and powerful citizen of Syracuse, and sister of the celebrated Dion. She was brought to the royal palace in a chariot drawn by four white horses, which was at that time a mark of great distinction. The nuptials of both were solemnized the same day, with universal rejoicings throughout the whole city. Dionysius, to remove all causes of discord, shewed an equal affection for both. But the Locrian had the good fortune to bring him the first son, who succeeded him. Aristomache after some years bore him two sons, viz. Hipparinus and Nisæus, and two daughters, Sophrosine and Arete. Sophrosine married Dionysius the eldest son of the Locrian, and Arete first Theorides the brother of Dionysius, and afterwards Dion.

(C) Dion was in great esteem and favour with Dionysius, to whom he was first introduced by his sister Aristomache, but afterwards recommended by his own merit. Amongst the other marks Dionysius gave him of his confidence, he ordered his treasurers to supply him with whatever money he should demand, provided they informed him the same day they paid it. But Dion, notwithstanding the kindness shewn him by the tyrant, used to speak to him with a great deal of freedom. Dionysius ridiculing one day the government of Gelon, and saying, in allusion to his name, that he had been the laughing stock of Sicily, that being the import of the Greek word γελως, all the courtiers highly applauded the commendation he beſtowed on his own ſiſter Theſta, for the bold and generous anſwer ſhe made him on account of her huſband's flight, as we have related above; his obliging and inſinuating behaviour towards the Syracuſans on ſeveral occaſions, and the familiarity, with which he condeſcended to converſe with the meaneſt citizens, and even workmen, convince us, that he had more equity, moderation, and generoſity than is commonly aſcribed to him. In ſhort, he was a tyrant, but not ſo inhuman, as many who have reigned ſince his time.

DIONYSIUS had three children by his wife Doris the Locrian, and four by Ariſtomache the ſiſter of Dion, whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention in the following reign. When no hopes was left of Dionyſius's life, Dion took upon him to ſpeak in favour of his children by Ariſtomache, inſinuating, that it was juſt to prefer the iſſue of a Syracuſan to that of a ſtranger. But the phyſicians, deſirous to make their court to young Dionyſius, the ſon of Doris, who had been brought up for the throne, did not give the father time to alter his reſolution, diſpatching him in the manner we have related above; ſo that Dionyſius, ſirnamed the younger, peaceably aſcended his father's throne. After he had performed his father's funeral with the utmoſt magnificence, he aſſembled the people, and promiſed to purſue, with regard to his ſubjects, quite different meaſures from thoſe which had been practiſed in the preceding reign. The gentle and humane diſpoſition of the young Dionyſius made the Syracuſians believe that they ſhould live happy under his government; whereas they were well appriſed, that if they attempted a change, the ſad conſequences of a civil war would involve the ſtate in endleſs calamities. On theſe conſiderations, notwithſtanding their paſſion for applauded the wit of that conceit, or rather pun, flat and inſipid as it was. But Dion took it in a different manner, and had the freedom to tell Dionyſius, that he was in the wrong to talk in that manner of a prince whoſe wiſe and equitable conduct had exhibited an excellent form of government, and given the Syracuſans a favourable opinion of monarchy. You reign ſaid he, and have been truſted for Gelon's ſake; but on your account no man will ever be truſted after you. This Dionyſius took in good part, without ſhewing the leaſt reſentment (33).

His Character.

liberty, they suffered him to take quiet possession of the throne, as of a lawful inheritance. He was of a quite different character from his father, being as peaceable and calm in his temper, as the other was active and enterprizing; which would have been no disadvantage to his subjects, had that mildness and moderation been the effect of a wise and judicious understanding, and not of a certain natural sloth and indolence. He was naturally inclined to virtue, and averse from all violence and cruelty, had a taste for arts and sciences, and took great delight in conversing with men of learning. Whence it is plain, that he would have proved a good prince, had an early and proper care been taken to cultivate the happy disposition which he brought into the world with him. But his father, to whom all merit, even in his own children, gave umbrage, stifled in him every noble and elevated sentiment by a mean and obscure education. He no sooner ascended the throne, but Dion, who was well acquainted with his temper and good disposition, undertook to correct the faults of his low education, and inspire him with thoughts suitable to the high station he was placed in. Dion was, as we have hinted already, the son of Hipparinus, the most illustrious citizen of Syracuse, and brother of Aristomache the wife of Dionysius the elder. In his early years he contracted an intimate acquaintance and friendship with Plato (D), and so improved by his lessons, that that great philosopher in one of his letters gives this glorious testimony of him; that he had never met with a young man, on whom his discourses made so great an impression, or who had embraced his principles with so much ardour. Diodorus speaks of him as one of the greatest men Sicily, or any other country, ever produced. And indeed it is not easy to find so many excellent qualities in one and the same person, perſon, as were centered in Dion. But to return to Dionyſius; in the very beginning of his reign, as he had been kept under great reſtraint by his father, he abandoned himſelf to all manner of diverſions and ſhameful pleaſures. He was ſcarce ſeated on the throne, when he made an entertainment, or rather a debauch, which continued for three months together, during all which time his palace, ſhut againſt all perſons of any ſobriety, was crouded with debauchees, and reſounded with nothing but low buffoonery, obſcene jeſts, lewd ſongs, dances, maſquerades, &c. As Dion believed, that this was the effect of his bad education and intire ignorance of his duty, he rightly conceived, that the beſt remedy would be to introduce to him perſons of good ſenſe, virtue, and learning, whoſe agreeable converſation might at once inſtruct and divert him, for the young prince was endowed with good natural parts, and took delight in converſing with philoſophers. With this view Dion often talked to him of Plato, as the moſt profound of all the philoſophers, whoſe merit he was well acquainted with, and to whom he was indebted for all he knew. He enlarged on the elevation of his genius, the extent of his knowledge, the amiableneſs of his character, and the charms of his converſation. He repreſented him as the man moſt capable of any to form him in the arts of governing, upon which his own happineſs, and that of his ſubjects depended, &c. Theſe diſcourſes well-timed inflamed the young prince with a deſire of ſeeing that celebrated philoſopher, and improving by his converſation. He wrote to him in the moſt obliging manner, inviting him to his court, and diſpatched expreſs after expreſs to haſten his journey. But Plato, mindful of the treatment he had met with at his father's court, could not prevail upon himſelf to comply with his invitation. All the Pythagorean philoſophers of Sicily and Italy joined their intreaties with the prince's; and Dion with repeated letters never ceaſed to importune him, till at length he promiſed to return into Sicily, and attend the young prince's education.

(D) He was first acquainted with Plato at the court of Dionysius the elder, who invited him into Sicily, and for some time professed a great kindness for him. But at length taking offence at his freedom, he ordered him to be carried into the common market-place, and there sold as a slave for five minas: But some philosophers of the same sect redeemed him, and sent him back to Greece with this friendly advice; that philosophers should very seldom converse with tyrants, and when they did, they should be of a winning behaviour (34).

Dionyſius ſends for Plato.

THIS reſolution highly diſpleaſed the reſt of the courtiers, who dreading the preſence of Plato, of which they foreſaw the conſequences, united againſt him as their common enemy. They were for the moſt part young unexperienced debauchees, perſons of no merit, and of moſt abandoned characters. Wherefore they rightly judged, that if all things were to be meaſured according to the ſtandard of true merit, which was one of Plato's maxims, they could lay no claim to any honours, nor expect any favour. The were not able to prevent Plato's voyage, but raiſed a ſtrong battery to render it ineffectual, by perſwading Dionyſius to recal Philiſtus from baniſhment, who was an experienced officer, and a zealous aſſertor of tyranny. They hoped to find a counterpoiſe in him to Plato and all his philoſophy. For Philiſtus was not only a brave commander, but a man of extraordinary parts and uncommon learning. He wrote the hiſtory of Sicily, as we have hinted elſewhere, and is honoured by Tully with the title of Thucydides the ſecond.

Plato arrives at Syracuſe.

Plato on his arrival was received with the higheſt marks of honour and reſpect; at his landing he found one of the prince's chariots, with horſes richly capariſoned, ready to attend him: and the prince no ſooner heard that he was landed, but he commanded a ſolemn ſacrifice to be offered in thankſgiving to the gods, for having ſent him a man of ſo great merit and wiſdom. Plato found Dionyſius in the moſt happy diſpoſition imaginable, and enflamed with an eager deſire of profiting by his precepts. The philoſopher, by adapting himſelf with wonderful addreſs to the young prince's humour, and gaining his confidence and affection, in a very ſhort time wrought a ſurprizing change in his mind. He had abandoned himſelf till then to idleneſs, pleaſure, and luxury, and was ignorant of all the duties of his character, the inevitable conſequence of a diſconſolate life. But, now awaked, as it were, from a lethargy, he began to have ſome reliſh for virtue, and to taſte the refined pleaſure of a blameleſs life. The courtiers, who never fail to ape the prince, ſeemed to fall in with his inclinations, and, laying aſide the frivolous amuſements of a court, applied themſelves to the ſtudy of philoſophy, as the only means to preferment.

Conſpiracy of the courtiers againſt Dion.

Philistus and his party were greatly alarmed at the ſudden change they obſerved in Dionyſius, and judging from ſome expreſſions he let drop, that Plato might at laſt induce him to reſign the tyranny, uſed all poſſible means to work him out of favour. They began by turning into ridicule the retired life, which Dionyſius led with Plato. Nor was that all; they attempted to render the zeal of Plato and Dion ſuſpected, by giving out, that Dion made uſe of Plato as a proper tool to draw Dionyſius into a voluntary reſignation of the crown, that he might place it it on the head of his nephew, the ſon of Ariſtomache. The Athenians, ſaid they, formerly invaded Sicily with a mighty fleet and a formidable army, without being able to ſubvert the government of Syracuſe; and ſhall now an idle caviller from Athens, an unintelligible ſophiſt, attain that point, and perſuade Dionyſius to renounce a real and ſubſtantial felicity, conſiſting in empire, riches, pleaſures, &c. for a pretended ſupreme good to be found in the academy? Such repeated diſcourſes raiſed in the mind of Dionyſius ſome ſuſpicion of Dion, as if he really deſigned to eſtabliſh his nephew in the ſovereignty. The fears of Dionyſius were carefully fomented by the enemies of Dion, who were perpetually adviſing the prince to take proper meaſures for the ſecurity of his life and throne. They even feigned a letter, which they ſhewed to Dionyſius, pretending, that it had been wrote by Dion to the Carthaginians. As this letter contained ſeveral articles of treaſon, Dionyſius flew into a violent paſſion, and having conſulted with Phiſtus what meaſures he ſhould take, by his advice diſſembling his reſentment, he led Dion alone to the ſea-ſide below the citadel, where he ſhewed him the letter, and accuſed him of entering into a league with his enemies the Carthaginians. Dion might have eaſily juſtified himſelf, but the king refuſed to hear him, commanding him immediately to go on board a veſſel, which lay there ready with orders to carry him to the coaſt of Italy and leave him there [s]. Dion baniſhed.

Such an unjuſt treatment raiſed great clamours in Syracuſe, and the whole city declared againſt it. Dionyſius, who apprehended the conſequences of the public diſcontent, in order to appeaſe it in ſome degree, allowed Dion's relations two veſſels to tranſport to him in Peloponneſus, whither he had retired, his riches and numerous retinue, for he lived with as much grandeur as a king [t]. Aſſoon as Dion was gone, Dionyſius made Plato change his habitation and remove into the citadel, in appearance to do him more honour, but in reality to aſſure himſelf of his perſon, and to prevent him from joining Dion. However, he continued to ſhew him an extraordinary kindneſs, and, out of a fooliſh jealouſy, offered him all his treaſures, provided he would prefer his friendſhip to that of Dion's. In the mean time, a war breaking out, Dionyſius reſtored Plato to his liberty, and even gave him liberty to return home. At his departure, he would have loaded him with preſents, which Plato refuſed, refused, only begging that he would recall Dion. Dionysius promised to restore him the following spring, but did not keep his word, and only sent him the revenues of his estate, desiring Plato, in a letter he wrote to him, to excuse his breach of promise, and to impute it to the war. He assured him, that, assoon as he put an end to the war, Dion should be recalled, upon condition that he did not meddle with public affairs, nor in the mean time lessen him in the opinion of the Greeks. For Dion during his banishment visited most of the cities of Greece, and was every-where received with extraordinary marks of distinction. The Lacedæmonians made him free of their city, without regard to the resentment of Dionysius, who at that very time assisted them with a very powerful supply in their war with the Thebans. Athens, which he chose for the place of his residence, paid him the highest honours, all the inhabitants of that illustrious city striving, as it were, to outdo each other in giving him instances of their esteem and affection. This alarmed the tyrant's jealousy, who put a stop to the remittance of Dion's revenues, ordering them to be paid into his own treasury [u]. Such a resolution obliged Dion, who had hitherto lived quietly at Athens, to take another course, as we shall see anon.

Plato returns to Sicily.

Dionysius having put an end to the war he was engaged in, of which no particulars have been transmitted to us, was again inflamed with a desire of seeing and hearing Plato, and accordingly prevailed upon Archytas and the other Pythagorean philosophers to write to him, and assure him, that he might return with safety, and that upon his return the promises which had been made him should be punctually performed. The philosophers deputed Archidemus to Plato, and Dionysius sent at the same time two triremes with several of his friends on board to sollicit his compliance. He also wrote letters to him with his own hand, wherein he declared, that if he refused to return into Sicily, Dion should receive no favours at his hands, but if he complied with his request, the exile should be immediately restored. Plato was very unwilling to trust himself anew to the tyrant's mercy and fickle temper, but could not resist the warm solicitations of Dion's friends; he therefore set out for Sicily the third time, being then in the seventieth year of his age. Dionysius received him with inexpressible joy, appointed him the best apartment of his palace, and and ſuffered him to have free acceſs to him at all hours without being ſearched, a favour not granted to his beſt friends. The philoſopher, ſeeing that Dionyſius repoſed an entire truſt in him, entered upon Dion's affair with him, which was the chief motive of his voyage. But the tyrant put it off, and in the mean time endeavoured, by heaping all manner of honours ſon Plato, to leſſen his eſteem and regard for Dion. The philoſopher diſſembled on his ſide, and, though extremely offended at ſo notorious a breach of faith, carefully concealed his diſſatisfaction. However, he could give over ſoliciting in behalf of his friend, which at length ſo exaſperated the tyrant, that all on a ſudden he ordered Plato to remove from his appartment in the palace to another without the caſtle, where his guards were quartered (E). Theſe had long hated Plato, becauſe he had adviſed Dionyſius to diſmiſs them, and live without any other guard but the love of his people. But Dionyſius reſtrained their fury, forbidding them on pain of death to moleſt his gueſt. When Archyas, who was then prætor or chief magiſtrate of Tarentum, heard of the danger Plato was in, he immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to Dionyſius to remind him, that Plato came to Syracuſe only upon his promiſe, and on the promiſe of all the Pythagorean philoſophers, who had engaged for his ſafety, wherefore he could not detain him againſt his will, nor offer him any inſult, without a manifeſt breach of faith. This remonſtrance awaked a ſenſe of ſhame in the tyrant, who at length gave Plato leave to return into Greece. Upon his departure Dionyſius, throwing off all reſtraint, abandoned himſelf to the moſt ſhameful vices, ſetting no bounds to his avarice, cruelty, rapin, &c. [w].

Diſgraced by Dionyſius.

NOT long after Plato had left Sicily, Dionyſius ordered all Dion's lands and effects to be ſold, and applied the money

(E) A few days before Dionyſius and Plato fell out, one Helicon of Cyzicum, a particular friend of Plato's, foretold an eclipſe of the ſun, which happening according to his prediction. Dionyſius was ſo much ſurprized at it, that he made him a preſent of a talent. Ariſtippus, jeſting upon that occaſion, ſaid, that he likewiſe had ſome very extraordinary to foretel, and being preſſed to explain himſelf, I propheſy, ſaid he, that it will not be long ere Dionyſius and Plato, who at preſent ſeem to be great friends, will be enemies (34).

money to his own uſe; neither did he ſtop here, but gave his half-ſiſter Arete, whom Dion had married after the death of Theorides, in marriage to Timocrates, one of his friends and flatterers. So unworthy a treatment Dion could not brook, and therefore from that moment reſolved to attack the tyrant with open force, and revenge all the wrongs done him. Plato, out of a ſcrupulous regard to the duties of hoſpitality, did all that lay in his power to divert him from ſuch a reſolution; but on the other hand Speuſippus, Plato's nephew, with whom Dion had contracted a particular friendſhip during his abode at Athens, encouraged him to purſue ſo noble a deſign, and reſtore Sicily to its antient freedom. All the reſt of Dion's friends were of the ſame opinion, and many of the chief citizens of Syracuſe continually importuned him to come thither, deſiring him not to be in pain for want of ſhips or forces, but to imbark on the firſt veſſel he met with, and only lend his name to the friends of liberty. Dion did not delay any longer, but, withdrawing from his retired life, undertook the delivery of his country, which implored his protection. No enterprize was ever formed with more boldneſs, or conducted with more prudence. He began to raiſe foreign troops privately by proper agents, for the better concealment of his deſign. Many perſons of diſtinction, who were at the head of affairs, entered into his meaſures, and gave him notice of whatever was tranſacted in Sicily. But of the exiles, who were above a thouſand, diſperſed up and down Sicily and Greece, only twenty-five joined him; ſo much were they awed by the dread of the tyrant. The iſland of Zacynthus was the place of the rendezvous, where the troops aſſembled to the number of about eight hundred, all tried on many occaſions, well diſciplined, and capable of animating with their example the forces, which Dion hoped to find in Sicily. When they were to ſet ſail, Dion acquainted them with his deſign, which till that time he had concealed from the common ſoldiers. The boldneſs of the undertaking occaſioned at firſt no ſmall conſternation; but Dion ſoon removed their fears by telling them, that he did not lead them in this expedition as ſoldiers but as officers, to put them at the head of the Syracuſans and all the people of Sicily, who were ready to receive them with open arms. Dion, before he ſet out from Zacynthus, offered a ſolemn ſacrifice to Apollo, and gave a grand entertainment to his ſmall army, which was now impatient to proceed on their voyage, and begin the great work of delivering Sicily from tyranny and oppreſſion. The next day they imbarked on board two trading veſſels, and put to ſea with loud ſhouts of joy, as if they had already dethroned the tyrant. Who could imagine, ſays our hiſtorian, that a man with two ſmall veſſels, ſhould ever dare to attack a prince, who had under his command four hundred gallies, an hundred thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe, with magazines of proviſions, and treaſures ſufficient to pay and maintain them? But no force is able to defend a prince, who is not guarded by the affection of his people, as the event of this undertaking will ſhew [x].

Dion, after having been twelve days at ſea, arrived with his ſmall body of troops at cape Pachynum, where their pilot adviſed them to land immediately leſt they ſhould be overtaken by a violent hurricane, which threatened them. But Dion, not thinking it ſafe to land ſo near the enemy, ordered him to put to ſea again, and double the cape, which they had no ſooner done, than a furious ſtorm attended with rain, thunder, and lightning, drove them on the eaſtern coaſt of Afric, where they were in great danger of being daſhed to pieces againſt the rocks; but luckily for them the wind changing all on a ſudden, they ſtood out to ſea for Sicily, and with a favourable wind entered the port of Minoa, not far from Agrigentum. This city was then in the hands of the Carthaginians, and governed by one Synalus, or, as Diodorus calls him, Paralus, Dion's particular friend. They were therefore kindly received, and would have ſtaid there ſome days to refreſh themſelves after the fatigues of their voyage, had they not received advice, that Dionyſius had ſome days before embarked for Italy, attended with fourſcore gallies. Dion, to take advantage of his abſence, immediately ſet out for Syracuſe, and on his march prevailed upon the Agrigentines, Geleans, Camarineans, and other cities to join him. He no ſooner entered the Syracuſan territories, but multitudes flocked to him from all parts, every one looking upon him as the deliverer of their country. When he arrived at the Anapus he ordered his troops to halt, and there offered a ſacrifice to the tutelary gods of Syracuſe; which being performed, he called an aſſembly of all the Syracuſans in his camp.

camp, and after having acquainted him with his design, which was to restore them to their liberty and suppress tyranny, he desired them to name a general, who should be entrusted with the whole conduct of their enterprize. The multitude cried out with one voice, that Dion and his brother Megacles should be generals, and invested them with absolute power and command. The new generals without delay drew up their army in battalia, and marched straight to the city, where they were received at the gates by the most considerable of the inhabitants in white habits. As no body appeared to oppose them, they boldly entered the city, and marched through Acradina to the forum, where they encamped, being in all above fifty thousand men. Here Dion ordered the trumpets to sound to appease the noise and tumult; and silence being made, an herald proclaimed, that Dion and Megacles were come to abolish tyranny, and to free the people of Syracuse and their allies from the yoke of the tyrant. At these words the whole city resounded with joyful shouts and acclamations for so sudden and unexpected an happiness. They had lived fifty years in slavery, and saw themselves by the valour of one man, restored to their liberty, when they least expected so happy a change. Where-ever Dion passed, the citizens, having set out on both sides of the streets tables and bowls, and prepared victims, as he came before their house, threw all sorts of flowers upon him, addressing vows and prayers to him as to a god. Dion seeing himself master of the city, fell upon Epipolæ and took it by storm, setting at liberty the citizens, who were prisoners in the fort. He then surrounded the citadel whither all the tyrant's friends and mercenaries had fled, with a strong wall from sea to sea; so that they could receive no succours by land, nor have any communication with the rest of the city [y].

In the mean time, Dionysius, who was at Caulonia in Italy, receiving intelligence of what passed in Syracuse (F), hastened thither and entered the citadel by sea, seven days

[y] Plut. & Diodor. ibid.

(F) As soon as Dion landed in Sicily, Timocrates, who married Dion's wife, and to whom Dionysius had left the command of the city in his absence, dispatched a courier to him with advice of Dion's arrival. But the courier, being almost at his journey's end, days after the arrival of Dion. He found his affairs in a desperate condition, and therefore to gain time he sent embassadors to Dion and the Syracusans, offering to restore the democracy, provided they would confer certain honours upon him in the republican state; he desired them to send deputies to treat with him, that he might put a speedy end to the war. The Syracusans immediately sent some of their citizens to sign an agreement with him upon the articles which he had proposed; but Dionysius, putting off the conferences, from day to day, and observing that the Syracusans in hopes of peace kept negligent guard, suddenly attacked the wall, with which they had inclosed the citadel, and made several breaches in it. So warm and unexpected an assault put the Syracusans in great disorder; however, they maintained their ground, and fought with great resolution. Dion distinguished himself above all the rest; for, finding that his troops were very backward in engaging the tyrant's mercenaries, and believing example more powerful than words, he threw himself violently in the midst of them, and after having made a great slaughter of the enemy and broken their ranks, made way for his men to follow him. His shield being pierced through in many places, and the enemy discharging showers of darts on him from all sides, he was wounded in his right arm with a javelin, and, fainting away through the extremity of the pain, was very near falling into the enemy's hands: but the Syracusans, highly concerned for the safety of their general, charged the mercenaries in a full body, and rescuing Dion, who was almost spent, put the enemy to flight. A great number of the tyrant's troops were slain on the spot; the rest escaped with much ado into the citadel. The Syracusans, having gained so glorious a victory, set up a trophy in defiance of the tyrant, rewarded their foreign troops with a considerable sum of money, and presented Dion with a crown end, was so fatigued, that he could not help stopping to take some sleep. In the mean time, a wolf, smelling some meat he had in his wallet, came to the place, and carried off the bag, in which was the meat with the dispatches. By this misfortune Dionysius was prevented from receiving a timely account of Dion's arrival (35).

crown of gold. On the other hand Dionyſius, having obtained leave to carry off his dead, cauſed them to be buried in purple robes; and paid them extraordinary honours; ſuch as ſurvived he rewarded with great generoſity, beſtowing upon them great part of his treaſures [z].

Ingratitude of the Syracuſans towards Dion.

DIONYSIUS after this defeat ſent embaſſadors anew to propoſe terms of peace; but Dion returned no other anſwer than this; Let Dionyſius firſt abdicate the tyranny, and then we ſhall hear him. Dionyſius was highly provoked at this haughty and peremptory anſwer, as he called it; but, however, diſſembling his reſentment, he ſent other embaſſadors with a letter to Dion wrote with great art and addreſs, and wonderfully calculated to render him ſuſpected by the Syracuſans, as if he intended to ſeize on the ſovereignty himſelf. The Syracuſans were taken with this groſs bait, for Dion read the letter in the public aſſembly, and began to be jealous of his too great power. The arrival of Heraclides did not a little contribute to the ſhameful ſteps that ungrateful people took with regard to their deliverer and benefactor. Heraclides was one of the Syracuſan exiles, an excellent officer, and well known among the troops, which he had formerly commanded under Dionyſius; but at the ſame time he was very ambitious, and a ſecret enemy to Dion, with whom he had had ſome diſpute in Peloponneſus. He arrived at Syracuſe with ſeven triremes and three other veſſels, not with a deſign to join Dion, but to act ſeparately againſt the tyrant, in hopes of having himſelf the glory of driving him out. His firſt endeavour was to ingratiate himſelf with the people, and for that he was wonderfully qualified by an open and inſinuating behaviour, whilſt Dion's auſtere gravity was offenſive to the multitude, eſpecially as they were become more haughty and untractable by their late victory (G). Heraclides, by courting them and in every thing

[z] Diodor. Plut. ibid.

(G) Dion had ſomething rigid and auſtere in his temper, that made him leſs acceſſible and ſociable than he ſhould have been, and kept even men of merit and his beſt friends at a kind of diſtance. Plato and thoſe who had his glory ſincerely at heart, often found fault with this his turn of mind, and adviſed him to correct it. But he, notwithſtanding their remonſtrances, ſeemed to thing ſeconding their capricious humour, ſo won their affections in a ſhort time, that of their own accord they called an aſſembly, and appointed him commander in chief of the fleet. Dion having notice of theſe irregular proceedings, haſtened to the aſſembly, and highly complained of the affront offered him, for they had conferred upon him the ſupreme command both of the fleet and army. His remonſtrances were of ſuch weight with the aſſembly, that they deprived Heraclides of the office, which they had juſt then honoured him with. When the aſſembly broke up, Dion ſent for him, and having gently reprimanded him for his ſtrange conduct in ſo delicate a conjuncture, when the leaſt diviſion among themſelves might be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences, he ſummoned a new aſſembly, and in the preſence of the multitude appointed him admiral, and allowed him ſuch a guard as he had himſelf. Dion imagined, that by this obliging behaviour he ſhould get the better of his rival's ill-will. But Heraclides was not ſo eaſily to be gained; he aimed at the ſupreme command, and nothing leſs would ſatisfy his ambition; he expreſſed indeed a great many obligations to Dion, ſeemed to court his favour, and in his outward behaviour ſhewed a great readineſs to obey his orders. But, in the mean time, he influenced the people under-hand againſt him, oppoſed his meaſures, and found fault with his whole conduct, as if he deſigned either to ſave the tyrant or protract the war. While Heraclides was thus diſpoſing the people to confer the ſupreme command upon himſelf one thing happened, which greatly raiſed his reputation among the Syracuſans. Philiſtus, the tyrant's admiral, having put to ſea with ſixty gallies, Heraclides gave him chace with his ſmall ſquadron, obliged him to engage, and gained a complete victory. Philiſtus behaved with great perſonal bravery, but at laſt finding himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides by the Syracuſans, who were deſirous of taking him alive, he laid violent hands on himſelf, after having diſcharged the truſt repoſed in him in a diſtinguiſhed manner. The Syracuſans vented their rage upon his dead body, which they barbarouſly mangled, dragged to pique himſelf upon the auſtere gravity and inflexible ſeverity, with which he treated the people. That rough, and, as he called it, manly behaviour created him many enemies, eſpecially among the populace.

dragged through all the ſtreets of the city, and then threw it over the walls to rot without burial in the open fields. He was one of the tyrant's moſt truſty friends, and had on all occaſions given him ſignal proofs of his fidelity. Wherefore Dionyſius was ſo diſheartened with the loſs of ſo ſteady a friend and experienced officer, that he ſent embaſſadors to Dion, offering to ſurrender the citadel with all the troops there in gariſon, and money to pay them for five months, upon condition, that he were allowed to retire to Italy, and there enjoy during his life the revenue of certain lands, which he mentioned, in the neighbourhood of Syracuſe.

Dionyſius flies to Italy.

Dion's advice was, that the terms ſhould be accepted; but the Syracuſans, hoping to take Dionyſius alive, would hearken to no propoſals. Wherefore Dionyſius, ſeeing all loſt, left the citadel in the hands of his eldeſt ſon Apollocrates, and, taking the advantage of a favourable wind, put to ſea in a ſmall veſſel, and landed undiſcovered in Italy with his treaſures and moſt valuable effects [a].

Factions in Syracuſe.

Heraclides was greatly blamed for having ſuffered him to eſcape; and therefore, to regain the favour of the people, he propoſed a new diviſion of lands, inſinuating, that they could never enjoy perfect liberty, ſo long as there was ſo great an inequality in wealth and power. This motion was warmly oppoſed by Dion, which gave Heraclides an opportunity of rendering him ſuſpected to the people, as if he intended to keep them in ſubjection, and reduce them to the ſame ſtate of ſlavery in which they had been held by their tyrants. By thus pretending to eſpouſe the cauſe of liberty, he prevailed upon the aſſembly to reduce the pay of the foreign troops, to appoint new generals, himſelf among the reſt, and to make a new diviſion of lands. At the ſame time they privately ſolicited the foreign troops to abandon Dion and join them, promiſing to give them a ſhare in the government, as if they were natives and citizens. But they generouſly rejected the offer, declaring, that they would ſtand by Dion to the laſt, and willingly ſacrifice their lives in defence of their general. The populace were ſo enraged at this anſwer, that they began to aſſemble in a tumultuous manner, and throw out threats both againſt Dion and his troops. Whereupon thoſe brave men, placing Dion in their center, began to march out of the

the city, protesting, that so long as one of them was alive no body should hurt him. In this manner they withdrew, without offering the least violence to any of the citizens, but only reproaching them with ingratitude towards their deliverer and great benefactor The Syracusans, despising their small number, and ascribing their moderation to fear and want of courage, began to attack them, not doubting, but they should put them all to the sword before they got out of the city. Dion being thus reduced to the necessity of either destroying those he was come to save, or being himself destroyed with so many brave men, begged them in the most tender and affectionate manner to hearken to reason, and not suffer themselves to be imposed upon by ambitious and ill-designing men, pointing with his hand at the citadel, which was full of enemies, who with great joy beheld all that passed. But finding them deaf to all his remonstrances, he commanded his men to face about and march in close order, as if they designed to fall upon the multitude; they obeyed his orders, and raising a great shout advanced against them, pretending to attack them with the utmost fury; the noise they made with their arms, according to Dion's directions, so terrified the populace, that they betook themselves to a disorderly flight. Dion did not offer to pursue them, but hastened his march towards the country of the Leontines. The Syracusans, being on their return treated by their countrymen as cowards, for having suffered so small a body of men to make their escape, in order to retrieve their honour, marched out again in pursuit of Dion, and coming up with him as he was passing a river, ordered their cavalry to advance to the charge. But when they perceived that he was resolved in earnest to repel force by force, they were again seized with terror, and, flying in a more shameful manner than before, made what haste they could to regain the city [b].

Dion obliged to quit Syracuse.

The Leontines not only received Dion with great marks of distinction, but made rich presents to his soldiers, and declared them all free citizens. They likewise sent embassadors to the Syracusans, complaining of the ill treatment Dion and his men had met with at their hands, and reminding them of the inestimable favours they had received from so worthy a patriot. The Syracusans replied, that Dion

Dion had driven out one tyrant with a deſign to eſtabliſh another, and therefore ought to be treated in the ſame manner as their firſt tyrant had been, whom they had obliged to quit not only Syracuſe but the iſland.

In the mean time, the tyrant's troops in the citadel, being reduced by famine to the utmoſt extremity, reſolved at laſt to ſurrender both the place and themſelves to the Syracuſans. Accordingly they ſent deputies to obtain for them the beſt terms they could; but while they were actually conferring with the townſmen, Nypſius, a general of experienced valour and greatly attached to Dionyſius, appeared with a numerous ſquadron of gallies, and a great many tranſports laden with corn and all ſorts of proviſions. Nypſius anchored in the port of Arethuſa, and having landed the men he brought along with him, he called a council of war, wherein he made a ſpeech to the gariſon ſuitable to the preſent occaſion, and with hopes of ample rewards engaged them to promiſe, that they would never ſubmit to the enemy upon any terms whaſoever. The Syracuſans no ſooner heard of this new ſupply, but they manned as many gallies as they had at hand, and attacking the enemy while they were unloading the corn and other proviſions, ſunk ſome of their ſhips, took others, and purſued the reſt to the ſhore. But this very victory was the occaſion of their ruin. For ſlighting the enemy, whom they looked upon as utterly undone, they gave themſelves up to feaſting, revelling, and all kind of debauchery; which general infatuation Nypſius did not fail to improve to his advantage. That brave commander, deſirous to repair his late loſs by ſome bold attempt, ordered his men to march out of the citadel, and aſſault the wall that incloſed it. They met with no oppoſition, the guards being every-where aſleep after their laſt night's debauch; having therefore in ſilence applied their ſcaling ladders, ſome of the moſt reſolute mounted the wall, killed the centinels, and opened the gates to their companions. Thus all the gariſon, conſiſting of ten thouſand well-diſciplined troops, entered the city, cut all thoſe to pieces who oppoſed them, and made ſuch a dreadful havock as can hardly be expreſſed. Many of the citizens were murdered in their beds, their houſes were plundered, and their wives and children taken out of their beds, and either cruelly butchered before their faces, or carried captives into the citadel, without regard to their tears, cries, and lamentations. The ſlaughter was ſo great, that that the ſtreets were every-where covered with dead bodies, and the private houſes ſwimming in blood.

THE citizens, ſeeing themſelves in this deſperate condition, knew not what to reſolve on. They were all well appriſed, that Dion was the only perſon who could adminiſter them any relief; but no one had courage enough to name him; ſo much were they aſhamed of their ingratitude towards their protector. As the danger increaſed every moment, and the enemy was preparing to ſet fire to the city, one boldly cried out, Let us ſend for Dion. His name was no ſooner heard but the whole multitude with ſhouts of joy approved the motion; and accordingly deputies were that inſtant diſpatched to Leontini, who arriving late in the evening threw themſelves at Dion's feet, and with many tears acquainted him with the deplorable condition of Syracuſe. Dion no ſooner heard them than he aſſembled a council of war, and having introduced the Syracuſan deputies, he deſired them to lay before his officers the ſtate of their city, which they did in a very moving ſpeech, entreating Dion to forget the ill treatment he had received, the rather, becauſe that unfortunate people had already paid dear for it, and acknowledged the miſeries they ſuffered juſtly inflicted upon them, for their ingratitude towards ſo loving a father of his country. As ſoon as they had done, Dion roſe up, but inſtead of ſpeaking burſt into tears, and could not for ſome time utter one ſingle word; the foreign ſoldiers, who were moſtly Peloponneſians, called out to him to take courage, and expreſſed a generous compaſſion in ſeeing their leader ſo overwhelmed with grief. At length, having recovered himſelf, he addreſſed his troops and the people of Leontini in the following terms: "Men "of Peloponneſus, and you, our allies, I have aſſem- "bled you here that you may conſider what is proper "to be done with regard to yourſelves; as for me I am "already determined, and muſt not be wavering, when "my country is in danger. If I cannot preſerve it, I "will periſh with it, and be buried in its ruins. But "for you, if you will be ſo generous as to forget the "ill treatment you have received at our hands, and aſſiſt "us once more, follow my example; but if your juſt "complaints againſt the Syracuſans prevail with you to "abandon them in their preſent diſtreſs, and ſuffer them "to periſh; may the gods amply reward you for the af- "fection and fidelity you have hitherto expreſſed for me. "I only

Dion recalled.

" I only beg, that you will remember Dion, who did not " abandon you, when you were baſely treated by his coun- " try, nor his country, when fallen into misfortunes". He had no ſooner done ſpeaking, than the foreign troops with one voice entreated him to lead them on that moment againſt the enemy. The deputies, tranſported with joy, tenderly embraced them, praying the gods to ſecond their generous reſolution. Aſſoon as the tumult was appeaſed, Dion ordered them to refreſh themſelves and return with their arms to the ſame place, being reſolved to ſet out that very night on his march to Syracuſe.

The deplorable condition of Syracuſe.

In the mean time, the ſoldiers of Dionyſius, after committing all ſorts of outrages in the city, had retired at night into the citadel. This ſhort reſpite gave Dion's enemies new courage, who flattering themſelves, that the garriſon would not venture again out of the caſtle, began to exhort the Syracuſans to think no more of Dion, but to defend themſelves with their own valour. They ſo far prevailed, that new deputies were diſpatched from the chief commanders to ſtop his march; but his friends at the ſame time ſent ſome worthy citizens to intreat him not to hearken to the embaſſies of ſuch, as were equally enemies to him and their country. Dion therefore purſued his march, but the oppoſite faction ſeized the gates with a deſign to diſpute his entrance. In the mean time, Nypſius, well appriſed of the diviſions that reigned in the city, made another ſally from the citadel, and made ſuch a dreadful havock in all quarters of the city, that from the heaps of dead bodies with which the ſtreets, the ſquares, and the forum, were ſtrewed, one would have believed that not a ſingle citizen had been left alive. They ſpared neither age nor ſex, but put all without diſtinction to the ſword. Nothing but murder and blood-ſhed was ſeen in every corner; and becauſe they were informed that Dion was haſtening to the relief of the city, they ſeemed determined to deſtroy it intirely before his arrival. For after they had murdered all the inhabitants they could light on, with burning torches, ſtraw, and other combuſtibles, they ſet fire to the houſes, ſo that many who had eſcaped the ſword were miſerably conſumed in the flames [c].

During

[c] Plut. ibid.

Dion relieves Syracuse.

DURING this confusion Dion unexpectedly arrived, and having detached his light-armed troops against the enemy to re-animate the citizens, who were still alive, with their presence, he drew up his heavy-armed infantry, and divided them into small parties, that they might be able to attack in several places at once, and appear stronger and more formidable to the enemy. Having made the dispositions and invoked the gods, he marched across the city against the enemy, being every where welcomed with acclamations, shouts of joy, and songs of victory. There was not one in the city so fond of life, as not to be more in pain for Dion's safety than his own: They were all under the greatest apprehensions in seeing him march the foremost over blood, fire, and dead bodies, with which the public streets were entirely covered. The enemy, hearing that Dion had entered the city, posted themselves in line of battle behind the ruins of the wall they had thrown down, determined at all events to maintain that post, lest their communication with the city should be cut off. It was with the greatest difficulty that Dion's men kept their ranks, being often obliged to march through the fire and clouds of smoke, while the roofs and beams of the houses, half consumed with the flames, falling down broke their ranks. At length they arrived at the place where the enemy waited for them, and began the attack. The slaughter was great on both sides, and the fight continued for several hours, before Dion's men could get over the ruins which covered the enemy; but at length the Peloponnesians, animating each other with mutual shouts, made such a vigorous effort, that the enemy, though far superior in number, was borne down and forced to give ground; the greatest part of them fled into the citadel, and the rest were cut in pieces by the victorious Peloponnesians. The city being thus delivered, Dion's men, instead of refreshing themselves after so great fatigues, spent all that night in extinguishing the fire, which they compassed, not without great danger and difficulty [d].

THE next day Heraclides and his uncle Theodotus, two of Dion's greatest enemies, put themselves into his hands, confessing their injurious treatment of him, and conjuring him to forget their ungrateful behaviour, and restore them to his favour, of which they acknowledged themselves

themſelves unworthy. Dion's friends adviſed him not to ſpare them, ſince they would not fail to raiſe new diſturbances in the city, and defeat in the end ſo glorious a victory. But Dion, believing he could get the better of their ſtubborn and reſtleſs temper by force of kind uſage and obligations, generouſly pardoned them. Heraclides ſeemed to be affected with this kindneſs, for the ſame day he propoſed in the aſſembly, that Dion ſhould be elected generaliſſimo, with ſupreme power by ſea and land. But the ungrateful populace, whoſe darling Heraclides was, oppoſed this motion with all their power, and Dion, to avoid new diſturbances, gave up that point, ſuffering Heraclides to command in chief at ſea [c].

The citadel ſurrenders.

ALL things being now quiet, the Syracuſans, under the direction of Dion, applied themſelves ſolely to the ſiege of the citadel, and in a ſhort time reduced the numerous gariſon to ſuch ſtraits, that Apollocrates, the tyrant's ſon, was obliged to capitulate. Dion allowed him to retire unmoleſted to his father in Italy, with five gallies and all his friends and relations. It is not eaſy to conceive the joy of the city upon his departure. The whole city crowded to the ſhore to gratify their eyes with ſuch an agreeable ſight, and to ſolemnize the happy day, on which, after ſo many years ſervitude, the Syracuſans could firſt ſtile themſelves again a free people.

ASSOON as Apollocrates ſet ſail, Dion entered the citadel at the head of his troops, and was met at the gate by his ſiſter Ariſtomache, leading his ſon, and by his wife Arete, whom Dionyſius, as we have related above, had given in marriage to Timocrates. Dion embraced his ſiſter firſt, and then his ſon; whereupon Arete drenched in tears was ready to ſwoon away, when Ariſtomache preſenting her to Dion; "The tears, ſaid ſhe, you ſee her "ſhed, at the time your preſence reſtores us to life and "joy, her ſilence and confuſion may well convince you, "that you alone have always poſſeſſed her heart. Shall ſhe "embrace you as her huſband, or die at your feet a-"bandoned by you for what ſhe has ſuffered againſt her will?" At theſe words Dion, with his face bathed in tears, tenderly embraced her, gave her his ſon, and ſent her home to his houſe, whither he ſoon followed her, leaving the Syracuſans in poſſeſſion of the citadel, as a pledge of their liberty. After this Dion rewarded with a magnificence truly royal all thoſe thoſe who had contributed to his ſucceſs, according to their rank and merit, diſmiſſed his guards, and, though at the height of glory, lived like a private citizen.

As the city was now in a profound tranquillity, Dion attempted to eſtabliſh in it a form of government, compoſed of the Spartan and Cretan, but wherein the Ariſtocratical was to prevail; the ſupreme authority, according to his plan, was to be veſted in a council, of which the members were to be choſen by the people and nobility. But this deſign was warmly oppoſed by Heraclides, who, ſtill turbulent and ſeditious, did not fail to ſtir up the people on that occaſion againſt Dion, as if he intended to abridge their power, and ſubject them to the nobility. Hereupon Dion, finding that he oppoſed all wiſe councils, was at laſt prevailed upon to conſent to his death, and he was accordingly by Dion's friends diſpatched in his own houſe. Dion publicly owned, that he had been put to death by his order, and in an harangue to the people convinced them, that it was impoſſible for the city to be free from commotions and ſedition, while Heraclides lived. However, after that murder Dion never enjoyed a happy hour, but lived in continual anguiſh and ſorrow, reproaching himſelf with having imbrued his hands in the blood of his fellow-citizen (H). Not long after, his ſon, for ſome unknown diſappointment, threw himſelf from the top of a houſe, and died of the fall. This increaſed Dion's affliction; but neither his grief nor life laſted long, Calippus having, by the blackeſt treachery, deprived Syracuſe of the greateſt hero it ever produced.

Dion's death.

CALIPPUS was an Athenian by birth, and had contracted an intimate friendſhip with Dion, who lodged in his houſe at Athens, and ever after ranked him among his particular and intimate friends. Having attended Dion into Sicily, after the tyrant was driven out, he gave himſelf up to ambitious views, and began to entertain thoughts of making himſelf maſter of Syracuſe. But as he was well apprized, that he could not accompliſh his deſign ſo long as Dion was alive, he threw off all regard for the ſacred ties of friendſhip and hoſpitality, and determined to get rid of of him. Notwithstanding the care he used to conceal his wicked purpose, it came to the ears of Dion's friends and relations (I), who all earnestly exhorted him to prevent Calippus's crime, by inflicting upon him the punishment his base treachery deserved. But he could not be prevailed upon to take any such resolution, saying, he had rather die a thousand deaths, than live under the necessity of continual precautions, not only against his enemies, but the best of his friends. He could not even be induced to take a guard for the security of his person; Calippus therefore haveing one night entered his house with a band of Zacynthian soldiers, who were entirely devoted to his interest, murdered him, without meeting with the least opposition, and apprehending his wife and sister, caused them to be carried to the public prison[f].

Calippus or Gylippus makes himself master of Syracuse.

After the Death of Dion, Calippus, with the assistance of the Zacynthian troops, made himself master of Syracuse, and practised there greater cruelties than any of the tyrants before him. Plutarch observes, that the success he met with occasioned great complaints against the gods, for suffering so impious a wretch to raise himself to so exalted a station, by such an execrable piece of treachery. But providence was not long without justifying itself, the traitor having soon undergone the punishment he deserved. Haveing marched with his forces against Catana, Syracuse revolted, and shook off so shameful a yoke. He then withdrew

(I) Amongst others, Dion's sister and wife, having had notice of his wicked designs, lost no time, but endeavoured to discover the truth by a very strict enquiry. Calippus, finding that they suspected him, went to them with tears in his eyes, and in appearance inconsolable, that any body should suspect him of such a crime, or think him capable of so black a design. They insisted upon his taking the Great Oath, as it was called. The person, who swore, was wrapped up in the purple mantle of the goddess Proserpine, and holding a lighted torch in his hand, pronounced against himself the most dreadful execrations, wishing them to fall upon himself and his family, if he was guilty of the crime laid to his charge. This oath Calippus took, while he was watching every day an opportunity of putting in execution his black design (36).

(36) Plin. ibid.

drew to Meſſana; but the inhabitants taking up arms ſhut their gates againſt him, and in a ſally cut off moſt of the Zacynthian troops who had murdered Dion. No city in Sicily would admit ſuch an execrable monſter; whereupon he left the iſland and retired to Rhegium, where, after having led for ſome time a miſerable life, he was ſlain by Leptines and Polyperchon, with the ſame dagger with which he had murdered Dion [g].

As for Ariſtomache and Arete, upon the downfall of Calippus they were ſet at liberty, and at firſt kindly entertained by Icetas of Syracuſe, one of Dion's friends, who received them into his houſe. But Icetas, at laſt complying with the importunities of Dion's enemies, provided a veſſel for them, and having put them on board, under pretence of ſending them to Peloponneſus, ordered the commander of the ſhip to put them to death in the paſſage, and throw them into the ſea. His orders were put in execution; but Icetas, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, paid dear for ſuch an inhuman treatment.

New troubles in Syracuſe.

Upon Dion's death, the city was involved in greater miſeries than ever; Calippus uſurped the ſupreme power, but after ten months was driven out by Hipparinus, the brother of Dionyſius, who, arriving unexpectedly with a numerous fleet, poſſeſſed himſelf of the city, and held it for the ſpace of two years. Syracuſe and all Sicily being thus divided into parties and factions, Dionyſius, taking advantage of theſe troubles, aſſembled ſome foreign troops, and having defeated Nypſæus, who was then governor of Syracuſe, reinſtated himſelf in the poſſeſſion of his dominions, ten years after he had been obliged to quit the throne. His paſt misfortunes, inſtead of ſoftening his fierce temper, ſerved only to inflame it, and render him more ſavage and brutal than ever. The better ſort of the citizens, not being able to brook ſo cruel a ſervitude, had recourſe to Icetas, who was by birth a Syracuſan, but at that time tyrant of Leontini; they created him general of all their forces, abandoning themſelves to his conduct, not that they had any great opinion of his virtue, but becauſe they had no other reſource. In the mean time, the Carthaginians, thinking this a very favourable opportunity to ſeize upon all Sicily, ſent a mighty fleet thither. In this extremity, the Syracuſans had recourſe to the Corinthians, from whom they, they were descended, and who, of all the Greek nations, were the most professed enemies of tyranny, and most generous assertors of liberty. Icetas, who had nothing else in view but to make himself master of Syracuse, and had already entered into a treaty with the Carthaginians, seemed to approve these measures, and even sent his deputies along with those of the Syracusans; but, in the mean time, was contriving, how he could prevent the Corinthians from sending any forces into the island, which, according to his late treaty with the Carthaginians, was, after the expulsion of Dionysius, to be divided between him and them. The Syracusan embassadors met with a very kind reception at Corinth, where in a general assembly it was resolved, that succours should be sent into Sicily, and that Timoleon should be forthwith dispatched to Syracuse, and there take upon him the command of the Syracusan forces against Dionysius and the Carthaginians [h].

Timoleon sent into Sicily.

TIMOLEON had led a retired life for twenty years, without ever interfering in public affairs, and expected nothing less than to be imployed, or even thought of, on such an occasion. He was sprung from one of the most illustrious families of Corinth, and had on all occasions signalized himself in the defence of his country, against the unjust pretensions of foreign as well as domestic tyrants. He had an elder brother by name Timophanes, whom he tenderly loved, and had saved in a battle by covering him with his own body. But his country was still dearer to him. Timophanes was suspected to entertain thoughts of seizing on the sovereignty, which Timoleon being informed of, used all possible means to divert him from so wicked an attempt. But finding all his endeavours ineffectual, and that neither kindness, friendship, affection, nor even menaces could prevail upon an heart abandoned to ambition, he caused his brother to be put to death in his presence by two of his intimate friends. This action was admired and applauded by the principal citizens of Corinth; but highly blamed by others, who reproached him as an abominable parricide, who would not fail of drawing the vengeance of the gods upon himself and his country. His mother in the excess of her grief uttered the most dreadful curses and imprecations against him; and when he came to comfort her, she caused the doors to be shut against him, not being being able to bear the ſight of one who had murdered her ſon. This ſtruck him with ſuch horror, that, conſidering Timophanes no longer as a tyrant, but only as a brother, he reſolved to put an end to his unhappy life by abſtaining from all nouriſhment. But his friends having, with the utmoſt difficulty, diſſuaded him from this fatal reſolution, he condemned himſelf to paſs the reſt of his days in ſolitude. From that moment he renounced all public affairs, and for ſeveral years never came to the city, but wandered about in the moſt ſolitary and deſart places, abandoned to exceſſive grief and melancholy. After he had paſſed near twenty years in this condition, he returned to Corinth; but lived there quite private and retired, without concerning himſelf with the adminiſtration. As he had by the death of his brother given a remarkable inſtance of his averſion to tyranny and tyrants, the Corinthians choſe him as the moſt proper man to be ſent into Sicily, which at that time abounded with tyrants above all other countries, there being ſcarce a city in the whole iſland, which was not held in ſlavery by ſome unjuſt uſurper. It was not without great difficulty that Timoleon was prevailed upon to accept the command offered him; but at laſt, his duty getting the better of his inclination, he complied with the requeſt of his friends, and began to raiſe forces for the intended expedition [i] (K).

In

[i] Plut. ibid.

(K) Diodorus varies in the circumſtances of this fact from Plutarch, whom we have followed. He tells us, that Timoleon having killed his brother, in the public market-place with his own hand, a great tumult aroſe among the citizens, ſome being of opinion, that he ſhould ſuffer according to law for having imbrued his hands in the blood of a citizen, and others crying him up as the deliverer of his country, and worthy of the greateſt rewards: To appeaſe this tumult an aſſembly was convened, and the caſe of Timoleon taken into conſideration. In the height of the debates the Syracuſan embaſſadors arrived, demanding a general to command their forces. Whereupon they unanimouſly agreed to ſend Timoleon into Sicily; but let him firſt know, that if he diſcharged with fidelity the truſt repoſed in him, he ſhould be treated

In the mean time, Icetas, who intended to poſſeſs himſelf of Syracuſe, under colour of aſſiſting the inhabitants againſt Dionyſius, foreſeeing, that Timoleon would defeat his meaſures, diſpatched embaſſadors to the Corinthians, acquainting them, that the Carthaginians, apprized of their deſign, were waiting to intercept their ſquadron with a great fleet; and that their ſlowneſs in ſending him ſuccours had obliged him to call in even the Carthaginians to his aid, and employ them againſt the tyrant; wherefore they might forbear making any farther levies, or exhauſting their treaſures in great but uſeleſs expences, ſince he could, with the aſſiſtance of his allies the Carthaginians, drive out Dionyſius, and reſtore Syracuſe to its antient liberty. The ſpeech of the embaſſadors, and the letters which they delivered from Icetas, only ſerved to haſten the departure of Timoleon, who was now fully convinced, that Icetas acted treacherouſly and aſpired at the ſovereignty. He therefore immediately imbarqued his men, who were in all but a thouſand, on board ten gallies, and putting to ſea arrived ſafe on the coaſt of Italy (L); where news was brought him, that Icetas had defeated Dionyſius, and, having made himſelf maſter of the greateſt part of the city, had obliged the tyrant to ſhut himſelf up in the citadel. At the ſame time Timoleon was informed, that Icetas had given orders to the Carthaginians to prevent his approach, and deſtroy his ſquadron as ſoon as ſoon as it appeared on the coaſts of Sicily. This gave him great uneaſineſs; however, he advanced with his ſmall fleet to Rhegium, where he found embaſſadors from Icetas, treated as one who had killed a tyrant; but if he did not anſwer their expectation, he ſhould on his return be condemned as the murderer of his brother (37).

(L) Diodorus tells us, that, during the whole time Timoleon was at ſea, a light, like a burning torch, went before him in the night, till the fleet arrived ſafe on the coaſts of Italy; and adds, that before he ſet ſail, he had been told by the prieſts of Ceres and Proſerpine, that the goddeſſes had appeared to them, and promiſed to ſail along with him to the iſland, that was conſecrated in a peculiar manner to them. This greatly encouraged Timoleon, who conſecrated the beſt galley of his ſquadron to the goddeſſes, calling it the ſacred ſhip of Ceres and Proſerpine (38).

(37) Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi. c. 10. (38) Idem, ibid.

Icetas, who were charged to acquaint him, that he ſhould be kindly received at Syracuſe, provided he diſmiſſed his troops; but otherwiſe the Syracuſans, who were jealous of foreign forces, would not admit him into their city. At the ſame time twenty Carthaginian gallies arrived in the port of Rhegium, ſent by Icetas to prevent the Corinthians from approaching Syracuſe. In this nice conjuncture Timoleon demanded a conference with the embaſſadors and the chief commanders of the Carthaginian ſquadron, in the preſence of the people of Rhegium. He pretended to be willing to return home, but ſaid, that he would firſt hear the Rhegians, and do it by their advice; that he might on his return to Corinth, have wherewithal to juſtify his conduct. The magiſtrates of Rhegium were of intelligence with him, and deſired nothing more than to ſee the Corinthians in poſſeſſion of Sicily. They ſummoned therefore an aſſembly, but ſhut the gates of the city, under pretence of preventing the citizens from going abroad, that they might apply themſelves only to the affair in hand.

Timoleon deludes the Carthaginians and arrives in Sicily.

THE aſſembly being met, long ſpeeches were made, and debates carried on, in appearance with great warmth, on purpoſe to gain time. While the Carthaginians were buſy in the council, nine Corinthian gallies, according to the orders they had received from Timoleon, ſet ſail, and were ſuffered to paſs, the Carthaginians believing their departure had been agreed upon between the officers of both parties, who were in the city. When Timoleon was privately informed that his gallies were at ſea, he ſlipt out of the aſſembly, and making to the gally that was left, imbarqued and rejoined the reſt of the ſquadron. The Carthaginians, thus deluded, purſued him; but as he had got far before them, the aſſembly not having broke up till it was dark, he arrived ſafe at Taurominium.

Icetas defeated by Timoleon.

UPON the unexpected news of Timoleon's arrival in Sicily, Icetas put the Carthaginians, who had a fleet of an hundred and fifty gallies, in poſſeſſion of the harbour of Syracuſe, and diſpatched an expreſs to Mago, the Carthaginian general, deſiring him to advance with his whole army to the gates of the city. In the mean time, Timoleon, leaving Taurominium, marched to Adranum, where he attacked a Carthaginian detachment commanded by Icetas in perſon, and put them to flight, though they were above four times his number. As victory naturally begets friends, not only Adranum, but ſeveral cities opened their gates to

Timoleon, and joined him with all their forces. So that he now boldly advanced to the relief of Syracuſe. On his arrival he found the Syracuſans in a moſt deplorable condition, Icetas being maſter of the city, the Carthaginians of the port, and Dionyſius of the citadel. The latter, ſeeing himſelf beſieged on all ſides without any hopes of relief, ſent privately embaſſadors to Timoleon, offering to put the citadel, which he could no longer defend, into his hands, upon condition he would ſuffer him to retire unmoleſted. Timoleon, taking the advantage of ſuch an offer, willingly agreed to the terms, and detached Euclid and Telemachus, with four hundred men, to take poſſeſſion of that important place. Dionyſius received them within the walls, and delivered up to them not only all his warlike ſtores and proviſions, but even the rich moveables of his palace, with ſeventy thouſand complete ſuits of armour, and two thouſand regular troops, which Timoleon incorporated among his Corinthians. After this Dionyſius, taking with him ſome of his friends and part of his treaſures, imbarked on a ſmall veſſel, and repaired, unperceived by the troops of Icetas, to the camp of Timoleon. There he appeared for the firſt time as a private man and a ſuppliant, after he had been, near twelve years, lord of one of the moſt wealthy kingdoms then known. Timoleon ſent him to Corinth with one galley only and without a convoy; however, he eſcaped the Carthaginian veſſels, which lay in wait for him, and arrived ſafe. He was at firſt greatly pitied by the Corinthians, but his manner of life ſoon changed their compaſſion into contempt. He paſſed whole days in perfumers ſhops, or with actreſſes and ſingers, diſputing with them on the rules of muſic and the harmony of airs. Some believed, that he behaved thus out of policy, not to give umbrage to the Corinthians, or betray any thought of recovering his dominions. Some writers tell us, that the ſupreme poverty, to which he was reduced, obliged him to open a ſchool at Corinth, where, ſays Tully [k], he exerciſed that tyranny over children, which he could no longer practiſe over men. Dionyſius, thus reduced to beggary, and of a powerful king become a contemptible ſchool-maſter, ought to warn all perſons in exalted ſtations not to rely ſo much on proſperity, or think the gifts of fortune, as Valerius Maximus expreſſes it, entailed upon any of the human race [l]

Dionyſius ſurrenders himſelf to Timoleon.

Philip

Philip king of Macedon, meeting one day Dionyſius in the ſtreets at Corinth, aſked him, how he came to looſe ſo powerful a kingdom as had been left him by his father; Dionyſius anſwered, that his father had left him indeed a rich kingdom, but not the fortune, which had preſerved both him and his kingdom [m].

Icetas beſiege the citadel o Syracuſe.

But to return to Syracuſe; after the retreat of Dionyſius, Icetas laid ſiege to the citadel, which was defended only by four hundred Corinthians left there by Timoleon, under the command of one Leon, an experienced and brave officer. Timoleon, who had withdrawn to Catana, ſent the gariſon frequent ſupplies of proviſions; but they were for the moſt part intercepted by Icetas, who kept the place cloſely blocked up on all ſides. When they were reduced to the laſt extremity, Timoleon found means to relieve them by conveying into the place, in ſpite of all oppoſition, a great quantity of corn. Whereupon Icetas and Mago, being well appriſed, that they could not become maſters of the citadel ſo long as Timoleon was in that neighbourhood, reſolved to leave part of the army in Syracuſe, and with the reſt either drive Timoleon from Catana, or block him up in that city. They were ſcarce gone, when Leon, who commanded in the citadel, obſerving that thoſe, who were left to continue the ſiege, were very remiſs in their duty, made a ſudden ſally, killed a great many of them, put the reſt to flight, and having poſſeſſed himſelf of the quarter of the city called Acradina, fortified it, and by works of communication joined it to the citadel. This bad news ſoon brought back Mago and Icetas, but they could not drive the enemy from Acradina. In the mean time, a ſupply of two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe ſent from Corinth landed ſafe in Sicily, having deceived the vigilance of the Carthaginian ſquadron poſted to intercept them. Timoleon, encouraged with this new reinforcement, marched againſt Meſſana, and having made himſelf maſter of that city, advanced to Syracuſe. As he approached the city, his firſt care was to ſend emiſſaries into the enemy's camp, and artfully ſpread among the Syracuſans and other Greeks, who ſerved under Icetas and Mago, that Timoleon's only deſign was to reſtore them to their antient liberty, that it was ſhameful for Greeks to fight under the ſtandards of a tyrant, and that if they joined Timoleon, the war would be soon at an end, and not only peace but liberty restored to the whole island. Such discourses being spread through the whole camp, and even reaching Mago's ears, whose army was mostly composed of mercenary Greeks, that general began to be very uneasy, and, as he wanted only a pretence to retire, he gave out, that his forces were going to betray him, and, without hearkening to the entreaties and warm remonstrances of Icetas, he weighed anchor and set sail for Africa, shamefully abandoning the conquest of Sicily. On his arrval in Carthage he laid violent hands on himself, to prevent the punishment which his cowardice deserved [n].

Mago returns to Carthage.

Timoleon master of Syracuse.

The next day, Timoleon appeared before the city with his army in line of battle, and assaulted it in three different quarters with such vigor, that the troops of Icetas were every where driven from the walls, and that part of the city which they held taken by storm. Timoleon no sooner saw himself master of Syracuse, and all the forts which had been built by the tyrants, but he caused a proclamation to be made by sound of trumpet, inviting all the citizens to come the next day with necessary tools, and demolish with their own hands the citadel and other castles, which he called the nests of tyrants. The Syracusans, looking upon that day as the first of their true liberty, crowded in multitudes to the citadel, which they soon demolished, together with the forts and the tyrants palaces, breaking open at the same time their tombs, and overturning every monument of tyranny. The citadel being quite razed, Timoleon caused public edifices to be erected, in the spot where it stood, for the administration of justice. He found the city in a most miserable condition, for many having perished in the wars and seditions, and others fled to avoid the evils attending tyranny, that once so wealthy and populous place was become almost a desart; insomuch, that the horses grazed on the grass that grew in the very market-place. The other cities of Sicily were in the same manner abandoned and desolate. Timoleon therefore wrote to Corinth, desiring the magistrates to send a new colony to repeople Syracuse, which could no otherwise recover its former splendor. The Corinthians, pitying the sad condition of a city, which they themselves had founded, sent to all the

the sacred games of Greece and public assemblies, and caused proclamations to be made by heralds, declaring, that the Corinthians having abolished the tyranny of Syracuse, and expelled the tyrants, restored Syracuse to its former liberty, and invited all those, who had withdrawn from their native country, to repair thither again and take possession anew of their lands and estates. At the same time they dispatched couriers into Asia and the neighbouring islands, whither great numbers of fugitives had retired, exhorting them to hasten to Corinth, where they should be supplied with vessels, and at the expence of the public conveyed to their own country [o].

Syracuse repeopled by the Corinthians.

When it was publicly known, that Syracuse was delivered from the oppression of tyrants, and that Corinth received all the fugitives in order to transport them to their native city, great numbers flocked thither from all parts; but as they were not sufficient to repeople that great city, they intreated the Corinthians and other cities of Greece to spare them some of their inhabitants, and their request being granted, they imbarked for Syracuse, being in all above ten thousand. At the same time great multitudes of people from Italy and other parts of Sicily joined Timoleon, who distributed the lands among them gratis, but sold the houses, and with the money arising from the sale established a fund for the support of the poor and needy.

Timoleon, having thus raised Syracuse in a manner from the grave, undertook the delivery of all Sicily, and the extirpating of tyrants and tyranny from the other cities. He began with Icetas tyrant of Leontini, whom he compelled to renounce his alliance with the Carthaginians, demolish his forts, and resign the sovereignty. Leptines tyrant of Engya and Apollonia, being closely besieged, surrendered himself to the conqueror, who spared his life, and sent him with several other tyrants to Corinth, where he led a private life. Afterwards he possessed himself of Entella, and put to death all those who adhered to the Carthaginians. The fame of his victories being now spread all over the island, the Greek cities every-where submitted to him, and were by him restored to the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges. Many cities likewise of the Sicani and Siculi, subject to the Carthaginians, sent emembaſſadors to him, deſiring to be admitted among his confederates.

Timoleon, having thus cleared Sicily of the many tyrants who held the people in ſubjection, and ſet the whole iſland at liberty, returned to Syracuſe, where in conjunction with Cephalus and Dionyſius, two legiſlators ſent from Corinth, he inſtituted ſuch laws as were moſt proper for the democracy. Among other wiſe inſtitutions, he appointed a chief magiſtrate to be choſen yearly, whom the Syracuſans called the Amphipolus of Jupiter Olympius; and the firſt Amphipolus was Callimenes. Hence aroſe the cuſtom among the Syracuſans to compute their years by the reſpective governments of theſe magiſtrates, which cuſtom continued in the time of Diodorus Siculus, that is, in the reign of Auguſtus, above three hundred years after the office of Amphipolus was firſt introduced [p].

Timoleon makes war upon the Carthaginians.

Timoleon, having thus reformed the government of Syracuſe, and by many wiſe laws ſettled the city in peace and tranquillity, began to entertain thoughts of driving the Carthaginians quite out of the iſland. With this view he ſent a ſtrong detachment, under the command of Dinarchus and Demaratus, into the neighbouring countries ſubject to the Carthaginians, enjoining them to plunder all thoſe cities, which refuſed to renounce their alliance with Carthage and join them. By this means he got a vaſt ſum of money, which ſerved to pay his ſoldiers their arrears, and make the neceſſary preparations for the war he deſigned. The Carthaginians, ſuſpecting his deſign, ſent over into Sicily, Aſdrubal and Hamilcar, two experienced commanders, with an army of ſeventy thouſand men, two hundred ſhips of war, and a thouſand tranſports, laden with warlike engines, armed chariots, horſes, and all ſorts of proviſions. They no ſooner landed at Lilybæum, but Timoleon advanced againſt him, though his army conſiſted only of ſeven thouſand men. On his march one of his mercenaries, by name Thracius, cried out, that Timoleon was not in his right ſenſes, elſe with ſuch a handful of men he would never attempt to oppoſe ſo numerous an army, that he was leading them to certain and unavoidable deſtruction, and that, if he was not diſtracted, he could propoſe nothing elſe than the ſacrificing of their lives, perhaps becauſe he was

was not able to pay them their arrears. By this ſpeech he prevailed upon a thouſand of the mercenaries to return to Syracuſe, and not follow Timoleon in ſo deſperate an expedition. This did not diſhearten Timoleon, who having by fair words and large promiſes brought back the other mercenaries to their duty, continued his march to the banks of the river Cremiſſus, where the enemy was encamped. His unexpected arrival occaſioned no ſmall confuſion in the Carthaginian army, which he improving to his advantage attacked them with great vigor and reſolution. Ten thouſand of the enemies forces, who had already paſſed the river, were defeated and put to flight, before the reſt could come up to their aſſiſtance. But, in the mean time, the whole army having gained the oppoſite bank, the battle was renewed, and the victory a long time doubtful; but while the Carthaginians were fighting with great reſolution, and endeavouring to hem in and ſurround on all ſides Timoleon's ſmall army, there aroſe on a ſudden a violent ſtorm of hail, thunder, and lightning, which, beating on the faces of the Carthaginians, put them into ſuch confuſion, that they were not able to ſtand their ground any longer. Aſſoon as they began to retire, the Greeks, encouraging one another with ſhouts of joy, preſſed them ſo vigorouſly, that the whole army was driven into the river, where great numbers of them were drowned in that throng and confuſion. The ſacred cohort or brigade, as the Carthaginians called it, which conſiſted of two thouſand five hundred citizens of Carthage, all men of experienced courage and valour, fought with great reſolution, and ſtood their ground till they were all cut off to a man. Of the reſt ten thouſand were ſlain, and above fifteen thouſand taken priſoners; all their baggage and proviſion, with two hundred chariots, a thouſand coats of mail, and ten thouſand ſhields, fell into the enemy's hands, and were either ſent to Corinth and there dedicated to Neptune, or hung up in the temples of Syracuſe. The ſpoil, which was exceeding rich, and conſiſted of gold and ſilver plate, and other furniture of great value, he divided among the ſoldiers, retaining nothing for himſelf but the glory of ſo famous a victory.

The Carthaginians defeated.

TIMOLEON after this victory returned to Syracuſe, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, and attended to his house by the magistrates and chief citizens, the people, as he passed through the streets, throwing flowers upon him, and paying him such honours as were due to heroes or demi-gods. Soon after his arrival he banished the thousand mercenaries, who deserted him, ordering them to leave Syracuse before sun-set. This was all the punishment he inflicted upon them [q].

Peace concluded with the Carthaginians.

As soon as the news of this overthrow reached Carthage, the people there were seized with such terror, that they immediately dispatched embassadors into Sicily, with orders to strike up a peace upon any terms whatsoever. As several new tyrants had already started up and formed a powerful alliance against Timoleon, he thought it advisable to conclude a peace with the Carthaginians, and turn his arms against those unjust usurpers. A peace was accordingly settled on the following terms: that all the Greek cities should be set free, that the river Halycus or, as Diodorus calls it, the Lycus, should be the boundary between the territories of both parties; that the natives of the cities subject to the Carthaginians should be allowed to withdraw, if they pleased, to Syracuse, with their families and effects; and lastly, that Carthage should not for the future give any assistance to the tyrants against the Syracusans.

Timoleon, having now nothing to fear from the Carthaginians, marched against the tyrants, determined to root them quite out of the island. Icetas had already taken the field, but was easily routed by Timoleon, who, following his victory, made him, his son Eupolemus, and the general of his horse prisoners, and put them all to death. His wife and daughter fell likewise into his hands, and were sent to Syracuse, where they were sentenced to die, and executed accordingly, the people of Syracuse thus revenging the death of Dion's wife and sister, whom Icetas had caused to be thrown into the sea, as we have related above. Mamercus tyrant of Catana, Hippon tyrant of Messana, and all the other tyrants of Sicily, met with the like fate, being first overcome by Timoleon, and then put to death by those whom they had tyrannically oppressed. Thus Timoleon, having entirely purged Sicily of the tyrants who had long infested it, given Syracuse wise laws, every-where re-established peace and tranquillity, repeopled the cities, and supplied them with means to recover their antient splendor, resigned his authority to live in retirement. The Syra-

Syracusans had out of gratitude bestowed upon him the best house in the city, and another very magnificent and pleasant one in the country, whither he retired with his wife and children, whom he had sent for from Corinth. In this retirement he passed the remainder of his life, enjoying the satisfaction of seeing so many cities and such numbers of people indebted to him for their happiness. He was tried in his old age with a very sensible affliction, which was the loss of his sight. In this condition the Syracusans gave him great instances of their gratitude, paying him frequent visits, and carrying all strangers of distinction to visit their benefactor and deliverer. When they had any important affair to be examined in the assembly of the people, they never failed to invite him thither, and religiously to follow his advice. He generally came in a chariot, and was attended from the gates of the city to the place of the assembly by the whole city, and reconducted in the same manner beyond the gates with loud shouts and acclamations. He lived in this retirement eight years, and was after his death honoured as a god. He was buried with great pomp and magnificence, the people of Syracuse having decreed, that two hundred minas should be laid out on that occasion; but the tears that were shed, and the blessings uttered, by every body in honour of his memory, were the chief ornament of his funeral. It was also enacted by a special decree, that annually, on the day of his death, public sports should be celebrated with horse-races and gymnastic games; and that whenever the people of Syracuse should be engaged in a war with the Barbarians, they should send to Corinth for a general [r].

The Syracusans enjoyed for the space of twenty years the fruits of Timoleon's victories. But it was impossible that a nation, which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey, should be long free from tumults and sedition. Great disturbances daily arising, the citizens were again involved in the same calamities, from which Timoleon had with so much trouble delivered them. A new tyrant started up among them, who exceeded all those who had gone before him in cruelty and all other vices. This was Agathocles, of whose birth and parentage Diodorus gives us the following account. He was the son of one Carsinus, who, being banished from Rhegium his native city, settled at Thermæ in Sicily, at that time subject to the Carthaginians.

ginians. There he married a woman of the place, who being troubled with ſtrange dreams, while ſhe was with child of Agathocles, imparted them to ſome Carthaginians who were going to Delphos, deſiring them to conſult the oracle in his name about the child ſhe was big with. The Carthaginians complied with her requeſt, and the oracle returned this anſwer, that the child would bring dreadful calamities upon the Carthaginians and all Sicily. The father, terrified with this prediction, expoſed the child, aſſoon as it was born in the open fields, charging one of his friends to watch till it died. As the infant continued ſeveral days alive, the perſon placed there to guard it grew weary, and retired home; which the mother having notice of, immediately repaired to the place, and carrying the child to the houſe of her brother Heraclides, entruſted it with him, calling it after her father's name Agathocles. When he was ſeven years old, Carſinus was invited by Heraclides to a ſolemn feaſt and ſacrifice, and on that occaſion ſeeing Agathocles, he was greatly taken with his beauty, for he is ſaid to have been one of the handſomeſt men of his age. His wife, laying hold of that opportunity to put him in mind of his ſon, told, him that the child he had expoſed would have proved as fine a child as that he ſo much admired, had he not been ſo barbarouſly murdered. At theſe words the father burſt out in tears, and ſaid that he heartily repented what he had done. Hereupon the mother ventured to diſcover to him the truth of the whole matter; whereat he was greatly overjoyed; but ſoon after, out of fear of the Carthaginians, removed with all his family to Syracuſe, where as he was by trade a potter, he brought up his ſon to the ſame buſineſs. After Timoleon had routed the Carthaginians on the banks of the Cremiſſus, he promiſed to make all thoſe who ſhould join him free of Syracuſe; and on this occaſion it was Carſinus and his ſon Agathocles were inrolled among the Syracuſan citizens. Carſinus died ſoon after; but Agathocles being recommended by his beauty to one Demas, a rich, but voluptuous and lewd, nobleman of Syracuſe, he was plentifully ſupplied by him with money and whatever elſe he had occaſion for. Demas was ſoon after created general of the Agrigentines, when he did not forget his favourite, but advanced him to the dignity of a chiliarch, that is, gave him the command of a thouſand men. He had ſome time before ſerved as a common ſoldier, and was even then very very remarkable for his dexterity in performing the military evolutions and the great ſtrength of his body, wearing in the military exerciſes ſuch heavy armour as no other man in the whole army could bear. After he was raiſed to the poſt of a chiliarch, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on all occaſions above the other commanders, being quite void of fear, and as ready to expoſe his own life to the greateſt dangers, as the lives of thoſe he commanded. In the mean time, Demas dying, and leaving his whole eſtate to his wife, Agathocles married her, and by that means became at once the moſt wealthy citizen in Syracuſe [s]. His riſe

He was not ſuffered long to enjoy his good fortune in Syracuſe, being driven from thence by Soſiſtratus, who, having uſurped the ſupreme power and made himſelf abſolute maſter of Syracuſe, baniſhed all thoſe who gave him any umbrage. Agathocles retired into Italy, where he had acquired great reputation in the war which the Crotonians had waged with the Brutians. He ſettled at Crotona, where he was kindly entertained; but forgetting the favours ſhewn him by the Crotonians, he attempted to make himſelf lord of their city, and was on that account obliged to ſave himſelf by flight from the fury of the incenſed multitude. From Crotona he withdrew to Tarentum, but was ſoon driven from that city too, being there convicted of the like practiſes. After this no city would receive him; whereupon, having got together a band of exiles and robbers, he plundered the country and lived upon rapine. In the mean time, Soſiſtratus having croſſed over into Italy and laid ſiege to Rhegium, Agathocles attacked him unexpectedly, forced his camp, and obliged him to imbark his men and drop that enterprize. Soſiſtratus ſoon after this unſucceſsful expedition was forced to abdicate the ſovereignty and quit Syracuſe. With him were driven out above ſix hundred of the chief citizens, who were ſuſpected by the populace to have formed a deſign of aboliſhing the democracy, and introduceing in its room oligarchy. Soſiſtratus and the exiles had recourſe to the Carthaginians, who readily eſpouſed their cauſe. Hereupon the Syracuſans recalling Agathocles, appointed him commander in chief of their forces, which truſt he diſcharged with more valour than integrity; for having defeated the united forces of Soſiſtratus and the Carthaginians, on which occaſion he received ſeven wounds, he began to exerciſe a ſovereign power over his fellow-citizens tizens, and take such measures as plainly shewed that he aspired to the monarchy. Wherefore the Syracusans, not daring to trust any of their own citizens, had recourse anew to the Corinthians, who sent them one Acestorides to take upon him the command of their forces. Acestorides was no sooner vested with this power, but he formed a design of dispatching Agathocles, being sensible that Syracuse could never enjoy a perfect tranquillity so long as Agathocles was alive. But, as he was afraid his death might occasion some disturbance in the city, he commanded him to retire from Syracuse in the close of the evening, and placed on all the roads soldiers with private orders to put him to death in the night and bury his body. But Agathocles, suspecting some treachery, chose a young man who resembled him both in stature and features, and, having privately delivered to him his horse, arms, and garment, sent him before, enjoining him to keep the public road. He was scarce out of the gates, when the guards, mistaking him for Agathocles, killed him and buried the body; nor were they undeceived till news was brought some time after, that Agathocles, who had escaped by private ways, was raising troops in the heart of Sicily. The Syracusans were not a little alarmed, when they heard, that he was not only alive, but had already got together a considerable army, and was preparing to come against the city. They therefore sent embassadors to him, and to avoid the evils of a civil war offered to recall him home, provided he disbanded his forces. Agathocles agreed to the proposal, and on his return being conducted by the citizens to the temple of Ceres, he swore there, according to custom, in the most solemn manner, that he would do nothing to the prejudice of the democracy [t].

The cruelties of Agathocles in Syracuse.

Notwithstanding the solemn oath he had taken, he no sooner saw himself restored to his country and estate, but he began to court the favour of the populace, and espouse their cause against the senate, which consisted of six hundred of the chief citizens, with no other view but to sow divisions and raise new disturbances, by means of which he hoped to have an opportunity of overturning the government and making himself master of the city. He pretended to protect the people againſt the oppreſſions and overgrown power of the ſenate, and was on that account, in ſpite of the ſenate, created commander in chief of the forces, which were then raiſing to be ſent againſt the city of Erbita, which had revolted from Syracuſe. Agathocles, ſeeing himſelf again at the head of an army, reſolved to get rid of all thoſe who were in a condition to thwart his deſigns. Having therefore appointed his troops to meet him early in the morning, at a place near Syracuſe called Timoleontium, he there told them, that before they employed their arms againſt the inhabitants of Erbita, they muſt clear Syracuſe of the ſix hundred tyrants, who were far more dangerous enemies than either the inhabitants of Erbita, or the Carthaginians themſelves; that Syracuſe could never enjoy a perfect tranquillity ſo long as one of them was left alive; that it was not enough to diſpatch the tyrants, unleſs at the ſame time all thoſe who ſided with them underwent the ſame fate. This was encouraging his ſoldiers, who were, for the moſt part, the ſcum of the populace, to murder the whole body of the nobility at once. For their further encouragement, he gave them leave to plunder the houſes, and ſeize on all the wealth of thoſe they ſhould put to death. When he had ended his ſpeech, the ſoldiery ſhewed an eager deſire to be led againſt the tyrants, as they called them, and to deliver Syracuſe from the oppreſſions it groaned under. Agathocles then entering the city, commanded the trumpets to ſound the charge; whereupon the ſoldiers falling upon all thoſe they met with, murdered them without diſtinction of rank, ſex, or age, plundered their houſes, and committed all ſorts of cruelties. In a few hours four thouſand and upwards were killed, and the ſtreets covered with dead bodies. But this was not enough for Agathocles; his deſign was not only to diſpatch the nobles, but to leave few of the other citizens alive to oppoſe him. Wherefore, when the ſlaughter was once begun, he encouraged his men to purſue the bloody maſſacre, giving them free liberty to plunder, raviſh, murder, and commit what enormities they pleaſed for two whole days and nights. The third day he ſummoned an aſſembly of the few who had outlived the general ſlaughter, and told them, that for the violent diſtemper, with which the ſtate had been long affected, he had been obliged to adminiſter a no leſs violent remedy; that he had nothing elſe in view but to reſtore the democracy, and reſcue the city from the cruel oppreſſions of a few tyrannical magiſtrates, and that for the future he would lead a private life free from further cares and toils. This he did to have the crown placed upon his head, as it were, by force; for he knew, that he had left none alive fit to govern, and on the other ſide was well aſſured, that thoſe who had aſſiſted him in ſpoiling and murdering their fellow-citizens, would not ſuffer him to reſign his authority, having no hopes of impunity but in veſting him with the ſupreme power, at whoſe inſtigation they had committed ſo many enormities. He therefore had no ſooner ended his ſpeech, but they all with one voice proclaimed him king, and decreed, that he ſhould thenceforth govern with an abſolute and uncontrolled power [u].

for

Agathocles proclaimed king.

BEING thus raiſed to the throne, the firſt law he enacted was, that all former debts ſhould be made void, and the lands equally divided among the rich and the poor. By this unjuſt decree he gained the affection of the common people, and ſo weakened the oppoſite party, that the very few nobles, who had outlived the general ſlaughter, were now upon a level with the meaneſt of the people. Agathocles, having thus triumphed over all his enemies, began to change his behaviour, and treat his ſubjects with a great deal of humanity and moderation, allowing every one to come freely into his preſence, and hearing patiently their complaints, which, when it lay in his power, he never failed to redreſs. He likewiſe publiſhed ſeveral wholeſome laws, ſeeking by all means to gain the love of his ſubjects, that he might be able to turn his arms againſt the other cities of Sicily, having a deſign to make himſelf maſter of the whole iſland. His ſubjects ſeemed diſpoſed to ſecond his ambitious views, which encouraged him to make war firſt on the neighbouring ſtates, and afterwards to carry his arms into the very heart of the iſland, which in the ſpace of two years has brought intirely under ſubjection, except a few cities that were held by the Carthaginians [w].

Reduces the greateſt part of Sicily.

WHEN news was brought to Carthage of the progreſs Agathocles made in Sicily, Amilcar was immediately diſpatched with a numerous fleet and a mighty army to put a ſtop to his conqueſts. The fleet was diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, in which Amilcar loſt ſixty ſhips of war and two hundred tranſports, with a great mumber of men. However, ever, being joined on his arrival by ſuch of the Sicilians as hated Agathocles, his army was in a few days increaſed to the number of forty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe. With theſe he took the field, and encamped near the city of Himera, where Agathocles attacked him, and with incredible bravery forced his trenches, and cut moſt of his forces in pieces. But while the Syracuſans were buſy in plundering the camp, a powerful ſupply arrived unexpectedly from Carthage, which revived the courage of thoſe who had fled to ſuch a degree, that they returned to the charge, and finding the Syracuſans in diſorder, attacked them in front, while the new ſupplies fell on their rear. Thus was the fortune of the day changed, and Agathocles, who thought himſelf ſure of the victory, obliged to ſave himſelf firſt in Gela, and afterwards within the walls of his metropolis. Thither the Carthaginians purſued him, and laid cloſe ſiege to that important place, which, if they could have taken it, would have put them in poſſeſſion of the whole iſland.

Agathocles defeated by the Carthaginians.

Syracuſe beſieged.

AGATHOCLES, being reduced to ſuch ſtraits, and abandoned by all his allies in Sicily from their abhorrence of his enormous cruelties, formed a deſign of ſo bold, and, in appearance, ſo impracticable a nature, that nothing but the ſucceſs, with which it was attended, could juſtify the undertaking of it. This deſign was to transfer the war into Africa, and beſiege Carthage, at a time when he himſelf was beſieged in his metropolis, which was the only city left him in Sicily. He communicated his deſign to no perſon whatſoever, but only told the Syracuſans in general terms, that he had found out an infallible way of freeing them from the impending calamities, and repairing all the loſſes they had ſuſtained to that day. He then choſe the moſt daring and intrepid among the ſoldiers and citizens of Syracuſe, ordering the foot to be ready with their their arms at the firſt call, and the horſemen to carry each along with him, beſides his arms, a ſaddle and a bridle. He ſet at liberty all the ſlaves, who were able to bear arms, and incorporated them among his troops. Haveing embarked all his forces, he appointed his brother Antandrus governor of Syracuſe, with forces and proviſions ſufficient to hold out a long ſiege, and taking with him his two ſons Archagathus and Heraclides; he went laſt on board himſelf. His fleet conſiſted of ſixty gallies, but the Carthaginian ſquadron, far more numerous than his, blocked up the mouth of the harbour, so that he was obliged to wait for some favourable opportunity to set sail. After he had attended a long time, and was ready to drop his design, a large fleet of transports appeared laden with corn and other provisions for Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians put to sea, and Agathocles no sooner saw the mouth of the harbour open, but he likewise hoisted sail. The Carthaginians at first imagined that the enemy's fleet was sent to defend the transports, and therefore tacking about prepared to engage. But Agathocles continued his course towards Africa, being closely pursued by the Carthaginians, till night coming on they lost sight of him. In the mean time, the transports, unexpectedly escaping the danger, plentifully supplied the city with corn and all other provisions. The Carthaginian admiral, finding that by pursuing two fleets at once he had missed them both, and that Agathocles did not return, resolved to pursue him close, and to prevent him from kindling the war in some other place. Having therefore sailed six days and six nights steering his coast towards Africa, he at last came up with the Syracusan fleet and engaged them. But as his men were quite tired out with rowing, the Syracusans gained the victory, and, having dispersed the enemy's fleet, landed safe on the coast of Africa at a place called the quarries [x].

Agathocles lands in Africa. Year of the flood 2685. Before Christ 319.

Agathocles, having thus landed his men in the heart of the enemies country, assembled his troops, and acquainted them in a few words with his design, and the motives which had prompted him to it; he told them, that the only way to divert the enemy from the siege of Syracuse, and drive them quite out of Sicily, was, to carry the war into their own country; that he led men inured to the hardships of war against an enemy softened and enervated by ease and luxury; that the natives of the country, who hated the Carthaginians, by whom they were treated rather like slaves than allies, would join them on the first news of their arrival; that the boldness of the attempt would strike the Carthaginians with terror, who were altogether unprepared to engage an enemy at the very gates of their metropolis; finally, that from no other enterprize they could reap more advantage and glory than from this, which

which would put them in poſſeſſion of the whole wealth of Carthage, and tranſmit their names and fame to the lateſt poſterity. The ſoldiers fancied themſelves already maſters of Africa, and applauded this ſpeech with loud ſhouts of joy and acclamations. Agathocles, finding his ſoldiers ſo well diſpoſed, reſolved to ſet fire to his fleet, and burn all his ſhips, except one or two for the carrying of diſpatches. Many reaſons determined him to ſo bold, or, as our hiſtorian calls it, ſo deſperate, an action. He had not one good harbour in Africa where his ſhips could lie with ſafety; wherefore as the Carthaginians were maſters at ſea, they would not fail to poſſeſs themſelves of his whole fleet, which was no ways in a condition to cope with theirs. As he had but a ſmall army, if he divided it, leaving troops ſufficient to defend the ſhips, he would not be ſtrong enough to encounter the enemy, and thereby be deprived of all the advantages of this unexpected diverſion. But what chiefly inſpired him with this reſolution was, that, the fleet being once deſtroyed, his men would be under a neceſſity of conquering, having no other hopes of ſafety remaining, ſave only in victory. Having therefore gained over before-hand ſuch of the officers as were entirely at his devotion, he aſſembled the ſoldiery, and appeared among them in his royal robes with a crown on his head, as if he were going to perform ſome religious ceremony. Then addreſſing himſelf to the aſſembly, he told them, that when they left Syracuſe, and were warmly purſued by the enemy, in that fatal danger he applied himſelf to Ceres and Proſerpine, the tutelar goddeſſeſs of Sicily, and promiſed to burn all the veſſels of the fleet in their honour, if they delivered them from the enemy, and helped them to land ſafe in Africa. Aid me therefore, O fellow ſoldiers, ſaid he, to diſcharge this vow, for the goddeſſes can eaſily make us amends for this ſacrifice. Having uttered theſe words, he took a torch in his hand and led the way, flying on board his own ſhip, and ſetting it on fire. All the officers did the like, and were chearfully followed by the ſoldiers. The trumpets ſounded from every quarter, and the whole ſhore ecchoed with joyful ſhouts and loud acclamations. The ſoldiers had not been allowed time to reflect on what they were doing, being hurried on by a blind and impetuous ardor; but when they had leiſure to weigh every particular, and were appriſed of the danger they were in, being ſeparated from their own country by the vaſt ocean, and

and in the midst of the enemy's, without the least hopes or means of escaping, a sad and melancholy silence succeeded that transport of joy and those acclamations, which, but a moment before, had been so general in the army [y].

Here again Agathocles left no time for reflection, but to raise again the drooping spirits of his soldiers, he led them against an important place called the Great City, which was subject to Carthage. The country through which they marched offered the most agreeable prospect imaginable. On either side, were spacious meadows, covered with flocks of all kinds of cattle, country-houses, built with extraordinary magnificence, delightful avenues, planted with all sorts of fruit-trees, delicious gardens, of a prodigious extent, and kept with all possible care and elegance, &c. This prospect re-animated the soldiers, who were again willing to run any danger in hopes of obtaining so pleasant and wealthy a country as a reward of their toils and labour. They marched full of courage to the Great City, took it by storm, and enriched themselves with the plunder, which was entirely abandoned to them. Thence they advanced to Tunis, which they likewise took sword in hand and plundered. The soldiers were for garisoning these two cities, that they might have some place to retire to in case of any misfortune; but Agathocles, that they might have no hopes of safety but in victory, caused them both to be levelled with the ground, and encamped in the open fields [z].

In the mean time, the news of this unexpected descent, reaching Carthage, threw the whole city into the utmost terror and confusion. They all concluded, that their army before Syracuse was entirely cut off and their fleet lost. The people hastened with trembling hearts to the market place, while the senate assembled in a tumultuous manner to deliberate how they might save the city, which the victorious enemy was with long marches advancing to besiege. They had no army in readiness to make head against the enemy, and their present danger did not allow them to wait till forces were levied among their allies. It was therefore resolved after long debates, that the citizens should be armed; and accordingly in a few days they had on foot an army of forty thousand foot and a thousand horse, with two hundred armed chariots. They appointed Hanno and Bo-

Bomilcar to command the forces, notwithſtanding the antient grudges that ſtill ſubſiſted between their families, hoping, that they would ſtrive to outvie one another in the defence of their common country, and by that means turn their private quarrels to the public advantage. The generals immediately took the field, and, poſſeſſing themſelves of an eminence not far from the enemy, drew up their troops, in battle array. Agathocles had only fourteen thouſand men, and was therefore not a little ſurprized when he ſaw ſo numerous an army ready to engage him. However, he diſſembled his fear, and in order to encourage his men, who were quite diſpirited and under great apprehenſions of the enemies horſe and chariots, he let out ſeveral owls, which he had before prepared for that purpoſe. Theſe, flying about the camp and lighting on the ſoldiers ſhields, ſo raiſed their ſpirits, that of their own accord they began to advance againſt the enemy, not doubting, but by the aſſiſtance of Minerva, to whom that bird was ſacred, and therefore looked upon by all the Greeks as a good omen, they ſhould gain a complete victory. Agathocles willingly ſeconded their ardor, and putting himſelf at their head charged the Carthaginians with incredible vigor. Hanno with the ſacred cohort, which conſiſted of the flower of the troops, ſuſtained a long time the fury of the Greeks, and even put them in diſorder, but being overwhelmed with ſhowers of darts and covered with wounds, he fell fighting bravely to the laſt. Bomilcar, underſtanding that his rival was ſlain, looked upon this as a favourable opportunity of poſſeſſing himſelf of the ſovereignty, to which he had long aſpired. But, as he was ſenſible that he could not accompliſh his deſign, if the army of Agathocles were deſtroyed, but might eaſily put it in execution if the enemy conquered, he reſolved to retire with the forces under his command, not doubting, but he ſhould be able to get the better of Agathocles whenever he pleaſed. Accordingly acquainting his men with Hanno's death, he ordered them to keep their ranks, and retire in good order to a neighbouring hill, as the only means to eſcape the fury of the victorious enemy. But, as their retreat looked like a flight, the Greeks purſued them ſo cloſe, that they put them in diſorder, and gained a complete victory. The ſacred cohort fought with great bravery, even after the death of Hanno, and couragiouſly advanced over the dead bodies bodies of their fellow soldiers, till they saw themselves abandoned by the whole army, and in danger of being surrounded by the enemy. They then retired in good order, and gained an eminence, where they halted, and anew made head against those who pursued them; but, not being supported by Bomilcar, they were either cut off, or forced to save themselves by flight, after having distinguished themselves in a very eminent manner. Two hundred Greeks were slain in the battle, and a thousand, or, according to some, six thousand Carthaginians; so that the slaughter on neither side was considerable. Agathocles, after having pursued the enemy for some time, returned and allowed his soldiers to plunder the Carthaginian camp, where they found twenty thousand pair of fetters and manacles, which the enemy had provided, not doubting, but they should take many prisoners [a].

THE Carthaginians, now giving all up for lost, dispatched messenger after messenger to Hamilcar in Sicily, with the news of what happened in Africa, and express orders to hasten over to the relief of his country. When the messengers arrived, Hamilcar commanded them not once to mention the victory of Agathocles; but on the contrary to noise it abroad in the camp, that he had been entirely defeated, his forces all cut off, and his fleet taken by the Carthaginians. The senate of Carthage had sent to Hamilcar by the messengers all the beaks of the Syracusan ships, that this report might more easily gain credit, for it was by their orders that he had caused it to be spread abroad. Hamilcar therefore immediately dispatched embassadors to Syracuse with the beaks of the ships, summoning the governor and citizens to deliver up the city, since their army and fleet in Africa were utterly destroyed. This sad news was commonly believed, and the whole city thrown into the utmost confusion. But the leading men, to prevent the mischiefs that might attend so general consternation, not only dismissed the messengers without any answer, but drove out eight thousand of their citizens, who seemed inclined to capitulate with the enemy. Hamilcar entertained the exiles with great kindness, and understanding from them the miserable condition the city was in, he resolved to assault it on all quarters at once, but first sent new deputies, puties, promiſing to ſpare Antandrus and all thoſe who ſided with him, if he delivered the city up into his hands. Hereupen a council of war was ſummoned, when Antandrus, who was very unlike his brother, was for capitulating: But Eurymnon the Ætolian, whom Agathocles had left to aſſiſt his brother with his advice, prevailed upon him and the reſt to hold out, till they had certain intelligence of the truth. The aſſembly was ſcarce diſmiſſed, when a galley with thirty oars arrived from Africa, and brought the agreeable news of Agathocles's victory, which immediately flew through the city, and reſtored life and reſolution to the inhabitants. Hamilcar made a laſt effort to ſtorm the city, but being repulſed with loſs, he raiſed the ſiege, and ſent five thouſand men to the relief of his diſtreſſed country. All his forces he thought it needleſs to ſend, and ſtill entertained hopes of obliging Agathocles to quit Africa and return to the defence of his own kingdom. He ſpent ſome time in reducing ſuch cities as ſided with the Syracuſans, and, after having brought all their allies under ſubjection, he returned again to Syracuſe, hoping to ſurpriſe the city by attacking it in the night. But the Syracuſans, having timely notice of his deſign, made a ſally unexpectedly, routed his army, which was an hundred and twenty thouſand men ſtrong, and took Hamilcar himſelf priſoner. We are told, that Hamilcar dreamt the night before that he ſhould ſup the next day in Syracuſe: his dream proved true, but the entertainment he met with was not much to his ſatisfaction: for thoſe, whoſe parents and relations he had barbarouſly murdered, led him in chains about the ſtreets of the city, and, after having vented their rage on their miſerable captive by all ſorts of torments, ſtruck off his head and ſent it into Africa, a welcome preſent to Agathocles, who, advancing to the enemy's camp, and ſhewing them their general, ſtruck them with ſuch terror, that their commanders, with the utmoſt difficulty, kept them from abandoning the camp and returning to Carthage [b].

The Carthaginians defeated in Sicily, and Hamilcar killed.

AGATHOCLES had already reduced all the cities ſubject to the Carthaginians, and was preparing to beſiege Carthage itſelf. But, before he ventured upon ſo difficult and hazardous an enterprize, he ſent embaſſadors to all the princes of Africa, inviting them to join the common cauſe, and and lend him their assistance in overturning that imperious republic, which, with so much haughtiness, lorded it over them. His chief design was to gain over Ophellas prince of the Cyreneans, who had been one of Alexander's captains, and at that time had on foot an army of ten thousand regular troops, and was contriving how he might enlarge his dominions. The embassadors sent to him were charged to flatter his ambition, by promising him, in their master's name, the sovereignty of all Africa, which Agathocles had invaded with no other view but to oblige the Carthaginians to quit Sicily. Ophellas allured by his promise set out at the head of twenty thousand men, and after two months march, mostly through sandy deserts, joined at last Agathocles. As that prince did not scruple to commit the most enormous crimes to promote his interest, Ophellas had no sooner put himself and his army in his power, than by the blackest perfidy he caused him to be murdered, and by fair words and large promises prevailed upon his army, now destitute of a leader, to serve under him, and be entirely at his devotion. Such of the Cyreneans as he found unfit to bear arms, for many of them had brought along with them their wives and children, he put on board some transports and sent them to Syracuse, where few of them arrived, most of the ships being cast away near the Pithecusan islands. Agathocles seeing himself now at the head of a numerous army assumed the title of king of Africa, and as Carthage was the only city that still held out, he invested it on all sides, with a design to reduce it by famine [e].

Agathocles returns to Sicily.

While he was lying before Carthage, news was brought him, that, after the defeat of the Carthaginians in Sicily and the death of Hamilcar, most of the cities, whether subject to the Carthaginians or Syracusans, had taken up arms, and entered into an association in defence of their liberties. As his affairs in Africa were in a very flourishing condition, he thought he might safely return for a while into Sicily. Having therefore built some open vessels with fifty oars apiece, and put two thousand men on board, he set sail for Sicily, leaving his son Archagathus commander in chief of his African army. The fame of his victories flew before him, and the news of his arrival struck the confederates with such terror, that many cities submitted

submitted of their own accord; others were reduced by dint of arms, and in a short time the whole island, except some few cities subject to the Carthaginians, acknowledged the sovereignty of Agathocles. Having thus settled affairs in Sicily, he returned to Africa, where he found the face of things quite changed by his absence. His son Archagathus had lost a battle, and his army was ready to revolt for want of provisions; the Carthaginians had recovered their courage, and were encamped in an advantageous post, whence it was no easy matter to dislodge them, all the avenues to the enemy's camp were guarded by strong detachments, and no pass was left open for the conveying of provisions to Agathocles's army, which was already in the utmost distress. In this critical juncture Agathocles attacked the enemy's camp, but was repulsed with the loss of three thousand men. After this unsuccessful attempt, all the Africans in his army deserted him. Whereupon, not having a sufficient force to contend with the Carthaginians, he resolved to leave Africa. But as he could not possibly transport his army, both for want of ships and because the Carthaginians were masters at sea, he determined to slip away privately, taking along with him only a few of his friends and his younger son Heraclides; for as Archagathus, was a daring young man, he had always entertained some jealousy of him. But Archagathus being apprised of his design, discovered it to the officers and commanders of thearmy, and these to the soldiery, who immediately running to their arms, seized on Agathocles and committed him to custody. The army being now without a head, there was nothing in the camp but tumult and confusion. The ensuing night a report being spread, that the enemy was advancing to attack them, they were all seized with a panic fear, and having none to command them, every one was preparing to save himself by flight, though they knew not whither to fly. In this confusion Agathocles with a small attendance stole away, and imbarking on board a small vessel put to sea, leaving his children to the wild fury of the disappointed soldiers, who immediately putting his two sons to death, chose leaders among themselves, and concluded a peace with the Carthaginians, upon the following terms: That the Greeks should deliver up all the places they held in Africa, receiving from them three hundred talents; that such of them as were willing to serve under the Carthaginians should be kindly treated and receive the usual pay; that the rest should be transported to Sicily, and have the city of Selinus for their habitation. These articles were agreed to and punctually observed by the Carthaginians. Our historian observes, that Agathocles lost both his army and his children the same month, and the same day of the month, on which he treacherously murdered Ophellas and brought over to himself his army [d].

Cruelties in Sicily.

AGATHOCLES was no sooner landed in Sicily, but sending for part of his forces he marched against the Egestines, who had revolted in his absence, and having taken the town by storm, he put all the inhabitants to death, without distinction of sex or age. The nobles he caused to be first tortured with the most exquisite torments rage or malice could invent. When news was brought him of the death of his children in Africa, he ordered his brother Antandrus, governor of Syracuse, to put all those to death, who were any ways related to such of the Syracusans as had attended him in the Carthaginian expedition. His orders were put in execution with such cruelty, that the sea was died a great way with blood. Such an inhuman butchery had never before been heard of even in Sicily, all those who were related to any of the African army, from the great grand-father to the sucking child, being barbarously murdered by the tyrant's orders [e].

THIS inhuman cruelty raised him many enemies, who joining Dinocrates, whom the tyrant had banished, reduced him to such straits, that he was fain to court the friendship of the Carthaginians, and purchase a peace with them at a very dear rate, for he restored to them all the cities which they had formerly possessed in Sicily. He even sent embassadors to Dinocrates, offering to resign the sovereignty, provided two strong holds, which he named, were left in his hands for the greater security of his person. These proposals were rejected by Dinocrates, who aspired himself to the supreme power, and had then under his command above twenty thousand foot and three hundred horse, which he must have disbanded, and submitted to the democracy, if Agathocles had abdicated the tyranny. Agathocles, finding he could not upon any terms obtain a peace, resolved to put all to the issue of a battle, and attacking Dinocrates in his camp put him to flight, and gained a complete victory, with five thousand foot only and eight hundred horse. The remains mains of the ſhattered army retired to a neighbouring eminence, where they ſent deputies to capitulate with the conqueror, who promiſed to ſpare their lives, provided they delivered up their arms. But they were no ſooner diſarmed, than the tyrants cauſed them to be hemmed in, and all to a man put to the ſword. As for Dinocrates, who was a man of the ſame ſtamp with himſelf, he received him into his friendſhip, and ever after entruſted him with his moſt weighty affairs. After this victory, Agathocles in two years time brought the whole iſland under ſubjection, ſave thoſe cities only, which by the late treaty he had reſtored to the Carthaginians[f].

AGATHOCLES, having nothing more to do in Sicily, paſſed over into Italy, where he ſubdued the Brutii, rather by the terror of his name, than by force of arms. From Italy he paſſed over to the Lipari iſlands, and obliged the inhabitants, who lived in perfect peace and ſecurity, to pay him an hundred talents of gold. After he had received this ſum, which was all they had, he plundered the ſacred treaſure, ſtripp'd the temples, and then ſet ſail for Syracuſe, with eleven ſhips laden with the gold and ſpoils of the temples. But, a violent ſtorm ariſing, all the veſſels were caſt away, except one galley, on which he himſelf eſcaped to ſuffer a more miſerable end. He was poiſoned by one Mœnon, whom he had unnaturally abuſed, at the inſtigation of his grandſon Archagathus. It was the tyrant's cuſtom always after his meals to pick his teeth with a quill, which Mœnon having dipp'd in poiſon, his teeth and gums putrified, and his whole body was tortured with the moſt racking pains, in the height of which he was hurried away to the funeral pile and burnt, while he was ſtill alive, in the twenty-eighth year of his reign and ninety-fifth of his age. He was a man of great boldneſs and reſolution, but of a moſt cruel and ſavage temper; for he is ſaid to have put more perſons to death in the three laſt years of his life, than all the tyrants before him during the whole time of their reſpective reigns. He never forgot his mean extraction, but rather gloried in the contemptible calling of a potter, which he had followed in his youth, ſaying, that it ſet off with more luſtre the high ſtation to which his own valor had advanced him; nay, even in public entertainments, while his guests guests were served in gold and silver plate, he used to eat in earthen ware, saying, that though he wore a diadem, yet he was still a potter (M). From the meanness of his condition Polybius endeavours to prove his capacity and talents, in opposition to Timæus, who tells us, that his rise was entirely owing to fortune, and not to any parts of his own. Scipio Africanus agrees with Polybius; for that illustrious Roman being asked, who, in his opinion, were the most prudent in the conduct of their affairs, and most judiciously bold in the execution of their designs, answered, Agathocles and Dionysius the elder [s]. The descent of Agathocles into Africa prompted Scipio to make the same attempt, wherefore in his answer to Fabius, who did not approve of his design, he did not forget to mention Agathocles as an instance in favour of his enterprize, and to shew, that frequently there is no other way to get rid of an enemy, but by carrying the war into his country. But how great soever Agathocles's parts may have been, they were far exceeded by his cruelties, which have rendered his memory execrable, and obscured the glory of his greatest conquests.

Messana seized by the Mamertini.

It was after the death of Agathocles, that the Mamertini treacherously seized on Messana, and by degrees possessed themselves of a considerable part of the island. According to the Latin writers the Mamertini were originally Campani, and assumed the name of Mamertini, that is, invincible warriors, from the word Mamers or Mavors, signifying Mars the god of war. As they were a bold and resolute nation, they were invited into Sicily by Agathocles to assist him in his conquests, but being disbanded after his death they they retired to Meſſana, with a deſign to return to their own country. The inhabitants of Meſſana admitted them into the city, and entertained them with great kindneſs, which was ill requited by them; for being charmed with an habitation, which greatly reſembled their native country, they reſolved to ſettle there, ſeize on the city, and form themſelves into a republic. Accordingly they fell unexpectedly upon the antient inhabitants, put all the men to the ſword, and married their wives and daughters. Being maſters of the city, they not only maintained themſelves in their uſurpation, but reduced moſt of the neighbouring ſtates, and extended their dominions to the middle of the iſland. Sicily was at that time a prey to numberleſs tyrants, and the Mamertini were powerfully aſſiſted by the inhabitants of Rhegium, where a Roman legion had ſettled, by following their example in murdering the citizens who had called them to their aſſiſtance.

The diſtracted ſtate of Syracuſe.

But to return to Syracuſe; that unfortunate city underwent many revolutions after the death of Agathocles. Mœnon, who had poiſoned him, uſurped the ſupreme authority, but being driven out by Hycetas he had recourſe to the Carthaginians, which gave riſe to a new war, wherein Hycetas having gained ſeveral victories over the joint forces of Mœnon and the Carthaginians, he at laſt ſeized on that authority of which he had deprived his rival, and governed Syracuſe with an abſolute ſway, though he declined the title of king, contenting himſelf with that of prætor. In the ninth year of his command, the Agrigentines having revolted, he left Syracuſe and marched out againſt Phintias, who was at the head of the rebels and Syracuſan exiles. In his abſence one Tœnion poſſeſſed himſelf of the ſovereign power, but being oppoſed by Soſiſtrates, who had the ſame aim, a civil war broke out within the very walls of the city; Tœnion held the iſland, and his rival the other quarters of the city. In the mean time, the Carthaginians, taking advantage of theſe diviſions, reduced moſt of the cities ſubject to Syracuſe, and inveſted that capital itſelf with a mighty fleet and an army of fifty thouſand men. A regard therefore to common good united the two competitors Tœnion and Soſiſtrates. They were tired of a war, which could only end in their common ruin, and therefore joined together in inviting Pyrrhus king of Epirus to put an end to the troubles, which threatened the ſtate with utter deſtruction. Many reaſons prompted them to have recourſe to Pyrrhus, rather than to any other of the many ſovereigns, who reigned at that time in Europe and Aſia. Pyrrhus had married Laneſſa the daughter of Agathocles, and had by her a ſon, whom the Syracuſans thought it reaſonable to place on the throne of his grandfather, ſince they could not by any other means rid themſelves of their domeſtic tyrants. Beſides, he had already given ſignal proofs of his courage, and therefore ſeemed the beſt qualified of any to make head againſt the Carthaginians, and ſtop the great progreſs they were making towards the reduction of the whole iſland. The Leontines and Agrigentines joined with Tœnion and Soſiſtrates, in preſſing the king of Epirus to come and take upon him the defence of their reſpective ſtates, offering to deliver up their cities into his hands. Pyrrhus, who wanted but an honourable pretence to withdraw from Italy, where he was engaged in a war with the Romans, willingly complied with the requeſt of the Sicilians, and, leaving a ſtrong gariſon in Tarentum, imbarqued for Sicily, where he landed among the acclamations of a numberleſs multitude, which on the news of his approach had flocked to meet him. Tœnion and Soſiſtrates immediately put him in poſſeſſion of the city, the fleet, and public treaſure. All the cities on that coaſt followed the example of Syracuſe, the name of Pyrrhus reſounding every-where, as if victory had landed with him. His inſinuating and affable behaviour at firſt gained him the hearts of all the Sicilians; and as he had an army of thirty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe, with a fleet of two hundred ſail, he drove the Carthaginians from place to place, till he diveſted them of all their acquiſitions in the iſland, except the two important places of Eryx and Lilybæum. The former he took by aſſault, and was himſelf the firſt man that mounted the wall, after having killed a great many of the Africans with his own hand. The Mamertini likewiſe felt the effects of his courage, being defeated by him in a pitched battle, driven from all the places they poſſeſſed, and ſhut up within the walls of Meſſana. The Carthaginians, alarmed at the rapidity of his conqueſt, ſent embaſſadors to treat of a peace with him upon very advantageous terms; but he, puffed up with his great ſucceſs, anſwered them, that the only means to obtain what they deſired was, to abandon Sicily, and let the Lybian ſea be the boundary between Carthage and Greece. He depended ſo much on the reduction of the whole iſland, that he ſtiled his ſon by the daughter of

Agathocles

Agathocles king of Sicily, and cauſed him to be acknowledged as ſuch by the Syracuſans and their confederates. Having thus put his ſon in poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Sicily, he began to entertain thoughts of ſailing over into Africa, and making war on the Carthaginians in their own territories, though they were ſtill maſters of Lilybæum, which was a key to the whole iſland. This deſign was noways agreeable to the Sicilians, who were ſenſible, that they could not enjoy a perfect tranquillity, ſo long as the Carthaginians had any footing in the iſland. Beſides, Meſſana was ſtill in the hands of the Mamertini, who, as they were a warlike people, would not fail to take advantage of the king's abſence and raiſe new diſturbances. They therefore did all that lay in their power to diſſuade him from his African expedition: But, notwithſtanding their remonſtrances, he perſiſted in his new reſolution, and began to make the neceſſary preparations for the conqueſt of Africa, which he hoped to ſubdue with as little trouble as he had done Sicily [h].

He diſobliges the Sicilians.

PYRRHUS had ſhips enough of his own for this expedition, but, as he wanted ſea-men, he obliged the maritime cities in his intereſt to furniſh him with ſailors and mariners, and even forced into the ſervice perſons of rank, who had any experience in maritime affairs. The cities complained of this violence, but he had no regard to their complaints. However, the Sicilians bore theſe outrages with patience, as they carried ſome appearance of zeal for the public welfare. But the king, who could bear no contradiction, taking offence at their oppoſing his new ſcheme, began to treat them more like an arbitrary tyrant, than a prince who was come to deliver them from the oppreſſions they groaned under; which ſoon drew upon him the hatred of the whole nation. In defiance of the cuſtoms of the country, he conferred the firſt dignities and the governments of the cities on foreigners, and continued them in their employments as long as he thought proper, without any regard to the time preſcribed by law. As to judicial proceedings with reſpect to private property and other affairs of that nature, he either decided them by his own arbitrary ſentence, or left them to the determination of his courtiers, whoſe ſole views were to enrich themſelves. A conduct ſo different different from that, by which he had at firſt ſucceeded ſo well in his enterprizes, could not but eſtrange the minds of the people from him; and when he plainly ſaw that he was univerſally hated, and that the Sicilians, not able to brook his arbitrary government, were contriving how to ſhake off the yoke, he placed in moſt of the cities ſuch gariſons as he knew to be entirely at his devotion, under pretence, that the Carthaginians were preparing to renew the war. He likewiſe ſeized the moſt powerful and illuſtrious citizens of each city, and, charging them with treaſonable practices, either put them to death, or baniſhed them the iſland. Full of jealouſy, as all tyrants are, he would have forced Soſiſtrates to attend him into Africa, not thinking it ſafe to leave him in Syracuſe, during his abſence. But Soſiſtrates, to avoid complying with his commands, revolted from him and retired from his native city. As for Tœnion, he was more complaiſant and continued with the king; but, while he believed himſelf one of his chief favourites, he was by his order cruelly aſſaſſinated. Tœnion had crowned him king of Syracuſe on his firſt landing, and contributed more than any other perſon to the reduction of Sicily; but all the important ſervices he had rendered the king were not ſufficient to exempt him from the cruel effects of his jealouſy. Such tyrannical proceedings put an end to the ſucceſs of Pyrrhus in Sicily. The averſion, which the cities conceived againſt him, was ſo great, that ſome of them entered into a league with the Carthaginians, and others with the Mamertines his avowed enemies. His troops were ſoon reduced to his Epirot Phalanx, the Sicilians daily deſerting in crouds and encreaſing the enemies forces. When Carthage heard of this change, new troops were raiſed all over Africa, and a numerous army ſent into Sicily to recover the antient conqueſts of the African republic; whilſt a mighty fleet cruiſed round the iſland to prevent Pyrrhus from making his eſcape [i].

He abandons Sicily and returns to Italy

This was the ſituation of Pyrrhus's affairs, when deputies came to him from the Samnites, Tarentines, Brutians, and Lucanians, whom he had abandoned to purſue new conqueſts in Sicily. They repreſented to him the dangers they had been in, and the loſſes they had ſuſtained ſince his departure, and remonſtrated, that without his aſſiſtance their cities and liberties muſt fall a ſacrifice to the Romans, who

who had already diſpoſſeſſed them of their lands, and ſhut them up within their walls. This embaſſy furniſhed him with an honourable pretence for his departure; he was glad to have an opportunity of making the world believe, that he had abandoned Sicily, not out of fear of the enemy, but to comply with the requeſts of his allies. He therefore ſeemed at firſt to deliberate what part to chuſe, being, as it were, divided between Sicily, Africa, and Italy. But Italy prevailed, and he began to prepare for his voyage, from which his new ſubjects in Sicily did not offer to divert him. When he was on the point of ſetting ſail, he cried out, at the ſight of that wealthy country which he was abandoning, What a fine field of battle do we leave to the Carthaginians and Romans! A prediction, which was ſoon fulfilled. He imbarqued on the ſhips which he had brought with him from Italy, but was met at ſea by the Carthaginians, who attacking him ſunk ſeventy of his gallies, and diſperſed or took the reſt, ſo that he ſaved himſelf in the ports of Italy with only twelve veſſels, the poor remains of a fleet of two hundred ſail. Nor was this all: The Mamertines no ſooner heard of his departure, but they detached a body of eighteen thouſand men to haraſs him after his landing. Theſe, having paſſed the ſtreights before him, poſted themſelves in the road, which Pyrrhus muſt take in marching by land to Tarentum, and, lying concealed among the woods and rocks, attacked him unexpectedly and with great reſolution. But Pyrrhus behaved himſelf on this occaſion with his uſual bravery. The attack being made on his rear, he haſtened thither, and at the head of his men made a dreadful ſlaughter of the enemy, till a wound he received on the head obliged him to retire. But he ſoon returned to the charge with freſh fury. As he was ſuppoſed to be diſabled by his wound, a proud Mamertine, of an extraordinary ſize and ſhining in bright armour, advanced out of the ranks, and with a loud voice challenged the king of Epirus, if he was yet alive, to a ſingle combat. Pyrrhus immediately turned about, and making a dreadful appearance by reaſon of the blood which ran down his face, flew upon this new champion, and diſcharged ſuch a blow on his head, that he cleaved him in two, one part of his body falling to the right, and the other to the left. This feat, which has been aſcribed to other warriors, perhaps with as much truth as to

Pyrrhus,

Pyrrhus, filled the Mamertines with terror, who suffered the Epirots to continue their march to Tarentum [k].

Hiero appointed general of the Syracusans.

UPON the Departure of Pyrrhus, Hiero was appointed to command the Syracusan forces, and make head against the Carthaginians, who had regained most of the places which they possessed before the arrival of the Epirots. Hiero was the son of Hierocles, one of the descendants of Gelon the first king of Syracuse, of whose glorious reign and exploits we have already given a full account. His descent was not so honourable by the mother's side; for she was a slave and of a very mean extraction. Wherefore Hierocles, or, as Justin calls him, Hieroclytus, thinking it beneath him to take care of the education of a son, who was the fruit of an unlawful intercourse, caused him, according to the barbarous customs of those days, to be exposed soon after his birth in a forest, where a swarm of bees is said to have nourished him some days with their honey. Upon the report of this prodigy, Hierocles consulted the soothsayers, who told him, that this son of his would one day mount the throne of his ancestors, and restore its family to its antient splendor. The father, being pleased with this answer, owned him, and caused him to be brought up in a manner suitable to his birth. When he came to man's estate, he distinguished himself by his courage, prudence, and address in all military exercises. He made his first campaigns under Pyrrhus, who had a great value for him, and honoured him with such rewards as generals used to bestow on those who excelled the rest in valour. In his first campaign an eagle is said to have perched upon his helmet and an owl upon his lance; and these two birds, the former being the symbol of valour the latter of wisdom, seemed to confirm the first prediction. And, indeed, young Hiero did not bely those prognostics, he so improved in the art of war under the direction of so great a master as the king of Epirus, that he was looked upon as the best commander in the army, when he was but twenty-five years of age. But his great moderation, affability, and engaging behaviour gained him more honour than his military exploits. He seemed to have been born for virtue, and to be governed by no other passion but the love of glory. Justin draws the following picture of this brave brave youth. He was exceeding handſome, of a robuſt conſtitution, and an extraordinary ſtrength. His affability in converſation, equity in the management of affairs, and moderation in the government of the people were ſuch, that he wanted nothing but a crown to be a great king. And this his great merit ſoon procured him, as we ſhall ſee anon.

When Pyrrhus left Sicily, the city of Syracuſe, being deſtitute of a governor, fell into the greateſt diſorders. To put a to ſtop this confuſion, the troops choſe Hiero and Artemidorus for their commanders; and the two generals had nothing more at heart than to re-eſtabliſh good order in the capital. With this view they entered the city at the head of the army, and Hiero on this occaſion firſt diſcovered an uncommon talent and genius for governing. By the arts of inſinuation and addreſs, without ſhedding of blood or hurting one ſingle citizen, he calmed the minds of the people, reconciled the factions, and ſo gained the hearts of all, that the Syracuſans, though highly diſſatisfied with the ſoldiery for aſſuming the right of chuſing their own generals, yet unanimouſly confirmed him in the command, inveſting him with all civil and military power during the interregnum [1].

Hiero, being now at the head of the army, began to take ſuch meaſures as ſhould prevent any further diſturbances in the city. He obſerved, that the generals and troops no ſooner left the city to take the field, but Syracuſe was involved in new troubles by ſeditious ſpirits and lovers of novelty. He thought it therefore neceſſary to have ſome perſon of merit and rank, upon whom he might rely for retaining the city in its duty, during his abſence and that of the army. Leptines ſeemed very fit for this purpoſe, being a man of great intereſt and authority among the people. In order therefore to attach him to his intereſt, he married his daughter, and always left his father-in-law governor of the city when he took the field; by which means he ſecured both himſelf and the public tranquillity. Another thing that gave Hiero great uneaſineſs and raiſed frequent diſturbances was, the ungovernable temper of the mercenaries in the ſervice of the republic. They had no reſpect for their commanders, nor affection for a ſtate of which

which they were no part, and therefore always ready to revolt, and even join the enemy, when their unjuſt demands were not complied with, and their hopes of gain not anſwered. They were ſo united among themſelves, that Hiero could not by any means get the better of them; if he undertook to puniſh the moſt criminal among them, the whole corps took his part; ſo that the general was rather governed by them than they by him. He therefore concluded, that the only means to put an end to the troubles they occaſioned, was utterly to extirpate that ſeditious body, whoſe licentiouſneſs and rebellious diſpoſition could only corrupt others, and incline them to the ſame pernicious practices. Accordingly he came at laſt to this reſolution, which was contrary to his natural inclination, but judged by him neceſſary for the tranquillity of his country and ſafety of his own perſon. He took the field under the pretence of marching againſt the Mamertines; but when he came within ſight of the enemy, he divided his army into two bodies, the one compoſed of Syracuſans the other of mercenaries; he ordered the latter to begin the charge, putting himſelf at the head of the former as if he deſigned to ſupport them. The mercenaries fell upon the enemy with the utmoſt fury, but, being abandoned by the Syracuſans, were all cut to pieces. The Syracuſan troops he brought back ſafe to the city, having taken care to poſt them ſo as to have a river between them and the enemy [m].

Hiero, having thus purged his army of thoſe mutineers, revived the military diſcipline among the Syracuſans, took other mercenaries more tractable into his ſervice, and by degrees rendered his army formidable both to the Carthaginians and Mamertines. He firſt made trial of their valour againſt the latter, who, elated with the advantage they had gained over the mercenaries, marched into the territories of Syracuſe, deſtroying all before them with fire and ſword. Hereupon, Hiero took the field, engaged them in the plains of Mylæ (N), utterly defeated them and

and took their general, by name Cios, priſoner. Cios, being carried to the Syracuſan camp, ſaw there the horſe which his ſon had rode in the battle, and taking it for granted that he was killed, reſolved to live no longer; and accordingly looſening the ligatures of his wounds, he ſoon after expired. By his death the Mamertines being deſtitute of a head, Hiero invaded their territories, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the cities of Mylæ, Amaſela, Alæſa, and Abacænum (O), and then returned loaded with glory and booty to Syracuſe, where he was declared king by the unanimous conſent of the citizens, and ſoon after acknowledged as ſuch by all the allies. This happened ſeven years after he had been inveſted with the command of the army [n].

The Mamertines reduced to great ſtraits by Hiero.

SOME time after his acceſſion to the throne he again worſted the Mamertines, and reduced them to ſuch ſtraits, that they began to entertain thoughts of ſurrendering their city to him. Accordingly, they ſent embaſſadors inviting him to a parley, wherein it was agreed, that the city of Meſſana ſhould be put into his hands, and that he ſhould maintain the inhabitants in the poſſeſſion of their antient rights and privileges, and protect them againſt any foreign invaſion. But as Hiero was advancing to take poſſeſſion of the place, he was deceitfully prevented by Hannibal, who

a very convenient harbour. Pliny ſpeaks of a fountain near Mylæ, which dried up in winter, and was full of water dureing the hotteſt part of the ſummer (39). Fazellus tells us, that he obſerved the ſame thing. The ſituation of the city of Amaſela is altogether unknown.

(O) Abacænum ſtood in the north part of Sicily. Cluverius places it near the little city of Tripio. As for the city of Tyndaris, it was not far diſtant from Abacænum, and the name of it ſtill preſerved in the place called at preſent Santa Maria di Tyndaro. It was originally a colony of the Lacedæmonians, who were ſuppoſed to have given it the name of Tyndaris, from Tyndarus the father of Leda. In this city was antiently a temple dedicated to Mercury, and a ſtatue of that god, which was looked upon as a maſter-piece of art. Pliny tells us, that a great part of Tyndarus was ſwallowed up by the ſea (40).

who at that time commanded the Carthaginian forces in Sicily. The cunning African came, as it were, to congratulate Hiero on his late victory, and amused him, till some troops, which he had kept concealed in the Lipari islands, drew near Messana. The officer, who commanded that detachment, assured the Mamertines that he came as a friend, and that his only design was to assist them against the Syracusans, and prevent them from delivering their city into the enemy's hands. The Mamertines, seeing themselves supported with a new reinforcement, summoned an assembly to deliberate on what measures they should take in so critical a juncture. The members of the assembly were divided in their opinions; some were for accepting the protection Carthage offered them, others for surrendering to Hiero, with whose mild government and strict honour they were well acquainted; but the greatest part were for calling the Romans to the assistance of a city, whose inhabitants were originally Italians [a].

The Mamertines call in the Romans.

The Mamertines, before they fought the last battle with Hiero, had sent deputies to Rome, imploring the assistance of the Roman senate and people against the invasions of their neighbours; and the people, at the instigation of the consuls, had promised to comply with their request. But the senate, having more regard to honour and equity than the people, were not yet come ot any resolution. They considered, that the Silicians were only endeavouring to recover a city which the Mamertines had taken by the blackest treachery, and thought it altogether unworthy of the Roman virtue to undertake openly the defence of traitors, who were guilty of the same perfidy, which they had lately punished in the Rhegians with the utmost severity. The senate therefore could not be prevailed upon to come into the measures of the people, so long as the Mamertines had no enemies to contend with except the Syracusans. But when news was brought to Rome, that the Carthaginians had entered Messana, and offered to defend it, the conscript fathers changed their mind. They were sensible, that Carthage undertook the defence of that important place only with a design to seize it for herself, and therefore, as they did not care to be so near neighbours to that powerful republic, they forgot the strict regard they had hitherto had to probity, came readily into the people's measures, and agreed to send the consul Appius Claudius to to attempt the deliverance of Meſſana, and ſtop the progreſs of the Carthaginians [q].

APPIUS Claudius did not go at firſt in perſon to Meſſana, but ſent thither one of his military tribunes, who was alſo named Claudius, in his ſtead. The tribune was a man of extraordinary boldneſs, and at the ſame time of great prudence and addreſs, fit for the carrying on of any great enterprize, and incapable of being terrified at the greateſt dangers. He immediately ſet out for Rhegium, and his firſt care there was, to get together what veſſels he could in order to croſs over into Sicily, But before he ventured to ſea with the few triremes he had under his command, he thought it adviſeable to diſcover firſt the diſpoſition of the Mamertines; and accordingly going on board a fiſher-boat, he paſſed undiſcovered through the midſt of the enemy's fleet, and arrived ſafe at Meſſana, which he found poſſeſſed by the Carthaginians, who had entered it with the conſent of ſome of the inhabitants, and contrary to the inclinations of others. The tribune convened the Mamertines in the place where they uſually met, in order to acquaint them with the motive of his coming among them. But at firſt the clamours of the Carthaginians, who aſſiſted at the aſſembly with the inhabitants, prevented him from being heard. However, he at laſt obtained a moment's ſilence, and then he addreſſed the aſſembly thus: "Mamertines, I come "hither, as a deputy from the Romans, to offer you the "aſſiſtance you have deſired. The ſenate and people con-"cur in granting it, and have nothing more at heart than "to defend Meſſana from the oppreſſion which threatens "her. We engage our words, that we will withdraw "our forces aſſoon as your city and fortunes are ſafe." Theſe few words made a deep impreſſion on their minds; but, as they had already introduced the Carthaginians into their city, they were no longer their own maſters, and therefore returned ſuch an anſwer as would have diſcouraged any one leſs bold than Claudius: "It is a great pleaſure to Meſſana, "they replied, to be able to ſpare the Romans the trouble "of aſſiſting her. Carthage is beforehand with them, "and her protection is ſufficient. Wherefore if you have "no other propoſals to make, you may withdraw. Every "free city has a right to call into her aſſiſtance whom ſhe "pleaſes." A free city! replied Claudius; Are you not "in the power of the Carthaginians? Are you not, even

" in this place, beſieged by a foreign force? Does not " Carthage already lord it over you, and make you feel " the weight of that yoke, which you muſt, if not re- " lieved by us, bear for ever? Anſwer me, if you dare." Upon theſe words the Mamertines held their peace for fear of the Carthaginians; and the Carthaginians were ſtruck dumb with the truth of the tribune's ſpeech, who taking advantage of this general ſilence: " You Carthaginians, ſaid " he, know not what to anſwer, becauſe you are conſcious " of your own injuſtice; and you Mamertines are dumb, " becauſe you dare not ſpeak; if fear had not ſhut your " mouths, I am confident, you would not reject my offers, " and therefore I interpret your ſilence as a tacit conſent to " my propoſal.". Upon thoſe words a murmur aroſe in the aſſembly, and Claudius crying aloud, " Mamertines, I un- " derſtand your meaning, you implore the aſſiſtance of " the Romans, we will comply with your requeſt," left the aſſembly and city without further delay, and returned to Rhegium [q].

The Romans undertake the defence of Meſſana.

Upon his report the ſenate judged, that the Mamertines were diſpoſed to receive ſuccours from Rome, and ordered the ſame tribune to ſet ſail with his fleet to Meſſana. His fleet was no-ways in a condition to cope with that of Carthage, the Romans having at that time only a few triremes, and their men being quite ignorant of ſea-affairs; whereas the Carthaginians were maſters at ſea, had numerous fleets cruiſing off the coaſts of Italy and Sicily, and were furniſhed with expert mariners. However, the tribune deſpiſing all danger, had the boldneſs to weigh anchor and ſteer his courſe to Meſſana; but being met by Hanno the Carthaginian admiral in the ſtreights between Rhegium and Meſſana, ſome of his ſhips were taken by the enemy, others by a violent ſtorm daſhed in pieces againſt the rocks on the coaſt of Italy; inſomuch, that he was obliged to return to Rhegium, after having loſt the beſt part of his fleet. Claudius not at all diſcouraged by his bad ſucceſs, began to refit his fleet in order to put to ſea again, ſaying, that he did not expect to learn the art of navigation without paying dear for it. Before he ſet ſail, the Carthaginians ſent him back the ſhips which they had taken in the late engagement, hoping by means of this artful preſent either to pique the Romans in point of honour, and ſo divert them from ſending ſuccours to Meſſana, or at leaſt to lay the whole blame of a rupture upon them. When Hanno's deputies deputies restored the ships, they reproached the Romans with having infringed the treaties agreed on by both republics, and pretended, that the streights belonged to Carthage. This so incensed Claudius, that he rejected the present with indignation, and pursued his former resolution with more vigor than ever. Hanno's deputies before they left Rhegium told Claudius in an imperious stile, that Carthage would not suffer a Roman even to wash his hands in the streights. But this served only to make Claudius who was undaunted in the greatest dangers, more eager to force out of the neighbourhood of Italy so proud and encroaching an enemy. Soon after the departure of the deputies he set sail again, and timed his enterprize so well, that he eluded the vigilance of the Carthaginian admiral, and arrived safe in the port of Messana. Hanno, who had exchanged the command of the fleet for that of the land-forces in Messana, upon the arrival of the Romans retired into the citadel, abandoning the city to Claudius, who immediately desired the Mamertines to call an assembly and invite Hanno to it. It was not without the utmost difficulty that Hanno was prevailed upon to leave the citadel, and trust himself among the Romans and Messanians. However he came at last, but hard words arising between him and Claudius, the bold Roman, who no longer appeared as an envoy, but was backed by his legionaries, was so provoked, that he ordered the soldiers to seize him, and kept him under confinement, till he prevailed upon him by menaces and fair promises to deliver the citadel up to the Romans and evacuate the city. This piece of cowardice cost him dear; for he was tried by his countrymen, found guilty, and condemned to be crucified [r].

Hiero, king of Syracuse, had already made the necessary preparations to besiege Messana, which city he looked upon as a fair conquest, after the victory he had gained over the Mamertines. But when he heard that it was defended by the Romans, thinking himself too weak to enter the lists against two such warlike nations, as the Romans and Mamertines, he sent embassadors to the Carthaginians, offering to join them, provided they would assist him in the siege of Messana, and help him in driving out the Romans. Such an embassy was, as we may well imagine very acceptable to the Carthaginians, who were determined to venture all, rather than suffer the Romans to get any footing in Sicily. A treaty therefore was immediately concluded between Carthage and Syracuse, whereby they were to assist each other in driving the Romans quite out of the island; Messana was to be delivered up to Hiero, and some places subject to Syracuse were to be put into the hands of the Carthaginians. Great preparations were carried on both at Syracuse and Carthage, new forces were raised, and a mighty fleet sent from Africa under the command of another Hanno, the son of Hannibal, who was charged with the whole management of the war. This fleet put into Lilybæum, whence the land-forces marched to Selinus, and encamped there, while their general went to Agrigentum and caused the fortifications of that place to be repaired. The Carthaginians and Syracusans being now ready to enter upon action, Hanno, before he began hostilities sent an herald to the Romans, summoning them to leave Sicily, and surrender up Messana to him, or to the king of Syracuse, if they desired to live in amity with their respective republics. Claudius answered, that he was determined to defend the place and the allies of the people of Rome to the last drop of his blood. Hereupon the Carthaginian and Syracusan armies joined, and invested Messana. The Carthaginians posted themselves near cape Pelorus and lined the coast, whilst Hiero with his troops blocked up the city on the land-side, and encamped round mount Chalcis; so that Messana was surrounded on all sides, and no succours or provisions could be conveyed into it either by sea or land [s].

As soon as the tribune Claudius had refused to quit the place, Hanno, the Carthaginian general, ordered all the Italians, who served in his army, to be massacred. When the murder of these unfortunate men was heard at Rome, the consul Appius, who had not appeared yet in this dispute, set out with all speed and went to Rhegium, with a design to cross over into Sicily. Upon his arrival at Rhegium, he sent deputies to king Hiero, conjuring him by his antient friendship to the Romans, not to persist in the siege of Messana, which alone could create a quarrel, the consequences of which might prove fatal to him. L. Genucius was the first of the Romans who began a correspondence with Hiero. Genucius was consul, and charged with the siege of Rhegium, which was held by the rebellious Campanian legion. While the consul carried on the siege, his provisions falling short, he applied to Hiero, who not only supplied him with what he wanted, but moreover sent him some some Sicilian forces; and this was the first time the Romans had any troops in their service from beyond-sea. Claudius, mindful of his former kindness to the Romans, proceeded at first with him in a friendly manner. But Hiero, taking it very much amiss, that the Romans should undertake the defence of a city, which must have otherwise fallen into his hands, broke out into invectives against the ingratitude of a republic, which he had assisted in her distress. As he was himself a man of strict equity, he thought it surprizing that the Romans, who had lately punished, with the utmost severity, one of their legions for treacherously seizing on Rhegium, should now protect those who in the very same manner had made themselves masters of Messana. He therefore answered the deputies sent to him by the consul Claudius, that the events of war were indeed uncertain, but should he in his attempt against the rebellious city prove unsuccessful, all men would agree, that though the ambition and power of the Romans prospered, yet Hiero fell in a just and honourable cause. The Romans themselves were very sensible, that his integrity was the only motive which prompted him to take up arms against the Mamertines. But, as he had joined the Carthaginians, the consul was little affected with his answer, and only said, that good king Hiero was not aware of the intention of his new allies, since their design in seizing Messana was only thereby to pave themselves a way to the conquest first of Sicily, and then of Italy [t].

The consul Claudius passes over into Sicily.

Claudius, finding the king of Syracuse determined to carry on the siege of Messana, resolved to sail thither in person, but as the Carthaginian fleet watched all his motions, he dissembled his design, and gave out, that it was not in his power to make war upon Hiero without fresh orders from the senate, and that he must therefore return to Rome, and lay the matter before the senate and people. This report soon reached Messana, and the Carthaginians, hearing it, left off cruising in the streights. Whereupon Claudius, having first ordered his troops to repair to several ports of Italy, and be there in a readiness to sail, went on board a galley built unskilfully and in great haste, pretending only to coast along the shore in order to return to Rome. But as soon as he was out of sight he tacked about, and, being favoured by a dark night, reached the neareſt neareſt ſhore in the iſland, and landed the few troops he carried with him, without being obſerved by the enemy. The Romans, who were then unexperienced in ſea affairs, thought this ſo glorious an action, that they gave the conſul the ſurname of Caudex, a Latin word ſignifying a boat unſkilfully built [u].

And defeats Hiero.

The conſul having landed his forces, reſolved to advance againſt Hiero, who blocked up Meſſana, on the ſide of mount Chalcis, in hopes of ſurprizing him. When the king ſaw the enemy marching up to attack his camp, he very imprudently left his trenches and went out to meet them, not doubting but he ſhould get the better of them in the open field, which he thought far more glorious than to fight behind a rampart. The Syracuſans charged with ſuch fury and reſolution, that the Roman cavalry was put in diſorder at the firſt onſet. But the legions fought with ſo much bravery, that the Syracuſans could not with their utmoſt efforts break through them; nay, they were themſelves, after a long and obſtinate diſpute, forced to give way, and leave the Romans an open paſſage into the city. The conſul, overjoyed at his gaining the firſt victory which Rome had ever obtained out of her contient, entered Meſſana in triumph, and was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable by the inhabitants, who now began to entertain hopes of being ſoon delivered from a ſiege, which had already reduced them to great ſtraits. Neither were they diſappointed in their expectation; Hiero could not continue any longer before the place after his overthrow, being diſtreſſed for want of proviſions; and beſides, he thought himſelf betrayed by the Carthaginians; for if they had guarded the ſtraits, the Romans could never have attacked him ſo unexpectedly, nor even ventured out of the ports of Italy. He could not help thinking, that the Carthaginians had ſuffered the Romans to enter the iſland on purpoſe to deſtroy him, and full of his diſtruſts he decamped haſtily in the night and retired to Syracuſe [w].

The progreſs of the Roman Arms in Sicily.

Appius, having now but one enemy to contend with, ſaillied out of the city and attacked the Carthaginian camp, but as it was in a very advantageous poſt, and ſtrongly fortified, he was obliged to withdraw his legions and retire into Meſſana after having ſuſtained a conſiderable loſs. His retreat retreat looked like a flight, and this encouraged the Carthaginians to quit their trenches and purſue him. But the legions unexpectedly facing about fell upon the purſuers, put them in diſorder, and made a dreadful havock of the broken troops. Thus the advantages of the day were equal; but Claudius, not thinking it adviſeable to attempt the enemies camp a ſecond time, laid waſte all the neighbouring country, and made excurſions to the very gates of Syracuſe itſelf. Hiero, finding that the Carthaginians were not in a condition to protect his dominions, began to entertain ſome thoughts of abandoning them and ſiding with the Romans. But the ſudden departure of the conſul Claudius for Rome prevented him, for the preſent, from entering into any treaty with that republic.

NEXT year early in the ſpring, both the Roman conſuls, Manius Valerius Flaccus and Manius Otacilius Craſſus, were ordered to tranſport their legions into Sicily, and carry on the war againſt Hiero and the Carthaginians. They both landed without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition from the Carthaginian fleet, and then parted, Valerius undertaking to diſlodge the Carthaginians from their advantageous poſt, where they kept Meſſana blocked up, and Otacilius advancing into the heart of the country to ſpread the terror of the Roman arms. What ſucceſs attended the former, we find no where mentioned; but the ſurname of Meſſana which was given him on this occaſion, and afterwards by corruption changed into that of Meſſala, as ſome writers inform us [x], is a convincing proof that he ſignalized himſelf by ſome gallant action. As for Otacilius, he advanced to the foot of mount Ætna, and poſſeſſed himſelf of all the cities in that fruitful country: Adranum and Centuripe were taken by aſſault, but many other cities, and among the reſt Alæſa, ſubmitted of their own accord to the conqueror. Afterwards the two conſular armies ſometimes joined to fight the united forces of the Syracuſans and Carthaginians, and ſometimes ſeparated to extend their conqueſts the wider; the enemies were every-where vanquiſhed, and as they took the cities ſubject both to the Syracuſans and Carthaginians, without diſtinction, they reduced in a few months time no fewer than ſixty-ſeven places; of which number were Taurominium and Catana, two cities of great importance. As they drew great great reinforcements from theſe cities, their armies were ſoon ſo increaſed, that they thought themſelves in a condition to undertake the ſiege of Syracuſe, the capital of the whole iſland, and at that time one of the greateſt and ſtrongeſt cities in the world. Hiero, being intimidated at the danger he was in, and now more ſenſible than ever, that an alliance with Rome would be leſs diſadvantageous to him than one with Carthage, loſt no time in endeavouring to ſave his ſtately metropolis from impending ruin. Aſſoon as the two conſular armies appeared before it, he ſent out deputies to treat with the Romans of a peace, who on their part were no-ways averſe to it, knowing that by keeping up a friendly correſpondence with Hiero, the Carthaginians would be reduced to their own forces only, and the Roman armies plentifully ſupplied with all manner of proviſions, for want of which they had been greatly diſtreſſed the year before. A treaty therefore was ſoon concluded on the following terms: that the Romans ſhould receive Hiero into the number of the friends and allies of their republic, and protect his capital and dominions, particularly the cities of Acra, Leontini, Megara, Elorum, Netum, and Tauro-minium, from all hoſtilities whatſoever; and on the other hand, that Hiero ſhould deliver up the priſoners he had taken without ranſom, pay the republic an hundred talents of ſilver, and cultivate her friendſhip by a faithful obſervance of the treaty. This agreement was drawn up by the king and conſuls, and afterwards ratified at Rome, firſt by the ſenate, and then by the people, at the motion of Cn. Attilus Halatinus, then a tribune of the people. It was at firſt only a truce for fifteen years, but the conditions were ſo faithfully performed on both ſides, that it laſted as long as Hiero lived [y].

Hiero concludes an alliance with the Romans.

From thenceforth Hiero ſaw no war in his dominions, nor had any other ſhare in it but that of ſending from time to time ſupplies of proviſions to his allies the Romans, who gratefully acknowledged his generoſity, and with great care protected his dominions from the inſults of their common enemy. During the ſpace of above fifty years he lived after his acceſſion to the throne, while the whole country around him was in flames, occaſioned by the cruel wars which the two moſt powerful republics in the world made upon each other, he was only a ſpectator, and heard the noiſe noise of the arms, which shook all the neighbouring regions, himself and his people enjoying the sweets of a profound peace and tranquillity. The Romans perceived on several occasions, during the first Punic war, and especially at the siege of Agrigentum with which it was begun, how necessary it was for them to cultivate the friendship of Hiero; for that prince abundantly supplied them with provisions, when without his aid they had been obliged by famine to quit the island, their convoys from Italy being often intercepted by the enemy's fleet which guarded the streights [z].

The interval between the end of the first Punic war and the beginning of the second, which was about five and twenty years, was to Hiero a time of tranquillity, in which his actions are not mentioned by the historians. Polybius only informs us, that the Carthaginians in the war, which they were obliged to support against the mercenary troops that had served under them in Sicily, had recourse to king Hiero, who kindly assisted them, fearing perhaps lest the mercenaries, getting the better of the Carthaginians, should carry their victorious arms into Sicily, which island they were perfectly well acquainted with. Hiero's sole application during this long interval was to make his subjects happy, and to redress the many evils, which the tyrannical government of Agathocles, and the intestine divisions arising upon his death, had occasioned. Before his reign the state had been divided by two factions, the one of the citizens the other of the soldiers; and their differences, supported on both sides with great animosity, kept up the spirit of division in the republic, and gave birth to numberless disorders. But Hiero, with his prudent and impartial conduct, so rooted out all seeds of discord and misunderstanding, that during a reign of fifty years no revolt or sedition ever arose, or the least commotion either in the army or the city. Both soldiers and citizens looked upon him rather as their common father and protector, than as their lord and sovereign, and were fully convinced, that he was infinitely averse from doing any thing that could in the least prejudice their fortunes or liberty. His particular care was to encourage agriculture, which he looked upon as the certain means to diffuse abundance throughout his kingdom; he did not think it unworthy of the sovereignty to study that art, and even compose a book on that subject, of which we ought much much to regret the loſs. As the chief riches of the country, and the moſt certain fund of the prince's revenue, conſiſted in corn, the tenth part of which was paid to him, Hiero made ſuch wiſe and equitable regulations on this head, that they became, in a manner, the fundamental laws of the country, and were always obſerved as ſacred and inviolable, not only in his reign, but in all ſucceeding times. When the Romans had reduced the city and dominions of Syracuſe under their obedience, they impoſed no new tributes, but only decreed, that all things ſhould be regulated according to the laws of Hiero [z].

Hiero's ſincere attachment to the Romans.

In the ſecondPunic war, Hiero gave ſignal proofs of his attachment to the Romans. As ſoon as he received advice of Hannibal's arrival in Italy, he went with his fleet well equipped to meet Tiberius Sempronius at Meſſana, and aſſured him, that, advanced in age as he was, he would ſhew the ſame zeal for the Roman people as he had done in his youth, if they thought it neceſſary that he ſhould put himſelf at the head of his troops and croſs over into Italy. He ſupplied the conſul's legions with corn and cloaths at his own expence, and was preparing to attend him into Italy, when Sempronius, receiving news of the advantage gained by the Romans over the Carthaginian fleet, thanked the king for his advantageous offers, but made no uſe of them at that time [a].

Hiero's ſincere affection for Rome appeared ſtill more conſpicuous, after the victory gain'd by Hannibal at the lake Thraſymenus. The Romans had already loſt three battles, and were abandoned by many of their allies. In this mournful conjuncture Hiero ſent a fleet laden with proviſions to the port of Oſtia: The embaſſadors, who came with the preſent, being introduced to the ſenate, told the conſcript fathers, "that Hiero, their maſter, had been as ſenſibly "affected with their misfortunes, as if he had ſuffered "them himſelf; that though he knew the grandeur of the "Roman people diſplayed itſelf more in times of adverſity, "than after the moſt ſignal ſucceſſes, yet he had taken the "liberty to ſend them, as a faithful ally, a victory of maſſy "gold weighing three hundred pounds, which the king "hoped they would vouchſafe to receive as a favourable "augury, and a pledge of his vows for their proſperity "that they had alſo brought three hundred thouſand mod

" of wheat, two hundred thouſand of barley, and were " charged by their maſter to acquaint them, that if they " wanted more, he could cauſe what quantity they pleaſed " to be tranſported to ſuch places as they ſhould appoint ; " that he knew the Romans employed no ſtrangers in their " armies, except light-armed troops, and therefore he had " only ſent a thouſand archers and ſlingers, whom they " might oppoſe to the ſlingers of the Balearic iſlands and " the Numidians in the Carthaginian army." To his preſents Hiero added a wholeſome piece of advice, which was, that the prætor, who ſhould be ſent to command in Sicily, might croſs from thence over into Africa, and by that means divert the Carthaginians from ſending any ſuccours to Hannibal in Italy. Rome was touched with the affection good king Hiero ſhewed her, thanked him for his preſents and advice, and ſent him this obliging letter: You have ever been a conſtant and generous friend. No change of times has altered your affection and generoſity towards us. We received with pleaſure the victory from your hands. It is a pledge of your friendſhip, which we will carefully preſerve ; and in order to keep her among us, and prevent her ever leaving us, we will ſhut her up in the ſtrongeſt place of Rome. We will place her on the capitol our citadel, and even in the temple of Jupiter. The gods grant, that ſhe may be as faithful and friendly to us as you. All the corn and barley on board the ſhips with the archers and ſlingers were ſent to the conſuls. They likewiſe ſent, purſuant to Hiero's advice, from the ports of Italy a reinforcement of twenty-five quinqueremes to T. Otacilius, who commanded the armies in Sicily, impowering him to carry the war into Africa, if he thought proper [b].

VALERIUS Maximus obſerves here the noble and polite liberality of Hiero, who did not offer the Romans three hundred pounds weight of gold in ſpecie, as being well acquainted with their delicacy in that point; but under the form of a victory, which they dared not refuſe, on account of the good omen it ſeemed to bring along with it. It is uncommon to ſee a prince, whoſe dominions were ſo expoſed to the inſults of the enemy, continue unalterably faithful to his former allies, even when they were on the brink of ruin. But nothing could ſhake Hiero's attachment to to Rome. But it was also his interest to act as he did. For had the Carthaginians entirely ruined, or even weakened, the Romans too much, Syracuse must have fallen a prey to the conquerors. That city was situated over-against Carthage, and lay mighty convenient for securing its commerce, and gaining the empire of the sea. Wherefore as Syracuse must have necessarily fallen after Rome, it was absolutely requisite for the king of Syracuse to hazard every thing, and either save Rome or fall with her.

Neither did king Hiero's generosity extend to the Romans alone; Polybius informs us, that he sent an hundred talents to the Rhodians, with other rich presents, after the great earthquake, which laid waste their island, and threw down the famous colossus. He moreover caused two statues to be erected in the market-place at Rhodes, representing the people of Syracuse placing a crown on the head of the Rhodians, as if, says our historian, Hiero, after having made the people magnificent presents, believed himself indebted to them. So great was the modesty with which his presents were always attended.

However, there is a pastoral in Theocritus [d] bearing the name of Hiero, wherein that poet seems to reproach the king, as if he had not acknowledged in a handsome manner the verses made in his commendation. But the mean manner, in which he claims, as it were, a reward for his poetry, leaves room to conclude, that the imputation of avarice falls with more justice on the poet than the prince, whose generosity is extolled by all the historians who mention him.

Tho' Hiero seemed entirely employed in mintaining the peace and tranquillity of his kingdom, yet he did not neglect matters relating to war, knowing that the surest means to preserve the public quit, was to hold himself always ready to make war upon such as should attempt to disturb it. To him Syracuse was indebted for those amazeing machines of war, which the Syracusans made use of when besieged by the Romans, as we shall see anon. The public buildings, such as palaces, temples, arsenals, &c. which were erected in Syracuse by his order, and under the direction of Archimedes, were the greatest ornaments of that stately metropolis. He caused also an infinite number of ships to be built for the exportation of corn, in which

which the whole riches of the iſland conſiſted. We are told of a galley built by his order, which was looked upon as one of the wonders of that age. Archimedes, who was the overſeer of the work, ſpent a whole year in finiſhing it; Hiero daily animating the workmen with his preſence. This ſhip had twenty benches of oars, three ſpacious apartments, and all the conveniences of a large palace. The floors of the middle apartment were all inlaid, and repreſented in various colours the ſtories of Homer's iliad. The ceilings, windows, and all other parts were finiſhed with wonderful art, and imbelliſhed with all kinds of ornaments. In the uppermoſt appartment there was a ſpacious gymnaſium, or place of exerciſe, and walks with gardens and plants of all kinds diſpoſed in wonderful order. Pipes, ſome of hardened clay, and others of lead, conveyed water all around to refreſh them. But the fineſt of the apartments was that of Venus, the floors being inlaid with agates and other precious ſtones, the inſide lined with Cypreſs wood, the windows adorned with ivory, paintings, and ſmall ſtatues. In this apartment there was a library, and a bath with three great coppers, and a bathing veſſel made of one ſingle ſtone of various colours, and containing two hundred and fifty quarts. It was ſupplied with water from a great reſervoir at the head of the ſhip, which held an hundred thouſand quarts. The veſſel was adorned on all ſides with fine paintings, and had eight towers of equal dimenſions, two at the head, two at the ſtern, and four in the middle. Round theſe towers were parapets, whence ſtones might be diſcharged againſt the enemy's veſſels when they approached. Each tower was conſtantly guarded by four young men completely armed and two archers. To the ſide of the veſſel was faſtened an engine made by Archimedes, which threw a ſtone of three hundred weight, and an arrow of eighteen feet, the diſtance of a ſtadium, or an hundred and twenty five-feet. Though the hold of this veſſel was exceeding deep, a ſingle man could ſoon clear it of water with a machine invented for that purpoſe by Archimedes. An Athenian poet having compoſed ſome verſes on this magnificent veſſel, Hiero, who underſtood the value of verſe, rewarded him with a thouſand medimni, that is, ſix thouſand buſhels of wheat, which he cauſed to be carried to the Pyræus or port of Athens. Hiero made afterwards a preſent of this great veſſel to Ptolemy, probably Philadelphus, king of Egypt, and sent it to Alexandria. As there was at that time a great famine in Egypt, good king Hiero sent along with it several other ships of less burden with three hundred thousand quarters of corn, ten thousand great earthen jars of salt-fish, twenty thousand quintals of salt-meat, and an immense quantity of other provisions [e].

Hiero's fidelity to the Romans was put to a severe trial after the battle of Cannæ, which was followed by an universal defection of their allies. The Carthaginians, having landed a great many troops in Sicily, made a dreadful havock in the territories of Syracuse. But nothing could shake the king's constancy. He was only concerned to see some, even of his own family, favour the Carthaginians. He had a son named Gelon, who married Nereis the daughter of Pyrrhus, and had by her several children, and amongst others Hieronymus, of whom we shall soon have occasion to speak. Gelon, despising his father's wholesome advice, and looking upon the Romans as already subdued by Hannibal, openly declared for the Carthaginians. He had already armed the multitude, and stirred up the allies of Syracuse to join him; but his measures were broken by a sudden and unexpected death, which happened so seasonably, that his father was suspected to have been privy to it [f]. Hiero did not survive his son long. After he had continued faithful to the Romans for fifty years together, he died in the ninetieth year of his age, and fifty-fourth of his reign, infinitely regretted by his subjects, and no less by the Romans, who lost in him the most constant friend they had ever had.

Year of the flood 2789. Before Christ 215.

There was none to whom Hiero could leave his crown except Hieronymus the son of Gelon, on whom he could not depend as to his conduct, the young prince being but fifteen years old at his grandfather's death. The good old king therefore, who had more at heart the happiness of his people, than the aggrandising of his family, had formed a design of abolishing monarchy, and restoring the Syracusans to their antient liberty. He had two daughters both married to the greatest lords of the kingdom, Demarata the elder to Andranadorus, and Heraclea to Zoippus, a man of a quiet disposition, and who had served Hiero with great fidelity, but was in his heart a zealous republican. Wherefore his wife Heraclea, whom he suffered to go go but very ſeldom to court, never attempted to divert her father from reinſtating the Syracuſans in their antient rights. But her ſiſter, at the inſtigation of her ambitious huſband, uſed her utmoſt endeavours to engage Hiero not to deprive his grandſon of a crown which was due to him by right of inheritance. The private views of Demarata and her huſband were to govern the kingdom, during the minority of Hieronymus, and to wait for a favourable opportunity of placing the crown upon their own heads. It was not eaſy for an old man of ninety to hold out againſt the careſſes, tears, and intreaties of a daughter, who beſieged him day and night. So that he at laſt gave way to the repeated inſtances of an ambitious woman, made a will, and bequeathed the crown to his grandſon, To prevent as far as poſſible the evils he apprehended, he appointed him fifteen guardians, who were to form his council, earneſtly deſiring them at his death never to depart from the alliance with the Romans, to which he had inviolably adhered for fifty years, to teach the young prince to abſtain from pomp and oſtentation, and to inſtil into his mind the ſame principles by which he had acted during his whole reign.

HIERO's eyes were no ſooner cloſed, but the guardians, ſummoning the people, read the king's will in the aſſembly. As the taſtes of the Syracuſans and their views were different, ſo were their opinions with relation to the things eſtabliſhed by the king. Some did not like the monarchical government; others took umbrage at the crown's being ſettled in one family; the greateſt part were diſſatisfied at the perpetual alliance to be made with Rome, already half ſubdued by Hannibal. In ſhort, the will was liked only by a very few, who were gained over by the court, and artfully placed in ſeveral parts of the aſſembly to ſhew their approbation of it by ſhouts and acclamations. However, none had courage enough to proteſt againſt it; and therefore the aſſembly broke up, without either openly contradicting or accepting the will. The king's obſequies were celebrated with great pomp by the citizens, to whom his memory was dearer than to his relations. A few days after, Andranadorus, thinking the young prince ſecurely ſeated on the throne, becauſe he ſaw no open oppoſition, began to take ſuch meaſures as plainly diſcovered his intentions, and increaſed the number of the enemies of the monarch and monarchy. Hiero's chief aim in appointing fifteen guardians was, to engage ſo many of the greateſt lords in his dominions to be defenders of his crown and family. But Andranodorus, out of a selfish view, deprived Hieronymus of his chief support by removing all the other guardians, and under pretence, that the king was of age to take the reins of government into his own hands. By this means that wicked minister, who had gained a great ascendant over the young prince, united in his own person all the power which had been divided among them. The best of princes, succeeding a king so greatly beloved by his subjects, would have found it very difficult to maintain himself in the throne. Whereas Hieronymus, under the direction of Andranodorus, became quite the reverse of his grand-father. He seemed to take pleasure in increasing the sorrow of the people for the loss of Hiero, and they, by comparing the vices of the successor with the virtues of his predecessor, began to conceive a great aversion to the new king. They no longer saw the throne filled with a prince, who was affected with all the misfortunes of his subjects, and gave the meanest of them a free access to him, being distinguished from the rest of the people, only by the great respect and veneration they all paid him. Hieronymus resumed the purple and diadem, and never appeared in public but in a chariot, drawn by white horses, and surrounded by a troop of guards. His whole conduct was suitable to this equipage. He was difficult of access, never gave audience but with an air of contempt, and often added severe jests to his denials. Even his guardians were with great difficulty suffered to approach him. He had no confidants, but the ministers of his pleasures, giving himself up to all manner of debauchery. His cruelty was no-ways inferior even to that of Agathocles, and seemed to have extinguished all sense of humanity in him. This raised an universal alarm both among the people and nobles, insomuch, that some of his guardians laid violent hands on themselves, to avoid seeing the vices of their ward, and others voluntarily withdrew from their country [g].

His vices and cruelty.

Only three men of distinction continued at court, Andranodorus, Zoippus, both Hiero's sons-in-law, and Thraso, sirnamed Charcarus. The latter was a true courtier, that is a slavish flatterer, and a meer tool; but at the same time, a cunning statesman, and one who indeed readily complied with all the inclinations of the prince, but understood better better than any other his maſter's true intereſt. The king often took pleaſure in engaging him in diſputes with Andranodorus and Zoipppus about ſtate-affairs. Thraſo was a zealous advocate for the Romans; but the two others, believing the Romans could never recover, after the dreadful overthrows they had received, openly declared for Carthage; and their ſpeeches had moſt weight with the young prince. However, the reaſons alledged by Thraſo kept him in ſuſpenſe, till a melancholy accident determined him to chuſe the worſt part. One, named Solias, a man of a mean condition, and who had ſerved the king from his infancy in the loweſt offices, diſcovered a conſpiracy againſt the king, but could name none of the conſpirators, except Theodotus, who was delivered up to Andranodorus, and tortured in order make him diſcover the whole plot and the names of the conſpirators. Being in the utmoſt agony he confeſſed the crime as to himſelf, but, inſtead of naming his accomplices, he accuſed all the king's beſt friends, though innocent, and amongſt others Thraſo, as the ring-leader of the whole enterprize, adding, that they ſhould never have engaged in it, if they had not been countenanced by one in favour with the king, and who had free acceſs into the palace. His depoſition was believed, and all the intereſt Thraſo had at court could not ſave his life. As for Theodotus, he perſiſted to the laſt breath in accuſing the innocent in order to ſave the guilty. And his accomplices depended ſo much on his ſecrecy, that none of them left the city, or abſconded during the whole time he was kept in priſon and racked [h].

Upon the death of Thraſo, who was the ſole ſupport of the Roman alliance, Andranodorus and Zoippus eaſily brought the king into their meaſures, who immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to the Carthaginian camp in Italy. Hannibal received them with great demonſtrations of kindneſs, and ſent an embaſſy to the young king of Syracuſe, at the head of which he put a young officer of great diſtinction at Carthage, named alſo Hannibal, hoping that the conformity of age and inclinations would make him agreeable to Hieronymus. With him he ſent two perſons advanced in years, who were both great ſtateſmen and experienced commanders; one was called Hippocrates, and the other Epicydes; they were born at Carthage, but originally Syracuſans, their grandfathers having been baniſhed Sicily, in the time of the tyranny of Agathocles. Claudius Pulcher, the Roman prætor in Sicily, took umbrage at the arrival of these embassadors, and immediately sent deputies to the court of Syracuse to renew the alliance made with king Hiero. But the Carthaginians having already had audience of Hieronymus, had given him such high notions of Hannibal's victories and reputation, that he had sent away young Hannibal to Carthage to prepare that senate for the receiving of his embassadors, when they should come to conclude a treaty of alliance with him [i].

He receives the Roman embassadors with contempt.

In this situation of affairs, the envoys of the Roman prætor were not received at Syracuse, with the respect due to their character. They began their speech with explaining the motives of their deputation. We are come, said they, to renew that alliance and good understanding, which the wise king Hiero maintained for so many years with Rome. But Hieronymus, who was naturally given to raillery, replied, I will ask you but one question: Who were conquerors at Cannæ, you or the Carthaginians? I am told such surprizing things of that battle, that I should be glad to know all the particulars of it. This severe reproach put the Romans out of humour; however, they only made him this reply, that when he would please to be serious they would desire another audience. They accordingly had one some days after, and spoke to the king with as much haughtiness as if they had been conquerors, adviseing him not to determine upon the choice of his allies from doubtful accounts, nor change sides too rashly, lest he should soon have occasion to repent of the measures he had taken. To this the king replied with an insulting air: Yes, indeed, I suppose it was out of pure friendship, that the Romans, upon a false report of my grandfather's death, brought their fleet in sight of Syracuse. Did they design to make themselves masters of my dominions, or to protect them? This reproach was wholly founded on an ill turn, which the enemies of Rome had given to a step of the Romans. A report being spread of king Hiero's death, the Roman fleet had advanced as far as cape Pachynum to assist the grandson of their faithful ally. But as soon as they understood, that Hiero was still alive, the fleet returned to Lilybæum. Hence the friends of Carthage took occasion to persuade the king, that the design of the Romans was to

to seize on his dominions, and keep them for themselves. The embassadadors endeavoured to undeceive him, but he with an air of raillery only replied; since then you could tack about, give me leave in my turn to take advantage of the wind, from what point soever it blows: it is now set for Carthage, and I shall sail thither. Upon this the deputies withdrew without returning any answer, and informed the prætor, who had sent them, of all that had passed [k].

Enters into an alliance with Carthage.

FROM this time Rome looked upon the king of Syracuse as her enemy. And truly that prince soon after the departure of the embassadors sent three deputies to Carthage, to ratify the alliance he had made with Hannibal. The conditions of this treaty were; first, that the Carthaginians should send a fleet and a land-army to assist Hieronymus: Secondly, that after they had with their joint forces driven the Romans quite out of the island, they should divide it into two equal parts, the river Himera (Q) being the boundary of the Syracusans on one side, and of the Carthaginians on the other. Such a treaty could not meet with any difficulty from the senate of Carthage, since the whole end of it was first to draw off Hieronymus from his alliance with the Romans, and then to sacrifice him to their ambition. Hippocrates and Epicydes were sensible of this, and therefore, as they had more at heart the interest of Syracuse than that of Carthage, they opened the young prince's eyes, and gave him to understand how prejudicial the second article might prove to him. Your right to all Sicily, said they, is indisputable. You are the son of Nereis, the daughter of Pyrrhus; and who does not know that Pyrrhus was, by the unanimous consent of all the Sicilians, declared king of the whole island? Though this discourse was no-ways conclusive, yet the young prince's

(Q) There were two rivers in Sicily known by the same name of Himera. The smaller fell into the Tyrrhenian sea, near the present city of Termini. The larger, after having watered the middle of the island, discharges itself into the Lybian sea. Both these rivers rise on mount Nebroda, now Madonia. Solinus, Mela, and some other geographers, make these two but one river, which afterwards divides itself into two branches (42).

eyes being eaſily dazzled with diſcoveries that favoured his ambition, he immediately diſpatched a new embaſſy to Carthage. The former propoſals he had made were juſt upon the point of being ſigned, and the Carthaginians were not a little ſurprized to ſee the king change his mind. The embaſſadors after a long preamble, wherein they endeavoured to prove their maſter's right to all Sicily, and to ſhew that he could not divide it without wronging himſelf, confined the alliance with Carthage to mutual aſſiſtance. The king of Syracuſe, ſaid they, will aſſiſt Hannibal in Italy, and Carthage ſhall aſſiſt him in Sicily. As it was of the utmoſt importance for Carthage to ſeparate Syracuſe from the Romans, and to recover a footing in Sicily, the ſenate conſented to the new propoſals of Hieronymus, and began to raiſe an army and equip a fleet to be ſent into that iſland. Half Sicily was at that time in the hands of the Romans, and had been a Roman province ever ſince the treaty, which put an end to the firſt Punic war; for by that treaty the iſland was divided into two parts; the one was poſſeſſed by the Romans, and the other by Hiero; ſo that at this time the Romans were in a condition to give Hieronymus great trouble. However, they could make no impreſſion on the king, who returned them only this unpolite and provoking anſwer, Let the Romans reſtore all the gold, preſents, and corn that they drew from my grandfather, and conſent, that the river Himera be the common boundary between us, and I will renew the antient treaties with them [1].

The Roman prætor, being exaſperated at theſe proceedings, took the field, and began hoſtilities in the territory of Syracuſe, before the arrival of the Carthaginians in Sicily. On the other hand, Hieronymus leading his troops to Leontini on the confines of his dominions, fixed his reſidence there. His army amounted in all to about fifteen thouſand men, of which he detached two thouſand under the command of Hippocrates and Epicydes to diſlodge ſome Roman gariſons from the poſts they poſſeſſed.

Hieronymus murdered.

In the mean time, the conſpirators, whoſe names Theodotus had concealed even in the midſt of torments, after having long watched an opportunity of putting their deſign in execution, at laſt appointed a day for the diſpatching of a tyrant, whoſe cruelties and other vices they could no longer

longer bear. They poſted themſelves in a narrow ſtreet, through which the king, during his reſidence at Leontini, uſed to ride every day on his return from the forum to the palace. His guards always attended him, but one of them, by name Dinomanes, was in the number of the conſpirators, and agreed with the reſt to make the guards halt, and by that means give them an opportunity of falling upon the king, while he was at ſome diſtance from his attendants. Accordingly Dinomanes, who was at the head of the guards, ſtopped as it were to tie the ſtrings of his buſkins; upon this ſignal the conſpirators, ruſhing out of their ambuſh, ſtabbed the king in ſeveral places before he could receive any aſſiſtance. For Dinomanes, facing about upon his fellow-ſoldiers, ſtood their onſet, and though dangerouſly wounded did not retire till the king was dead. When the guards ſaw the prince wallowing in his blood, and the conſpirators advancing to attack them, they betook themſelves to flight. When the king's death was known in the army, which was encamped under the walls of Leontini, the ſoldiers cried out, that the conſpirators ought to be all ſacrificed to the manes of Hieronymus. But the ſweet name of liberty, with which the conſpirators filled the city and camp, ſoon appeaſed their reſentment. Hopes were alſo given them, that the king's treaſures ſhould be divided among them, and that they ſhould ſoon be headed by more able generals, than the late unexperienced young prince. They were alſo put in mind of the public crimes and private vices of the late king, which, being artfully repreſented and in the worſt light, filled them with ſuch horror that they left the dead body to rot in the public ſtreet. A remarkable inſtance of the little dependence, that is to be had on the zeal of an inconſtant multitude [m].

The king was no ſooner dead, but Soſis and Theodotus, two of the conſpirators, haſtened to Syracuſe to prevent the attempts of Andranodorus and the others of the king's faction. But notwithſtanding their diligence, Andranadorus had notice of what had happened before their arrival, and taken his precautions accordingly. He had already ſeized on the citadel and the iſland of Ortygia, and filled them with troops and officers in whom he could confide. Some writers are of opinion, that the Roman prætor Claudius was not entirely unconcerned in a plot, which was ſo uſeful to his republic. But, however that be, he did not fail to give give the senate immediate advice of all that had passed, and to take the necessary steps for the preserving of that part of Sicily, which belonged to the Romans [n].

Disturbances in Syracuse.

While Andranodorus, supported by the king's faction, was fortifying himself in Ortygia, Sosis and Theodotus entered that quarter of Syracuse called Tyche. The sun was set before they reached the city, but still there was light enough to see the king's diadem and bloody robes, which the conspirators carried in their hands and shewed to the people. This sight drew crouds of the inhabitants round them, whom they invited into Acradina, which was as it were the heart of the city, to take there proper measures for the recovery of their liberty. Hereupon all the city sided with the conspirators; lights were seen in all parts; some took to their arms, and those who had none in their houses ran to the temple of Jupiter Olympius, where the arms of the Gauls and Illyrians were hung up, which the Romans had presented to their good ally king Hiero. Such citizens as were armed posted themselves in all the avenues leading to the citadel, and there kept guard all night. Andranodorus attempted to possess himself of the public granaries, but the soldiers, whom he employed on this occasion, revolted from him, and delivered them up to the magistrates of the city. In this manner the first night was spent after the murder of Hieronymus [o].

The next morning as soon as it was light, all the inhabitants of Syracuse, some armed and some unarmed, crowded into Acradina, where the senate was assembled, which had not been convened, nor consulted, upon any affair since Hiero's death. Polyærnus, an illustrious citizen, spoke to the people with great freedom and moderation. "Syracusans, said he, I am not at all surprized to see you "up in arms in order to recover your antient liberty. "The sense you have of your past slavery, and the cala- "mities you have suffered under a tyrannical government, "have inspired you with this generous resolution. But, "after all, you have heard from your fathers, that civil "discord is likewise attended with great evils, and that "Syracuse has suffered more from domestic than foreign "wars. I commend your readiness in taking arms, but "should think you still more worthy of commendation, "if you only used them in the last extremity. It is my "opinion,

" opinion, that you ſend deputies to Andranodorus, and " that you firſt try by gentle methods, whether you can " prevail upon him to open the gates of the citadel, to put " the iſland into the hands of the magiſtrates, and to with- " draw his gariſons. If he ſubmits, violence is uſeleſs ; " but if he perſiſts in maintaining himſelf upon a throne, " to which he has no right, his crime is greater than that " of Hieronymus, and deſerves a more ſevere puniſh- " ment." This diſcourſe had the deſired effect ; deputies were ſent to Andranodorus, who entered into a conference with them. He was ſenſible, that it would be very difficult for him to maintain himſelf in his uſurpation againſt the unanimous conſent of the people. Ortygia was already partly poſſeſſed by the citizens, and the public granaries, on which he had depended, were in the power of the magiſtrates. Theſe conſiderations gave him juſt apprehenſions ; but his wife Demarata, Hiero's daughter, a haughty and ambitious woman, taking him aſide, put him in mind of the famous ſaying of Dionyſius the tyrant, that no man ought to quit a throne till he is dragged from it by the heels : ſhe adviſed him to demand time to conſider, and in the interim to bring the troops from Leontini, and endeavour to gain them, by promiſing them half the king's treaſures [P].

ANDRANODORUS did not entirely reject this counſel, nor think proper to give into it without reſerve. He choſe a mean between both, and reſolved to ſubmit to the ſenate in expectation of a more favourable opportunity to bring his deſigns to bear. He therefore anſwered the deputies, that he would open the gates of Ortygia the next day, come into Acradina, and give the aſſembly an account of his conduct. Accordingly he threw open the gates the next morning, and repairing to the market-place of Acradina, where the people were aſſembled, he mounted the tribunal of harangues, and after excuſing his delay, from the apprehenſions he had been under of being involved in the tyrant's puniſhment, he declared, that he was come to put his life and fortune into the hands of the ſenate. Then turning to Soſis and Theodotus. As for you ſaid he, illuſtrious avengers of the public wrongs, don't imagine that the glorious work of eſtabliſhing your liberty is yet accompliſhed. What have you done hitherto is but a ſketch of what ought to follow.

follow. An unrestrained populace is as dangerous in a republic as a persecuting tyrant. Andranodorus, having spoke these words, laid down the keys of Ortygia and of the king's treasures at the feet of the two chiefs of the conspiracy. The whole city was highly rejoiced on this occasion, and the rest of the day spent in feasting and returning thanks to the gods, for so happy a change.

Andranodorus submits to the senate.

The next day the people assembled to elect the chief magistrates to govern the state, when Andranodorus was one of the first chosen, and with him the chief conspirators, among the rest Sosipater and Dinomanes, though then at Leontini. They had there seized on the money, which Hieronymus had with him to pay the troops, and had caused it to be removed to Syracuse, where treasurers were chosen to take care of all the effects of the late king. And lastly, as a sign of their having entirely recovered their liberty, they caused the wall to be beat down between Acradina and the island Ortygia, which was the retreat of the kings.

In the mean time, Hippocrates and Epicydes, Hannibal's two agents, whom Hieronymus had placed at the head of his troops, endeavoured to conceal the king's death from them, and caused those to be assassinated who first spread the report of it in the camp. But all was to no purpose; they were abandoned by the greater part of the troops, and obliged to quit the field and repair to Syracuse, in order to carry on there the same negotiations with the republic, which they had begun with the king. But finding that the change of government had changed the dispositions of the Syracusans, when they were introduced into the senate, they spoke thus: We came into Sicily being sent by Hanibal as embassadors to Hieronymus his friend and ally. We have only obeyed the commands of our general, and if our abode in the island gives you any umbrage, allow us at least a free passage to our army. Locri is the place where we desire to be set ashore in Italy, both sea and land are infested by the Romans, we beg therefore you would give us a guard to escort us to that port. The Syracusans were not sorry to part with those two strangers, who were of a turbulent and factious disposition, and well experienced in military affairs. But as the senate was too dilatory in appointing the time for their departure and the guards to escort them, they found means to form a party against the senate of Syracuse and against Rome. They had commanded the king's forces, and therefore being well known to the soldiers diers, they aſſembled as many of them as they could in their lodgings, and by ſeditious ſpeeches ſtirred them up to rebellion, telling them, that the ſenate deſigned to deliver up the ſtate of the Romans, and ſacrifice the public good to their private ambition. Andranodorus was not a ſtranger to theſe plots, but favoured them underhand, in hopes of turning them to his own advantage. The ſeditious Demarata was continually ſpiriting him up to re-eſtabliſh monarchy and place himſelf on the throne. The time is come, ſaid ſhe, for placing Hiero's daughter on the throne of her father. All is quiet in Syracuſe, but the republic not yet well ſettled, the ſoldiers who are uſed to receive the king's pay, are not yet diſperſed, nor have they imbibed the republican ſpirit; two great generals, diſciples of Hannibal in the art of war, are ready to lend us their aſſiſtance; they are acquainted with the troops, and eſteemed by them: Let us then ſeize this happy moment, and not delay, till Hippocrates and Epicydes are forced from Syracuſe and we deprived of their concurrence [q].

This Diſcourſe of Demarata made no ſmall impreſſion on Andranodorus; however, he did not think fit to imbark in ſo dangerous and enterprize, till he had communicated his deſign to Themiſtus. This noble man had married Harmania the late king's ſiſter, and therefore ſhewed a great readineſs to enter into the plot, being well apprized, that, if the republican ſtate were reſtored, he ſhould be reduced to a private ſtation. Thus the deſign for uſurping the throne was formed, and meaſures taken for the putting of it in execution; but an indiſcreet confidence diſconcerted the whole. Themiſtus was very intimate with one Ariſto, a man of no mean birth, but by profeſſion an actor, which was not deemed diſhononrable among the Greeks, men of diſtinction appearing ſometimes on the ſtage, and acting parts in tragedies. Aſſoon as Ariſto was informed by his friend, that the conſpirators had reſolved to put the magiſtrates to death, and re-eſtabliſh the monarchy, he thought it his duty to prefer the intereſt of his country to the laws of friendſhip; and accordingly diſcovered the conſpiracy to the chief magiſtrates or prætors, by whom, after he had been examined, ſentence of death was privately paſſed upon Andranodorus and Themiſtus upon his depoſition alone; for Ariſto was known to be a man of great honour and probity. The ſentence was to be executed at the door of the ſenate-houſe, when theſe two chief conspirators should come to the senate, and guards were placed at the enterance with private orders, to kill them as soon as they appeared. The guards, pursuant to their orders, fell upon them as they were entering the senate, and the two conspirators fell down dead on the spot covered with many wounds. Their death struck the rest of the senators with terror, for they were quite strangers to the motives of that execution; but the prætors, when the tumult was quelled, introduced Aristo, who unriddled the whole secret to them, lamented the unhappy fate of his friend Themistus, and discovered the designs of the conspirators. He told them, that the Iberian and African mercenaries, whom Hieronymus had kept in his pay, were to have been the instruments of this new revolution, and to have been employed in cutting off the chief citizens of Syracuse; that their estates were to have been the rewards of the assassines, and that the due preparations were made for the seizing of Ortygia again in the name of Andranodorus. He then entered into a detail of all the circumstances of the conspiracy, and named the persons, who were to have executed each particular part of that black design. As his evidence carried with it all the appearance of truth and sincerity, the senate passed a decree, declaring, that the death of Andranodorus was as just as that of Hieronymus.

Andranodorus and Themistus put to death.

In the mean time, the populace, not knowing for what reason two citizens of distinction had been so unexpectedly put to death, threatened to revenge the violence offered them. But the sight of the dead bodies of the two conspirators, which were dragged out into the porch, appeased the tumult, and then Sopater, appointed by the senate to harangue the pople, informed them of their pernicious designs, ascribing all the misfortunes of Sicily to them, and not to Hieronymus, who, being only a youth, had been led astray by their wicked counsels. He insinuated, that the king's guardians and tutors had reigned in his name; that they ought to have been exterminated with the tyrant; that impunity had encouraged them to commit new crimes, and even to aspire to the tyranny; that not being able to succeed in their design by force, they had made use of dissimulation and perfidy; that neither favours nor honours could get the better of the wicked disposition of Andranodorus, whom they had raised to the highest dignities with the deliverers of their country; that as to Themistus, he had been inspired, as well as his accomplice, with the ambition of reigning by his wife. Theſe furies are the occaſion of all our misfortunes, ſaid Sopater; theſe the firſt authors of the preſent conſpiracy. At theſe words, the whole aſſembly cried out, that none of them ought to be ſuffered to live, and that it was neceſſary to root out entirely the race of the tyrants, without any reſerve or exception [r]. This cruel ſentence was no ſooner paſſed by the people, but the prætors, who ought to have checked the fury of the multitude, ordered it to be put into execution. Damarata Hiero's daughter, and Harmonia Gelon's daugher, the former married to Andranodorus, and the latter to Themiſtus, were killed firſt. The executioners went afterwards to the houſe of Heraclea, the wife of Zoippus. That virtuous princeſs was the only perſon of the royal family, who was not concerned in the conſpiracy. Her huſband, having been ſent on an embaſſy to Ptolemy king of Egypt, had remained at Alexandria to avoid ſeeing the vices and ill conduct of Hieronymus. During his abode there, Heraclea, whom he had inſpired with noble ſentiments, ſpent her days in retirement, wholly employed in the education of the two young princeſſes her daughters. When ſhe heard that the executioners, after having murdered her ſiſter and niece, were come to her, ſhe took refuge with her two daughters in the moſt remote part of her houſe, where ſhe worſhipped her gods. But the murderers found her out, and Heraclea ſeeing thoſe who were to embrue their hands in her blood, went to meet them, and with her hair diſhevelled, her face bathed in tears, and, in a condition moſt proper to move compaſſion, conjured them in the name of Hiero her father, not to involve an innocent woman in the guilt of Hieronymus; ſhe repreſented to them, that the king, whom they had ſo much reaſon to hate, had done nothing for her but increaſe her affliction, by ſeparating her huſband from her; that not having any ſhare in the deſigns of her ſiſter and niece, ſhe ought to have none in their puniſhment; that her huſband had always declared for a republican ſtate, and would return with joy to Syracuſe, if he knew of the death of Hieronymus and the preſent revolution. But, alas! ſaid ſhe, how will his hopes be diſappointed? he will find his zeal for his country rewarded with the murder of his wife and children. Tell me, at leaſt, what my crime is. What have you to fear from me in the forlorn condition, to which I am reduced, or from my daughters, unhappy orphans, without credit dit or ſupport ? We are, indeed, of the blood-royal, and if that gives you umbrage, baniſh us. At Alexandria I ſhall find a kind huſband, and my daughters a tender father [s].

HER ſpeech made no impreſſion on the minds of the executioners; they drew their ſwords to ſacrifice thoſe innocent victims, and then Heraclea, forgetting her own danger, interceded only for her daughters; but her intreaties and tears were to no purpoſe; they firſt ſtabbed her in the ſight of her daughters; and then with innumerable wounds diſpatched them already ſtained and covered with the blood of their mother. They were ſcarce dead when an order came from the people to ſuſpend the execution; but when they underſtood that the innocent princeſſes were already executed, they exclaimed with the utmoſt rage and fury againſt the magiſtrates, who had been ſo ready to put that cruel ſentence in execution, without allowing them time to reflect on the injuſtice of it. The death of Andranodorus and Themiſtus had occaſioned two vacancies in the college of prætors, and the people took hold of this pretence to come to a new election. The day was fixed for the aſſembly, and all the Syracuſans met in the public market-place to give their ſuffrages. Compaſſion for the unfortunate Heraclea had greatly abated the hatred of the people to the king's party; inſomuch, that Hannibal's embaſſadors, who had always been zealous for the late king, did not deſpair of being elected. They were originally Syracuſans, highly eſteemed by the ſoldiery, and beſides had gained over to their intereſt ſuch among the people, as were moſt touched with compaſſion for the death of Heraclea and her daughters. They had alſo the addreſs to place ſome among the crowd, whom they had hired to act and ſpeak in their favour; and theſe, when the people came to vote, cried out, ſome Epicydes, and others Hippocrates, whoſe names being repeated in ſeveral places, the aſſembly took theſe ſcattered votes for the unanimous conſent of the multitude. The prætors, indeed, were for bringing the cauſe before the ſenate, but were prevented by the clamours of the people; ſo that Epicydes and Hippocrates were declared duely elected.

cure his conqueſt in Italy, and give Carthage an opportunity of recovering her antient dominions in Sicily, where Rome would find it more difficult to maintain a war, than in her own neighbourhood. The Romans, who had been put in poſſeſſion of the greateſt part of this iſland, at the end of the firſt Punic war, had divided their dominions there into two provinces, under the government of two prætors. Appius Claudius ruled in that which bordered on the territories of Syracuſe; and Cornelius Lentulus, at the head of two legions, commanded in the province which was neareſt to Lilybæum. Beſides, Otacilius was cruiſing on the coaſt with a fleet of an hundred ſail, and ready to act according to the reſolutions that ſhould be taken at Syracuſe. However, the forces of the two prætors were not thought ſufficient by the ſenate of Rome to make head againſt the Syracuſans, when ſupported by the numberleſs troops, which in all likelihood would be ſent into the iſland from all parts of Africa. It was therefore reſolved, that Marcellus ſhould tranſport the army he commanded at Nola into Sicily, and aſſiſt Claudius and Lentulus. As Hannibal was no longer ſo formidable as he had been, Marcellus, though juſt recovered from a fit of ſickneſs, ſet out for Sicily on the firſt orders, leaveing Fabius to keep the Carthaginian in awe on the continent. The greateſt part of the Syracuſan prætors were ſtill inclined to keep up a good underſtanding with Rome, and had ſent deputies to Claudius to renew the antient treaties, which had been violated by Hieronymus. But Claudius, who knew that the conſul Marcellus would ſoon arrive in Sicily, came to no concluſion with them, referring the whole matter to the conſul; who, upon his arrival having heard their propoſals, and finding them advantageous to his republic, diſpatched an embaſſy to Syracuſe to confirm the treaty. But the embaſſadors found the ſtate of affairs much altered. A report had been induſtriouſly ſpread by the emiſſaries of Hannibal, that a Carthaginian fleet appeared off cape Pachynum, and this report gave new confidence to the enemies of Rome. Beſides, Hippocrates and Epicydes left no ſtone unturned to inſpire the populace with an averſion to the Romans. By means of the mercenaries and Roman deſerters they ſpread a report, that Syracuſe was to be delivered up to the Romans, and that this deſign was carrying on by the prætors, who had ſold themſelves to Rome. Theſe ſuſpicions were confirmed by the approach of ſome ſhips of Otacilius, tacilius, which Appius had ordered to draw near to Syracuse, to encourage the party in the Roman interest. Nay, the populace, at the instigation of Hippocrates and Epicydes, had already taken up arms, to oppose the pretended descent of the Romans [t].

Apollonides exhorts the Syracusans to join the Romans.

In this confusion, the wisest among the prætors thought proper to summon an assembly of the people. Hot debates arose, and there being reason to fear some sedition, Apollonides, one of the principal senators, made a discourse very suitable to the occasion. He represented, that never city was nearer its destruction or preservation than Syracuse was at that time; that if they unanimously joined either the Carthaginians or Romans, they might escape the danger that threatened them; but if they were divided, the war would not be more cruel and bloody between the Carthaginians and Romans, than between Syracusans and Syracusans, as having different troops and commanders within the narrow compass of their own walls; that it was therefore absolutely necessary in the first place to agree among themselves, and then to consider which of the allies was to be preferred, since they could not possibly stand neuter, while two rivals were making war under the very walls of Syracuse. As for me, said Apollonides, if I may be allowed to declare my private opinion, the love I bear to my country inclines me to the Romans, who have shewed us a steady friendship, and protected us for fifty years together. Hiero sided with the Romans, and how happy were we during the whole time of his long reign? Hieronymus entered into an alliance with Hannibal, and hence his untimely end, and our present disturbances. In what then have the Carthaginians deserved the preference? He added to this one very material consideration, which was, that if they declared against the Romans, they would have the war immediately upon their hands; whereas on the side of Carthage the danger was more remote. This discourse made no small impression on the minds of the people, who ordered, that a certain number of military officers should be joined in comission with the prætors and the chief men in the senate to deliberate on the matter. Accordingly the council was held, and, after long and warm debates, it appeared, that Syracuse had no just cause to break with Rome. So that it it was declared, that the treaty of peace concluded with the Romans should be continued, and an embassy sent to Marcellus to renew it. But the consul would not accept of the alliance, unless Leontini and the other cities, which had been subject to the kings, were included in the treaty. Hippocrates and Epicydes were overjoyed to hear that the signing of the treaty was put off, being resolved to imbroil matters, and create a misunderstanding between Rome and Syracuse on the first opportunity; and one offered in a few days. The Leontines, being harassed by their neighbours, send to demand aid of the Syracusans, who willingly granted them their request, thinking this a favourable opportunity to discharge their city of a turbulent unruly multitude, and to remove their no less dangerous leaders. Hippocrates was therefore charged to march at the head of the mercenaries and Roman deserters, to the number of four thousand men, into the territory of Leontini, and cover their borders against the incursions of their troublesome neighbours. Hippocrates was not at all displeased with this new commission; he immediately left Syracuse, and, not content to defend the Leontines and ravage the territories of their enemies, made incursions into the Roman province, and laid waste the lands belonging to Rome, which bordered on the country of the Leontines. In this he acted contrary to the orders he had received; but his only view was to provoke the Romans, and oblige them to commit hostilities in the territories of Syracuse wherein he succeeded; for Appius Claudius, who was then the Roman prætor in that part of Sicily, not being able to bear the insults of Hippocrates, marched his troops to the frontiers of his province, and there posted them in different places, with orders to oppose the Syracusan prætor, and repel force by force. This was what Hippocrates wanted, and accordingly, pretending that the Romans were come to attack him, he fell upon one of Appius's detachments, and cut the whole body in pieces. Marcellus, upon advice of these proceedings, sent deputies to Syracuse, enjoyning them to declare before the senate and people, that no alliance was to be expected with Rome, so long as these two enemies to the Roman name continued in Sicily, and therefore to insist upon their being banished the island. The Syracusans shewed a great readiness to comply with the consul's request, and orders were given for the apprehending of Epicydes, Hippocrates being at that time in the terriory of the Leontines at the head of an army. But

Epicydes, having timely notice of the design of the Syracusans, made his escape, and took sanctuary in Leontini, where he hoped to create new troubles. He was there received by his collegue, and both together used their utmost endeavours to embroil the Leontines with the Syracusans, by stirring them up to resume their antient liberty. The city of Leontini had been always subject to Hiero and Hieronymus; but in more antient times an independent state, and was now inclined to throw off the yoke, and recover its antient rights and privileges. This disposition of the people Epicydes made use of to attach them to his interest, openly declaring, that neither he, nor his collegue Hippocrates, would ever abandon them, till they were as free as Syracuse herself. What, said he, shall Leontini be in a worse condition than Syracuse? Shall that imperious city shake off the yoke of her kings, and at the same time keep you in slavery? That liberty, which Syracuse is so proud of, took birth within your walls. The blood of Hieronymus was shed here; the cry of liberty was first heard among you. What then prevents you from procuring that freedom for yourselves, which Syracuse found in your city? Hippocrates and I will assist you to the utmost of our power, and promise you, in the name of our republic, and in that of the great Hannibal, that you shall be soon in a condition to act as independently of Syracuse, as that city has done of you. The name of liberty was so agreeable to the Leontines, that with one consent they declared Hippocrates and Epicydes their generals, protesting, that whatever measures Syracuse might take, they would enter into none, but such as were approved of by their new commanders. Hence, when the Syracusans sent to complain of the hostilities committed against the Romans, and to demand, that Epicydes and Hippocrates should be expelled Sicily, neither their complaints nor demands were heard. They received only this proud answer, that the republic of Leontini had not empowered that of Syracuse to comprehend her in their alliance with the Romans [u].

Hippocrates and Epicydes elected generals of the Leontines.

The Syracusan deputies informed the consul of the revolt of the Leontines, and not only left him at liberty to declare war against them, without any infraction of the treaty made with their republic; but even offered to assist him in so

so just a war, on condition, that the Leontines, when subdued, should again be subject to the Syracusans their antient masters. Marcellus immediately took upon him the command of the troops which served under Appius the prætor, whom he appointed his lieutenant, and marched against the city of Leontini. The legionaries were so enraged at the remembrance of the unexpected massacre of their companions by Hippocrates, that they took the place at their first assault. Hippocrates and Epicydes had time to save themselves in the citadel, whence they withdrew the night following, and retired to Erbessus or Herbessus on the river Anapus, near the frontiers of the Syracusan territories. In their retreat they were informed, that a body of eight thousand men was marching from Syracuse under the command of Sosis and Dinomanes to join Marcellus. Whereupon the two cunning partizans of Hannibal hired men of their faction to meet those two commanders on the road, and to pretend, that they had escaped from the general slaughter at Leontini, where the Romans had put all the inhabitants to death, and burnt the city to the ground. Marcellus indeed had caused all the Roman deserters found in the place, to the number of two thousand, to be beheaded; but had treated both the inhabitants and the mercenary troops with his usual clemency; nay, he was busy at that very time in restoring the inhabitants their goods; and scarce any thing had been taken out of their houses, but what the soldiers had seized in their first fury. However, this false report made such an impression on the soldiers, that their officers could not prevail upon them to march any farther, but were forced to lead them to Megara, a city in that neighbourhood. There they had a more certain account of what had passed at Leontini, and having discovered the cheat Hippocrates and Epicydes had put upon them, they resolved to be revenged, and pursued them to Erbessus. The two chiefs of the Carthaginian party, hearing that the Syracusans were on full march to Erbessus, and dreading the resentment of the two commanders, whom they had exasperated with the false reports which had caused a tumult in the army, took this desperate step. Remembering that they had formerly acquired great reputation among the Syracusan troops, that had served under them in the time of Hieronymus, and consisted chiefly of foreigners and mercenaries, they resolved to leave their asylum, meet the army, army, and throw themselves upon the mercy of the soldiers. It happened luckily for them, that a body of Cretans, who were greatly addicted to the Carthaginians, were marching at the head of the Syracusan army. These Cretans had formerly served the Romans as auxiliaries; but being taken prisoners at the battle of Thrasymenus, had been kindly treated by Hannibal, and sent home without ransom. To them therefore Hippocrates and Epicydes addressed as suppliants, and presenting them with olive-branches, which were the symbols of peace, Cretans, said they, we now expect you will shew us some marks of your friendship and gratitude, not suffering the Syracusans to give us up to the fury of the Romans. The Cretans, affected with their speech, immediately took them under their protection, and promised either to share their danger, or deliver them out of it. Sosis and Dinomanes ordered the two prisoners to be put in irons as enemies of the state, but the soldiers refused to obey their orders, protesting, that they would stand by them to the last drop of their blood. So that the two generals were forced to let the criminals escape unpunished, and guard as well as they could against new intrigues. And now Hippocrates and Epicydes, seeing the disposition of the army, invented a stratagem worthy of Hannibal himself. They counterfeited a letter from the two generals to Marcellus, and hired a courier, who was to suffer himself to be taken in the road from Megara to Syracuse. The letter was couched in the following terms: Sosis and Dinomanes to the consul Marcellus, greeting. We are overjoyed to hear that you have put all the Leontines to the sword, especially the mercenaries who were commanded by Hippocrates. Our republic will never be at rest while we have any of these foreigners amongst us. Turn then your arms towards Megara, and deliver Syracuse from the mercenaries we command. It is easy to imagine what effect the reading of this letter must have had on the minds of the soldiers. They immediately cried, to arms, and would have fallen on their generals, if they had not saved themselves by flight to Syracuse, whither the calumny followed them. For Hippocrates and Epicydes, having corrupted one of the soldiers who had been shut up in Leontini, sent him away to Syracuse, that he might appear there as an eye-witness of the pretended cruelties practised by Marcellus at the taking of the city. He exaggerated the inhumanity of the Romans,

and declared that every thing had been destroyed by fire and sword. This report found credit not only among the common people, but even among some of the magistrates. The informer was brought into the senate, and being examined, his deposition raised a jealousy among the leading men of the republic, who thought it necessary to shut the gates of Syracuse, and guard the city against the Romans, as an enemy, whose avarice and cruelty would spare nothing. However, this falshood did not take with all; there were but few, besides the populace and soldiery, who gave into it; the rest were undeceived by Sosis and Dinomanes [w].

In the mean time, Hippocrates and Epicydes, taking advantage of the absence of Sosis and Dinomanes, made themselves masters of the army, and so incensed them against their generals, that they were for cutting in pieces the few Syracusan troops that served among them, as privy to their design of destroying all the foreigners. But the two Carthaginians stopped their fury, not so much out of compassion as policy. They were sensible, that the massacre of those innocent men would have provoked the citizens of Syracuse against them; whereas by protecting them they secured to themselves both their friendship and that of their relations. Having taken these precautions, they began their march to Syracuse, and finding the gates shut, they prevailed upon the officers of the guard to open one, declaring, that their only design was to defend the city against the Romans. Some part of the army was already entered, when the Syracusan prætors hastening to the gate, commanded it to be shut. But the soldiers without and populace within conspiring together, the few Syracusan troops, that were then under arms, could not prevent the whole army from entering the city, and possessing themselves of the quarter called Tyche. The prætors retired to Acradina, but as they had only a handful of young citizens to defend it, that post was soon forced, and all the prætors who were there massacred, except Sosis, who escaped in the tumult, and took sanctuary in the Roman camp. Thus the two partizans of Carthage became masters of Syracuse, and, having the people and troops at their devotion, devotion, ruled with as abſolute and arbitrary a ſway as any tyrants had done before them. And now, foreſeeing that Marcellus would ſoon lay ſiege to the city, they neglected nothing that was neceſſary to put it in a poſture of defence. They gave the ſlaves their liberty, and enrolled them in the troops. They ſet free all priſoners, aſſembled the people to elect new prætors, and prevailed upon the blind multitude to elect them only, which was confirming the ſovereignty they had uſurped.

Marcellus no ſooner heard that Epicydes and Hippocrates were become maſters of Syracuſe, but he left Leontini, and, at the entreaties of the prætors, who had fled for refuge to his camp, came and inveſted the city. The Roman prætor Appius ſtill endeavoured to bring about an accommodation, and with this view ſent two gallies to Syracuſe, with embaſſadors to negotiate a reconciliation between the Romans and citizens. But one of the gallies being by a violent ſtorm driven into the port, the Syracuſans ſeized it, and by that act of hoſtility declared war. The other galley, which had the embaſſadors on board, returned without landing them, leſt the law of nations ſhould be violated in their perſons. However, Marcellus, who was encamped near the temple of Jupiter Olympius, about a mile and a half from the city, in order to bring the Syracuſans to reaſon, ſent in a new embaſſy. But Hippocrates and Epicydes, hearing of their approach, went out to meet them with a numerous attendance, not caring they ſhould come into the city. The Roman, who was at the head of the embaſſy, addreſſing the Syracuſans, told them, that the Roman conſul was not come as an enemy to deprive them of their liberty, but to reſcue them from the oppreſſion they groaned under, and to revenge the death of their murdered prætors; and that if they ſuffered their magiſtrates, who had ſheltered themſelves in the Roman camp, to return and live at home quietly, if they delivered up to the conſul's hands the authors of the late ſlaughter, and reſtored the city of Syracuſe to its antient liberty, the Romans would have no occaſion to make uſe of arms, or employ any violence. But, if they did not comply with theſe juſt demands, they ſhould be obliged to treat them as enemies, and make them feel the moſt dreadful effects of war. To this Hippocrates haughtily replied, that if they intended to beſiege Syracuſe, they ſhould ſoon be made ſenſible of the difference between that city and Leontini, and that as for their demands, they would grant none of them.

Having

Having made this ſhort reply, he turned his back upon the deputies, returned into the city with his attendants, and cauſed the gates to be ſhut. Marcellus therefore determined to beſiege the place by ſea and land, and made the neceſſary preparations for ſo great an undertaking [x].

Syracuſe beſieged by Marcellus.

WHEN the Romans had taken their poſts, they hoped to carry the city of Syracuſe by aſſault, as they had lately done that of Leontini. The attack was general, on the ſide of Acradina by ſea, and of Tyche by land. Marcellus took upon him the command of the fleet, leaving the land-forces to be conducted by Appius. The city was twenty-two miles in compaſs, and nevertheleſs Marcellus cauſed machines of various ſorts to be raiſed all round it, in hopes of finding ſome weak place in ſo vaſt a compaſs of walls. But to his great ſurprize he found all places equally defended by the wonderful induſtry of a ſingle man. This was the celebrated Archimedes, who, at the requeſt of king Hiero, to whom he was related, had framed ſuch engines of war, as quite diſconcerted the meaſures of the Romans. The pacific prince had no occaſion to made uſe of theſe maſterpieces of art, during the whole length of his reign, nor, probably, did ever imagine, that they would be firſt uſed againſt his faithful allies the Romans. But Hippocrates and Epicydes, finding how uſeful both the machines and the contriver might prove in ſo critical a conjuncture, prevailed upon that great mathematician to undertake the defence of his country; and to his genius alone it was owing, that the city, though of ſo large a compaſs, held out near three years againſt the utmoſt efforts of a conſular army. The immenſe preparations, which the conſul made for the taking that city by ſtorm, could not have failed carrying it, had it not been defended by Archimedes. The Roman fleet conſiſted of ſixty quinqueremes, beſides a far greater number of other ſhips. The decks were covered with ſoldiers armed with darts, ſlings, and bows, to drive the beſieged from the ramparts, which on the ſide of Acradina were waſhed by the ſea, and to facilitate the approach to the walls. But a machine of Marcellus's own invention was what he chiefly depended on. He had faſtened together ſide-ways eight gallies of different lengths, which made but one large body, and were rowed only by the oars of the outermoſt gallies. Theſe eight gallies, thus joined, ſerved only as a baſis for a machine, a machine, which was raiſed up higher than the higheſt towers of the walls, and had at the top a platform, guarded with parapets in front and on each ſide. This machine was called a ſambuca, from its reſemblance to a muſical inſtrument of that name, not unlike a harp. The conſul's deſign was to bring his ſambuca to the foot of the walls of Acradina; but while it was ſtill at a conſiderable diſtance (and it advanced very ſlow, being moved only by two ranks of rowers) Archimedes diſcharged from one of his engines a vaſt ſtone, weighing, according to Plutarch's account (R), twelve hundred and fifty pounds, then a ſecond, and immediately after a third, all which, falling upon the ſambuca with a dreadful noiſe, broke its ſupports, and gave the gallies, upon which it ſtood, ſuch a violent ſhock, that they parted, and the machine, which Marcellus had raiſed upon them, at a vaſt trouble and expence, was battered to pieces. At the ſame time ſeveral other machines, which were not viſible without the walls, and conſequently did not leſſen the confidence of the Romans in the aſſault, played inceſſantly upon their ſhips, and everwhelmed them with ſhowers of ſtones, rafters, and beams pointed with iron. Inſomuch, that Marcellus, being at a loſs what to do, retired with all poſſible haſte, and ſent orders to his land-forces to do the ſame; for the

(R) It is not eaſy to conceive, how the machines formed by Archimedes could throw ſtones of ten quintals, or ten talents weight, as Plutarch expreſſes it (43), at the fleet of Marcellus, when it was a conſiderable diſtance from the walls of Syracuſe. If what Plutarch affirms be true, our artillery falls ſhort of thoſe frightful machines. Some have therefore queſtioned that author's account, and adhered to Polybius, who reduces the ſtones, that were thrown by the Baliſtæ made by Archimedes, to the weight of ten pounds. If we ſuppoſe that each of theſe ſtones, or rather rocks, weighed ten quintals, we cannot compute them at leſs than twelve hundred and fifty pounds weight each, at the rate of an hundred and twenty-five pounds each quintal or talent, according to the cuſtom of computing received among the antient Greeks, and here uſed by Plutarch. Livy ſeems to agree with Polybius, and only ſays, that the machines of Archimedes threw ſtones of a great weight on the gallies of Marcellus. If we reckon the talents mentioned by Plutarch, according to the talent uſed in Sicily, the ſtones will be reduced to the weight of 125 pounds only; nay ſome authors infer from various paſſages of Suidas, Pollux, and Feſtus, that the talent of Sicily ſcarce weighed ten pounds.

the attack on the land-side was attended with no better success, the ranks being broke and thrown into the utmost confusion by the stones and darts, which flew with such noise, force, and rapidity, that they struck the Romans with terror, and dashed all to pieces before them [y].

MARCELLUS surprised, though not discouraged, at this artificial storm, which he did not expect, held a council of war, in which it was resolved, the next day before sun-rise, to come up close under the wall and keep there. They were in hopes by this means to secure themselves against this terrible storm of stones and darts, which fell on the ships when at a distance. But Archimedes had prepared engines, which were adapted to all distances. When the Romans therefore had brought their ships close under the wall, and thought themselves well covered, they were unexpectedly overwhelmed with a new shower of darts and stones, which fell perpendicularly on their heads, which obliged them to retire with great precipitation. But they were no sooner got at some distance, than a new shower of darts overtook them, which made a dreadful havock of the men, while stones of an immense weight, discharged from other machines, either disabled or broke in pieces most of their gallies. This loss they sustained without being able to revenge it in the least on the enemy. For Archimedes had placed most of his engines behind the walls, and not only out of the reach, but even out of the sight, of the enemy; so that the Romans were repulsed with a dreadful slaughter, without seeing the hand that occasioned it, as if they had been fighting, to use Plutarch's expression, not with men, but with the gods themselves. What most harassed the Romans in the attack by sea was, a sort of crow with iron claws, fastened to a long chain, which was let down by a kind of lever. The weight of the iron made it fall with great violence, and drove it into the planks of the gallies. Then the besieged by a great weight of lead at the other end of the lever weighed it down, and consequently raised up the iron of the crow in proportion, and with it the prow of the galley, to which it was fastened, sinking the poop at the same into the water. After this the crow letting go its hold all on a sudden, the prow of the galley fell with such force into the sea, that the whole vessel was filled with water and sunk. At other times the machines dragging dragging ſhips to the ſhore by hooks, daſhed them to pieces againſt the points of the rocks, which projected under the walls. Other veſſels were quite lifted up into the air, there whirled about with incredible rapidity, and then let fall into the ſea, and ſunk with all that were in them. How theſe ſtupendous works were effected, few, if any, have hitherto been able to underſtand. Some writers are of opinion, that Plutarch and Polybius, from whom we have theſe accounts, had no better authority for their relations than a tradition, founded only on the ignorance of thoſe who handed it down to them. The Romans, they ſay, in the time of Marcellus, did not value themſelves upon diving into the ſecrets of mechaniſm, and therefore to extol the conqueror of Syracuſe took pleaſure in magnifying every thing, and making miracles of the moſt common effects of mechanics. Thus ſome authors reaſon, and chuſe to leſſen the credit of venerable writers, and of Archimedes himſelf, rather than honeſtly confeſs, that the machines, as deſcribed by Polybius, Plutarch, and Livy, were wonders of mechaniſm, which all mankind are not capable of underſtanding.

The troops under the command of Appius ſuffered no leſs in this ſecond attack than the fleet. In the whole ſpace of ground, which the army, when formed, took up, the laſt files, as well as the firſt, were overwhelmed with ſhowers of darts and flints, againſt which they could not poſſibly defend themſelves. When they had with infinite trouble brought the mantelets and covered galleries, under which they were to work the rams, near the foot of the walls, Archimedes diſcharged ſuch large beams and ſtones upon them as cruſhed them to pieces. If any brave Roman ventured to draw near to the wall, iron hooks were immediately let down from above, which taking hold of his cloaths, or ſome part of his body, lifted him up in the air, and daſhed out his brains with the fall. Thus one ſingle man repulſed two Roman armies, by mere dint of genius, without having any occaſion to make uſe of the ſword. The Syracuſans were no more than his inſtruments in managing the machines according to his directions, while he himſelf was the ſoul that preſided over all their powers and and operations. Marcellus, though at a loſs what to do, could not, however, forbear expreſſing himſelf with pleaſantry; ſhall we perſiſt, ſaid he to his workmen, in making war upon this Briareus, upon this giant with an hundred hands? But the ſoldiers were ſo terrified, that if they ſaw upon the walls only a ſmall cord, or the leaſt piece of wood, they immediately turned their backs and fled, crying out, that Archimedes was going to diſcharge ſome dreadful machine upon them [z].

MARCELLUS and Claudius, ſeeing their troops thus diſheartened, and having no hopes of making a breach in the walls, called a council, in which it was reſolved to turn the ſiege into a blockade, ſhut up all the avenues to the place both by ſea and land, and force it to ſurrender by famine. But, in the mean time, that ſo great an army might not continue inactive before one ſingle city, Marcellus, leaving Appius before Syracuſe to intercept all convoys to it, put himſelf at the head of two-thirds of the Roman troops, and ſet out to reconquer the cities, which, in this general diſturbance of Sicily, had deſerted the Romans. Elorum and Herbeſſus ſurrendered of their own accord; and were kindly treated by the conqueror; but Megara, having ſtood a ſiege, was taken and razed to the ground, which ſtruck no ſmall terror into the Syracuſans, who now began to fear the like fate. After Marcellus had reduced a great many cities without oppoſition, there being no army in the field to oppoſe him, at laſt Hamilco entered the port of Heraclea with a numerous fleet ſent from Carthage, and landed twenty-thouſand foot, three thouſand horſe, and twelve elephants. His forces were no ſooner ſet aſhore, but he marched againſt Agrigentum, which he retook from the Romans, with ſeveral other cities lately reduced by Marcellus. Upon the news of his arrival and progreſs, which was ſoon known at Syracuſe, the gariſon, which was yet entire and had ſuffered no hardſhips from the ſiege, was very impatient to take the field and join Hamilco. Accordingly it was reſolved, that Epicydes ſhould command in the city, during the blockade, and Hipppocrates march out at the head of ten thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe, to carry on the war in concert with Hamilco, and ſtop the progreſs of Marcellus. This deſign was executed in the night without difficulty. Hippocrates at the head of his detachment broke through the Roman lines, and encamped at Acrillæ, a ſmall town to the ſouth of Syracuſe.

IN the mean time, Marcellus, after having made a vain attempt upon Agrigentum, which was held by Hamilco, was was returning with his army to Syracuse. He did not know that Hippocrates had broke out of the besieged city, and was so near him; but nevertheless marched in good order for fear of a surprize. As he drew near Acrillæ, he unexpectedly discovered the enemy busy in fortifying their camp, in order to pass the night there. Whereupon he advanced in great haste, and falling upon them, before they had time to draw up, cut eight thousand of them in pieces. The cavalry with a small body of infantry made their escape, under the conduct of Hippocrates, to Acræ (S), a city belonging to Syracuse; and Marcellus, after this victory, which kept several cities steady in the interest of Rome, pursued his march to Syracuse, and kept it more closely blocked up than ever [a].

And defeats Hippocrates.

While Marcellus and Appius continued inactive before Syracuse, succours were brought both to the Carthaginians and Romans, the two republics being resolved to make the utmost efforts in Sicily. Bomilcar arrived at Syracuse with a fleet of fifty sail, and about the same time a Roman fleet brought a whole legion to Panormus. This legion Hamilco hoped to surprize before they reached the Roman camp, but they luckily kept along the coast, and arrived safe at cape Pachynum, while Hamilco, expecting they would have crossed the country, lay in wait for them at a great distance from the shore. At Pachynum Appius met them with a large detachment, and conducted them to the main body of the army before Syracuse. As for Bomilcar, the Carthaginian admiral, soon after his arrival he put to sea again and returned to Carthage, upon advice, that the Roman fleet, which was far more strong than his, was advancing to attack him. Hamilco, being joined by Hippocrates and the few troops that had escaped the late slaughter, advanced to Syracuse in order to draw Marcellus to [a] Liv. l. xxiv. c. 35.

(S) Acræ was built, according to Thucydides (44), by the Syracusans about the fourth year of the eighth olympiad, seventy years after the foundation of Syracuse. Cluverius plainly proves from the march which Hipprocrates here takes, and from the old itineraries, that this city stood near the monastery, which the Sicilians call Santa Maura d'Arcia, between the cities of Noto and Avula, about twenty-four miles from Syracuse.

to a battle. But, finding the Roman general kept close in his lines, which were well fortified, he left Syracuse, and marching about the country drew several cities off from the Romans. Murgantia betrayed the Roman garison into his hands and surrendered. Enna, a city of great importance, intended to follow the example of Murgantia. But Pinarius, the commander of the garison, being alarmed at the reports which spread of the revolt of many cities, after having massacred the Roman garisons, kept part of his men under arms, night and day, so that all the Sicilian artifices to deceive him proved ineffectual. He set and relieved the guards himself, and was ever ready against all events, as if Hamilco had been at the gates. The inhabitants therefore, who had promised to deliver up the city to Hamilco, finding that Pinarius could not be surprised, resolved to attempt something by open force, and assembling in crowds demanded of him the keys of their city. Pinarius calmly told them, that he had received the keys of the city, and his commission to guard it, from his general; that it was in vain to apply to him while the consul was within reach; and lastly, that he could not disobey the orders of his general, without drawing upon himself and his family the severest punishments. The Ennenses answered, that if he did not of his own accord comply with their request, they would deliver themselves from their present slavery by force. To which Pinarius replied, that since they would not be at the trouble of recurring to Marcellus, he desired they would at least suffer an assembly of the people to be called, that he might know, whether this was the motion of a few only, or of the whole city. This being granted, and the assembly appointed to meet the next day, Pinarius, perceiving that the multitude were determined to come to some violent resolution, took his measures accordingly. In order to secure himself against their furious attempts, he retired with his garison into the citadel, and there acquainted them with the danger that threatened them. The perfidious Ennenses, said he, design to put us all to death, and then surrender themselves up to the Carthaginians. An assembly of the people is appointed to meet to-morrow. By break of day therefore our fate or that of the treacherous Sicilians must be determined. If we are not by that time masters of their lives and fortunes, they will be of ours. Let us not then suffer them to prevent us. Arm yourselves, and wait for a signal from me. I shall be at the assembly, and when I give you a signal signal with my robe, make a great shout, fall on the citizens, and cut them in pieces without giving any quarter. Having thus spoke, he posted some of his troops in the avenues to the market-place, and others in the theatre, where the assembly was held. As soon as it was day, Pinarius came to the place appointed, and represented to the multitude, that he could not surrender the keys, without incurring the displeasure of his general, which would prove fatal to him and his children. Upon this the whole multitude cried out, that he must deliver the keys, and that as to the incurring the displeasure of his general, that was nothing to them. They then crowded round him and began to offer violence, when Pinarius starting up, Your blood, said he, shall atone for the affront you offer a Roman officer, and immediately gave the signal agreed on, and the soldiers rushing in upon the unarmed multitude began the slaughter. Some posted themselves at the doors that none might escape, others sword in hand fell upon those who had surrounded their commander. The floor and seats of the theatre were in an instant covered with blood, and as many were stifled in endeavouring to escape, as fell by the sword. The slaughter in the streets was no less dreadful, the dead and wounded lying every-where in heaps; none were spared, and the city was treated as if it had been taken by assault, and given up to the soldiers to be plundered. Thus Enna was kept in the hands of the Romans, who excused their conduct on this occasion by saying, that they had only been before-hand with those, who designed to treat them in the same manner. And indeed Marcellus, who was a man of a very mild and humane temper, approved of this action, and even granted the soldiers all the plunder which had been found in the city. But, as the city of Enna was consecrated to Ceres and her daughter Proserpine, the Sicilians were highly offended at the massacre of the Ennenses, and their revolts became daily more frequent [b].

In the mean time, Marcellus, having kept all the avenues to Syracuse shut up the whole summer, thought it adviseable to put his men into winter-quarters, in some place near the besieged city; and accordingly retired to Leon (T) in [b] Liv. ibid. c. 36.

(T) The town of Leon stood north of Syracuse, six or seven furlongs in that neighbourhood, to watch there the city and keep it blocked up till ſpring. He ſent Appius Claudius to Rome, that prætor intending to aſk the conſulſhip againſt the next year, a dignity which he had well deſerved. T. Quintius Criſpinus, one of Marcellus's lieutenants, was put in his room, and ſoon after new conſuls being created, viz. Q. Fabius Maximus and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Marcellus, from being conſul, became proconſul in Sicily, and commander in chief of all the Roman forces there.

WHEN the ſeaſon of the year ſuffered the proconſul to take the field again, he was at a loſs what to do; ſome of his officers adviſed him to attack Hamilco in Agrigentum, and others to return to his trenches before Syracuſe and continue the blockade. But the wiſe proconſul foreſaw, that it would be impoſſible for him to take the city, either by force, while it was defended by Archimedes; or by famine, while the Carthaginian fleet, which was returned far more numerous than before, ſupplied it with proviſions. He thought, that the only expedient was to try whether he could make himſelf maſter of Syracuſe by ſome ſecret intelligence. There were many Syracuſans in his camp, who had taken refuge there in the beginning of the troubles. Marcellus therefore diſcloſed his ſcheme to theſe faithful allies, and impowered them to offer their countrymen their lives and liberties, if they ſurrendered to the Romans. The Syracuſans in the camp zealouſly entered into the proconſul's meaſures; but as they found it impoſſible to carry on a correſpondence with their friends in the city, they reſolved to ſend into Syracuſe a truſty ſlave, as a deſerter, to furlongs from Hexapylum, as Thucydides informs us (45). Hexapylum was a ſtately building, which ſerved for an entrance into Syracuſe by the quarter called Tyche. Livy (46) reckons the diſtance between Hexapylum and Leon to be five thouſand paces. But this ſeems very improbable; for Marcellus encamped there with a deſign to continue the blockade of Syracuſe. Interpreters therefore commonly take for granted, that the text of Livy is corrupted, and that we ought to read Mille & quingentis paſſibus, inſtead of quinque millia paſſuum. By this correction Livy's account agrees better with that of Thucydides.

to acquaint their friends with the proconſul's propoſals. The ſlave acquitted himſelf of his charge with great fidelity, and above fourſcore perſons of diſtinction, hiding themſelves under the nets in a fiſher-boat, came ſucceſſively to the Roman camp and conferred in perſon with Marcellus. But when the conſpiracy was upon the point of taken effect, one Attalus, in reſentment for not having been admitted into it, diſcovered the whole to Epicydes, who put all the conſpirators to death.

Marcellus, ſeeing his ſcheme thus defeated, found himſelf involved in new difficulties. Nothing came into his thoughts but the grief and ſhame of raiſing a ſiege, after having ſpent ſo much time in it, and loſt great numbers of men and ſhips. While he was deliberating what to do, an unforeſeen accident revived his hopes of gaining at laſt the place. Epicydes had ſent one Damippus, a Lacedæmonian, to demand ſuccours of Philip king of Macedon, who had already entered into a treaty with the Carthaginians. Damippus was taken by ſome ſhips of the Roman ſquadron, and brought to the camp of Marcellus. But Epicydes, extremely concerned at his detention, expreſſed a great deſire to ranſom the priſoner, and Roman general was not averſe to it, Rome having her reaſons to keep up a good underſtanding with Lacedæmon at that time. Conferences therefore were appointed to be held near Syracuſe, at a place called Portus Trogilorum (U), by the foot of a tower called Galeagra. As the deputies went to and fro, it came into a Roman ſoldier's thoughts to conſider the wall with attention. After having counted the ſtones, which were all of an equal ſize, and examined with his eye the meaſure of each, he found that the wall was not ſo high as had been imagined, and concluded, that it might be ſcaled with ladders of a moderate ſize. The ſoldier therefore, without loſs of time, gave the proconſul an account of what he had obſerved, and Marcellus did not neglect the hint; he examined the place himſelf, and found that the ſoldier's obſervations were very juſt. But the difficulty was how to come with his men to the place, which indeed was weak, but well defended with Archimedes's machines, and guarded with

(U) Trogilorum was a name common both to a ſuburb and a port near Syracuſe; both which lay north of Tyche and Acradina. As to the tower called Galeagra, it ſtood near the Portus Trogilorum, where Tyche and Acradina joined.

with extraordinary care. While Marcellus was meditating with himself by what stratagem he might surprize the centinels there on guard, a deserter informed him, that the Syracusans were on a certain day to begin the celebration of the festival of Diana (W), which lasted three days, and that Epicydes, who wanted other provisions, designed to distribute wine in plenty among the people and soldiers. Upon this advice Marcellus resolved to attack the city in one of the nights during the festival, not confining the assault to the weak place, but making it general. To this end he held a council with some tribunes of the army, and chose out a certain number of the most resolute centurions, giving them leave to select a thousand men out of the whole army. These were ordered first to take a repast, and then to repose till the trumpet called them. In the mean-time, ladders were prepared with great secresy, to prevent the enemy from being informed by their spies. The Roman general determined to make his attack, when the townsmen and soldiers, after having drunk plentifully, were in their first sleep. The scaling-ladders were committed to the management of one single manipulus or company, consisting of an hundred and twenty men. Those advanced silently to the foot of the wall, to which they applied their ladders, and made themselves masters of the tower of Galeagra, without meeting with the least opposition, or even being discovered, the soldiers being all asleep after their debauch. When the first had gained the top of the ramparts without noise or tumult, the others followed, encouraged by the boldness and success of their leaders. At length this whole detachment, consisting of a thousand chosen men, got got ſafe and undiſcovered into the city. In the mean time, another detachment, taking advantage of the enemy's ſtilneſs, for they were all either drunk or aſleep, beat down one of the gates of Hexapylum, and gave a free paſſage to a great body of Romans on that ſide. Other detachments ſcaled the walls in different parts, and they all met at Hexapylum, which had before been appointed for the place of their general rendezvous. The Romans now kept ſilence no longer, but advanced in order of battle, and made themſelves maſters of the quarter called Epipolæ, which was encompaſſed with the ſame common wall as Ortygia, Acradina, Tyche, and Neapolis; had its own citadel called Euryalum on the top of a ſteep rock, and was, we may ſay, a fifth city. Here the Romans ſpent the night, making a dreadful noiſe with their trumpets in order to ſtrike terror into the enemy. The ſound was not heard all over this vaſt city, but it reached far enough to alarm all Tyche, and throw that quarter into the utmoſt conſternation; ſome of the inhabitants there, thinking the Romans already in poſſeſſion of the whole city, leaped down from the walls into the ditch, while others, falling in with the Roman guards, were cut in pieces. Notwithſtanding this confuſion, Marcellus waited till day-break, and then having beat down the ſtately entrance with ſix gates, called Hexapylum, he entered Tyche with his army in battalia [c].

(W) This festival was celebrated in honour of Diana under the name of Artemis, not only at Syracuse, but at Delphos, and in most cities of Greece. On this occasion they offered to the goddess a mullet, as being thought to bear some sort of relation to her; because it is said to hunt and kill the sea-hare (47). The bread offered to the goddess was called Lochia, and the women, who performed the sacred rites, Lombai (48). The Greeks celebrated no fewer than twenty-two festivals in honour of Diana; of which Johnson in his work, intitled, de Festis Græcorum, gives a minute and distinct account.

Epipolæ taken.

And Tyche.

In the mean time, Epicydes, who was quartered in the fartheſt part of Ortygia, at a great diſtance from the places poſſeſſed by the Romans, hearing that the enemy had ſeized on Epipolæ and Tyche, went out of the iſland, and croſſed Acradina at the head of a numerous body of mercenaries, with a deſign to drive the Romans from their poſts, imagining that only a few deſperate men had ſcaled the walls. But when he ſaw, to his great ſurprize, all Epipolæ full of legionaries, after a ſlight ſkirmiſh, he retired into Acradina, to allay the people's fears and prevent a tumult. Then Marcellus marching from Tyche to Epipolæ joined the detachment, which had poſſeſſed themſelves of that quarter in the night. As Marcellus was now on the point of becoming maſter of one of the fineſt and moſt opulent cities in the world, his officers did not fail to congratulate him on his ſucceſs. But he, conſidering from an eminence the beauty and

and extent of that great and ſtately metropolis, is ſaid to have ſhed tears, being touched with compaſſion on the miſeries, to which ſo many inhabitants, formerly rich and fortunate, were going to be reduced. He called to mind the two powerful Athenian fleets, which had been ſunk before this city, and the two numerous armies cut in pieces with the illuſtrious generals who commanded them; the many wars ſuſtained with ſo much valour againſt the Carthaginians, the famous tyrants and kings, who had reigned in that antient metropolis, Hiero particularly, who had ſignalized himſelf by the important ſervices he had rendered the people of Rome, whoſe intereſts had been as dear to him as his own; moved with theſe reflections and his natural inclination to try gentle methods before he uſed violence, he thought it incumbent upon him to engage the Syracuſan noblemen of his party to ſolicit their countrymen to ſurrender of their own accord, that they might thereby prevent the ſacking of the city. The ſoldiers murmured a little at the general's good nature, looking upon Syracuſe and its immenſe riches as a ſure booty. Their wiſhes were but too ſucceſsful, for the Syracuſans would hearken to no propoſals, though the Romans were already maſters of a conſiderable part of the city. Acradina, the ſtrongeſt and beſt part of the city, was not yet taken, and Epicydes had appointed the Roman deſerters to guard it, who, as they were to die according to the Roman laws, though the town were taken by compoſition, watched all the avenues to it with extreme care. Marcellus therefore, leaving Acradina, turned his arms againſt the citadel of Epipolæ, called Euryalum, which was not yet taken. This fort ſtood on an eminence, at ſome diſtance from the ſea, and commanded the great road by which the convoys were brought into the city. The governor was an Argian, by name Philodemus, and had been entruſted with the defence of the place by Epicydes. Soſis, who had formerly taken ſanctuary in the Roman camp, hoped to prevail upon him to capitulate. But the artful Greek, having demanded time to conſider, put off the ſurrender of the city from day to day, not doubting, but Hamilco and Hippocrates would haſten to the relief of Syracuſe, already half taken. Hereupon Marcellus, encamping between Neapolis and Tyche, cut off all communication with Epipolæ, hoping to reduce the citadel in a very ſhort time by famine. In this new camp the inhabitants of Tyche and Neapolis ſent

deputies to him, entreating him to spare their lives, and preserve their houses from being plundered. Their city had been taken by assault, so that according to the laws of war the conqueror was master of their lives and fortunes. However, Marcellus shewed them clemency. The plunder of the place was due to the soldiers, as a reward of their valour, and he could not deprive them of it without injustice. But he enjoined them under pain of death not to kill, or any ways abuse, the inhabitants, and even posted guards in all the avenues to see that his orders were put in execution. No city was ever plundered with so much order or less cruelty. The soldiers, breaking open the houses, seized indeed every thing they found, money, moveables, and provisions; but did not offer the least violence to the vanquished. The booty was immense, but it only raised their expectations of a greater, when Acradina and Ortygia should be taken. During this military execution, Philodemus, governor of the citadel of Epipolæ, despairing of being able to subsist in the midst of a plundered city, which could not supply him any longer with provisions, came to terms with the proconsul, and being allowed to march out with his men and join Epicydes, put the citadel into the hands of the Romans. Then, Marcellus, turning all his efforts against Acradina, blocked it up so close, that it could not hold out long without new supplies of men and provisions [d].

The quarters of the city that were taken, plundered.

During these transactions, Hamilco and Hippocrates appeared before Syracuse, and their arrival gave the Romans no small apprehension. Marcellus, as we have said, was shut up within the walls, being encamped between Neapolis, or the new city, and Tyche, in a place which was almost destitute of inhabitants; Crispinus was not yet entered Syracuse, but still continued in the old post of the Romans. The two Carthaginian generals, after having taken a view of both camps, resolved to divide the attacks between them. Hamilco was to fall on Marcellus's camp, while Hippocrates endeavoured to force the trenches of Crispinus. The Carthaginian fleet at the same time was drawn up in line of battle along the coast

coast within reach of Acradina, so as to cut off all communication between the forces of Marcellus, which surrounded Acradina, and Crispinus. Hippocrates began the attack, and fell with the utmost fury upon the camp of Crispinus, but was three times repulsed with incredible bravery. At the same time Hamilco without, and Epicydes within the walls, attacked the posts of Marcellus; but were attended with no better success. Epicydes was forced to return into Acradina with great loss, and narrowly escaped being taken prisoner by Marcellus, who commanded there in person. After these two advantages the Roman general pitched three camps round Acradina, and kept it blocked up closer than ever, but durst not draw too near it for fear of the machines of Archimedes. The unfortunate Syracusans were now in the utmost distress for want of provisions, and, to complete their misfortunes, a plague broke out among them. The infection began in the country, being occasioned by the excessive heat of the season, and the unwholesome exhalations of the neighbouring marshes. The two camps of Hamilco and Crispinus were first infected with it, and from the latter it spread to Marcellus's army, by means of his communication with Crispinus. Soon after it began to rage in Arcadina; so that, within and without the city, nothing was seen but persons dead or dying. None durst relieve or assist the sick, for fear of being infected by them; and the bodies of the dead were for the same reason left without burial, to infect and poison the air with their stench and corruption. Nothing was heard night and day but groans of dying men, and the heaps of dead bodies continually presented mournful objects to the living, who expected every moment the same fate. However, the distemper made less ravage in the two Roman armies, than in those of Hamilco and Hippocrates. As the latter had no place to retire to, and were not inured to the climate and air of the country, being for the most part but lately come from Africa, they died daily in great numbers, and at length Hamilco and Hippocrates themselves were carried off. Upon their death most of the Sicilian troops, which had joined the Carthaginians, disbanded and returned to their respective cities. Thus Marcellus was delivered from a great army, which had besieged him as close as he had done Acradina. He had now only only a ſmall body of Sicilians to contend with, for the Carthaginians, both officers and ſoldiers, were all ſwept off by the plague. The Sicilians retired to two ſmall towns, ſtrong by ſituation, and at a ſmall diſtance from Syracuſe, and there waited for a new reinforcement from Carthage, whither Bomilcar had failed to give the ſenate an account of the death of Hamilco and the utter ruin of his army. He allay'd the grief, which this news occaſioned, by repreſenting, that the Romans had imprudently ſhut themſelves up in one city to beſiege another, that their troops were greatly diminiſhed by the plague, that it would be no difficult matter to beſiege them, and bring them into the ſame ſtraits, to which they had reduced Acradina. His ſpeech revived the hopes of the ſenate, who gave him the command of a hundred and thirty gallies, with ſeven hundered tranſports, which formed a fleet conſiderably greater than that which the Romans had on the coaſts of Sicily. With this ſquadron Bomilcar ſet ſail from Carthage, and had a quick paſſage. The news of his return raiſed the courage of the beſieged, and greatly diſheartened the Romans, who were quite tired out with ſo long and tedious ſiege, But as Bomilcar was for ſeveral days prevented, by contrary winds, from doubling cape Pachynum, Marcellus had time to recollect himſelf, and cauſe his fleet to be got ready with a deſign to engage that of the Carthaginians, though far ſuperior in number to his. In the mean time, Epicydes, fearing leſt the Carthaginians ſhould be ſurprized by the Romans, took it into his head to leave Syracuſe and to go to the fleet, which was deſigned for his relief. On his arrival he found Bomilcar uneaſy about the event of a battle, and very backward to engage the Romans, of whoſe preparations he had been already informed. But, nevertheleſs, he was prevailed upon by Epicydes to venture an engagement, and advanced in ſight of the Roman fleet. Marcellus, who commanded it, as ſoon as the high winds abated, began to prepare for a battle, when all on a ſudden, Bomilcar doubling cape Pachynum, took to the main, and ſteered his courſe towards Tarentum, after having diſpatched expreſſes to Heraclea, with orders to the tranſports, which lay there, to return to Africa. What induced him to take ſo ſudden and unexpected a reſolution was never known. Epicydes, being thus diſappointed in the great hopes he had entertained, was afraid to return into a city already half taken, and therefore fled for refuge to Agrigentum, rather with a deſign to wait the event of the ſiege in a place place of ſafety, than to make any attempts towards the relief of a city, which he had brought to deſtruction.

WHEN it was known in the camp of the Sicilians, that Epicydes had quitted Syracuſe and the Carthaginians Sicily, they ſent deputies to Marcellus, after having founded the diſpoſition of the beſieged, to treat of a ſurrender. It was unanimouſly agreed, both by the Sicilians in the camp and the Syracuſans in Acradina, to ſurrender on the following terms, viz. that all the demeſnes of the kings of Syracuſe ſhould be delivered up to the Romans, and that Rome ſhould ſuffer the Syracuſans to live according to their own laws, and enjoy their eſtates and liberties. Marcellus was willing to grant them the terms they demanded, in order to prevent the ſpilling of blood and the ruining of a ſtately city. But thoſe, whom Epicydes had entruſted with the government of the city during his abſence, oppoſed the wiſe meaſures of the inhabitants. As theſe were all ſtrangers, they were little concerned for the welfare of Syracuſe, and ſtill retained ſome hopes of relief, either from Epicydes or Bomilcar. But the magiſtrates, ſeeing the city already reduced to great ſtraits for want of proviſions, reſolved to get rid of their governors, and accordingly aſſaſſinated them all, and then having aſſembled the people in the market-place, introduced to them the deputies of the camp, who had hitherto treated only for themſelves. Theſe, in a ſpeech well calculated for the occaſion, repreſented to the people, that they ought not to impute the calamities they groaned under to fortune, ſince it was in their power to deliver themſelves from them when they pleaſed; that the Romans had not undertaken the ſiege of Syracuſe out of hatred, but out of affection, to the inhabitants, having no other view but to reſcue them out of the hands of their tyrants; that Hippocrates and Epicydes had brought all their misfortunes upon them, but ſince one of them was carried off by the plague, and the other had deſerted them out of fear, what remained but to have recourſe to the clemency of the conqueror? The ſervices, ſaid they, of Hiero, and his faithful adherence to the Romans, are not entirely blotted out of their memories. Only conſent to be reconciled to Rome, and you will be free and happy. Marcellus out of good nature offers you advantageous terms, which if you do not accept, all ſubſequent calamities will be entirely chargeable on ourſelves. Seize therefore the preſent opportunity, and ſince you are delivered from your tyrants, let Deputies ſent to Marcellus.

This diſcourſe was received with general applauſe; and the aſſembly thought proper to create new magiſtrates before the nomination of the deputies, to make the embaſſy to Marcellus more ſolemn and authentic. Some of the prætors were in the number of the deputies, and the perſon who ſpoke addreſſed himſelf to Marcellus thus: "You "ſee at your feet the deputies of a people, who have been "unfaithful to you againſt their will. Hieronymus, and "not we, broke the alliance with Rome, wherein he did "more hurt to his ſubjects than to you. When after his "death our antient alliance was renewed with Rome, it "was not infringed by the Syracuſans, but by the emiſſa-"ries of Hannibal, who did not make war upon you till "they had firſt made us ſlaves; and it cannot be ſaid, that we "have had any times of liberty, which have not been times "of peace and alliance with you. And at this preſent, "as ſoon as we are become maſters of ourſelves, by the "death of thoſe who held us in ſubjection, we come to "deliver up to you our arms, our perſons, our walls, and "our city, determined not to refuſe any conditions you "ſhall think fit to impoſe. The gods, illuſtrious general, "have granted you the glory of taking the moſt noble and "beautiful city of the Greeks, ſo that all her paſt atchieve-"ments, whether by ſea or land, will add to the glory of "your triumph. Make it not then ſo much a point of "honour to deſtroy it, as to leave it a ſtanding monument "of your fame to the world. All ſtrangers, from what-"ever part of the univerſe they ſhall come to Syracuſe, and "there obſerve the monuments of our antient victories "over the Athenians and Carthaginians, will at the ſame "time know, that Marcellus conquered this victorious "people. They will be told, that the Syracuſans are be-"come perpetual clients of the Claudian family, and that "Marcellus made himſelf their firſt patron by his valour "and clemency. Let not the remembrance of Hierony-"mus be of more weight with you, than that of Hiero. "The latter was much longer your friend, than the former "your enemy. Permit me to ſay, that you have reaped "the fruits of Hiero's friendſhip; but the ill-conducted "enterprizes of Hieronymus have fallen only on his own "head."

The

[e] Liv. l. xxv. c. 29.

THE suppliants were graciously received by Marcellus, who was willing to grant their demands; but the greatest difficulty was to preserve tranquillity and union in the city. The garison consisted of Roman deserters and mercenaries, the former, looking upon all conferences about a surrender as so many sentences of death against themselves, used their utmost efforts to prevent the citizens from complying with the terms proposed by Marcellus. But finding all their endeavours unsuccessful, they applied themselves to the mercenaries, and persuaded them that Marcellus would give them no quarter. Whereupon the mercenaries, being inspired with the same fear, joined the deserters, and both taking up arms, while the deputies were still in the camp of Marcellus, ran to the houses of the new prætors, whom they massacred, and then dispersing themselves on all sides, put to the sword all they met, without distinction, plundering the houses, and filled the city with blood and slaughter. That they might not be without leaders, they appointed six officers of their own body, three to command in Acradina and three in Ortygia. The tumult being at length appeased, the mercenaries were made sensible, that they had been imposed upon by the Roman deserters; and the deputies, returning at the same time from the camp of Marcellus, assured them, that the Romans had not decreed any punishment against the foreign troops.

Disturbances raised in Syracuse by the Roman deserters.

AMONG the six new governors, chosen by the seditious to command in Syracuse, was a Spaniard, named Mericus, a man of great integrity, and who did not approve of the measures taken by his collegues. This man Marcellus took upon him to gain over to the Romans, and with this view sent into the city a young Spaniard lately come from Spain, charging him to make great offers in his name to his countryman, provided he would do him some important service. The young Spainard got safe into the city among the attendants of the Syracusan embassadors, and discharged his commission so well, that Mericus sent his brother privately to Marcellus with the Spanish soldier, who having obtained a private audience agreed with Marcellus, in the name of Mericus, to deliver up one of the gates to the Romans. As soon as the two Spaniards were returned into Acradina, Mericus made it his only business to perform his promise. He first feigned an extraordinary zeal for the defence of the city, pretending, that the deputies of Marcellus were allowed too much liberty, and that it was dangerous to admit any such deputies into Acradina, or to send embassies to the Romans. Upon the credit of this first step he proposed, that, as they had to deal with so artful an enemy as Marcellus, each governor should have his distinct quarter of the city assigned him, and should be responsible for any neglect of duty in it. His advice was followed, and in this division that part of Acradina fell to him, which lay between the fountain of Arethusa and the great port, not far from the island Ortygia. Marcellus, being informed in what part Mericus commanded, resolved to make an attempt on that side. Accordingly, having filled a transport with soldiers, he ordered them to land at the gate of Arethusa, where they were received within the walls by Mericus, and put in possession of the gate. A false attack was carried on at the same time in a neighbouring quarter, which drew all the enemies forces out of the island, and diverted them from observing what happened at the gate Arethusa. As the island of Ortygia was by this means quite abandoned, Marcellus, who had foreseen this, sent several transports with a strong detachment to take possession of the island, which they did without opposition, the gate being left open by the garison, while they hastened to repulse the enemy, at the place where the false attack was carried on. When Marcellus was informed, that his men was in possession of the island, which was reckoned impregnable, and also a quarter in Acradina, he immediately caused the retreat to be sounded, lest the soldiers should, in the heat of the action, plunder the treasures of the kings of Syracuse, which were much magnified by fame [f].

The clemency of Marcellus towards the conquered.

And now Marcellus after a three years siege, being at length become master of the unfaithful city, gave signal proofs of his clemency and good nature. The place was taken by assault, and had greatly provoked the Romans by joining their most avowed enemies, while they were engaged in a war, that was likely to prove fatal to them. But, notwithstanding their infidelity, he would not use all the rights of a conqueror, nor practice that severity which the faithless city perhaps deserved. The first instance he gave of his good nature was, his ordering that the Roman deserters should be suffered to escape, being unwilling to shed the blood even of traitors. Accordingly, a gate was left open for them, and all the Roman forces withdrawn from thence till they had made their escape. The inhabitants bitants of the two conquered cities ſent deputies to him, demanding nothing elſe but their own lives and the lives of their children. Theſe Marcellus received with great humanity, and having aſſembled a council compoſed of his own officers and of ſome Syracuſans who were in his camp, returned them the following anſwer. "Syracu-

"ſans, ſaid he to them, the ſervices, which good king

"your unfaithfulneſs, and pay dearer for the breach of "your treaties than we deſire. My aim was not, in ſit-

"but to deliver you from your tyrants, and prevail upon
"you to deliver up into my hands two men, who have "now abandoned you without ſharing the misfortunes they "have brought upon you. Both the examples of your "magiſtrates, who fled to the Roman camp for refuge,
"and of the moſt illuſtrious of your citizens, who came "from time to time to ſurrender themſelves up into our "hands, continually excited you to return to us. And "yet a generous Spaniard has all the glory of bringing "you back to your duty. As for myſelf, the glory of "having taken Syracuſe, and the ſatisfaction of ſaving it "from the entire ruin it deſerved, make me ſufficient a"mends for the fatigues and dangers I have undergone
"in ſo long a ſiege." Live then Syracuſans, live: But let the plunder of your goods be the puniſhment of your obſtinacy, and the juſt reward of my ſoldiers. Marcellus, having ſpoke thus, immediately ordered the quæſtor of his army to take poſſeſſion of the king's treaſures for the uſe of the republic, and gave the reſt of the booty up to his troops, without reſerving any part of the plunder for himſelf.

As ſoon as the trumpets ſounded, the Roman ſoldiers diſperſed themſelves all over Ortygia and Acradina, and nothing eſcaped their avarice. Nay, the enraged ſoldiers went beyond their orders, and, adding cruelty to avarice, put many of the citizens to the ſword, and amongſt others the great Archimedes. During the ſacking of Acradina, he was ſhut up in his cloſet, and ſo intent on a demonſtration of geometry, that neither the noiſe of ſoldiers, nor the cries of the people, drew off his attention from it. He was very calmly drawing his lines, when he ſaw a ſoldier enter his room, and clap a ſword to his throat.

Archimedes killed by a Roman ſoldier.

Hold,

Hold, friend, said Archimedes, one moment, and my demonstration will be finished. The soldier, surprized at his unconcern in so great a danger, resolved to carry him to the pro-consul; but Archimedes taking under his arm a small box full of spheres, sundials, &c. the soldier thought it contained gold and silver, and not being able to resist the temptation killed him on the spot. Marcellus was exceedingly concerned for his death, but not being able to repair that misfortune, he applied himself to honour his memory to the utmost of his power. He made a diligent search after his relations, treated them with great distinction, and granted them peculiar privileges. He likewise caused his funeral to be performed with great pomp and solemnity, and a monument to be erected to his memory, among the great men who had distinguished themselves in Syracuse [g].

An account of Archimedes.

As the defence of the city for near three years together was the work of Archimedes alone, whose great genius made him, as it were, the intelligence that presided over all the labours of the besieged, it will not be improper to make here a short digression, and give the reader some short account of so extraordinary a person. He was born in Syracuse, and descended of an illustrious family, being related to king Hiero. Most of the antients tell us, that he was no less considerable for his noble extraction, than sublime genius. Yet Cicero represents him as a man of a very mean birth, who had nothing to recommend him, but his skill in geometry [h]; and the only elogium he bestows on this famous mathematician is, that he had a fruitful genius, and made many fine discoveries. But the Roman orator knew no more of Archimedes than what he had learned of Polybius, who only mentioned such endowments, as had made his name immortal, and these were not much esteemed by the Romans in Cicero's times, who thought no merit equal to that of an orator, a general, or a statesman. And hence it is, that Cicero prefers Archytas and Plato to Archimedes. The former had governed Tarentum, and, together with a singular talent for the mathematics, had all the qualities of an excellent general. The latter was eminent among the antient legislators, which was enough to gain him the preference in the opinion of the Romans. But Archimede wa

was neither a ſtateſman, nor a ſoldier, nor an orator. But if we conſider, that he alone found means to diſconcert all the meaſures of one of the greateſt officers of the Roman republic, and by the force of his genius rendered all the efforts of two numerous armies unſucceſsful, we cannot without injuſtice degrade him ſo far, as to place him after an Archytas, or a Plato. And therefore Plutarch ſpeaks of him with admiration: He ſays, that his great genius made him be looked upon as ſomething more than a mortal, that he excelled all thoſe who had gone before him, and that it was hardly credible any ſhould in future ages ever rival him. His ſtrong paſſion for mathematics gave room for the report, that he was continually ſo charmed with the ſoothing ſongs of a domeſtic ſyren, that he neglected the common concerns of life: For he took delight in no pleaſure of life, but in that of ſtudy. For the ſake of this he deſpiſed every thing elſe. Not to interrupt his ſtudies he often denied himſelf the neceſſaries of life, and was dragged from his contemplations, to take a frugal repaſt. Senſible only to the pleaſures of the mind, he ſo neglected his perſon, that his friends were obliged in a manner to force him to the public baths, to make him preſerve a decency ſuitable to his rank; and even then he employed himſelf for the moſt part in drawing mathematical figures, on the walls of the ſtoves with the water in which he bathed. In ſhort, the contemplation of the heavens and the earth gave him ſuch delight, as rendered all other pleaſures quite taſteleſs to him and inſipid. He long confined his thoughts to ſpeculations only, according to the prejudices of that time, when it was thought too low an employment for a great genius to reduce the ſublime diſcoveries of the mind to practice. But king Hiero had ſufficient power with him to make him deſcend from thoſe ſublime ſpeculations to practice, and to convince him, that no man could, without ingratitude, deprive the public of the fruits of his private ſtudies. One day when Archimedes was explaining to the king the wonderful effects of the motive powers, he told him, that he had invented, but not made, a machine, by which he could draw the whole globe of the earth to him, provided he could find another globe or earth to ſtand on. The king, ſurprized at the propoſal, deſired him to give a proof of ſo bold an aſſertion, by removing ſome great weight with a ſmall force. Archimedes complyed with the king's requeſt, and having cauſed one of the heavieſt gallies in the port to be drawn aſhore by a great number of men, he built his machine, and then ſitting down at a proper diſtance from the galley, without trouble or exerting his force in the leaſt, drew the veſſel to him, though ſhe had her full lading in her, and was crowded with men. This experiment plainly ſhewed the king what uſe he might make of the wonderful talents of this great man, if he could only perſuade him to put his inventions in practice. This the king undertook to do, and by many intreaties prevailed upon the ſpeculative geometrician to deſcend to mechanics, and build thoſe wonderful machines for the defending of cities, which we have ſpoke of above. Beſides the warlike machines, amongſt his maſter-pieces was reckoned a ſphere of glaſs, the circles of which repreſented the periodical and ſynodical motions of the ſtars and planets. Cicero himſelf could not help doing juſtice to the inventor of ſo fine a work, ſaying, that we ought to look upon this artificial globe, or rather little world, in which Archimedes had ſo happily imitated the wiſe hand of the divine architect of the univerſe, as the effect of a ſuperior genius [i] (X). Some have falſly imagined, that Archimedes ſet fire to the Roman

Roman fleet by means of a burning glaſs [k]. But the honour of this invention is due to Proclus, who firſt made uſe of brazen burning-glaſſes, to ſet on fire the ſhips of Vitalian, who beſieged Conſtantinople, in the 500th year of the chriſtian æra. Thoſe who have the leaſt knowledge of mathematics, underſtand what kind of demonſtration Archimedes made uſe of againſt a diſhoneſt goldſmith, who having agreed with king Hiero for a certain quantity of gold, which was to be formed into a crown for one of the gods, kept ſome of the gold for himſelf, and putting ſilver in the room of it reſtored to the king of Syracuſe a crown as heavy as the gold he had received. The diſcovery of this fraud, which Archimedes made in a bath, gave him ſo great pleaſure, that he ran home, without reflecting he was naked, crying out aloud, I have found it, I have found it. But the force of his genius ſhewed itſelf to far greater advantage in the ſtructure and direction of the formidable batteries he played againſt the Roman armies and fleets. It is a great misfortune, that neither he, nor any after him, have given us an account of the manner of building and working thoſe machines. Upon his tomb, as he had ordered in his life-time, was placed a cylinder and a ſphere, with an inſcription ſhewing the proportion between them, which he firſt found out. An invention of ſo little uſe, as this may ſeem, pleaſed that great artiſt better, than the deviſing of thoſe machines which made him ſo famous. The Syracuſans, who had been in former times ſo fond of the ſciences, did not long retain the eſteem and gratitude they owed a man, who had done ſo much honour to their city. In leſs than a hundred and forty years after, Archimedes was ſo perfectly forgot by his citizens, notwithſtanding the eminent ſervices he had done them, that they did not even know he had been buried at Syracuſe. It is from Cicero we have this circumſtance, who being led by his curioſity, while he was quæſtor in Sicily, to make a ſearch after the tomb of Archimedes, was aſſured by the Syracuſans, that his ſearch would be to no purpoſe, there being no ſuch monument among them. Cicero pitied their ignorance, which only ſerved to encreaſe his deſire of making that diſcovery. After many fruitleſs attempts, he at laſt obſerved, without the gate of the city leading to Agrigentum, a pillar almoſt entirely covered with thorns and brambles, through which he

he could discern the figure of a sphere and cylinder. Those, who have any taste for antiquity, may easily conceive the joy of Cicero on this occasion. He cried out with the words of Archimedes, I have found it, I have found it. The place was immediately cleared, when the inscription appeared still legible. So that, says Cicero, in concluding this account, the greatest city of Greece, formerly the mother of sciences, would not have known the treasure it possessed, if a man born in Arpinas had not discovered the tomb of one of its citizens, so highly distinguished by the greatness of his genius [l]. But to resume the thread of our history.

Engyum taken by Marcellus.

Marcellus, after having plundered Syracuse and stript it of all its valuable monuments, which were sent to Rome, advanced to the city of Engyum, which was one of the most antient colonies the Cretans had founded in Sicily. The Engyans had received a strange superstition from their founders, which it was dangerous to contradict. It was affirmed, that certain goddesses, called the Mothers, appeared from time to time in a temple of that city. But one Nicias, a man of wit, had talked with some pleasantry of these pretended apparitions, and being likewise a friend to the Romans, the inhabitants resolved to put him to death. But he avoided the danger by counterfeiting madness, and then made his escape to the Romans, who took him under their protection. This enraged the Engyans against them to such a degree, that Marcellus thought it necessary to curb their insolence, and punish them for the severity they practised on the friends of Rome. He flew to Engyum, and took it by assault, but at the request of Nicias spared the inhabitants, and would not even suffer his soldiers to plunder the place. By this clemency Marcellus gained the hearts of the Sicilians, and his reputation was extended far among the Greeks [m].

Antines maintains the Carthaginian interest in Sicily.

After the reduction of Syracuse, most of the cities of Sicily, which had sided with the Carthaginians, voluntarily submitted to Marcellus; and those which had continued faithful to Rome, or had renewed their alliance with the republic without waiting till Syracuse was taken, were maintained in possession of their ancient privileges. Nevertheless Sicily was not entirely settled in peace: Epicydes and Hanno, the commander of the Carthaginian forces the iſland, were fled to Agrigentum for refuge; Mutines, who had been ſent by Hannibal to ſupply the place of Hippocrates, kept the field at the head of a detachment of Numidians. The general was a Phœnician by deſcent, and a native of Hippo a city of Africa, which the Greeks called Diarrhytos, to diſtinguiſh it from another city, bearing the ſame name of Hippo, in Numidia. This officer, who was formed by Hannibal himſelf, had acquired great reputation in the army by his valour and conduct. Epicydes and Hanno, who were well acquainted with his merit, had given him the command of a body of Numidian horſe, and this brave man anſwered their expectations. He ſoon made himſelf dreaded in all Sicily, by the many advantages he gained over the cities in alliance with Rome. After he had with ſurprizing expedition ravaged the enemy's lands, he flew to all the places that ſtill adhered to Carthage, and by his preſence kept the wavering people in awe, even after the reduction of Syracuſe. He ſecured the fidelity of ſome by ſending them the proviſions and ſuccours they wanted; others he encouraged with his preſence to hold out reſolutely againſt Marcellus, and raiſed their dejected ſpirits. He ſeemed to be in all places where the intereſt of the republic required his preſence. Epicydes and Hanno had till now ſhut themſelves up in Agrigentum; but being encouraged by the ſucceſsful expeditions of Mutines, they ventured to take the field, and advancing as far as the river Himera, formed a camp there. Marcellus, being informed of the enemy's march, immediately put himſelf at the head of his army, and encamped about four miles from the Carthaginian troops, with a deſign to watch their motions. Mutines did not give him time to deliberate what part to act; for that brave general, who only wanted an opportunity of ſignalizing himſelf, immediately paſſed the river, and falling on the advanced guards, ſpread an alarm in the whole Roman army. The next day Marcellus marched out of his lines and attacked the camp of Mutines, but was repulſed with great loſs. Mutines was preparing to attack the Romans in their entrenchments, when news was brought him, that the Numidian cavalry, falling out among themſelves, had raiſed great diſturbances in the neighbouring country, and that a body of three hundred of them had retired to Heraclea. This obliged the general to drop, or rather put off, his enterprize. He inſtantly flew to ſuppreſs a revolt, the conſequences of which might defeat his deſigns, and at the ſame deſired Epicydes and Hanno not to venture an engagement till he returned. This requeſt was no-ways agreeable to the two generals. Hanno, who had been long jealous of the glory and reputation of Mutines, could not brook his ſeeming to impoſe laws upon him, as if he had been a ſubaltern. What, ſaid he, am I ſent into Sicily with a commiſſion by the ſenate and people of Carthage, only to be ſubject to the caprice of a man of no birth or family? Hanno found it no difficult matter to inſtill the ſame uneaſineſs into the mind of Epicydes. So that they both reſolved to paſs the river, and give battle without waiting for Mutines. Their rage and jealouſy made them look upon this brave African only as a troubleſome rival, who would aſſume to himſelf all the honour of a victory, which they might gain without him. Marcellus, ſeeing the Carthaginians form their army, drew up his likewiſe in battalia. This great general had four years before humbled the pride of Hannibal before Nola, and therefore thought it ſhameful to retire before two commanders, who were much inferior to him, and who had already felt ſo often the effects of the Roman valour. So that the Roman accepted the challenge, and while he was preparing for the battle, ten Numidians came from the Carthaginian army to inform him, that their countrymen were determined to continue inactive during the engagement. They were perſuaded, that Epicydes and Hanno had ſent away Mutines their commander, and employed him elſewhere, on purpoſe to rob him of the glory of conquering the Romans. The report of the revolt of the Numidians was ſoon ſpread among the legionaries, who looked upon it as a happy preſage of victory. The moſt cowardly took courage when they were no longer to contend with thoſe ſquadrons, which had been to that time ſo formidable to them. As to the enemy, they were ſeized with a ſudden terror upon the firſt report of the revolt. Beſides, Epicydes and Hanno could no longer depend on the Numidian cavalry, which was the main ſtrength of their army, and were under no ſmall apprehenſion, leſt, in the heat of the engagement, they ſhould turn their arms againſt the Carthaginians. While they were in this perplexity, the Roman army advanced, and falling upon the affrighted troops with the utmoſt fury, put them to flight at the firſt onſet. The fugitives took the road to Agrigentum, whither they were purſued by the Romans, who killed many thouſands of them

them, and took eight elephants. The Numidians, after having been idle ſpectators of the battle, refuſed to follow the others to Agrigentum, for fear of being beſieged there by the Romans, and retired to the neighbouring cities. This great advantage raiſed Marcellus to the higheſt pitch of glory; he returned victorious to Syracuſe, and ſoon after ſet out from thence for Rome, after having delivered up his army and the government of Sicily to Marcus Cornelius Cethegus. He was ſcarce gone, when a Carthaginian fleet landed eight thouſand foot and three thouſand Numidian horſe in Sicily. By the help of theſe new forces the Carthaginians began to recover their power in ſeveral parts of the iſland; Murgantia, Hybla, and Macella went over to them, and after their example ſome leſs conſiderable places fell off from the Romans. As for Mutines, he at the head of his Numidians deſtroyed the country with fire and ſword, daily returned to the cities of his allies loaded with booty, and laid the whole country waſte, with impunity even in ſight of the Roman army. The Roman ſoldiers were enraged, that they had not been allowed to follow their general to Rome, and there ſhare the honours of a triumph with him. Their murmurs increaſed, when they were forbad to take up their winter quarters in the cities; and they only wanted a head to break out into an open rebellion. All the addreſs of Marcus Cornelius was wanting to appeaſe their reſentment; ſome he gained by careſſes and fair words, others he intimidated by threatnings, and having brought them to ſubmit again to the laws of military diſcipline, he ſoon repaired the loſſes the republic had ſuffered ſince the departure of Marcellus. At the head of his troops he forced all the rebellious cities to return to their duty, and particularly Murgantia, which with its territory was beſtowed by the ſenate on the Spaniards, as a reward for their zeal in the ſervice of the republic [n].

New forces arrive from Carthage in Sicily.

But the total reduction of Sicily was reſerved for Marcus Valerius Lævinus, who, being appointed conſul with Marcellus, was ſent into Sicily to ſettle the affairs of that iſland. It ſtill continued cuſtomary at Rome for the two conſuls to chuſe their provinces by lot; and it now happened, that Italy fell to Lævinus, and Sicily to Marcellus. But as ſoon as this was declared, the Sicilians, who were preſent, expreſſed as much terror and conſternation as they had done at Syracuſe, when Marcellus ſurprized it. They dreſſed themſelves, selves in mourning, crowded to the houses of the senators, and protested, that it would be better for Sicily to perish in the flames of mount Ætna, or to be swallowed up by the sea, than to fall again under the government of her conqueror and tyrant. These accusers had been suborned by M. Cornelius Cethegus, who, being prætor in Sicily, sent them to Rome with a design to form an accusation against Marcellus, and raise his own glory on the ruins of this great man's reputation. In order to this he wrote many letters to the senate, wherein he declared, that there was a great deal to do in the island, before it could be entirely reduced; and thereby prevented Marcellus from enjoying the honour of a triumph, which was seldom granted till an expedition was completed. The Syracusans, who were to accuse Marcellus, kept themselves concealed in the villages round Rome, till they heard that Sicily had fallen to his lot, and then they appeared as suppliants before the senate to demand justice against him. Marcellus, who was not a stranger to the secret plots of his enemies, and knew, that some of the senators out of compassion, and others out of jealousy, laid great stress on the complaints of the Syracusans, declared, that if his collegue was willing to change provinces, he would not be against it. Lævinus consented to the change, and accordingly orders were sent into Sicily, enjoining the prætor Cornelius Cethegus to deliver up the troops under his command to the consul. But before either Lævinus or Marcellus set out for their respective provinces, the Sicilians were heard in the senate, and Marcellus cleared. His proceedings in Sicily were declared regular, the pillage of Syracuse approved of, and his regulations ratified. Nevertheless it was decreed, that Rome should for the future consult the interest of Syracuse and Lævinus was exhorted to shew the Syracusans all the lenity that was consistent with the welfare of the republic. When the decree was passed, the Sicilians were brought to the senate to hear it, and Marcellus, who had retired that the debates of the senators might be more free, came after them, and took his place as consul. Then the Sicilians, confounded at what they had done, threw themselves at his feet, bathed them with tears, and begged him to pardon the attempts, which the present sense of their misery had induced them to make against his honour. Marcellus received them very graciously, promised them his protection, and in consequence of this promise obtained of the sena-

that the Syracuſans ſhould be reinſtated in their antient liberties, and treated as allies of Rome. Hence proceeded the eternal gratitude of the Syracuſans to Marcellus and his poſterity. They enacted a decree, wherein it was ordered, that whenever any of his family ſet foot in Sicily, the people ſhould walk before him crowned with garlands, and celebrate that happy day with ſacrifices. From thenceforth, the whole iſland remained under the patronage of the Marcelli, the Sicilians becoming clients of that illuſtrious family ° (Y).

(Y) The conduct of Marcellus on this occaſion was not intirely approved of at Rome. Some of the ſenators, remembering the attachment which king Hiero had on all occaſions ſhewn to their republic, could not help condemning their general for giving up the city to be plundered by his greedy ſoldiers. The citizens were not in a condition to make good their party againſt an army of mercenaries, and therefore were obliged againſt their will to yield to the times, and obey the miniſters of Hannibal who commanded the army. But they were no ſooner their own maſters, firſt by the death of Hieronymus, and afterwards by the flight of Epicydes, than they declared for the Romans, and put to death ſuch as favoured the Carthaginian party; ſo that they were never willingly unfaithful to Rome. Marcellus nevertheleſs plundered the city, and ſtripped it of all its valuable monuments, as if the citizens had been enemies to Rome, not by force, to uſe Livy's expreſſion, but by inclination. The ſame writer imputes to Marcellus the cuſtom, which prevailed among the Romans, of ſtripping the conquered cities of their richeſt ornaments, and eſtabliſhing their capital with them. It is true, ſays he, theſe ſpoils belonged by right of war to the conqueror; but it muſt be owned, that this cuſtom gave riſe to many evils. From that time the people began to be very inquiſitive after theſe maſter-pices of art, which have been the admiration of all ages. And, hence came that unbounded licentiouſneſs, which prevails among us to this day, of ſparing nothing, either ſacred or profane, to gratify our oſtentation and curioſity. Religion itſelf could no longer ſet bounds to the avarice of a greedy conqueror. He laid his ſacrilegious hands on ſacred things. The moſt venerable deities were tore from the places where they had fixed their abode; and the temple, which was built by Marcellus himſelf, has met with the ſame fate. The ſtately monuments, with which he enriched it, are now become the prey of an unjuſt uſurper; and there are now but few remains

THE cauſe of the Sicilians being thus determined, Lævinus ſet out for his province, and on his arrival found the whole iſland reduced by the prætor Cornelius, except Agrigentum and its territory. Having therefore ſettled the government of Syracuſe and its dependencies, to the advantage of the Romans and the ſatisfaction of the inhabitants, he turned his arms againſt the only place that was left of the fine ſtatues and valuable paintings, which the conqueror of Syracuſe reſerved for embelliſhing it. Thus far Livy (50). Till the age, in which this general lived, Rome had entertained her citizens with no ſights, but what ſuited her martial genius, viz. triumphs, trophies, and the military enſigns and arms of conquered nations. This was very ſuitable to the taſte of men, who were enemies to luxury, and had been brought up in the noiſe and hurry of war. The old Romans therefore, who were fond of the antient cuſtoms, thought the conduct of Fabius at the taking of Tarentum preferable to that of Marcellus at the taking of Syracuſe. The former was content with the gold and other ſpoils that might fill Rome with plenty, and did not touch the famous ſtatues and pictures which adorned the temples and public places, ſaying, Let us leave the Tarentines their angry gods. Marcellus, on the contrary, emboldened by his example the triumphant victors to lead both men and gods in chains after their chariots. From his time, ſays Plutarch (51), the citizens were no longer employed, as in earlier ages, in forming great deſigns, and conſpiring to promote the glory of their country. The public places were filled only with idle people, who ſpent great part of the day in diſcourſing on ſtatues of exquiſite workmanſhip, valuable pictures, and thoſe who had excelled in painting and ſculpture. Polybius is no leſs ſevere on the Romans on this account, than Livy or Plutarch. Theſe ſtatues, ſays he (52), pictures, baſs-reliefs, and other rich ſpoils of the conquered nations, were, indeed, a proof of the conqueſts of Rome, and at the ſame time of the injuſtice of thoſe who ſeized them. When theſe monuments were ſhewn to ſtrangers, they perpetuated their hatred to the Roman name, and put the conquered people in mind of their misfortunes. This inſpired the ſpectators with indignation againſt the conquerors, and with compaſſion for the oppreſſed nations. The rich ſpoils, which Marcellus brought out of Sicily, were placed by him in the temples of Virtue and Honour, which he had built in diſcharge of a vow made in the war with the Gauls (53).

left to Carthage in the whole iſland. The city of Agrigentum was defended by a numerous gariſon under the command of Hanno; but the conſul with little trouble made himſelf maſter of it, more by the good fortune of Rome than his valour. Hanno, growing daily more jealous of the great reputation which Mutines acquired, at length deprived that brave ſubaltern of his commiſſion, and put his ſon in his room. But his having no command did not at all leſſen his credit among the ſoldiers, eſpecially the Numidians, who were more attached to him than ever; ſo that all the odium of this removal fell on the general. On the other hand, Mutines, not being able to brook the affront put upon him, reſolved, at all events, to be revenged on Hanno; and accordingly began to maintain a private correſpondence with the conſul, adviſing him to bring his army before Agrigentum. Upon the firſt news of the march of the Romans, Mutines conſpired with the Numidians againſt Hanno, put himſelf at their head, and having ſeized one of the gates, put the Romans in poſſeſſion of it. The Carthaginian guard was then cut in pieces, and the legionaries, mixed with the Numidians, advanced in order of battle into the center of the city. So that the place was taken before Hanno knew that the Romans were before it. He haſtened to the market-place, imagining, that the Numidians, who often oppoſed the orders of their generals, had raiſed ſome new commotion. But perceiving, while he was yet at ſome diſtance, that the Romans were mixed with the Numidians, and not doubting but he was betrayed, he turned ſhort, and made the beſt of his way out of the city, and arriving at the port, he imbarqued with Epicydes and a ſmall number of officers on a veſſel which was ready to ſet ſail. The reſt of his army betook themſelves to flight, but, Lævinus haveing poſted guards in all the avenues and paſſages, they were all killed to a man. All the chiefs of the Agrigentini were, by Lævinus's order, firſt beaten with the rods, and then beheaded. The common people were reduced to ſlavery, and ſold to the beſt bidder. The ſpoils of the pillaged city were publicly put up to ſale, and the money returned to the public treaſury. After the reduction of Agrigentum and flight of Hanno and Epicydes, moſt of the Sicilian cities ſubmitted to the Romans of their own accord, and others were either betrayed or taken by force. Thus the Romans became maſters of the whole iſland, the conqueſt queſt of which paved then a way to the more diſtant nations in Africa and Aſia. Lævinus, having now no enemies to contend with, ſettled peace throughout the whole iſland, and took upon himſelf the government of it in the name of his republic, making it all but one province. This fruitful country, the cultivating of which had been long interrupted by wars, produced corn an hundred fold; hence from this time it became the granary of Rome, and her conſtant refuge in diſtreſs [p].

And all Sicily reduced to a Roman province

Lævinus, having ſettled Sicily in peace, was recalled to Rome to preſide in the comitia, which were to be held for the electing of new magiſtrates. Upon his departure, as he was to return ſoon, he left the command of his army and the government of Sicily to the prætor Cincius during his abſence. When he came to Rome he gave the ſenate an account of his expedition and of the preſent ſtate of the iſland. After which he introduced to the conſcript fathers Mutines, and all thoſe who deſerted Hannibal to adhere to the republic. They had many honours conferred upon them; and all the advantageous terms, which the conſul had promiſed them, were granted by a decree of the ſenate. Mutines himſelf was admitted to enjoy the rights of a Roman citizen, at the motion of one of the tribunes of the people and by the authority of the ſenate. He ever afterwards ſerved the Romans with great fidelity, and accompanied the two Scipios into Aſia againſt Antiochus, on which occaſion he is ſaid to have diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very particular manner.

All Sicily being now become a province of the Roman republic, it was not treated as the other countries, which Rome ſubdued afterwards, upon which a certain tribute was impoſed; but ſuffered to enjoy its antient privileges, and retain all its former rights. This diſtinction, as Tully obſerves, Sicily well deſerved, ſince that iſland was the firſt of all foreign nations that had entered into alliance and amity with Rome, and the firſt conqueſt the republic made out of Italy. This iſland was afterwards a kind of paſs for their troops into Africa; and Rome would not have ſo eaſily reduced the formidable power of Carthage, had not Sicily ſerved her as a magazine to ſupply her armies with proviſions, and been a ſecure retrea to her fleets. Hence Scipio Africanus, after having taken and deſtroyed Carthage, thought himſelf obliged to adorn the cities of Sicily with ſome of the richeſt ſpoils he had brought from Africa, to the end that the Sicilians might have ſome monuments among them of thoſe victories, to which they had greatly contributed [q].

BESIDES Syracuſe, there were ſeveral other free cities in Sicily, namely, Leontini, Agrigentum, Gela, Meſſana, Himera, Catana, Ætna, Apollonia, Selinus, Taurominium, Agyris, and Centuripe. Theſe underwent the ſame viciſſitudes as Syracuſe, being at ſome times governed by their own laws, and at others enſlaved by their domeſtic tyrants, till they were at laſt all brought under ſubjection by the Romans. Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, is one of the moſt famous on account of his cruelty among the Sicilian tyrants. He uſurped the ſovereignty of that city in the ſecond year of the fifty-ſecond olympiad, and maintained it for ſixteen years. We have ſtill remaining ſome letters of Abaris to his tyrant, and his anſwers; though ſome aſcribe them to Lucian. Perillus the Athenian, to flatter the cruelty of Phalaris, made the famous brazen bull for tormenting of criminals, and was the firſt that ſuffered in it, having demanded too great a reward for his contrivance. The people of Agrigentum, unable to bear any longer with his unheard-of cruelties, made a general inſurrection, ſeized on the tyrant, and put him to death, ſome ſay, by ſhutting him up in his beloved bull [r]. The moſt material tranſactions relating to the other cities of Sicily we have delivered in the hiſtory of Syracuſe, with which their reſpective hiſtories are inſeparably interwoven, and therefore ſhall now proceed to the hiſtory of the other iſlands, beginning with that of Rhodes, which, though ſmall in extent, yet makes a very conſiderable figure in hiſtory, perhaps the firſt after Sicily.

The History of Rhodes.

Its names. THE island before us was formerly known by the names of Ophiusa, Asteria, Æthræ, Trinacria, Corymbia, Poessa, Atabyria, Macria, Oloessa, Stadia, Telchinis, Pelagia, and Rhodus. In latter ages the name of Rhodus or Rhodes prevailed, which authors commonly derive from the Greek word Rhodon, signifying a rose, that island abounding, as they say, above any other with this sort of flowers. And indeed several Rhodian coins are still to be seen representing the sun, and on the reverse a rose. But Diodorus Siculus [s] will have it so called from one Rhoda, the daughter of Apollo by Venus (Z). It lies in the Mediterranean over-against the coast of Lycia and Caria, from which it is distant above twenty miles. This island is about an hundred and twenty miles in compass, and blessed with a most fruitful soil, which gave occasion to the fable of those golden showers that were once said to have fallen upon it. It formerly produced, in great plenty, all sorts of delicious fruits, and wines of so exquisite a taste, that they were used by the Romans chiefly in their sacrifices, and thought, as Virgil informs us [t], too good for mortals. The air is here said to be so serene, that no day ever passes without sun-shine; whence the poets feigned Phœbus to be in love with this island, which, say they,

(Z) Bochart derives the name of Rhodes from the Phœnician word Rod, signifying a serpent, and adds, that as the Greeks called it Ophiusa, because it was once greatly infested by those insects, so the Phœnicians, who were once masters of it, named it Gesirath Rod, that is, the island of serpents; to the word Rod the Greeks adding the termination peculiar to their language formed the name of Rhodus (54). Others tell us, that it was called Rhodus from the Greek word Rhodon, signifying a rose, not that it abounded with roses, but because a rose-bud of brass was found in laying the foundations of the antient city of Lindus (55).

they, was a mere marſh altogether uninhabitable, till loved by Phœbus, and raiſed out of the waters by his powerful influence.

THE iſland of Rhodes had in Homer's time three cities, viz. Lindus, Camirus, Ialyſus; to which in after-ages was added a fourth bearing the name of the iſland. Lindus, now Lindo, ſtood on the eaſt coaſt of the iſland, and was famous in antient times for a temple dedicated to Minerva, whence that goddeſs had the ſurname of Linda. This temple is ſaid to have been built by Danaus king of Egypt, landing here on his flight from his own kingdom. A certain feſtival was celebrated annually in this city, not with bleſſings and prayers, as Lactantius informs us [u], but with curſes and imprecations; inſomuch, that if one good word eſcaped any of thoſe that were preſent, it was deemed a very bad omen, and the whole ceremony begun anew. Lindus gave birth to Chares, the architect of the coloſſus, and to Cleobulus one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. Camirus or Cameiros was ſituate on the weſtern coaſt of the iſland, and is barely mentioned by the antients. Ialyſus, in the north over-againſt the coaſt of Lycia, was the moſt antient city in the whole iſland, but we find nothing relating to it worth mentioning. Theſe three cities were, according to Diodorus [w], built by Tlepolemus the ſon of Hercules before the Trojan war. But Strabo [x] and Cicero [y] tell us, that they were founded by the Heliades, or grandſons of Phœbus, Ialyſus, Camirus, and Lindus, who imparted their names each to the city he built (A). But the city of Rhodes

(A) Some writers tell us, that theſe three cities were built by the Dorians not long after their migration, whence they are counted by Athenæus among the Dorian colonies (56). Herodotus ſays, they were founded by the daughters of Danaus, who landed in this iſland, after having put to death the ſons of Egyptus their huſbands (57). In the city of Lindus was a magnificent temple, ſaid by Plutarch (58) to have been built by them in honour of the Lindian Minerva. Zoſimus tells us, that in his time time were still to be seen at Constantinople two statues of exquisite workmanship, the one of Jupiter Dodonæus, the other of the Lindian Minerva, and adds, that the magnificent temple of that goddess in the city of Lindus having been by an accidental fire reduced to ashes, these two statues were found in the rubbish, no ways hurt or damaged (59). Cadmus, according to Diodorus Siculus (60), presented the Lindian Minerva with a kettle made after the antient fashion, on which was an inscription in Phœnician letters. Amasis king of Egypt consecrated, as Herodotus informs us (61), to the same goddess two statues and a linen vest of a wonderful texture. Pliny says, that each thread of this vest consisted of three hundred and fifty smaller threads, and adds, lest we should question the truth of what he says, that the consul Mutianus, having had the curiosity to untwist several threads both of the woof and warp, found that each of them contained exactly the abovementioned number of other threads, so fine that they were scarce discernible by the naked eye (62). The same author tells us, that Helena offered to the same goddess a cup of amber of exquisite workmanship, and speaks of several pictures in this temple done by Parrhasias, Zeuxis, and other great masters. The other two cities, Camiros and Ialysus, contained nothing remarkable; the latter was commanded by a citadel built on a neighbouring hill, and called by Strabo (63) Ochyroma. Lindus and Ialysus were both well fortified in the time of the Peloponnesian war, as appears from Thucydides (46); but Camiros, or as some write it Cameiros, was then without walls. Diodorus (65) speaks of another town, which he calls Achaia, and supposes to have been built by Ochimus and Cercaphus, two of the sons of Apollo, at a small distance from Ialysus; but, as no other writer makes mention of this city, we are inclined to believe, that Diodorus by Achaia meant the castle of Ochyroma, which perhaps in his time was known by that name. The cities of Lindus, Ialysus, and Camiros were, as Strabo informs us (66), three different republics, and quite independent of each other, governing themselves by their own laws till the inhabitants abandoned their antient habitations, and went to settle in the city of Rhodes, which was built in the time of the Peloponnesian war, that is, many centuries after the other three.

(B) This stately city was built by the same architect, whom the Athenians eclipſed the other three, and became the metropolis of the whole iſland. It was ſituate on the eaſt coaſt, at the foot of a hill of a gentle aſcent, and in an agreeable plain, environed at ſome diſtance with ſeveral hills full of ſprings, and covered with all kinds of fruit trees. No city, if we believe

Athenians had employed in building the Piræus or port of Athens viz: Hippodamus, a native of Miletus, and deſervedly counted among the beſt architects that Greece ever produced (67). Iſidorus was greatly miſtaken in making Cecrops king of Athens the founder of this city (68), ſince it is manifeſt from all the monuments of antiquity, that Rhodes was not built before the Peloponneſian war; no mention being made by any writer of ſuch a city till that period. It was built, according to Strabo (69) and Ariſtides (70), in the form of an amphitheatre, ſurrounded with walls like thoſe of Munychia, embelliſhed with moſt ſtately buildings, ſtrait and broad ſtreets, pleaſant avenues, fine groves, large ſquares, &c. Dio Chryſoſtomus (71) tells us, that moſt of the Pagan deities had temples in this city; among which that of the ſun, called by the Dorians Haleium, was one of the moſt noble ſtructures of antiquity. Strabo mentions the temple of Bacchus, or, as the Rhodians ſtiled him, Thyonidas, which, as he tells us, was enriched with a prodigious number of pictures done by the celebrated painter Protegenes. Heſychius, Appian, and Suetonius ſpeak of the temples of Iſis, of Ocridion, and Diana, as maſter-pieces of art. Each of theſe temples contained immenſe treaſures, votaries flocking thither with rich preſents from all parts of Greece, Aſia, and Italy. In the Dionyſium, or temple of Bacchus, was a ſtatue of Pluto of maſſy gold, and an incredible number of other ſtatues and pictures done by the greateſt maſters. Pliny tells us (72), that in his time there were in the city of Rhodes above three thouſand ſtatues, moſt of them done with great taſte; nay if Ariſtides is to be credited (73), there were more valuable ſtatues and pictures in the city of Rhodes alone, than in all the other cities of Greece. The pictures of Menander king of Caria, and of Anæus the ſon of Neptune by Apelles, and thoſe of Perſeus, Hercules, and Meleager by Zeuxis, are greatly cried up by Pliny and other antient writers. That Meleager was thrice ſinged with lightning, as the ſame Pliny informs us (74); but that accident did not in the leaſt deaden the luſtre and brightneſs of its colours.

believe Strabo [z], was in antient times preferable to it, whether we conſider the ſtatelineſs of its buildings, or the excellent laws by which it was governed. In the Roman times it was famous for the ſtudy of all ſciences, and reſorted to by ſuch of the Romans as were deſirous to improve themſelves in literature, being by ſome of the antients equalled to Athens itſelf [a]. It had a very convenient haven, at the entrance of which were two rocks, and on thoſe rocks, tho' fifty foot aſunder, the famous Coloſſus is ſuppoſed to have ſtood (C). It was a huge ſtatue of braſs erected in honour of the Sun or Apollo, the tutelary god of the iſland, and for its ſize accounted one of the ſeven wonders of the world, being ſeventy cubits, or an hundred and five foot, high; inſomuch, that ſhips in entering the harbour ſailed between its legs. Demetrius Poliorcetes having for a whole year beſieged the city of Rhodes without being able to take it, at laſt tired out with ſo long a ſiege was reconciled to the Rhodians, and on his departure preſented them with

The Coloſſus.

[z] Strabo l. xiv. [a] Suet. in Tiber.

(C) Pliny deſcribes it in the following terms: Of all things that are deſervedly admired, the Coloſſus of Rhodes, done by Chares of Lindus the diſciple of Lyſippus, is the moſt worthy of admiration. It was ſeventy cubits high, and is ſtill, though lying on the ground, a great prodigy. Its thumb is a fathom in compaſs, and its fingers larger than moſt ſtatues. It was hollow, and had in its cavities vaſt ſtones employed by the artificer to counterballance its weight, and render it ſteady, &c. (75). Sextus Empiricus tells us, that it was eighty cubits high, and that Chares the Lindian, having ſpent the whole ſum which he had demanded for the completing of the work, before he had half done it, laid violent hands on himſelf, out of ſhame for being ſo groſly miſtaken in his computation. Upon his death, one Laches, a native of the ſame city, undertook the work, ſays the ſame writer, and put the laſt hand to it. That it was done, at leaſt in part, by Laches, he proves from the inſcription which was ſtill extant in his time on the pedeſtal of the ſtatue in the following words: Laches of Lindus made the Coloſſus of Rhodes eighty cubits high. We will not call in queſtion the veracity of our author; but after all we cannot help thinking it ſomewhat ſtrange, that no writer, either before or ſince his time, ſhould mention this inſcription. He flouriſhed in the reign of Antoninus ſurnamed the philoſopher.

with all the engines of war he had employed againſt their city. Theſe the Rhodians ſold for three hundred talents, and, with that money and other additional ſums of their own, raiſed this famous coloſſus. The artificer they employed was Chares of Lindus, who was twelve years in compleating the work. After it had ſtood ſixty years, it was thrown down by an earthquake, which did great damage in the eaſt, eſpecially in Caria and Rhodes [b]. On this occaſion the Rhodians ſent embaſſadors to all the princes and ſtates of Greek origin to repreſent the loſſes they had ſuſtained, and by that means procured great ſums for the repairing of them, eſpecially from the kings of Egypt, Macedon, Syria, Pontus, and Bithynia. The money they gathered is ſaid to have exceeded five times the value of the damages. But they, inſtead of ſetting up the coloſſus again, for which end moſt of it was given, pretended an anſwer from the oracle of Delphos, forbidding it, and kept the money for themſelves [c]. Thus the coloſſus lay where it fell for the ſpace of 894 years, till at length Moawias, the ſixth caliph or emperor of the Saracens, having taken Rhodes, ſold the braſs to a Jew, who loaded with it nine hundred camels, ſo that allowing eight hundred pound weight to every camel's load, the braſs of the coloſſus, after the waſte of ſo many years, amounted to ſeven hundred and twenty thouſand pound weight [d]. From this coloſſus the iſland is by ſome authors called Coloſſa, and the inhabitants Coloſſians, whence ſome have falſely imagined, that St. Paul's epiſtle to the Coloſſians was directed to the Rhodians. But the Coloſſians, to whom the apoſtle wrote, were the inhabitants of Coloſſe, a city in Phrygia Major, of which we have ſpoke in the hiſtory of that antient kingdom.

THE city of Rhodes is ſtill a place of no ſmall note, being pleaſantly ſeated on the ſide of a hill, three miles in compaſs, and well fortified with a treble wall. The ſtreets, as our modern travellers inform us, are wide, ſtrait, and well paved, and the houſes built after the Italian taſte. The chief haven is convenient, ſafe, and well fortified. The city is well peopled, and the inhabitants as wealthy as the Turkiſh

Turkish tyranny permits any to be. It is well known, that this city and island belonged in middle ages to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who defended it with incredible bravery against the mighty fleet and numerous army of Solyman II. till the place was betrayed by a traitor in the town. After the reduction of Rhodes, the knights, who were denominated from this island, retired to that of Malta, which was granted to them by the emperor Charles V. where they continue to this day.

The inhabitants.

This island, if we believe Diodorus, was first peopled by the Telchinæ, who were originally from the island of Crete. The Telchinæ, who, according to that writer, were well skilled in astrology, foreseeing, that the island would be soon laid under water and the inhabitants drowned, abandoned their habitations, and made room for the Heliades or grandsons of Phœbus, who took possession of it after that god had cleared it of the mud, with which it had been covered by the deluge. The Heliades, as the same author informs us, excelled all other men in learning, especially in astrology; and were the first who found out the art of navigation, and the dividing of the day into hours. One of them by name Tanges, continues our author, being through envy killed by his brothers, they were forced to abandon Rhodes, and take sanctuary in other countries. Macer fled to Lesbos, Candalus to Coos, Triopas, to Caria, and Actis to Egypt. Triopas possessed himself of the promontory in Caria, from him called Triopium; Actis built in Egypt a city, which from the name of the sun he called Heliopolis, and taught the Egyptians the science of astrology. But most of the inhabitants of Greece being afterwards destroyed by the flood, and the antient monuments lost, the Egyptians took this opportunity of appropriating the study of astrology solely to themselves; and it was generally believed, even by the Greeks, that the Egyptians were the first who found out the knowledge of the stars [e]. Thus Diodorus derives the study of astrology from the inhabitant of Rhodes. But we should be glad to know how he came to make this discovery, after all the antient monuments, relating thereunto, were lost. All authors agree, that the Egyptians were the first who applied themselves to the study of astrology, and the opinion of Diodorus, supported by no authentic monuments, is not of weight enough with us to counter-ballance their authority.

In

In after-ages the deſcendents of the Heliades, who had remained in Rhodes, (four of them only being concerned in the death of their brother Tanges) being infeſted by great ſerpents, which bred in the iſland, had recourſe to an oracle in Delos, which adviſed them to admit Phorbas and his followers to ſhare with them the lands in the iſland, if they deſired to be delivered from their preſent calamity. Phorbas was the ſon of Lapithas, and was at that time, with many of his friends, in Theſſaly ſeeking for a convenient place to ſettle in. The Rhodians, according to the direction of the oracle, ſent for Phorbas, who, being admitted as a proprietor with them in the iſland, deſtroyed the ſerpents, and freed the inhabitants from their former fears. He continued with his followers, who were all Theſſalians, in Rhodes, where after his death he was honoured as a demi-god [f].

Afterwards Althæmenes, the ſon of Catreus king of Crete, conſulting the oracle concerning ſome affairs, was anſwered, that it would be his fate to kill his own father. To avoid this misfortune he of his own accord abandoned Crete, and with many Cretans, who attended him, paſſed over into Rhodes, and ſettled at Camirus. There he built a temple on the top of mount Atamirus in honour of Jupiter, called from thence Jupiter Atamirus. He choſe that place becauſe he had from thence a clear proſpect of Crete his native iſland. He was greatly honoured by the inhabitants of Camirus, and admitted with his followers to enjoy all the rights and privileges of the antient proprietors. But his father Catreus having no other ſon, and being exceeding fond of Althæmenes, undertook a voyage to Rhodes in order to bring him back to Crete. He landed at Rhodes in the night with a numerous attendance, which giving jealouſy to the Rhodians, they fell upon him, and in this conflict he was killed by his own ſon. Althæmenes was ſo concerned for his death, that he ever afterwards avoided all manner of company, wandering in the deſarts till he died of grief; but by the direction of the oracle he was afterwards honoured as an hero or demi-god [g].

Not long before the Trojan war Tlepolemus the ſon of Hercules, having killed unawares one Licymnius, fled from Argos, and, having conſulted an oracle about planting a colony, was adviſed to paſs over into Rhodes, which he did accordingly and ſettled there. He was afterwards created king king of the whole island, which he governed with great justice and equity. These were, according to Diodorus, the first inhabitants of the island of Rhodes [h].

AFTER the Trojan war, the Dorians possessed themselves of the best part of this island, after having driven out the antient proprietors; and hence it is, that both Strabo [i] and Pausanias [k] called the Rhodians Dorians and also Peloponnesians, the Dorians being properly the inhabitants of Peloponnesus. As the Dorians were, according to Eusebius [l], descended from Tharsis, the son of Javan and grandson of Japhet, that writer by Tharsis understands the Rhodians. On the other hand S. Jerom is of opinion, that the island of Rhodes was first peopled by the descendants of Dodanim the brother of Tharsis, whom the Greeks corruptly called Rhodanim; and hence came the name of Rhodes and Rhodians [m]. Be that as it will, all the antients agree, that the Rhodians after the Trojan war consisted chiefly of Dorians, and that the Doric dialect was commonly used throughout the whole island.

Their trade and navigation.

THE Rhodians applied themselves very early to trade and navigation, and soon became so skilled in maritime affairs and expert in navigation, that for many ages they were sovereigns of the sea, their laws, called the Rhodian laws, being the standard whereby to decide all controversies relating to maritime affairs. These laws and constitutions were so just, that they were afterwards incorporated into the Roman pandects, and followed in all the provinces of the Roman empire.

THE government of Rhodes was originally monarchical, and several kings are said to have reigned there long before the Trojan war [n]; but as the authors (D), who have wrote of Rhodes, have not reached our times, we can give no account of those antient kings. TLEPOLEMUS, Clitophon, who, according to Hieroclides, wrote a treatiſe on the government of Rhodes. Ergeas is quoted by Athenæus as the author of a hiſtory containing the exploits of the Phœnicians, who in ancient times inhabited the iſland of Rhodes. Jaſon deſcribed in three books the ſtate of Greece and Rhodes. Polyzelus is ſaid by Strabo and Athenœus to have wrote ſeveral hiſtorical tracts, among others one on the warlike actions of the Rhodians. Zenon wrote a geographical account of Rhodes. Eudoxus is mentioned by Laertius, who tells us, that he wrote an hiſtory, and by Suidas, Apollonius, and the etymologiſt, who quotes the tenth book of this author's hiſtory. Some writers confound Eudoxius the Rhodian hiſtorian with another Eudoxius of Cyzicum, who, following Ptolemy Lathurus, ſailed from the Perſian gulf to Cadiz, as Strabo relates on the credit of Poſſidonius (78), and Pliny on that of Cornelius Nepos. Simmias flouriſhed about the beginning of the olympiads, and wrote ſeveral poems on the antiquities of Samos, where he was born of Rhodian parents. Tzetzes cites thirteen verſes from his poem, entitled Apollo, on men who had dogs heads. Theſe have all wrote the hiſtory, or part of the hiſtory, of Rhodes, and are frequently quoted by the antients, eſpecially by Diodorus Siculus. It would be too tedious to inſert here a catalogue of the many eminent writers, whom this iſland has produced. However, we ſhall give a ſuccinct account of thoſe, whom we find to have been moſt admired by the beſt judges of antiquity. Theſe are, Ariſtophanes, a native of Lindos, whoſe comedies met with ſuch applauſe at Athens, that he was declared free of that city, and honoured with a crown made of the branches of an olive tree, which grew in the citadel and was ſacred to Minerva. Eudemus, counted by Strabo among the moſt illuſtrious philoſophers of antiquity (79); he is ſaid to have wrote a learned treatiſe of geometry, aſtronomy, and the power and influence of the ſtars: Hieronymus, commended by Strabo, Athenœus, and Tully, as the chief Peripatetic philoſopher of his time. Leonidas, ranked by Strabo, Heſychius, and Vitruvius among the men, who gained more reputation to their country by the arts of peace, than the greateſt captains by thoſe of war: Piſander, a native of Camiros, mentioned by Strabo and Macrobius as the author of a poem ſtiled Heraclea, which comprehended in two books all the exploits of Hercules: he is ſaid by Suidas to have been the firſt that repreſented Hercules with a club: Panœtius, who was precepter to Scipio Africanus the younger, and attended him together with Polybius in all his expeditions. Upon Scipio's death he retired to Athens, where he was highly eſteemed and admitted into the number of Athenian citizens.

(78) Strabo. l. vi. (79) Idem, l. xiv.

Tlepolemus, the son of Hercules, accompanied Agamemnon to the Trojan war, leaving the government of his kingdom to Butas, who had attended him in his flight from Argos. Some say, that he was killed before Troy by Sarpedon, others that he returned home loaded with the spoils of the plundered city [o]. Dorieus is only mentioned by Pausanias, and supposed to have reigned, since his son Damagetus enjoyed the royal dignity. All we know of Damagetus is, that he was commanded by an oracle to marry the daughter of the best man among the Greeks, and that in compliance with the injunction of the god he took to wife the third daughter of Aristomenes the Messenian [p], by whom he had Diagoras, who succeeded him in the kingdom, citizens. Cicero acknowledges that he followed him in his book of offices: Molon, or Apollonius Molon, who taught rhetoric first at Rome afterwards at Rhodes, and had in both places a great many disciples of distinction, amongst others Cicero, who followed him from Rome to Rhodes. Molon wrote some historical works; for Josephus (80) complains of him as undeservedly traducing the Jews, and disparaging some of the most glorious actions of their princes: Ideus, who took upon him to correct the Iliad, but did not succeed so well in that undertaking, as he did in an epic poem of his own, wherein he set forth the memorable actions of the Rhodians: Timocreon, a famous poet and wrestler, who in the olympic games was victor in five different sorts of combats. Athenœus tells us, that his epitaph was wrote by Simonides, and conceived in the following terms: Here lies Timocreon the Rhodian, who of all things liked good eating and drinking, and never spoke well of any body. Praxiphanes, a native of Lindus, wrote a most learned comment on the obscure passages of Sophocles, and is often mentioned by Strabo, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Hesychius: Antheas, born likewise in Lindus, was the first inventor, as Suidas informs us, of the Adonic verse, so called from Adonis, that poet having first made them to bewail his death. Many other writers of great note have formerly flourished in this island; but, as we cannot pretend to give an account of them all in this place, we must refer our readers to Meursius, in his learned treatise on the island of Rhodes, printed at Amsterdam in 1675, and published with those on Crete and Cyprus by the same author.

dom, and became ſo famous on account of his equity and juſtice, that the princes who ſucceeded him were called Diagoridæ, as if he had been the head and firſt of the family [q]. Evagoras is mentioned only by Laertius, who gives us no account of his reign [r]. Cleobulus travelled into Egypt, where he ſtudied philoſophy, and on his return to Rhodes was highly eſteemed, not only by his country-men, but by all the Greeks, and counted among the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. His daughter Cleobulina is ſaid to have been a woman of great learning, well verſed in philoſophy, aſtrology, poetry, &c. and to have had an admirable talent in making ænigmas [s]. Cleobulus died in the 70th year of his age, leaving the kingdom, as he had no male iſſue, to his daughter, who reſigned it to Eraſtides, one of the deſcendants of Diagoras, and conſequently of the ſame family. Eraſtides, it ſeems, performed nothing worth mentioning; he is called by Pindar a pacific prince, and ſaid to have reigned without giving trouble to his neighbours, or being troubled by them. After him reigned ſeveral other princes of the ſame family, as we gather from the ſcholiaſt of Pindar [t]; but the only one we find mentioned by the antients is Diagoras II. who was cotemporary with Pindar. He proved conqueror in the Olympiac, Iſthmian, Nemæan, and Argian games, and is on that account highly commended by Pindar. He had two daughters Calipateras and Pherenice, and three ſons, Acuſilaus, Damagetus, and Dorieus. Theſe ſons were all three victors at the ſame time in the olympic ſports, Acuſilaus in boxing, Dorieus in wreſtling, and Damagetus in the exerciſe called Pancration, which conſiſted of the two former. After the judges had paſſed ſentence, and the public herald proclaimed their names, they flew to embrace their father, who was preſent, and, placing their crowns on his head, carried him in triumph through the crowd, all Greece extolling with loud acclamations their piety, which made that numerous aſſembly in a manner forget their victory. The father, not able to bear ſuch an exceſs of joy, died in their arms, envied more for his death, as our author expreſſes it, than for the many victories, which during his life had equalled him to the gods [u]. Dorieus was three times ſucceſſively victor in the olympic games, eight times in the Iſthmian, ſeven times in the

Nemæan, and once in the Pythic, no one daring to contend with him. Being driven from Rhodes, he retired with his nephew Pisidorus to Thurium in Italy. What was laid to his charge, we know not; but Thucydides informs us, that he was soon recalled, and that on his return he not only openly declared for the Lacedæmonians, but served in their fleet with gallies equipped at his own expence, till he was in an engagement taken prisoner by the Athenians, who at first designed to put him to death, but afterwards sent him home untouched and without ransom, in consideration of the many victories he had gained in the public sports [w]. His sister Pherenice, after the death of her husband, privately instructed her son Pisidorus in the exercises used at Olympia, and attended him herself in disguise to the sports; for women were not allowed to be present at those games; nay, so severe were the laws in this particular, that if any woman was found so much as to have passed the river Alpheus, during the time of the solemnity, she was to be thrown headlong from a rock on the top of mount Timœus. Pherenice, after her son had won the Prize, discovered herself, and being apprehended was brought before the judges, who acquitted her, out of respect to her father, brothers, and son [x]. From Diagoras I. to Diagoras II. chronologers count two hundred and fifty years; whence it is manifest, that neither the actions, nor even the names, of several intermediate kings have reached us. Upon the death of Diagoras II. some great revolution must have happened; for we find another family on the throne, viz. that of the Asclepiadæ, while his children were still alive [y]. But are quite in the dark both as to their names and actions. All we know is, that they did not long enjoy the sovereignty, the Rhodians having no king at the time of Xerxes's expedition into Greece, which, according to Diodorus [z], happened a few years after the death of Diagoras. After the death or expulsion of the last king, the republican government prevailed all over the island, during which the Rhodians applied themselves to trade and navigation, and, as Strabo informs us [a], became very powerful by sea, and planted planted ſeveral colonies in diſtant countries, namely Rhodes in Spain, and Parthenope in the country of the Opici. The ſame author adds, that the Rhodians at this time were maſters of the Balearic iſlands, called then the Gymneſian iſlands. During the Peloponneſian war, the Rhodians firſt ſided with the Athenians, but, after their great overthrow in Sicily, revolted from them and joined the Lacedæmonians, whom they likewiſe abandoned, and renewed their ancient alliance with the Athenians, after the former had been defeated by Conon admiral of the Perſian fleet. In the time of the Peloponneſian war, and for ſeveral years after, the republic of Rhodes was rent into two factions, the people favouring the Athenians, and the nobles the Lacedæmonians; but the latter at laſt prevailed, the democracy was aboliſhed, and an ariſtocracy introduced in its room. Under this form of government the ſtate enjoyed a profound tranquillity, till the third year of the hundred and fifth olympiad, which was the third year of the reign of Philip the ſon of Amyntas, when that war broke out, which was called the Social War, and laſted four years. The Rhodians, Chians, Coans, and Byzantines, being weary of their alliance with the Athenians, by whom they were treated rather like ſubjects than allies, reſolved to take up arms againſt Athens, and reinſtate themſelves in their antient independency. To reduce them the Athenians employed great forces and the moſt experienced officers of their republic, viz. Chabrias, Iphicrates, and Timotheus. Theſe were the laſt of the Athenian generals, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves either at home or abroad [b]. The war was begun by the ſiege of Chius, where Chares commanded the land-forces, and Chabrias the fleet. All the allies, eſpecially the Rhodians, exerted themſelves in ſending aid to the Chians. But in ſpite of their utmoſt efforts Chabrias, having forced the paſſage, entered the port, and fell upon the enemy's fleet. The other gallies under his command, ſeeing him in great diſtreſs and ſurrounded by the enemy, betook themſelves to flight, leaving Chabrias to the mercy of the allies. But he, chuſing rather to die, than to retire or ſurrender, fought with incredible bravery till he received a wound, which ſoon put an end to his life [c].

Thus the first attempt of the Athenians having miscarried, both sides made vast preparations for renewing the war. The Athenians fitted out a fleet of sixty gallies, giving the command of it to Chares, and appointed Iphicrates and Timotheus to command another fleet, consisting of the same number of gallies, which was to be employed against the Rhodians, and to prevent their joining the other allies. But the Rhodians were before-hand with them, and the confederate fleet to the number of an hundred sail being united early in the spring, they ravaged the islands of Imbros and Lesbos, took all the ships they met, and, raising contributions among the allies of Athens, got together such sums of money, as were sufficient to defray all the expences of that campaign. Being encouraged with this success they sailed to Samos, which adhered to the Athenians, and besieged the place both by sea and land. On the other hand, the Athenians, to oblige the allies to raise the siege, invested Byzantium, which had the desired effect, the allies making all possible haste to its relief. When the two fleets were in sight of each other, the allies began to prepare for an engagement, but, a violent storm arising, Timotheus and Iphicrates thought it not adviseable to hazard a battle in such a conjuncture. Chares, who was for engaging, after having earnestly pressed, but in vain, his collegues to follow his advice, wrote to Athens accusing them of cowardice and treason. Upon his accusation, the people, who were naturally jealous of such as were distinguished by their extraordinary merit, recalled the two generals, and laid a heavy fine upon them, which Timotheus being unable to pay, retired to Chelos, where he died of grief [d].

Chares, by the recal of his two collegues, having the sole command of the fleet, engaged in a very rash enterprize, whereby he hoped to do his country great service. Pharnabazus, having revolted from the king of Persia, was upon the point of being attacked by the governors of the neighbouring provinces at the head of seventy thousand men, he himself having but a very small army. In this critical conjuncture he prevailed upon Chares to join him with his forces, and by his assistance totally routed the king's generals; for which signal piece of service Pharnabazus rewarded him with such sums of money, as were sufficient sufficient to pay his fleet and army. When the news of this victory first reached Athens, Chares's conduct was highly applauded; but after the king had complained by his embassadors of the injury done him by Chares, and it was spread abroad, that the Persians designed to join the confederates with a fleet of three hundred sail, the Athenians changed their notes, and treated Chares as a traitor, who had not only abandoned the service of his country for a foreign war, but infringed the articles of peace with the Persians, and thereby provoked that mighty monarch against the Athenian republic. However, the credit of Chares saved him upon this, as it had done upon several other occasions. But the people were so terrified with the threatnings of the king of Persia, that they resolved to conclude a peace with the states which had revolted, almost upon their own terms: accordingly a treaty was agreed on very little to the honour of Athens, and an end put to the Social War, after it had continued for the space of four years [e]. By this treaty Rhodes, Chios, Cos, and Byzantium, were to enjoy full liberty, and be quite independent of Athens. It was on this occasion that Isocrates wrote that famous oration which is entitled, of peace or social, wherein he represents to the Athenians, that real and lasting greatness does not consist in making conquests, which cannot be effected without violence and injustice, but in governing the people with wisdom, and rendering them happy, in protecting their allies, and by good offices obliging and gaining over their neighbours, without having recourse to arms, except when all other means prove ineffectual. This oration is still extant and well worth the reader's perusal.

THE peace, which put an end to the war of the allies, did not procure for all of them the tranquillity they had reason to expect. The people of Cos and Rhodes, who had been declared free by the treaty, seemed only to have changed their master. Mausolus, king of Caria, who had assisted them in throwing off the Athenian yoke, declared for an aristocracy, and by that means having oppressed the people, came by degrees to be absolute master of both islands, the nobility not daring, as they were hated by the people, to oppose him. But Mausolus dying two years after the treaty of peace with Athens, the people and nobility,

bility, uniting together, drove out the gariſons of Mauſolus, and recovered their antient liberties. Having thus cleared their reſpective iſlands of foreign forces, the Rhodians, to revenge the injuries they had ſuffered from Mauſolus, haveing equipped a fleet, invaded Caria, with a deſign to poſſeſs themſelves of that country, which lay very convenient for them. The famous queen Artemiſia, who had ſucceeded her huſband in the kingdom of Caria, being acquainted with their deſign, ordered the inhabitants of Halicarnaſſus, where it was moſt likely they would land, to keep within the walls, and when the enemy arrived, to expreſs by ſhouts and clapping of hands, a readineſs to ſurrender. The inhabitants followed her directions; whereupon the Rhodians, not ſuſpecting any treachery, left their fleet without any to guard it, and entered the city. In the mean-time Artemiſia came with her gallies out of the little port through a ſmall canal, which ſhe had cauſed to be cut on purpoſe, entered the great port, and ſeizing the enemy's fleet without reſiſtance, ſet ſail for Rhodes. The Rhodians, who had entered the city, having no means to make their eſcape, were all cut in pieces. But before this melancholy news reached Rhodes, Artemiſia had got poſſeſſion of that city. When the inhabitants ſaw their veſſels approach adorned with wreaths of laurel, they admitted them into the port with extraordinary marks of joy, not doubting but they had taken Halicarnaſſus. Then Artemiſia, landing her troops, fell upon the unarmed multitude, diſperſed them, and having poſſeſſed herſelf of the city, put the chief citizens, who had promoted the Carian expedition, to death. Being now miſtreſs of the metropolis, ſhe cauſed a noble trophy to be erected in the market-place, and two ſtatues of braſs; one of which repreſented the city of Rhodes, and the other Artemiſia branding it with an hot iron. The Rhodians afterwards ſurrounded that trophy with a building, which prevented it entirely from being ſeen, religion forbiding them to demoliſh any monuments which had been once conſecrated [f]. From this, and from what we read in one of Demoſthenes's orations [g], it appeares, that Artemiſia did not, like a forlorn and inconſolable widow, paſs her whole time in grief and lamentation, as ſome writers would make us believe. A modern author author of no mean character [h] ſuſpects, that whatever has been reported of her exceſſive grief is without any foundation, being advanced by ſome, and perhaps believed, on account of the magnificent monument ſhe erected to the memory of her deceaſed huſband, and afterwards copied by others. And truly her whole conduct diſcovers rather the active courage of a queen, than the ſevere affliction and retirement of a widow. The Rhodians, being thus reduced by a woman, and unable to bear any longer ſo ſhameful a ſervitude had recourſe to the Athenians, and privately ſent embaſſadors to implore their protection. They had but lately provoked the Athenians by their revolt, and the many miſchiefs which they had brought upon their republic, dureing the ſocial war. However, Demoſthenes took upon him to back their embaſſadors, and ſpeak to the people in their favour. He began by ſetting their revolt in its full light, and enlarging on their injuſtice and perfidy; inſomuch, that ſome imagined the orator was going to declare againſt them in the ſtrongeſt terms. But all this was only to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of his auditors, and afterwards ſtir them up to compaſſion for a people, who acknowledged their fault, and owned themſelves unworthy of that protection, which they were come to implore. He ſet before them the great maxims, which in all ages had gained ſo much glory to Athens, the forgiving of injuries, the pardoning of their enemies, and the taking upon them the defence of the unfortunate. To the motives of glory he added thoſe of intereſt, ſhewing how neceſſary it was, that they ſhould declare for a city, that favoured the democratic government, and not abandon, to a foreign power, ſo wealthy an iſland as that of Rhodes. This is the ſubſtance of that famous diſcourſe, entitled, For the liberty of the Rhodians. What impreſſion this ſpeech made on the minds of the Athenians we know not. All we can advance with certainty is, that the Rhodians were ſoon after delivered from the yoke they groaned under. Some writers, tell us, that they were indebted to the Athenians for their liberty, while others affirm, that, Artemiſia dying the ſame year ſhe poſſeſſed herſelf of the iſland, the Rhodians re-inſtated themſelves in their former condition with their own forces [i].

FROM

They ſurrender to Alexander.

From this time, the Rhodians enjoyed a profound tranquillity till the reign of Alexander the Great, to whom they delivered up of their own accord their cities and harbours, and were on that account highly favoured by that prince [k]. Diodorus tells us, that Alexander lodged his laſt will in the archives of the city of Rhodes, and ſhewed on all occaſions a greater value for the Rhodians, than for any other of the Greek nations. However, they no ſooner heard the news of his death, but taking up arms they drove out the Macedonian gariſon, and once more became a free people [l]. About this time happened a dreadful inundation at Rhodes, which being accompanied with violent ſtorms of rain, and hail-ſtones of an extraordinary bigneſs, beat down many houſes, and killed great numbers of the inhabitants. As the city of Rhodes was built in the form of an amphitheatre, and no care had been taken to clear the pipes and conduits which conveyed the water into the ſea, the lower parts of the city were in an inſtant laid under water, ſeveral houſes quite covered, and the inhabitants drowned before they got to the higher places. As the deluge encreaſed, and the violent ſhowers continued, ſome of the inhabitants made to their ſhips, and abandoned the place, while others, attempting to remedy the evil, miſerably periſhed in the waters. The city being thus threatened with utter deſtruction, the wall on a ſudden burſt aſunder, and the water diſcharging itſelf with a violent current into the ſea, unexpectedly delivered the inhabitants from all danger [m].

An inundation at Rhodes.

Antigonus makes war upon the Rhodians. Year of the flood 2695. before Chriſt 304.

The Rhodians ſuffered greatly by this unexpected misfortune, but ſoon repaired their loſſes by applying themſelves more cloſely than ever to trade and navigation, the only ſource of their wealth and power. As the city of Rhodes was at this time very powerful at ſea, and, according to Diodorus [n], the beſt governed of any city among the Greeks, all the princes, who were then at variance with each other, courted their friendſhip. But, the Rhodians carefully declined favouring one againſt another, and, by thus obſerving a ſtrict neutrality in the wars that were kindled in thoſe times, became one of the moſt opulent ſtates of all Aſia; inſomuch, that, for the common good of all Greece, they undertook the Piratic war, and at their own own charges cleared the ſeas of the pirates, who had for many years infeſted the coaſts both of Europe and Aſia. Though they were thus in amity with all the neighbouring princes, yet their inclinations as well as intereſt ſecretly attached them to Ptolemy; for the moſt advantageous branches of their commerce ſprung from Egypt. Wherefore, when Antigonus, engaged in a war againſt Ptolemy for the iſland of Cyprus, demanded ſuccours of them, they earneſtly entreated him not to compel them to declare againſt their antient friend and ally. But this anſwer, as prudent as it was, drew upon them the diſpleaſure of Antigonus, who immediately ordered one of his admirals to ſail with his fleet to Rhodes, and ſeize all the ſhips that made out of the harbour for Egypt. The Rhodians, finding their harbour blocked up by the fleet of Antigonus, equiped a good number of gallies, fell upon the enemy, and obliged him with the loſs of many ſhips to quit his ſtation. Hereupon Antigonus, charging them as the aggreſſors and beginners of an unjuſt war, threatened to beſiege their city with the ſtrength of his whole army. The Rhodians endeavoured by frequent embaſſies to appeaſe his wrath, repreſenting to him, that not they, but his admiral had begun hoſtilities, by ſeizing their trading veſſels, and interrupting their navigation. But all their remonſtrances ſerved rather to provoke, than allay, his reſentment; and the only terms upon which he would hearken to any accommodation, were, that the Rhodians ſhould declare war againſt Ptolemy; that they ſhould admit his fleet into their harbour; and that an hundred of the chief citizens ſhould be delivered up to him as hoſtages for the performance of theſe articles. The Rhodians, foreſeeing the ſtorm which was then impending, ſent embaſſadors to all their allies, and to Ptolemy in particular, imploring their aſſiſtance, and repreſenting to the latter, that their attachment to his intereſt had drawn upon them the danger to which they were expoſed. The preparations on both ſides were immenſe. As Antigonus was near fourſcore years of age at that time, he committed the whole management of the war to his ſon Demetrius, who appeared before the city of Rhodes with two hundred ſhips of war, an hundred and ſeventy tranſports having on board forty thouſand men, and a thouſand other veſſels, loaded with proviſions and all ſorts of warlike engines. As Rhodes had enjoyed for many years a profound tranquillity, and been free from all devaſtations, the expectation of booty in the plunder of ſo wealthy a city allured multitudes of pirates and mercenaries to join Demetrius in this expedition; inſomuch, that the whole ſea between the continent and the iſland was covered with ſhips, which ſtruck the Rhodians, who had a proſpect of this mighty armada from the walls, with great terror and conſternation. Demetrius having landed his troops without the reach of the enemy's machines, detached ſeveral ſmall bodies to lay waſte the country round the city, and cut down the trees and groves, employing the timber, and materials of the houſes without the walls, to fortify his camp with ſtrong ramparts and a treble paliſade; which work, as many hands were employed, was finiſhed in a few days [o].

Demetrius arrives before the city of Rhodes with a mighty fleet.

The Rhodians on their part prepared for a vigorous defence. Many great commanders, who had ſignilized themſelves on other occaſions, threw themſelves into the city, being deſirous to try their ſkill in military affairs againſt Demetrius, who was reputed one of the moſt experienced captains, in the conduct of ſieges, that antiquity had produced. The beſieged began with diſmiſſing from the city all ſuch perſons as were uſeleſs; and then taking an account of thoſe, who were capable of bearing arms, they found that the citizens amounted to ſix thouſand, and the foreigners to a thouſand. Liberty was promiſed to all the ſlaves, who ſhould diſtinguiſh themſelves by any glorious action, and the public engaged to pay the maſters their full ranſom. A proclamation was likewiſe made, declaring, that whoever died in the defence of his country ſhould be buried, &c. out of the treaſury, that fortunes ſhould be given to his daughters, and his ſons, when they were grown up, ſhould be crowned and preſented with a complete ſuit of armour, at the great ſolemnity of Bacchus. This decree kindled an incredible ardour in all ranks of men. The rich came in crouds with money to defray the charges of the war, and the artificers applied themſelves with indefatigable induſtry to the forging of arms, making of engines, and contriving new ſorts of warlike machines, which did great execution on the enemy. In a word, every thing was in motion throughout all the quarters of the city, the workman and artificers ſtriving to out-do each other, and the rich ſupplying them with materials at their own charge.

The

THE beſieged firſt ſent three nimble veſſels againſt a ſmall fleet of merchant ſhips that ſupplied the enemy with proviſions. Theſe falling upon them ſunk ſome, took others, and burnt the greateſt part of them, carrying back with them to Rhodes a great number of priſoners. By this firſt expedition the Rhodians gained a conſiderable ſum of money; for it had been mutually agreed between them and Demetrius, that a thouſand drachms ſhould be paid for the ranſom of every freeman, and five hundred for each ſlave.

DEMETRIUS, having planted all his engines, began to batter, with incredible fury, the walls on the ſide of the harbour, but was for eight days ſucceſſively repulſed by the beſieged, who ſet fire to moſt of his warlike machines, and thereby obliged him to allow them ſome reſpite, which they made good uſe of in repairing the breaches, and building new walls, where the old ones were either weak or low. When Demetrius had repaired his engines, he ordered a general aſſault to be made, and cauſed his troops to advance with loud ſhouts, thinking by this means to ſtrike terror into the enemy and drive them from the walls. But the beſieged were ſo far from being intimidated, that they repulſed the aggreſſors with great ſlaughter, and performed the moſt aſtoniſhing feats of bravery. Demetrius returned to the aſſault the next day, but was in the ſame manner forced to retire, after having loſt a great number of men and ſome officers of diſtinction. He had ſeized at his firſt landing an eminence at a ſmall diſtance from the city, and having fortified this advantageous poſt, he cauſed ſeveral batteries to be erected there with engines, which inceſſantly diſcharged againſt the walls ſtones of an hundred and fifty pounds weight. The towers, being thus furiouſly battered night and day, began to totter, and ſeveral breaches were opened in the walls. Then the Rhodians unexpectedly ſallying out drove the enemy from their poſt, overturned their machines, and made a moſt dreadful havock; inſomuch, that ſome of them retired on board their veſſels, and were with much ado prevailed upon to come aſhore again.

THE ardor of Demetrius was not diminiſhed by this loſs, he ordered a ſcalade by the ſea and land at the ſame time, and ſo employed the beſieged, that they were at a loſs what place they ſhould chiefly defend. The attack was carried on with the utmoſt fury on all ſides, and the beſieged defended themſelves with the greateſt intrepidity. Such of the enemies as advanced firſt were thrown down from the ladders, and miſerably bruiſed. Several of the chief officers, having mounted the walls to encourage the ſoldiers by their example, were there either killed or taken priſoners. After the combat had laſted many hours, with great ſlaughter on both ſides, Demetrius, notwithſtanding all his valour, thought it neceſſary to retire in order to repair his engines, and give his men ſome days reſt [p].

Demetrius, being ſenſible that he could not reduce the city till he was maſter of the port, after having refreſhed his men, returned with new vigor againſt the fortifications, which defended the entry into the harbour. When he came within the caſt of a dart, he cauſed a vaſt quantity of burning torches and firebrands to be thrown into the Rhodian ſhips which were riding there, and at the ſame time galled, with dreadful ſhowers of darts, arrows, and ſtones, ſuch as offered to extinguiſh the flames. However, in ſpite of their utmoſt efforts the Rhodians put a ſtop to the fire, and haveing with great expedition manned three of their ſtrongeſt ſhips, drove with ſuch violence againſt the veſſels, on which the enemy's machines were planted, that they were ſhattered in pieces, and the engines diſmounted and thrown into the ſea. Exceſtus the Rhodian admiral, being encouraged with this ſucceſs, attacked the enemy's fleet with his three ſhips, and ſunk a great many veſſels, but was himſelf at laſt taken priſoner; the other two veſſels made their eſcape, and regained the port.

As unfortuuate as this laſt attack had proved to Demetrius, he determined to undertake another; and in order to ſucceed in his attempt, he ordered a machine of a new invention to be built, which was thrice the heighth and breadth of thoſe he had lately loſt. When the work was finiſhed, he cauſed the engine to be placed near the port, which he was reſolved at all adventures to force. But, as it was upon the point of entering the harbour, a dreadful ſtorm ariſing, drove it againſt the ſhore with the veſſels on which it had been reared. The beſieged, who were attentive to improve all favourable conjunctures, while the tempeſt was ſtill raging, made a ſally againſt thoſe who defended the eminence mentioned above, and, tho' repulſed ſeveral times, carried it at laſt, obliging the Demetrians, to the number of four hundred, to throw down their arms and and ſubmit. After this victory gained by the Rhodians, there arrived to their aid an hundred and fifty Gnoſſians, and five hundred men ſent by Ptolemy from Egypt, moſt of them being natives of Rhodes, who had ſerved among the king's troops [q].

DEMETRIUS, being extremely mortified to ſee all his batteries againſt the harbour rendered ineffectual, reſolved to employ them by land, in hopes of carrying the city by aſſault, or at leaſt reduce it to the neceſſity of capitulating. With this view, having got together a vaſt quantity of timber and other materials, he framed the famous engine called Helepolis, which was by many degrees larger than any that had ever been invented before. Its baſis was ſquare, each ſide being in length near fifty cubits, and made up of ſquare pieces of timber, bound together with plates of iron. In the middle part he placed thick planks, about a cubit diſtance from each other, and on theſe the men were to ſtand who forced the engine forward. The whole was moved upon eight ſtrong and large wheels, whoſe felloes were ſtrengthened with ſtrong iron plates. In order to facilitate and vary the movements of the Helepolis, caſters were placed under it, whereby it was turned in a trice to what ſide the workmen and engineers pleaſed. From each of the four angles a large pillar of wood was carried to about the height of an hundred cubits, and inclining to each other; the whole machine conſiſting of nine ſtories, whoſe dimenſions gradually leſſened in the aſcent. The firſt ſtory was ſupported by forty-three beams, and the laſt by no more than nine. Three ſides of the machine were plated over with iron, to prevent its being damaged by the fire that might be thrown from the city. In the front of each ſtory were windows, of the ſame ſize and ſhape as the engines that were to be diſcharged from thence. To each window were ſhutters to draw up for the defence of thoſe who managed the machines, and to deaden the force of the ſtones thrown by the enemy, the ſhutters being covered with ſkins ſtuffed with wool. Every ſtory was furniſhed with two large ſtair-caſes, that whatever was neceſſary might be brought up by one, while others were going down by the other, and ſo every thing might be diſpatched without trouble or confuſion. This huge machine was moved forwards by three thouſand of the ſtrongeſt men of the The Helepolis.

the whole army, but the art with which it was built greatly facilitated the motion. Demetrius caused likewise to be made several testudos or pent-houses, to cover his men while they advanced to fill up the trenches and ditches, and invented a new sort of galleries, through which those who were employed at the siege might pass and repass, at their pleasure, without the least danger. He employed all his sea-men in levelling the ground, over which the machines were to be brought up to the space of four furlongs. The number of workmen, who were employed on this occasion, amounted to thirty thousand men.

In the mean-time, the Rhodians, observing these formidable preparations, were busy in raising a new wall within that which the enemy intended to batter with the Helepolis. In order to accomplish this work, they pulled down the wall, which surrounded the theatre, some neighbouring houses, and even some temples, after having solemnly promised to build more magnificent structures in honour of the gods, if the city were preserved. At the same time they sent out nine of their best ships to seize such of the enemy's vessels as they could meet with, and thereby distress them for want of provisions. As these ships were commanded by their bravest sea-officers, they soon returned with an immense booty and a great many prisoners. Among other vessels they took a galley richly laden, on board of which they found great variety of valuable furniture and a royal robe, which Phila herself had wrought and sent as a present to her husband Demetrius, accompanied with a letter written with her own hand. The Rhodians sent the furniture, the royal robe, and even the letter to Ptolemy, which exasperated Demetrius to a great degree. In this proceeding they did not imitate, as Plutarch observes, the polite conduct of the Athenians, who having once seized one of Philip's couriers, with whom they were then at war, opened all the packets but that of Olympias, which they sent sealed as it was to Philip [r].

While Demetrius was preparing to attack the city, the Rhodians having assembled the people and magistrates to consult about the measures they should take, some proposed in the assembly the pulling down of the statues of Antigonus and his son Demetrius, which till then had been had in the utmost veneration. But this proposal was was generally rejected with indignation, and their prudent conduct greatly allayed the wrath both of Antigonus and Demetrius. However, the latter continued to carry on the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour, thinking it would reflect no ſmall diſhonour on him, were he obliged to quit the place without making himſelf maſter of it. He cauſed the walls to be ſecretly undermined; but when they were ready to fall, a deſerter very opportunely gave notice of the whole to the townſmen, who having with all expedition drawn a deep trench all along the wall, began to countermine, and meeting the enemy under ground, obliged them to abandon the work. While both parties guarded the mines, one Athenagoras a Mileſian, who had been ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Rhodians by Ptolemy, with a body of mercenaries, promiſed to betray the city to the Demetrians, and let them in through the mines, in the night-time. But this was only in order to enſnare them; for Alexander, a noble Macedonian, whom Demetrius had ſent with a choice body of troops to take poſſeſſion of a poſt agreed on, no ſooner appeared, but he was taken priſoner by the Rhodians, who were waiting for him under arms. Athenagoras was crowned by the ſenate with a crown of gold, and preſented with five talents of ſilver.

Demetrius now gave over all thoughts of undermining the walls, and placed all his hopes of reducing the city in the battering engines which he had contrived. Having therefore levelled the ground under the walls, he brought up his Helepolis, with four teſtudos on each ſide of it. Two other teſtudos of an extraordinary ſize, bearing battering rams, were likewiſe moved forward by a thouſand men. Each ſtory of the Helepolis was filled with all ſorts of engines for diſcharging ſtones, arrows, and darts. When all things were ready, Demetrius ordered the ſignal to be given, when his men, ſetting up a ſhout, aſſaulted the city on all ſides, both by ſea and land. But in the heat of the attack, when the walls were ready to fall by the repeated ſtrokes of the battering-rams, embaſſadors arrived from Cnidus, earneſtly ſoliciting Demetrius to ſuſpend all further hoſtilities, and at the ſame time giving him hopes, that they ſhould prevail upon the Rhodians to ſubmit to an honourable capitulation. A ſuſpenſion of arms was accordingly agreed on, and embaſſadors ſent from both ſides. But the Rhodians refuſing to capitulate on the conditions offered them, the attack was renewed with ſuch fury, and the machines played off in so brisk a manner, that a large tower, built with square stones, and the wall that flanked it were battered down. The besieged nevertheless fought in the breach with so much courage and resolution, that the enemy, after various unsuccessful attempts, was forced to abandon the enterprize and retire[s].

In this conjuncture a fleet, which Ptolemy had freighted with three hundred thousand measures of corn and different kinds of pulse for the Rhodians, arrived very seasonably in the port, notwithstanding the vigilance of the enemy's ships, which cruised on the coasts of the island to surprize them. A few days after came in safe two other fleets, one sent by Cassander with an hundred thousand bushels of barley, the other by Lysimachus with four hundred thousand bushels of corn and as many of barley. This seasonable and plentiful supply, arriving when the city began to suffer for want of provisions, inspired the besieged with new courage, and raised their drooping spirits. Being thus animated, they formed a design of setting the enemies engines on fire, and with this view ordered a body of men to sally out the night ensuing, about the second watch, with torches and fire-brands, having first placed on the walls an incredible number of engines to discharge stones, arrows, darts, and fire-balls, against those who should attempt to oppose their detachment. The Rhodian troops, pursuant to their orders, all on a sudden sallied out, and advancing in spite of all opposition to the batteries set them on fire, while the engines from the walls played incessantly on those who endeavoured to extinguish the flames. The Demetrians on this occasion fell in great numbers, being incapable in the darkness of the night either to see the engines, that continually discharged showers of stones and arrows upon them, or to join in one body and repulse the enemy. The conflagration was so great, that several plates of iron falling from the Helepolis, that vast engine would have been entirely consumed, had not the troops, that were stationed in it, with all possible speed quenched the fire with water before prepared, and ready in the apartments of the engine against such accidents. Demetrius, fearing lest all his machines should be consumed, called together by sound of trumpet those whose province it was to move them, and by their help brought them off before they were entirely destroyed.

ſtroyed. When it was day he commanded all the darts and arrows, that had been ſhot by the Rhodians, to be carefully gathered, that he might, from their number, form ſome judgment of the number of machines in the city. Above eight hundred fire-brands were found on the ſpot, and no fewer than fifteen hundred darts, all diſcharged in a very ſmall portion of the night. This ſtruck the prince himſelf with no ſmall terror, for he never imagined, that they could have been able to bear the charges of ſuch formidable preparations. However, after having cauſed the ſlain to be buried, and given directions for the curing of the wounded, he applied himſelf to the repairing of his machines, which had been diſmounted and rendered quite unſerviceable.

In the mean time, the beſieged, improving the reſpite allowed them by the removal of the machines, built a third wall in the form of a creſcent, which took in all that part that was moſt expoſed to the enemies batteries; and beſides drew a deep trench behind the breach to prevent the enemy from entering the city that way. At the ſame time they detached a ſquadron of their beſt ſhips, under the command of Amyntas, who made over to the continent of Aſia, and there meeting with ſome privateers, who were commiſſioned by Demetrius, took both the ſhips and the men, among whom were Timocles, the chief of the pirates, and ſeveral officers of diſtinction belonging to the fleet of Demetrius. On their return they fell in with ſeveral veſſels laden with corn for the enemy's camp, which they likewiſe took and brought into the port. Theſe were ſoon followed by a numerous fleet of ſmall veſſels, loaded with corn and proviſions ſent them by Ptolemy, together with fifteen hundred men, commanded by Antigonus, a Macedonian of great experience in military affairs. Demetrius, in the mean time having repaired his machines, brought them up anew to the walls, which he inceſſantly battered, till he opened a great breach, and threw down ſeveral towers. But when he came to the aſſault, the Rhodians under the command of Aminias defended themſelves with ſuch reſolution and intrepidity, that he was in three ſucceſſive attacks repulſed with great ſlaughter, and laſt at forced to retire. The Rhodians likewiſe on this occaſion loſt ſeveral officers, and amongſt others the brave Aminias their commander.

While the Rhodians were thus ſignalizing themſelves in the defence of their country, a ſecond embaſſy arrived at the camp of Demetrius from Athens and the other cities of Greece, soliciting Demetrius to compose matters, and strike up a peace with the Rhodians. At the request of the embassadors, who were in all above fifty, a cessation of arms was agreed upon, but the terms offered by Demetrius being again rejected by the Rhodians, the embassadors returned home without being able to bring the contending parties to an agreement. Hostilities were therefore renewed, and Demetrius, whose imagination was fertile in expedients, for succeeding in his projects, formed a detachment of fifteen hundred of his best troops, under the conduct of Alcimus and Mancius, two officers of great resolution and experience, ordering them to enter the breach at midnight, and forcing the entrenchment behind it, to possess themselves of the posts about the theatre, where it would be no difficult matter to maintain themselves against any efforts of the townsmen. In order to facilitate the execution of so important and dangerous an undertaking, and amuse the enemy with false attacks, he at the same time, upon a signal given, ordered the rest of the army to set up a shout, and attack the city on all sides, both by sea and land. By this means he hoped, that the besieged being alarmed in all parts, his detachment might find an opportunity of forcing the entrenchments, which covered the breach, and afterwards of seizing the advantageous posts about the theatre. This feint had all the success the prince could expect; for the troops having set up a shout from all quarters, as if they were advancing to a general assault, the detachment commanded by Alcimus and Mancius entered the breach, and fell upon those, who defended the ditch and the wall that covered it, with such vigour, that, having slain the best part of them and put the rest in confusion, they advanced to the theatre, and seized on the posts adjoining to it. This occasioned a general uproar in the city, as if it had been already taken: But the commanding officers dispatched orders to the soldiers on the ramparts not to quit their posts, nor stir from their respective stations. Having thus secured the walls, they put themselves at the head of a chosen body of their own troops and of those who were lately come from Egypt, and with these charged the enemies detachment. But the darkness of the night prevented them from dislodging the enemy, and regaining the advantageous posts they had seized. But the day no sooner appeared, than they renewed their attack with wonderful bravery. The Demetrians without the walls with loud ſhouts endeavoured to animate thoſe who had entered the place, and inſpire them with a reſolution to maintain their ground, till they were relieved with freſh forces. The Rhodians, being ſenſible, that their fortunes, liberties, and all that was dear to them in the world lay at ſtake, fought like men in the utmoſt deſpair, the enemy defending their poſts for ſeveral hours without giving ground in the leaſt. At length the Rhodians, encouraging each other to exert themſelves in defence of their country, and animated by the example of their leaders, made a laſt effort, and breaking into the very heart of the enemy's battalion, there killed both their commanders. After their death the reſt were eaſily put in diſorder, and all to a man either killed or taken priſoners. The Rhodians likewiſe on this occaſion loſt many of their beſt commanders, and among the reſt Damotetis, their chief magiſtrate, a man of extraordinary valour, who had ſignalized himſelf during the whole time of the ſiege [t].

Demetrius, not at all diſcouraged by this check, was making the neceſſary preparations for a new aſſault, when he received letters from his father Antigonus, enjoining him to conclude a peace with the Rhodians upon the beſt terms he could get, leſt he ſhould loſe his whole army in the ſiege of a ſingle town. From this time Demetrius wanted only ſome plauſible pretence for breaking up the ſiege. The Rhodians likewiſe were now more inclined to come to an agreement than formerly, Ptolemy having acquainted them, that he intended to ſend them a great quantity of corn, and three thouſand men to their aſſiſtance, but that he would have them firſt to try, whether they could make up matters with Demetrius upon reaſonable terms. At the ſame time embaſſadors arrived from the Ætolian republic, ſoliciting the contending parties to put an end to a war, which might involve all the eaſt in endleſs calamities.

An accident, which happened to Demetrius in this conjuncture, did not a little contribute towards the wiſhed-for pacification. This prince was preparing to advance his Helepolis againſt the city, when a Rhodian engineer found means to render it quite uſeleſs. He undermined the tract of ground over which the Helepolis was to paſs the next day, in order to approach the walls. Demetrius, not ſuſpecting any ſtratagem of this nature, cauſed the engine engine to be moved forward, which, coming to the place that was undermined, sunk so deep into the ground, that it was impossible to draw it out again. This misfortune, if we believe Vegetius and Vitruvius, determined Demetrius to hearken to the Ætolian embassadors, and at last to strike up a peace upon the following conditions: that the republic of Rhodes should be maintained in the full enjoyment of their antient rights, privileges, and liberties without any foreign garison; that they should renew their antient alliance with Antigonus, and assist him in his wars against all states and princes, except Ptolemy king of Egypt; and that, for the effectual performance of the articles stipulated between them, they should deliver an hundred hostages, such as Demetrius should make choice of, except those who bore any public employment [u].

The siege of Rhodes raised Year of the flood, 2696. Before Christ 303.

Thus the siege was raised after it had continued a whole year, and the Rhodians amply rewarded all those, who had distinguished themselves in the defence of their country; the slaves were set free, and admitted to the rights and privileges of citizens, and many of the freemen crowned with crowns of gold, and honoured with rich presents out of the public treasury. They likewise set up statues to Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus, who had greatly contributed to the preservation of the place. But to express their gratitude to Ptolemy above the rest, they sent some of their priests to consult the oracle of Ammon, whether they should worship him, as a god, or no; and being answered, that they might pay him divine honours, they consecrated to him a square grove in the city, enclosing it with a sumptuous portico, which was a furlong in length, and from him called Ptolemeum, or Ptolemy's Portico; and in order to perpetuate the memory of their deliverer in this war by another method, they gave him the appellation of Soter, that is, Saviour. By this firname he is distinguished by the historians from the other Ptolemies, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Egypt [w]. Some writers have imagined, that the firname of Soter was given him for having saved Alexander in the city of the Oxydracans [x]; but in this particular we chuse with the learned Usher to follow Diodorus.

Demetrius

DEMETRIUS, now reconciled with the Rhodians, at his departure presented them with the Helepolis and all the other machines he had employed in the siege, which they selling, erected, with the money accruing from the sale, and with some additional sums of their own, the famous colossus, as we have hinted above. We cannot help taking notice here of one circumstance, which greatly redounds to the honour of Demetrius. Rhodes was, at the time of the siege, the residence of a celebrated painter named Protogenes, who was a native of Caunus a city of Caria. The house, where he lived, was in the suburbs without the city when Demetrius first besieged it. But neither the presence of the enemy, who surrounded him, nor the noise of the arms, that perpetually rung in his ears, could induce him to quit his habitation or interrupt his work. The king, surprized at this, asked him, Why he did not, like the other inhabitants, save himself within the walls? Protogenes replied, that he was under no apprehension, since he was sensible, that Demetrius had declared war against the Rhodians, and not against the sciences. The prince was so pleased with this answer, that from that time he took him under his protection, and placed a safe-guard round his house to protect him from the insults of the soldiery. The master-piece of Protogenes was the picture of one Ialysus (E), supposed by the Rhodians to have founded their

The commendable conduct of Demetrius toward Protogenes a celebrated painter.

(E) This Ialysus was but a fabulous hero, the son of Orchimus and grandson of Apollo and the nymph Rhoda. Protogenes is said to have employed seven years in finishing this piece, dureing which time he condemned himself to a very rigid and abstemious life, eating nothing but lupines, lest the vapours, which a richer food might send up to the brain, should darken his imagination. To make the picture the more lasting, he covered it with four lays of colours, that as time should wear one away, another underneath should still appear fresh. When Apelles first saw it, he was so transported with admiration, that his speech failed him for some time; and when he began to recover from his astonishment, he cried out, Prodigious work! wonderful performance! However, it has not all those graces which the world admires in my works. One of the figures in this picture was a dog, which had cost the painter an immense pains without his being able to express to his own satisfaction the idea he had conceived. He endeavoured to represent the dog in a panting attitude with his mouth foaming, as after a long course, and exerted all the skill he their city. Pliny pretends, that the city was saved by this piece; it was lodged, as he informs us, in that quarter of the city, by which alone it was possible for Demetrius to storm the place; but he chose rather to retire from before the city, than to expose so valuable a monument of art to the danger of being consumed in the flames[x]. This indeed would have been carrying his taste to a surprizing excess; but we have already intimated the true reasons which obliged Demetrius to raise the siege.

The Rhodians having finished this war, and concluded a peace upon very honourable and advantageous terms, applied themselves entirely to trade and navigation, by which they

he could, but still was dissatisfied with what he had done. Art, in his opinion, was more visible than it ought to have been, and he wanted to make the foam appear not painted, but actually flowing out of the dog's mouth. He frequently retouched it, but could not express those simple traces of nature of which he had formed the ideas in his mind. At last finding all his attempt unsuccessful, in a violent emotion of rage and despair, he darted at the picture the spunge with which he used to wipe off his colours, and chance accomplished, to use Pliny's expression, what art had not been able to effect (81). In the same piece was a satyr represented with wonderful art leaning against a column, on the top of which was a thrush so well done, that when the picture was exposed to view, some fowlers with thrushes having stopt to see it, the birds, mistaking the painted thrush for a real one, began to sing as soon as they discovered it (82). This piece Cicero admired above all the pictures he had ever seen; for in his time it was still in Rhodes. It was afterwards carried to Rome by Cassius, and consecrated in the temple of Peace, where it remained in Pliny's time; but was in the reign of the emperor Commodus, as Herodianus informs us, consumed with the temple by fire. Protogenes is censured by the antients for often retouching his pictures, without ever being satisfied with what he had done. Of him if it was that Apelles said, Nescit manum de tabula tollere, as Pliny expresses; a defect to be equally avoided, as Tully observes, by painters and writers; we ought, says that great orator, to know how far it is proper to expatiate on every subject: for Apelles justly censured some painters, who could never quit the pencil, nor put the last hand to their work (83).

they not only became maſters of the ſea, as Polybius ſtiles them [y], but the moſt opulent and flouriſhing ſtate of all Greece. They endeavoured to maintain, as much as lay in their power, a ſtrict neutrality in the wars that broke in the eaſt, eſpecially after the death of Antigonus, but, however, could not help being involved in one with the Byzantines, which laſted but a ſhort time, and did not prove very expenſive. The ground of this war is thus related by Polybius; the Byzantines, being obliged to pay a yearly tribute of fourſcore talents to the Gauls, in order to raiſe this ſum, came to a reſolution of laying a toll on all the ſhips that traded to the Pontic ſea. This reſolution provoked the Rhodians, who were a trading nation, above all the reſt. Wherefore they immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to the Byzantines complaining of this new tax; but as the Byzantines had no other means of raiſing money wherewithal to ſatisfy the avarice of the Gauls, and redeem their country from the rapines of thoſe barbarians, they perſiſted in their former reſolution. Whereupon the Rhodians declared war againſt them, and at the ſame time ſent to ſolicit Pruſias king of Bithynia to join them, being well aſſured, that Pruſias wanted only a favourable opportunity of venting his reſentment upon the Byzantines for having endeavoured to reconcile Attalus and Achæus, who were both declared enemies to the king of Bithynia. The Byzantines likewiſe diſpatched embaſſadors to Attalus and Achæus ſoliciting aid from them. They found Attalus diſpoſed to aſſiſt them; but he was not then in a condition to give them a proof of his friendſhip, having been lately confined by Achæus to the antient limits of his father's kingdom. As for Achæus, who was at this time in poſſeſſion of all Aſia on this ſide of mount Taurus, and had lately aſſumed the title of king, he readily eſpouſed the cauſe of the Byzantines, and promiſed to aſſiſt them with the whole power of his kingdom [z].

In the mean time, Pruſias, taking the field, poſſeſſed himſelf of Hieron, which town formerly belonged in common to the merchants trading to the Pontic ſea, but had been lately purchaſed by the Byzantines with a great ſum of money, by reaſon of its convenient ſituation for protecting their trade. He likewiſe ſeized on all that portion of Myſia in Aſia which they had enjoyed for many ages. At the ſame same time, the Rhodians with their fleet ravaged the coasts of the Byzantine territories, and seized all their ships trading to the Pontic sea. But these losses were not sufficient to make them comply with the request of the Rhodians, or to hearken to the terms proposed to them by Xenophon the Rhodian admiral. They chiefly depended upon the promises made them by Achæus, who was both inclined to assist them, and had a powerful army on foot. The Rhodians therefore, to draw Achæus off from the Byzantines, sent embassadors to Ptolemy king of Egypt, entreating him to deliver up to them Andromachus, the father of Achæus, who was at that time a prisoner in Alexandria. They hoped, that by sending him back to his son without ransom, they should so gain the good-will of Achæus, as to prevent him at least from sending any succours to their enemies. Ptolemy did not readily yield to the demand of the Rhodians; for Andromachus being both father to Achæus and brother to Laodice the wife of Seleucus, he proposed to make a better bargain of him for himself; for the disputes between him and Antiochus were not well composed; and Achæus was become very powerful, extending his conquests far and wide. However, Ptolemy was at length prevailed upon to gratify the Rhodians by delivering up Andromachus to them. The Rhodians immediately restored him without ransom to his son, and, by that grateful office and other honours decreed to Achæus, gained him over to their party, and so deprived the enemy of their chief support. Another misfortune at the same time befel the Byzantines, which proved no less prejudicial to their affairs. They had sent for Tibites, who was then in Macedon, and had as just a claim to the kingdom of Bithynia as Prusias, who was his nephew. Tibites immediately set out from Macedon in hopes of raising disturbances in Bithynia, and making good his title to that kingdom, when supported by the power of the Byzantines. But he died on his journey, and his death so disheartened the Byzantines, that they began to deliberate how they might extricate themselves out of their present difficulties. Cavarus, king of the Thracian Gauls, happened to be at that time in Byzantium, and being desirous to have the glory of putting an end to the war, offered his mediation, which being readily accepted by the contending parties, a peace was concluded between the Rhodians and Byzantines, upon condition that the Byzantines should forbear exacting toll on ships trading to the Pontic sea; which was all the Rhodians had in view in declaring war. As for king Prusias, the the articles of the treaty with him were, that there ſhould be perpetual peace between him and the Byzantines; that Pruſias ſhould reſtore to the Byzantines all the lands, towns, people, &c. which he had taken during the war, and that he ſhould repair all the damages ſuffered by the Byzantines and Myſians ſubject to them. Thus a period was put to the war between the Byzantines on one ſide, and king Pruſias, ſurnamed Cholos or the Lame, and the Rhodians on the other [a].

The coloſſus and ſeveral public buildings thrown down by an earthquake.

ABOUT this time happened that dreadful earthquake, which, as we have hinted above, threw down the famous coloſſus, the arſenal, and great part of the walls of the city of Rhodes; which calamity the Rhodians improved to their advantage, ſending embaſſadors to all the princes and ſtates of the Greek name, who exaggerating their loſſes procured immenſe ſums for the repairing of them. Hiero king of Syracuſe preſented them with an hundred talents, and beſides exempted from all taxes and duties ſuch as traded to Rhodes. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, gave them an hundred talents, a million of meaſures of wheat, materials for building twenty quinqueremes, and the like number of triremes, and beſides ſent them an hundred architects, three hundred workmen, and materials for repairing their public buildings to a great value, paying them moreover fourteen talents a year for the maintenance of the workmen he ſent them. Antigonus gave them an hundred talents of ſilver with ten thouſand pieces of timber, each piece being ſixteen cubits long, ſeven thouſand planks, three thouſand pounds of iron, as many of pitch and roſin, and a thouſand meaſures of tar. Chryſeis, a woman of diſtinction, ſent them an hundred thouſand meaſures of wheat, and three thouſand pounds of lead. Antiochus exempted from all taxes and duties the Rhodian ſhips trading to his dominions, preſented them with ten gallies, and two hundred thouſand meaſures of corn, with many other things of great value. Pruſias, Mithridates, Lyſanias, Olympicus, Limnæus, and all the other princes then reigning in Aſia made them proportionable preſents. In ſhort, all the Greek towns and nations, all the princes of Europe and Aſia, contributed, according to their ability, to the relief of the Rhodians on that occaſion; inſomuch, that their city not only ſoon roſe from its ruins, but but attained to a higher pitch of riches and splendor than ever [b].

The Rhodians join with Attalus, against Philip king of Macedon. Year of the flood 2786. before Christ 213.

A few years after, the Rhodians could not help engaging in a war against Philip king of Macedon, which cost them them immense treasures. Philip, without any provocation, had invaded the territories of Attalus king of Pergamus, and because the Rhodians seemed to favour their antient friend and ally, the king of Macedon sent one Heraclides, by birth a Tarentine, to set fire to their fleet, and at the same time dispatched embassadors into Crete, in order to stir up the Cretans against the Rhodians, and thereby prevent them from lending any assistance to Attalus. These proceedings so provoked the Rhodians, that they entered into an alliance with Attalus, and proclaimed war against Philip [c]. That prince at first gained an inconsiderable advantage over the Rhodians, in a naval engagement fought near the island of Lada, over-against the city of Miletus, having taken two of their quinqueremes and dispersed the rest. The next year he ventured a second battle off the island of Chios against the united fleets of Attalus and the Rhodians; but was defeated with the loss of three thousand Macedonians and six thousand allies; and besides, two thousand Macedonians and seven hundred Egyptians, who served on board his fleet, were taken prisoners, the Rhodians having lost in all but sixty men, and Attalus seventy. Notwithstanding this loss, which was the greatest he had ever sustained to that day, either by sea or land, he gave out, that he had been victorious, because he happened to take the ship which carried Attalus after it had been driven ashore. However, he afterwards carefully avoided coming to a sea engagement either with Attalus or the Rhodians. After this victory the two fleets steered their course towards the island of Ægina, where they came to an anchor, hoping to intercept Philip, as he returned on board his fleet into Macedon. But failing in their attempt, they sailed to Pyræus the port of Athens, and there renewed their alliance with the Athenians, who, having been lately insulted by Philip, paid them extraordinary honours, adding to their ten tribes, each of which bore the name of one of their heroes, an eleventh, which they called Attalis, in honour of Attalus, and presenting the Rhodians with a crown of gold, after having made all the inhabitants of Rhodes free of Athens. The king of Pergamus and the Rhodians, better

ter pleaſed with the treaty than the honours beſtowed upon them, returned on board their gallies and ſet ſail, Attalus to the iſland of Ægina, and the Rhodians to their own iſland. In their paſſage they drew into their confederacy all the Cyclades, except Andros, Paros, and Cythnos, where Philip kept Macedonian gariſons. Nevertheleſs, this ſeparation of Attalus and the Rhodians proved of very bad conſequence for the common cauſe. Had they kept united, and purſued Philip in his retreat, or at leaſt ſhut up all the entrances into Greece, they would have re-eſtabliſhed its liberty, and deprived the Romans of that glory. But while the Rhodians and Attalus were loſing time in negotiations with the inhabitants of the Cyclades and Ægina, Philip, who knew how to improve the faults of his enemies to his own advantage, having divided his forces into two bodies, ſent one under the command of Philocles to ravage the territory of Athens; the other he put on board his fleet, with orders to ſail to Meronea, a city on the north coaſt of Thrace. As for himſelf, he marched by land to the ſame place, attended only by two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe. The city, being attacked at the ſame time by ſea and land, was taken at the firſt aſſault. The city of Ænos, which ſtood on the ſame coaſt, was betrayed to the Macedonians by the governor of the place; and then all the caſtles along the ſhore ſubmitted of their own accord to the conqueror, who paſſed on from thence to the Thracian Cherſoneſus, where he took Eleus, Alopeconeſus, Callipolis, and Madytos. From the Cherſoneſus the king paſſed over the Helleſpont, and laid ſiege to Abydos, which city ſtopped the rapidity of his conqueſts, but was at laſt taken by aſſault, as we ſhall relate at length in the hiſtory of the ſucceſſors of Alexander [d].

Before Philip began the ſiege of Abydos, the Rhodians and Attalus had ſent embaſſadors to Rome to complain of him, and inform the ſenate, that he was ſoliciting ſeveral ſtates in Aſia to take up arms, with a deſign to enſlave the Greek cities that refuſed to join him, and then purſue his conqueſts both in Europe and Aſia. The Rhodians had in the very beginning of this war entered into an alliance with Rome, and on that conſideration their embaſſadors were received with marks of great diſtinction by the ſenate, who promiſed to diſpatch embaſſadors to Philip, and employ ploy their good offices with that prince, in behalf of the Greeks in Asia and Europe. They were as good as their word, but Philip dismissed their embassadors without shewing any inclination to treat of a peace. Whereupon the Romans, Attalus, and the Rhodians having renewed their alliance, war was proclaimed at Rome against Philip, and P. Sulpitius the consul sent with an army into Macedon. On his arrival he found Athens besieged by part of the king's troops, and the king himself busy in making the necessary preparations for invading the kingdom of Pergamus. Sulpitius immediately detached a squadron of twenty gallies to the relief of Athens, under the conduct of Claudius Centho, who obliged the Macedonians to raise the siege, and performed such exploits in Greece as were worthy of the consul himself. Sulpitius was not in a condition to undertake any thing else the rest of the year; he had left Rome too late, and did not arrive in Epirus before the end of autumn, when the season did not allow him to keep out at sea or take the field [e].

EARLY in the spring, the Rhodians sent twenty gallies, under the command of Agesimbrotus, to join Attalus and Apustius the Roman admiral, and these three fleets struck such terror into the Macedonians, that they durst not venture out of their harbours; so that the confederates laying siege to Oreos, a strong city subject to Philip on the eastern coast of Eubœa, made themselves masters of that important place, and afterwards laid waste all the neighbouring countries which adhered to Philip. The ensuing year the Rhodians, in conjunction with Attalus and L. Quinctius, brother to Titus Quinctius Flaminius, after having ravaged the country of the Carystii, laid siege to Eretria, a city near the Euripus, which they took by assault; and then returning to Carystus carried that place likewise. From Carystus they entered the Saronic gulph, and appeared before Cenchrea one of the ports of Corinth, which they likewise reduced. But Corinth itself, being garisoned by some of the choicest of the Macedonian troops and the Roman deserters, the consul, who attacked the place by land, while his brother with the Rhodians invested it by sea, was forced to raise the siege after he had made a breach in the walls [f].

The Rhodians recover the province of Peræa from Philip.

THESE exploits the Rhodians performed in conjunction with the Romans and king of Attalus. But the province of

of Peræa they recovered from Philip with their own forces alone. Peræa was a ſmall province of Caria, ſeparated by the Carpathian ſea from the iſland of Rhodes, to which it had been formerly ſubject. This province the Rhodians undertook to recover, while Philip's forces were engaged with Attalus and the Romans, committing the whole conduct of this expedition to Pauſiſtratus, who was then their prætor or chief magiſtrate. Pauſiſtratus put to ſea with his fleet, and landed in Caria at the head of two thouſand nine hundred men. With this ſmall army he encamped in the plain which had led to Stratonice, one of the richeſt cities in Caria, and antiently peopled, according to Strabo, by a colony from Macedon. The Rhodian general on his landing had the precaution to ſeize on a ſtrong hold, called Tendeba, where he was reinforced by a thouſand Achæans and an hundred horſe, ſent him by the Achæan republic. Dinocrates, one of the king of Macedon's generals, hearing that the Rhodians had made a deſcent in Caria, and poſſeſſed themſelves of Tendeba, immediately haſtened thither to recover the place, and oblige the enemy to reimbark. But finding them well fortified, he turned towards Aſtragon, a fortreſs on the borders of the territory of Stratonice. Under the walls of this caſtle he ſtrengthened his army with all the Macedonian gariſons in that neighbourhood, and then marched to Alabanda, where the Rhodians were encamped, with a deſign to draw them to a deciſive action. The Rhodians were ſo far from declining a battle, that they came to meet him, and encamped at a ſmall diſtance from his army. The two generals drew up their troops in battalia. Dinocrates poſted five hundred Macedonians on the right, the Argives on the left, and the Carians in the center. Pauſiſtratus placed moſt of his auxiliaries in the center, and the Cretans and Thracians in the wings. Both armies advanced in good order, and continued ſome time within reach of each other before they began the attack, being ſeparated by a rivulet. At laſt Pauſiſtratus, advancing at the head of his mercenaries, charged the Macedonian phalanx with ſuch fury that he put it in diſorder; then the reſt of his army, forcing their way through the ranks, already broken by the confuſion and flight of the phalangites, ſpread terror and ſlaughter every where. Dinocrates in vain endeavoured to rally his diſordered troops; the affrighted ſoldiers would not hearken to the voice of their commander, and the general himſelf was forced to retire with the ſmall remains of his army to Bargyliæ a city of Caria. The Rhodians ſpent the reſt of the day in purſuing the fugitives, and in the evening returned to their camp. Nothing now prevented them from marching directly to Stratonice, which city they might have made themſelves maſters of without ſtriking a blow. There was no enemy in the field, and Dinocrates had drawn out the gariſon to reinforce his army before the battle. But not knowing how to uſe their victory, they loſt a favourable opportunity of extending their conqueſts all over Caria. They reduced indeed all the caſtles and towns of Peræa; but in the mean time gave the Macedonian general leiſure to ſupply Stratonice with proviſions, and throw himſelf into it with the remains of his army; ſo that all the efforts of Pauſiſtratus, in attempting afterwards to reduce it, proved ineffectual [g].

The Rhodians give a ſignal proof of their attachment to the Romans, and of their zeal for the common intereſt of Greece.

About this time, Antiochus, ſurnamed the Great, having reduced in one campaign Cœle-Syria, Phœnice, and Judæa, was making vaſt preparations in order to conquer Cilicia and Caria, and then paſs into Europe and join his old ally Philip. With this view having raiſed a mighty army, he ſent it under the command of his two ſons, Ardues and Mithridates, to wait for him at Sardis, while he with a powerful fleet, conſiſting of an hundred large ſhips of war and two hundred other veſſels, reduced the cities on the coaſts of Caria and Cilicia, which were ſubject to the king of Egypt. On this occaſion the Rhodians gave a ſignal proof of their attachment to Rome, and zeal for the common intereſts of Greece. Antiochus had already taken Zephyrium, Soli, Aphrodiſias, Selinus, and ſeveral other caſtles along the coaſt, and was actually beſieging Coraceſium, an important place in Cilicia, when the Rhodians ſent an embaſſy to him, requiring him not to extend his conqueſts beyond Nephelis, a famous promontory of Cilicia, and threatening him with war in caſe he did not comply with their requeſt. The embaſſadors were ordered to add, that the Rhodians were not prompted to take up arms againſt him out of any grudge or hatred to his perſon; but becauſe they would not ſuffer him to join Philip, and interrupt the progreſs of the Romans in reſtoring Greece to its antient liberty. When the embaſſadors were brought into his tent, for he was then encamped before Coraceſium, and acquainted him with their buſineſs, the proud monarch, who was uſed to give law to others, was highly provoked; but, however, ever, had command enough over his temper not to express any resentment. He only answered, that he would take care not to quarrel with the Rhodians or the Romans, with whom he designed always to keep up a good understanding; that he would send embassadors to renew the antient treaties, which his ancestors had made with Rhodes, and that he had been always desirous to live in amity with the Romans; and, in proof of the friendship then subsisting between him and that republic, he gave them an account of the embassy he had lately sent to Rome, and of the great honours which had been bestowed upon his embassadors by the senate. Soon after Antiochus sent embassadors to Rhodes, who upon their arrival there heard the news of the entire defeat of Philip at Cynocephalæ. This news emboldened the Romans, and most of them were for putting a fleet out to sea and engaging Antiochus. But the Rhodians advised them rather to secure the liberty of the cities in alliance with the king of Egypt, which were not yet subdued by Antiochus. Their advice was followed, and the cities of Caunus, Myndus, Halicarnassus, and the island of Samos were by this means preserved from the Syrian yoke. However, Antiochus reduced Coracesium, Coricus, Andriace, Limyra, Patara, Xanthus, all which cities belonged to Ptolemy, and lastly Ephesus itself [h].

In the mean time, a peace being concluded between Philip and the Romans, the Rhodians were, by the articles of the treaty, put in possession of Stratonice and the best part of Caria. This regard shewn them by the Romans encouraged them to assist the republic to the utmost of their power in the war, which was soon after proclaimed at Rome against Antiochus. They sent Pausistratus with thirty ships of war to join Livius the Roman admiral, and act in conjunction with him against Antiochus. But the best part of his fleet was, by the artifice of Polyxenidas Antiochus's admiral, surprized and destroyed. Polyxenidas was himself by birth a Rhodian, but having been banished his conntry, had gone into the service of the king of Syria, and was now commander in chief of the Syrian fleet. Pausistratus had advanced with his fleet as far as the island of Samos, where he received an express from Polyxenidas, telling him, that being now master of the Syrian fleet, it was in his power to do Pauſiſtratus and his country ſignal ſervice, provided, Pauſiſtratus would engage in the name of his republic to reſtore him to his native country, and to the honours he enjoyed before his baniſhment. Pauſiſtratus, thinking that ſuch a propoſal ought neither to be implicitly believed, nor abſolutely neglected, deſired Polyxenidas to explain himſelf more fully, and promiſed ſecrecy. Then the latter ſent a ſecond expreſs, acquainting him, that he was ready to deliver up Antiochus's fleet, provided only, he might be permitted to return to his country, and be reinſtated in his former condition there. This Pauſiſtratus thought a propoſal of too much importance to be rejected, and in order to give Polyxenidas time to follow him, he retired with his ſquadron to a port of Samos, called Panormus, and there waited to ſee the concluſion of the affair. From thence he ſent an expreſs to Polyxenidas, promiſing him whatever he demanded; and Polyxenidas on his ſide ſent him a letter written with his own hand, wherein he promiſed to deliver up the whole Syrian fleet. Upon this open declaration Pauſiſtratus was no longer in ſuſpenſe. He had it in his power to ruin Polyxenidas; and he could not believe, that a wiſe man would make a promiſe, which might coſt him his life, without deſigning to perform it. Nothing therefore remained but to take the proper meaſures for putting the deſign in execution. To this end Polyxenidas promiſed to cauſe all duty to be neglected on board the Syrian fleet; to ſeparate the ſoldiers and ſeamen under ſeveral pretences, to ſend them away from the port of Epheſus, where his fleet was then at anchor, and by that means expoſe them to be taken without the leaſt difficulty. This method pleaſed Pauſiſtratus, who affected the ſame negligence, which he was aſſured he ſhould find in the enemy's fleet, and quietly waited for notice when he ſhould go and attack them in the port of Epheſus. In the mean time, Polyxenidas, the better to cover his real deſign, ſent away ſome of his gallies, ordered the harbour to be cleanſed, and ſeemed in no haſte to put to ſea. While Pauſiſtratus was daily expecting to be called to Epheſus, a private perſon happened to come from that city to Samos, who being examined by Pauſiſtratus concerning the proceedings of Polyxenidas and the condition of his fleet, ingenuouſly told him, that the port of Epheſus was full of ſhips, that the ſoldiers and mariners were all aſſembled at a place within reach of it, and that the Syrian admiral admiral was making great preparations as if he had ſome great enterprize in view. Notwithſtanding this ſincere report of an indifferent perſon, Pauſiſtratus was ſo prepoſſeſſed with the promiſe of an artful enemy, that he ſtill continued at Samos, in hopes of being ſoon ſent for to take the Syrian fleet. But Polyxenidas took quite different meaſures; he ſailed from Epheſus with ſeventy ſhips of war, ſteering his courſe to Pygela, a city on the coaſt of Ionia, whence the Aſiatic fleets generally ſet out for Greece. But before he weighed anchor, he ordered one Nicander, commander of a ſquadron of privateers, to make a deſcent in the iſland of Samos, and conceal his men there till the reſt of the fleet arrived. From Pygela Polyxenidas ſet ſail for the port of Panormus, where arriving in the night, he found the Rhodians lying on the ſhore without any apprehenſion of an enemy. But the noiſe of a fleet entering the port ſoon awakened them. As they were all veteran troops, Pauſiſtratus, at laſt convinced of the treachery of his adverſary, thought it more adviſeable to make uſe of them in a fight at land than at ſea; and accordingly drew them up in order of battle to the right and left upon two promontories, which formed the mouth of the harbour. They were ſcarce drawn up when they were, to their great ſurprize, attacked in the rear by Nicander, who had therein followed the directions of Polyxenidas. The Rhodians, fearing leſt they ſhould be ſurrounded, retired with precipitation to their ſhips; but, the mouth of the harbour being ſtopped up by the Syrian fleet, they found it neceſſary to force a way through it in order to gain the high ſeas. The galley, on board of which was Pauſiſtratus, was the firſt that faced the enemy at the mouth of the port, and broke through their fleet in ſpite of all oppoſition; but, being immediately inveſted by five quinqueremes commanded by Polyxenidas in perſon, ſhe was overpowered and ſunk. Thus periſhed Pauſiſtratus, who had on all occaſions diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage and prudent conduct, and was at laſt overcome by a baſe ſtratagem. After the death of the admiral, the Rhodian fleet was ſoon deſtroyed; ſome of the gallies were taken in ſight of the port, others in the port itſelf, while they attempted to force their way out; inſomuch, that of this great armament only ſeven ſhips eſcaped, viz. five belonging to Rhodes, and two to the iſland of Cos. Theſe, in order to force their way through the enemy's fleet, lighted great fires in their prows, and from thence held out long poles with kettles full of burning bitumen, which, by the terror they gave the enemy, favoured their escape. In their flight they were met by some Erythræan gallies, that were coming to their assistance; and with them they turned towards the Hellespont, where they joined the Roman fleet, which under the command of Livius was carrying on the siege of Abydos [i].

The Rhodians, notwithstanding this loss, did not renounce their alliance with Rome or their engagement to assist her with all their forces. They immediately fitted out twenty new gallies, and gave the command of them to Eudamus, a man indeed less brave and experienced than Pausistratus, but more distrustful and circumspect. Eudamus having joined the Roman admiral at Samos, the confederates sailed from thence together to Ephesus, where they not only insulted the Syrian fleet under the command of Polyxenidas, but even challenged them to an engagement at land. But the challenge not being accepted, they returned to Samos, whence Livius, after he had resigned his command to his successor Æmilius, was detached with part of the fleet to reduce Patara in Lycia, which place was a great check upon the Rhodians while in the enemy's hands. But Livius failed in his attempt; whereupon the Roman and Rhodian fleets sailing to Adramytium, where Antiochus was encamped, obliged him to retire to Sardis, and then the confederate fleets returned to Samos, where they parted. Eumenes went to the Hellespont to convoy the Scipios, who were appointed to carry on the war against Antiochus, over into Asia. Eudamus returned to Rhodes with his gallies to receive there new reinforcements; and Æmilius continued at Samos to watch the motions of Polyxenidas, who was still shut up in the port of Ephesus [k].

In the mean time news being brought, that a formidable fleet was coming out of Syria under the command of the famous Hannibal, Eudamus, the Rhodian admiral, having reinforced his squadron with seventeen other ships, went out to meet him, in order to prevent his joining Polyxenidas in the port of Ephesus. Eudamus first advanced to the island of Megiste near the coasts of Lycia, with a design to wait for him there; but, the heat being excessive and the air there very unwholesome, he sailed from thence to the the mouth of the Eurymedon, a river of Pamphylia, where he was informed by the inhabitants of Aſpendus, that Hannibal's fleet appeared off Sida, a maritime city on the borders of Pamphylia. It conſiſted of thirty-ſeven large ſhips, among which were three ſeptiremes, four hexaremes, and ten triremes; whereas the Rhodian fleet conſiſted only of thirty-two quadriremes, and four triremes. When the Syrian fleet diſcovered the Rhodians advancing to attack them, they made a large front and faced the enemy. Hannibal commanded the right wing, and Apollonius, one of the king's chief favourites, the left. The Rhodians ſailed on in a line, with Eudamus at their head, Chariclitus brought up the rear, and Pamphilidas commanded in the center. When they came to draw up in line of battle, Eudamus ſailed out, but did not leave room enough for his gallies to be drawn with the due diſtances in one line. This inadvertency cauſed ſome diſorder in his fleet. However, while they were diſentangling themſelves in the beſt manner they could, Eudamus with five gallies only attacked Hannibal's wing, and the experience of the Rhodians ſoon repaired the fault of their admiral, for the ſhips widened of themſelves, ſo that each had room enough to turn about and ply their oars. Then the onſet began, and not one of the Rhodian gallies attacked Antiochus's ſhips without ſucceſs. The largeſt ſhip in the royal navy was by a very ſmall Rhodian galley ſunk in the very beginning of the engagement, which greatly terrified and diſheartened the Syrians in the left wing. But Eudamus was hard preſſed by Hannibal in the right wing. The Carthaginian had already ſurrounded the five Rhodian gallies, which the others obſerving haſtened to his relief, attacked Hannibal on all ſides with ſuch vigour, that he was forced to crowd all the ſail he could, and ſave that part of the ſquadron by flight. The Rhodians, after having purſued him ſome time and taken one of the hexaremes, returned to Rhodes with the glory indeed of having conquered, but reproaching one another for not having utterly deſtroyed, the Syrian fleet. However, they had at leaſt the advantage of blocking him up in the ports of Pamphylia ſo cloſe, that it was impoſſible for him to do the king the leaſt ſervice. Chariclitus lay at anchor with twenty ſhips of war off Patara and the iſland of Megiſte, in order to intercept him in his paſſage, if he attempted to join Polyexnidas. As for Eudamus he returned with only ſeven great ſhips to join the prætor Æmilius at

Samos. While the Rhodians kept Hannibal thus blocked up, Æmilius, being joined by another Rhodian ſquadron, entirely defeated the fleet of Antiochus off the the iſland of Teos. In this engagement the Syrians loſt fifty-two of their beſt ſhips, and the Romans only two. The news of this defeat ſo dejected Antiochus, that he raiſed the ſiege of Colophon, and retired into Cappadocia to his ſon-in-law Ariarathes. He was ſoon after totally defeated by land in the famous battle which was fought near Magneſia, and determined that unhappy prince to accept a peace upon ſuch conditions as it pleaſed the conqueror to impoſe. On this occaſion king Eumenes went in perſon to Rome to congratulate the republic on the ſucceſs of her arms in the Levant, and was received by the ſenate with all poſſible marks of honour and gratitude for his ſervices, and preſſed to declare what recompence would be moſt agreeable to him. The king for a long time modeſtly declined ſaying any thing in his own praiſe, or aſking any particular reward, referring that matter wholly to the determination of the conſcript fathers. But they ſtill inſiſting that he ſhould give an account of his exploits, and declare what Rome could do to ſhew her gratitude in the moſt acceptable manner, he at length comply'd; and having run over his father's ſervices and his own, and anſwered the objections he foreſaw the Rhodians would make as republicans againſt the increaſe of his territories, and in favour of the Aſiatic Greeks, whoſe liberty and independence they would contend for, he thus concluded: "As to my deſires, ſince I muſt declare them, "they are theſe. You have confined the king of Syria "within mount Taurus, and if Rome keeps for her-"ſelf the countries which extend from thoſe parts to the "ſea, I ſhall lay no claim to them; it will be both a "pleaſure to me and a ſecurity to my dominions to have you "for my neighbours. But if you ſhould deſpiſe ſo diſtant a "conqueſt, and think it will not anſwer the expence of "keeping it, I will venture to ſay, that none of your allies "have better deſerved it than myſelf." The ſenate received his propoſal with approbation, and was diſpoſed to grant him his requeſt, but the Rhodian deputies, when they were admitted to audience, pleaded for the liberty of the Greek cities in Aſia, as Eumenes had apprehended. "Your "victories, ſaid they to the ſenate, have made you maſters "of a great many Greek colonies on this ſide of mount "Taurus, and ſhall they alone not partake of that general "regard for liberty, which has made you the deliverers of "Greece!

The Rhodian deputies oppoſe at Rome the pretenſions of king Eumenes.

" Greece? Subject as many of the other nations to Eumenes
" as you pleaſe; they do not know the value of liberty;
" they have been ſo long accuſtomed to kingly government,
" that it is ſcarce any burthen to them. But the Greeks
" have the ſame ſpirit as the Romans; they love, nay they " adore, liberty, and expect to receive from you this in" eſtimable preſent, for which they will be eternally in" debted to your glorious arms. It may indeed be ſaid,
" that theſe Greek cities declared for Antiochus. And ſo
" likewiſe did many of the Greek cities in Europe, which " nevertheleſs you reſtored to their laws and liberties. And " this is all we aſk for the Aſiatick Greeks. Cannot you " deny Eumenes what you denied yourſelves? This, con" ſcript fathers, is our only requeſt. Have not the paſt
" ſervices of the Rhodians deſerved your favour for a people,
" who came originally from Greece as well as themſelves?
" Beſides, to grant our deſires is to give the higheſt inſtance
" poſſible of that true magnanimity, which is peculiar to
" Roman minds."

THIS ſpeech made an impreſſion on the minds of the fathers, who at length determined to ſend ten commiſſioners into the Levant to ſettle all diſputes there, but declared before-hand, that Lycaonia, the two Phrygias, and Myſia ſhould for the future be ſubject to Eumenes. Lycia, that part of Caria which was next to Rhodes, and part of Piſidia were beſtowed on the Rhodians, as a reward for their eminent ſervices during the war. However, in both theſe diſpoſitions thoſe cities were excepted which enjoyed their liberty before the war. The diſpoſal of Soli raiſed a diſpute between the Rhodians and the embaſſadors of king Antiochus. Soli was a city of Cilicia beyond mount Taurus, and had been founded by a Greek colony from Agri. The Rhodians therefore thought it ſhould be declared free, as well as the other Greek cities. But the king's embaſſadors claiming it in virtue of the treaty concluded with the Romans, the Rhodians acquieſced, and Soli was allotted to king Antiochus [1]. The Rhodians rewarded by the Romans.

THE Rhodians, tho' ſuch zealous aſſertors of liberty, yet oppreſſed, in a moſt cruel manner, the Lycians, who had been ſubjected to them by the Roman ſenate. The Lycians, not able to bear the oppreſſions they groaned under, ſent deputies to Rome, to complain of their new maſters and procure ſome redreſs for their calamities. When they The Lycians complain to the ſenate of the Rhodians were introduced to the ſenate, they addreſſed the fathers thus: We were formerly ſubject to the king of Syria, and found his government very mild in compariſon of the oppreſſions we endure under the Rhodians. We now undergo all the hardſhips of ſlavery. All kinds of ſeverity are uſed, not only againſt particular perſons, but againſt the whole nation. The honour of our wives and daughters is not ſafe; our eſtates are at the mercy of our maſters; our lands are pillaged; in ſhort, we are treated like ſlaves bought in the market. The ſenate, touched with compaſſion, wrote a letter to the Rhodians, which was carried by the Lycian envoys themſelves, to this effect: We never intended to enſlave the countries we gave you. None of thoſe people, who were born free, have been reduced to a ſtate of ſlavery by us. Remember therefore, that the Lycians are allies of the people of Rome, at the ſame time that they are your ſubjects. The Rhodians, taking it very much amiſs, that their ſubjects ſhould dare to have recourſe to any foreign power, began to treat them with more ſeverity than ever. Whereupon the Lycians, at the inſtigation of Eumenes, as is ſuppoſed, taking up arms, attempted to ſhake off the yoke. But the Rhodians ſoon reduced them, and uſed them in ſo cruel a manner, that they were obliged to have recourſe anew to Rome, where they found many patrons, the Rhodians having diſobliged the Romans, by conveying with their fleet Laodice the daughter of Seleucus, whom Perſes had lately married, into Macedon. The ſenate therefore appointed new commiſſioners to compoſe matters between the Lycians and Rhodians, enjoining them to favour the former as much as they could, without wronging the latter. The commiſſioners were not received at Rhodes with the uſual marks of friendſhip and affection; but, however, the Rhodians complied with their injunctions, and treated the Lycians thenceforth more like allies than ſubjects [m].

Year of the flood, 2822. Before Chriſt 177.

In the mean time, Eumenes, arriving at Rome, acquainted the ſenate with the vaſt preparations which Perſes the ſon of Philip was making, with a deſign, as he rightly ſuppoſed, to kindle a new war in the eaſt, and recover the countries which had been taken from his father by the Romans. The Rhodians taking it for granted, that Eumenes had included their republic in the informations he had given againſt the king of Macedon, ſent to Rome one of their chief men, named Satyrus, to clear them from all ſuſpicion of favouring Perſes. Satyrus was a man of a violent temper, and therefore being being, by the help of his friends and patrons, admitted to an audience of theſenate together with Eumenes, he broke out into reproaches againſt him. It is you, ſaid he, who have ſtirred up Lycia againſt the Rhodian government. You have done more miſchief in Aſia than ever Antiochus the Great did. Theſe invectives were agreeable to the Aſiatics, who now began to favour Perſes; but the only effect they had at Rome was, to render the Rhodians ſuſpected, and increaſe the affection of the Romans for Eumenes. As the Romans were then on the point of engaging in a war with Perſes, three commiſſioners were ſent to the coaſts of Aſia, to watch the motions and inclinations of the Rhodians. Rhodes thought herſelf injured by the Romans in her diſputes with the Lycians, and had given ſome plain proofs of her affection to Perſes. She actually had at this time a fleet of forty ſail in her ports, and it was not known for what expedition they were deſigned. But when the commiſſioners arrived at Rhodes, they found the inhabitants better diſpoſed than they expected. Hegeſilochus, a man entirely addicted to the Romans, was then prytanes (F), or the chief magiſtrate. He had no ſooner diſcovered, that Rome intended to carry the war into Macedon, but he aſſembled the people, and addreſſed themſelves thus: "The "Roman forces are coming once more to exert themſelves in the eaſt; what can we do better than join that "republic? We are become rich and powerful by having aſſiſted her in her former expeditions; what then "do we not owe her in point of gratitude? Beſides, "our common ſafety depends upon our not dividing our "intereſts from hers. Let us not then be both ungrate- "and imprudent; and if it be neceſſary for us to declare "for

The Rhodians ſuſpected by the Romans.

(F) The chief magiſtrate in the city of Rhodes was called Prytanes, which name the Rhodians, in all likelihood, borrowed of the Athenians. The latter choſe annually by lot five hundred ſenators to govern their ſtate; that is, fifty in each of the ten tribes, of which their republic conſiſted, as each tribe had his turn of precedency. The fifty ſenators in office were called Prytanes, the place where they uſed to aſſemble Prytaneon, and the ſpace of time they continued in office Prytaneia. The Prytanes, among the Rhodians, had much the ſame power and authority as the Prætor in the other ſtates of Greece, but was choſen every ſix months, at the end of which his authority expired, unleſs he was, by a plurality of votes, continued in his office; which, as Polybius tells us, ſometimes happened, but ſeldom, the Rhodians being, to a great degree, jealous of their liberties.

"for Rome, let us not delay to the last minute the succours which she has a right to demand of us. Our gallies lie unemployed in our harbours; let us equip them, and by our diligence anticipate the expectations of our friends and benefactors, let Rome find us prepared to serve her." This proposal of Hegesilochus had been approved, and forty gallies immediately equipped; so that, upon the arrival of the Roman deputies, the Rhodians offered themselves ready to serve them, and engage in the war whenever the republic thought fit to call upon them [n].

Perses endeavours to persuade the Rhodians to stand neuter. Year of the flood, 2825. Before Christ 174.

THE Roman envoys were scarce re-imbarked, highly satisfied with the zeal of the Rhodians, when embassadors arrived at Rhodes from Perses. They brought from the king a letter to the senate, wherein he gave them an account of his negotiations with the Romans, and added, that he hoped all differences would be soon composed in an amicable manner; but that, at all events, he depended on their affection. The senate of Rhodes assembled to give audience to the Macedonian embassadors, who employed all their eloquence to persuade the Rhodians to stand neuter, till war was openly declared, by that means, said they, Rhodes will be in a condition to prevent a war, by interposing her good offices, which will be very acceptable to both parties, so long as she sides with neither; but if afterwards Rome persists in troubling the repose of the east, it will be then your business to take up arms, and oppose, to the utmost of your power, those who are for involving you in new wars. This speech was heard with attention; but the senators were already prepossessed in favour of the Romans, so that the answer they received, was not agreeable to the king. The prytanes gave it in these words. We entreat Perses to ask nothing of us which may be prejudicial to the interests of Rome. After this the embassadors withdrew, and returned to Macedon, without any positive answer to their demands [o].

The haughty embassy of the Rhodians to the Roman senate.

NOT long after, war being declared with Perses, the Rhodians sent some of their gallies to join Caius Lucretius the Roman admiral; but the greatest number of their ships of war they kept in their own harbours, expecting the issue of the first battle between Perses and the Romans; for tho' many of the leading men favoured Rome, yet the people was generally inclined to Perses. Hence no no ſooner was news brought of the defeat of the conſul Licinius in Theſſaly, but the Rhodians entered into negotiations with Perſes, and, taking upon them to be mediators between the contending powers, ſent embaſſadors to Rome, commanding, rather than entreating, the ſenate to put an end to the war. "If Rome, ſaid they, addreſſing "the ſenate, was formerly victorious in the eaſt, to what "did ſhe owe her ſucceſs but to our arms and fleets? "The victories you gained over Antiochus were our vic-"tories as much as yours. As for Macedon, it was then "at peace with us, and our entering into engagements "with Perſes could be therefore no juſt offence to you. "But we at laſt broke with this prince, merely out of "complaiſance to Rome. We followed your ſtandards to "the prejudice of our ally, contrary to our own inclinations, "and without any provocation from him. Had he done "any thing which could give us juſt cauſe to abandon "him? We have indeed, been very juſtly puniſhed for "ſeparating from him. How many misfortunes have we "ſuffered for the three years that you made war with "him? Our navigation is loſt, and our iſland wants ne-"ceſſaries. We can no longer ſail with ſafety along the "coaſt of Aſia, and raiſe our impoſts in the tributary ci-"ties there. The Rhodian republic therefore, fatigued "with your hoſtilities, which all recoil upon her, thought "herſelf obliged to entreat the Macedonian to make peace "with Rome. She ſent embaſſadors to require it of him; "and now ſhe ſends others to the ſenate to warn them to "put an end to the war with Perſes, which if you refuſe "to do, we ſhall find proper means to bring the obſtinate "to reaſon [P]."

It is eaſy to judge, in what manner ſo vain and preſumptuous a ſpeech was received. Some hiſtorians, tells us, that the only anſwer the ſenate returned was, to order a decree to be read in their preſence, whereby the Lycians and Carians were declared free. This was touching them to the quick, and mortifying them in the moſt ſenſible part. The intrepid chief of the embaſſy was ſo ſtruck with this decree, that he fell into a ſwoon. Others ſay, the ſenate anſwered in few words, that the diſpoſition of the Rhodians, and their ſecret intrigues with Perſes, had been long known at Rome; that when they ſhould have have conquered Perſes, which, they hoped, would be very ſoon, they ſhould, in their turn, find means to reward or puniſh the good or ill offices they had received during the war. They had ordered the embaſſadors, however, the uſual preſents; but the proud Rhodians refuſed to accept them.

The Rhodians engage with Perſes to ſtand neuter.

The embaſſadors, upon their return to Rhodes, found their deputies from Perſes and Gentius king of Illyricum, ſent by their reſpective maſters, to conclude an alliance with the Rhodians, and engage them to turn their arms againſt Rome. The advantages which the Macedonian fleet had lately gained over the allies of Rome, inclined the Rhodians to give a favourable reception to the embaſſadors of the confederate kings. They made harangues in the ſenate and before the people, and were heard with attention. In ſpite of all the oppoſition they met with from Thetetes and a few others, who ſtill adhered to the Romans, the Rhodian ſenate promiſed not to lend the Romans ſhips or men, and thereby oblige them to finiſh the war with Macedon, by a peace which ſhould be advantageous to the eaſt. Purſuant to this engagement, they recalled the ſhips which they had ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Romans, and ſoon after ſent new embaſſadors to Rome in favour of Perſes. But they, unfortunately for the republic of Rhodes, arrived at Rome juſt when the news of the entire defeat of Perſes was publiſhed; and the ſenate maliciouſly choſe that very time to give them audience. But the chief of the embaſſy turned the haughty demands he was ordered to make in favour of the king of Macedon into congratulations, "I came hither, conſcript fa"thers, ſaid he, to repreſent to you, how burdenſome
"the war in the Levant was to you, and how prejudi"cial to us; but your proſperity has prevented my repre-
"ſentations, and left nothing for me to do, but to re"joice with you upon your great ſucceſs." The ſenate ordered ſuch an anſwer to be given, as was ſuitable to the ſuſpicions they entertained of the Rhodians. "Neither
"the intereſts of Greece, ſaid they, nor your own ſafety
"brought you hither. It was your attachment to the "Macedonian party that induced you to croſs the ſeas,
"in order to intimidate us. Had your concern been only "for Greece or yourſelves, you would have come and "implored the aſſiſtance of Rome, when Perſes entered
"Theſſaly, and threatened both the continent and you
"iſland with a ſudden invaſion. On the contrary, you "knew

" knew that Paulus Æmilius had opened a way into Macedon;
" your fears were for that kingdom, and therefore you " came to treat of peace. Go, perfidious men, and carry
" back word to your republic, that her care for the intereſts
" of Perſes is now out of ſeaſon." This anſwer ſo terrified the Rhodians, that they returned home, and exhorted their countrymen to regain the good-will of the ſenate by all ſorts of ſubmiſſion [q].

The Rhodians endeavour to appeaſe the wrath of the ſenate.

EMBASSADORS were accordingly ſent to appeaſe the wrath of the ſenate, who, on their arrival at Rome, were not only refuſed audience, but even threatened with war. The ſenate firſt decreed, that the Rhodian embaſſadors ſhould not be treated with the uſual hoſpitality, nor looked upon as friends. Junius the conſul was charged to acquaint them with this decree. As ſoon as the conſul appeared, the embaſſadors, who were waiting in the curia for an anſwer, advancing ſome paces tawards him, aſſured him, that they were come only to congratulate the Romans on their late victory, and efface the ſuſpicions which the fathers might entertain of their republic. But Junius, putting on a grave air, " We deſire no congratulations, ſaid he, from a people
" whoſe fidelity we ſuſpect. Go and condole with Perſes.
" We admit none within the walls of Rome, or into the " ſenate, but the embaſſadors of nations which are our " friends; and are you ſo? Did you even preſerve the ap" pearances of friendſhip during the war?" The Rhodians were thunder-ſtruck at theſe words, fell proſtrate with tears in their eyes, and entreated the conſul to have more regard to the ſervices they had formerly done Rome, than to the ill conduct into which they had been ſeduced for ſome years. Then they changed their habits, and running from houſe to houſe, in the attire of criminals, endeavoured to raiſe the compaſſion of the Roman citizens. But Juventius Thalna, the prætor, moved the tribes to declare war againſt Rhodes and to ſend one of the preſent magiſtrates to begin hoſtilities. This motion being oppoſed by ſome of the tribunes, and the conteſt growing warm, the ſenate was at laſt obliged to admit the Rhodian embaſſadors to an audience, and give them leave to ſpeak in their own vindication. Aſtymedes, who was at the head of the embaſſy, made a long harangue, wherin he confeſſed, that vanity was indeed the vice of his countrymen, and that they were very apt to talk arrogantly but

but he hoped, that the Romans would not think any inſtance of this national weakneſs ſuch a crime as to be puniſhed with the total ruin of their country. He urged the many important ſervices which Rhodes had formerly rendered the republic, and that tho' of late ſhe had ceaſed to aſſiſt the Romans, yet ſhe had never committed hoſtilities againſt them: He concluded with declaring the entire ſubmiſſion of the Rhodians to the good-will and pleaſure of Rome, and their reſolution to make no reſiſtance to her arms in caſe of an attack. As ſoon as Aſtymedes had done ſpeaking, the embaſſadors and their retinue fell proſtrate, and held out branches of olive in their hands, as a token of their ſuing for peace. Then they withdrew, and the matter was diſcuſſed in the ſenate. Such of the ſenators as had ſerved in the Macedonian war voted warmly againſt the Rhodians, and were for engaging Rome in a new war. But Cato put an end to the debate by a ſpeech full of ſpirit and good ſenſe. He reproached the ſenators with being blinded by proſperity, ſince nothing elſe could have made them deliberate, whether they ſhould deſtroy a republic, againſt which the only charge was ſecret thoughts and proud words. "O! "ye immortal gods, ſaid he, ſhall we then uſurp your "rights? Shall we ſearch into mens thoughts to find "enemies? Have we not open and declared enemies "enough? I ſhall readily grant, that the Rhodians were "heartily grieved for the defeat and captivity of Perſes; "nay, I ſhall allow, that compaſſion for him had not ſo "great a ſhare in their affliction as their own intereſt; "but is it then unlawful to wiſh for liberty? Rome is a "powerful ſtate, and capable of ſwallowing up all the "countries of the eaſt. Macedon, the only bulwark againſt "her, was deſtroyed. The inundation was drawing near, "and hence their fears and alarms. Did the Rhodians "hate you? No; but they loved themſelves. Are there "any among us who would not be uneaſy to ſee a formidable neighbour in poſſeſſion of lands adjoining to ours? "What would we not do to get rid of ſuch a neighbourhood? Any means but violences are lawful. This is "the preſent caſe. The Rhodians wiſhed that Perſes "might not be ruined, and that the barrier, which ſeparated "them from us, might not be thrown down; and what is "there criminal in this? Beſides, are bare wiſhes puniſhable? But it is alſo ſaid, that the Rhodians ſhewed their "pride by words; and indeed one of their embaſſadors did "drop

Cato ſpeaks in their favour.

" drop ſome very arrogant and haughty expreſſions; but " what can be inferred from thence more than this, that " there is a nation in the world more haughty and imperious " than ourſelves? Is an indiſcreet expreſſion ſo highly " criminal, that it ought to be expiated with rivers of blood? " What will the conſequence of an unjuſt ſeverity be but " inſurrections among the timorous nations, and re- " volts, or at leaſt diſtruſts among our allies? Foreign na- " tions will fear us more, but love us leſs. The Rhodians, " after all, have not carried their ingratitude to exceſs. " Perſes, when in his greateſt glory, could not ſeduce " them ſo far as to prevail on them to take up arms againſt " us; I therefore vote for rejecting the motion of the " prætor Juventius, and leaving the Rhodians in peaceable " poſſeſſion of their iſland [r]."

Lycia and Caria taken from the Rhodians.

THE advice and repreſentations of Cato were of ſuch weight with the ſenate, that war was not declared againſt the Rhodians, which was the main point. The ſenate only renewed the decree they had formerly made, whereby the Rhodians were ordered to withdraw their gariſons from Lycia and Caria, and reſtore the inhabitants to their antient liberty. After the publication of this decree, Philocrates, one of the embaſſadors, returned to Rhodes; but Aſtymedes continued at Rome, to give his republic notice of what was tranſacted there. The news which Philocrates brought to Rhodes, where they were all in the utmoſt conſternation and under great apprehenſions of a war with Rome, was received with inexpreſſible joy; inſomuch, that the loſs of Lycia and Caria ſeemed to them but a ſlight puniſhment. They now made it their whole buſineſs to regain the affection of the Romans. The alliance which they had formerly entered into with Rome, was not yet complete. They had reſerved to themſelves a liberty to make alliances with any king or independant ſtate they pleaſed, whether in Europe or Aſia; but now the times were changed. Since the conqueſt of Macedon, there was no power in all the eaſt to be feared or courted, except the Romans; the Rhodians therefore were deſirous to enter into a more ſtrict alliance with Rome, and, in order to gain the affection of the Roman citizens, they commanded a crown of gold to be made at [r] Liv. l. 45. Polyb. legat. 93. Diodor. Sicul. l. 19. & in Photii Biblio. cod. 244.

Rhodes of great value (G), which Theodotus, their admiral, was ordered to carry to Rome, and there negotiate this new alliance (H). Nevertheleſs, as the Rhodians were vainglorious, they enjoined Theodotus not to offer his petition in writing, leſt, in caſe his requeſt was not granted, it might be conveyed down to poſterity, and be a ſtanding monument of reproach to them. The admiral ſet ſail, came to Rome, and made his preſents, which were accepted; but as for the alliance, Rome made his republic ſolicit it a long time, taking pleaſure in humbling the Rhodian pride. They were ordered firſt to evacuate Caria and Lycia, and alſo to withdraw their gariſons from the two cities of Caunus and Stratonice, the firſt of which they had purchaſed of one of Ptolemy's generals with two hundred talents, and the ſecond had been given them by Antiochus and Seleucus. However, they not only readily gave up both places, but moreover either put to death, or baniſhed, all thoſe, who, during the courſe of the war, had favoured Perſes; whereupon the ſenate complied at laſt with their requeſt, and admitted them into an alliance with Rome [a].

The Rhodians admitted to an alliance with Rome.

Some years after, the Rhodians gave a ſignal inſtance of the great deference they paid to Rome. Calynda, a famous city of Caria, being beſieged by the inhabitants of Caunus, ſent embaſſadors to the Rhodians, imploring their aſſiſtance, and offering to ſurrender to them. Notwithſtanding this advantageous offer, the Rhodians deliberated ſome time,

(G) Livy (84) fixes the value of this rich crown at twenty thouſand of thoſe pieces of gold, which the Romans called aurei; but Polybius values it only at ten thouſand. The aureus among the Romans was worth twenty-five Attic drachmæ, or twenty-five denarii, according to Dio Caſſius (85). It weighed two drams and a half. Suppoſing therefore, that, in theſe ages of the republic, the proportion of gold to ſilver was as ten to one, which we have reaſon to infer from ſeveral paſſages, this piece of gold could not be worth leſs than twenty five drams.

(H) The negotiating of this new alliance with Rome was, according to Polybius, committed to the care of another embaſſador, whom he calls Rhodophi; but a little lower he gives him the name of Theetetes. He was eighty years of age, and died at Rome, before he could put the laſt hand to the negotiation.

time, whether they ſhould relieve the Calyndines or no, without conſent of the Roman ſenate; but as the ſiege was purſued with vigor, and an anſwer from Rome would come too late, they at laſt ſent ſuccours to the beſieged city, and forced the Caunians to retire. However, before they took poſſeſſion of the place, they ſent two of their chief citizens, Lydamis and Cleagoras to Rome, to lay their laurels at the feet of the conſcript fathers, and to draw what advantages they could from their ſubmiſſion. Indeed, nothing could be more agreeable to the haughty ſenators, than to ſee thoſe Rhodians, who, a few years before, pretended to give law to Rome, now reduced ſo low, as not to dare to take poſſeſſion of a city without their leave. The deputies were graciouſly received, and their reception encouraged them to deſire of the fathers, that the private ſubjects of Rhodes might be reſtored to the enjoyment of all the lands they had formerly poſſeſſed in Caria and Lycia. Their requeſt was granted, and embaſſadors returned as well ſatisfied with the ſenate, as the ſenate was with them. The Rhodians, out of gratitude, deſired leave to erect, in the temple of Minerva at Rome, a ſtatue of that goddeſs, thirty cubits high. Thus, all jealouſies between the two republics were removed, and the good underſtanding, which had long ſubſiſted between them, entirely reſtored [t].

And favoured by the ſenate

Year of the flood. 2837. before Chriſt 162.

FROM this time, to the breaking out of the Mithridatic war in Aſia, the Rhodians performed nothing, which hiſtorians have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. They enjoyed their liberties, while all the other ſtates and colonies of Greece were brought under the Roman yoke, and became provinces of that republic. They continued to maintain an inviolable attachment to Rome, and gave a ſignal inſtance of their fidelity in the above-mentioned war; for the Rhodians and the little country of Lydia, near mount Sipylus, were the only allies that remained faithful to the Romans on all the coaſts of Aſia, after Mithridates had proclaimed war with the republic; Rhodes eſpecially ſerved as a ſanctuary for all the Romans, whom the Aſiatics drove in great numbers out of their countries: and Caſſius himſelf, formerly governor of the province of Pergamus, fled thither for refuge. The king of Pontus therefore reſolved to turn all his forces by ſea and land againſt that iſland; and the inhabitants choſe rather to ſuſtain a ſiege than renounce their alliance with Rome. They put their ports in a state of defence, and covered their ramparts with all sorts of military machines. The Romans, who had fled thither, made up the best part of the Rhodian army, and the inhabitants, relying upon them and their own skill in maritime affairs, were not at all dismayed at the vast fleets and land-forces, which Mithridates was bringing against them. They posted their fleet before their island, and divided it into three squadrons; one, drawn up in a line, covered the entrance of the port, and the other two were placed, like wings, to hinder the enemy's approach. Mithridates appeared on board a quinqueremis, at the head of a fleet much more numerous than that of the enemy. He divided it into three squadrons, ordering two of them to invest the wings of the Rhodians, whilst he himself attacked the squadron that faced the port. The Rhodians therefore, lest they should be overpowered with numbers, retired by degrees, till they came to the mouth of the harbour, which they entirely stopped up; and after this, the several engagements that followed, turned to their advantage. Mithridates lost many ships, and narowly escaped himself being made prisoner in his quinqueremis, which was taken.

During these sea-engagements, Mithridates embarked his numerous army on transports, which being dispersed by a violent storm, and driven to the right and left of the island, the Rhodians sent out their fleet, fell on the vessels, which the storm had put in disorder, sunk some, burnt others, and took four hundred men prisoners. Upon this Mithridates resolved to attack the city by sea in the night, and ordered a sambuca, built on two gallies, to advance to the walls. He had been informed, that the wall of the city was but of a moderate height on the side of the temple of Jupiter Atabyrius, and resolved to storm it there. To this end he embarked his troops silently, furnished them with scaling ladders, and ordered them to wait till a signal was given them by a person hired for that purpose, from the top of the temple. In the mean time the king himself made a false attack on the side of the port, with great shouts, which caused the besieged to kindle many fires in the city. Those who were to wait for the signal before they began the attack on the side of the temple, mistaking these fires for it, were too hasty in the attempt, and miscarried. Early in the morning the Rhodians made a vigorous sally, and drove off the aggressors. The sambuca, after having done some damage, sunk with its own weight; and and Mithridates, diſheartened at theſe diſappointments, broke up the ſiege, after having loſt a great many men and the beſt part of his navy [n]. The behaviour of the Rhodians on this occaſion was highly applauded at Rome, and orders were ſent to Sylla to return them thanks in the name of the ſenate, and renew the antient alliance between the two republics. In the war which Pompey made upon the Cilician pirates, the Rhodians aſſiſted him with all their naval forces, and had a great ſhare in all the victories which he gained, though that proud Roman aſſumed the whole glory of ſuppreſſing thoſe robbers to himſelf [w].

In the civil war between Cæſar and Pompey, they aſſiſted the latter with a numerous fleet, under the command of one Euphranor, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf above all the commanders of Pompey's navy, and gained very conſiderable advantages over Cæſar's fleets [x]. After the death of Pompey, they ſided with Cæſar, which drew upon them the reſentment of C. Caſſius, who advanced to the iſland of Rhodes with a powerful fleet, after having reduced the greateſt part of the continent. The Rhodians, terrified at his approach, ſent embaſſadors, entreating him to make up matters in an amicable manner, and promiſing to ſtand neuter, and recal the ſhips which they had ſent to the aſſiſtance of the triumviri. Caſſius inſiſted upon their delivering up their fleet to him, and putting him in poſſeſſion both of their harbour and city. This demand the Rhodians would, by no means, comply with, and therefore began to put themſelves in a condition to ſtand a ſiege; but firſt ſent Archelaus, who had taught Caſſius the Greek tongue, while he ſtudied at Rhodes, to intercede with his diſciple in their behalf. Archelaus could not, with all his authority, prevail upon him to moderate his demands; wherefore the Rhodians, having created one Alexander, a bold and enterprizing man, their prætor or prytanes, equipped a fleet of three and thirty ſail, and ſent it out under the command of Mnaſeus, an experienced ſea-officer, to offer Caſſius battle. Both fleets fought with incredible bravery, and the victory was long doubtful; but the Rhodians being at length overpowered with numbers, were forced to return with their fleet to Rhodes, two of their ſhips being ſunk, and the reſt very much much damaged by the heavy ships of the Romans. This was the first time, as our author observes, that the Rhodians were fairly overcome in a sea-fight [y].

Year of the flood, 2957. Before Christ 42.

Cassius, who had beheld this fight from a neighbouring hill, having refitted his fleet, which had been no less damaged than that of the Rhodians, repaired to Loryma, a strong hold on the continent belonging to the Rhodians. This castle he took by assault, and from hence conveyed his land-forces, under the conduct of Fanus and Lentulus, over into the island. His fleet consisted of fourscore ships of war and above two hundred transports. The Rhodians no sooner saw this mighty fleet appear, but they went out again to meet the enemy. This second engagement was far more bloody than the first; many ships were sunk, and great numbers of men killed on both sides. But victory anew declared for the Romans, who immediately blocked up the city of Rhodes both by sea and land. As the Rhodians had not had time to furnish the city with sufficient store of provisions, some of the inhabitants fearing, that if it were taken either by assault or by famine, Cassius would put all the inhabitants to the sword, as Brutus had lately done at Xanthus, privately opened the gates to him, and put him in possession of the town, which he nevertheless treated as if it had been taken by assault. He commanded fifty of the chief citizens, who were suspected to favour the adverse party, to be brought before him, and sentenced them all to die; others, to the number of twenty-five, who had commanded the fleet or army, because they did not appear when summoned, he proscribed. Having thus punished such as had either acted or spoke against him or his party, he commanded the Rhodians to deliver up to him all their ships, and whatever money they had in the public treasure. He then plundered the temples, stripping them of all their valuable furniture, vessels, and statues. He is said not to have left one statue in the whole city, except that of the sun, bragging, at his departure, that he had stript the Rhodians of all they had, leaving them nothing but the sun. As to private persons, he commanded them, under severe penalties, to bring to him all the gold and silver they had, promising, by a public cryer a tenth part to such as should discover any hidden treasures. The Rhodians at first concealed ſome part of their wealth, imagining, that Caſſius intended by this proclamation only to terrify them; but when they found that he was in earneſt, and ſaw ſeveral wealthy citizens put to death for concealing only a ſmall portion of their riches, they deſired, that the time prefixed for the bringing in of their gold and ſilver might be prolonged. Caſſius willingly granted them their requeſt, and then through fear they dug up what they had hid under ground, and laid at his feet all they were worth in the world. By this means he extorted from private perſons above eight thouſand talents. He then fined the city in five hundred more, and leaving L. Varus there with a ſtrong gariſon to exact the fine without any abatement, he returned to the continent [z].

AFTER the death of Caſſius, Marc Anthony reſtored the Rhodians to their antient rights and privileges, beſtowing upon them the iſland of Andros, Naxos, Tenos, and the city of Myndus. But theſe the Rhodians ſo oppreſſed and loaded with taxes, that the ſame Anthony, tho' a great friend to the Rhodian republic, was obliged to diveſt her of the ſovereignty over thoſe places, which he had a little before ſo liberally beſtowed upon her [a]. From this time, to the reign of the emperor Claudius, we find no mention made of the Rhodians. That prince, as Dion informs us [b], deprived them of their liberty, for having crucified ſome Roman citizens. However, he ſoon reſtored them to their former condition, as we read in Suetonius [c] and Tacitus [d]. The latter adds, that they had been as often deprived of, as reſtored to, their liberty, by way of puniſhment, or reward, for their different behaviour, as they had obliged the Romans with their aſſiſtance in foreign wars, or provoked them with their ſeditions at home. Pliny, who wrote in the beginning of Veſpaſian's reign, ſtiles Rhodes a beautiful and free town. But this liberty they did not long enjoy, the iſland being ſoon after reduced by the ſame Veſpaſian to a Roman province, and obliged to pay a yearly tribute to their new maſters [e]. This province was called the province of the iſlands. The Roman prætor, who governed it, reſided at Rhodes, as chief city under his juriſdiction; and Rome notwithſtanding the eminent ſervices rendered her

SECT. IV.

The Hiſtory of Crete.

Names. THE iſland of Crete, now called Candia from its capital, was known to the antients by the names of Aeria, Chthonia, Idæa, Curete, Macaris, &c. It is one of the largeſt iſlands in the Mediterranean, being, according to Strabo [f], 287 miles in length; according to Pliny [g], 270 and, according to Scylax, 312. As to its breadth, it is not, as Pliny obſerves [h], above 55, where wideſt. Whence it was ſtiled, as Stephanus informs, the Long Iſland. It lies between the Archipelago to the north; the African ſea to the ſouth; the Carpathian to the eaſt; and the Ionian to the weſt. The name of Crete, which generally prevailed among the antients, ſome derive from Curetes, who are ſaid to have been the firſt inhabitants of the iſland; others from the nymph Crete daughter of Heſparus, or from Cretus the ſon of Jupiter, who is ſuppoſed to have reigned here (I).

This

[f] Strabo, l. 10. [g] Plin. l. 4. c. 12, [h] Idem ibid.

(I) Euſebius, St. Hierom, Marcianus, Iſidorus, and Cedrenu derive the name of Crete from Cres, one of the Curetes, wh brought up Jupiter, Diodorus Siculus ſays it was called Crete fro Crete the daughter of one of the Curetes, whom Jupiter married giving her name to the iſland, which before was named Idæa (86) It is at preſent known by the name of Candia, which Moroſi (87) derives from the Latin word Candidus, ſignify white, ſuc being the colour of its ſoil. Others derive the name of Cand from Chandax, which, in the language of the Saracens, ſignifie as Scylitzas informs us (88), an intrenchment. The Saracens bui a town, as we read in the ſame author, in the place, where, b the advice of aGreek Monk, they had intrenched themſelves in t time of the emperor Michael ſurnamed the Stammerer. Climate, ſoil, &c.

THIS iſland, as lying between the 34th and 35th degrees of north latitude, was, in antient times, greatly celebrated for its fertility. It abounded in all ſorts of grain, its plains being covered with a deep rich ſoil, and plentifully watered by ſmall rivers. The fruits it produced infinitely ſurpaſſed, as Pliny obſerved, all of the ſame kind that were produced in other countries [i]. The wines of this iſland are greatly commended both by the antient and modern writers. Tho' they are, generally ſpeaking, pretty ſtrong, yet Galen met with a ſort in this place, which was temperate enough to be given in fevers [k]. The air was antiently deemed moſt pure and wholeſome, and is to this day, tho' great part of the country lies uncultivated; a misfortune too common in ſuch regions as groan under the Mohammedan yoke. From the fruitfulneſs of its ſoil and purity of its air it had the appellation of Macaris, or the fortunate iſland.

Cities.

IN former times there were reckoned in this iſland an hundred cities, ninety before the Trojan war, and ten more after the Dorians ſettled here; and hence ſprung the name of Hecatompolis. Of theſe hundred cities forty only were remaining in the time of Ptolemy, for ſo many he enumerates. Thoſe of moſt note were, Gnoſſius, antiently called Ceratus, where king Minos is ſaid to have fixed his reſidence. This city was once the capital of the iſland, and, according to Strabo [l], a wealthy and populous place, being thirty furlongs in compaſs, and full of inhabitants. The ſaid writer places it twenty furlongs off the Ægean or Archipelago, and ninety from the African ſea. Some of our modern travellers think it ſtood near the preſent town of Caſtel Pediada; while others pretend to diſcover ſome of its ruins at a ſmall diſtance from the village of Cynoſa. From this city Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, ſo much celebrated by the poets, had the name of Gnoſſis. The river Ceratus waſhed its walls; whence it is by ſome antient writers called by the ſame name. Cydonia ſtood, according to Strabo [m], Pliny [n], and Diodorus Siculus [o], on the coaſt oppoſite to the Lacædemonian territories in Peloponneſus, and was the moſt powerful and wealthy city of all Crete, ſince town they called Chandax, that is, intrenchment, in proceſs of time the name of Chandax was changed into that of Candia, which became common to the city and iſland.

in the civil wars of that iſland, it withſtood the united forces of Gnoſſus and Gortyna, after they had reduced the greater part of the iſland. Cydonia was deemed the ſtrongeſt place in the whole iſland. It had been often beſieged, but never taken till the time of Metellus, to whom that glory was reſerved, Cydonia opening its gates to him after the defeat of Laſthenes and Panares [p]. This city was the moſt antient in the whole iſland, moſt of the others having been built and peopled by Cydonian colonies: and on this account it was commonly called by the Greeks, the Mother of cities. From Cydonia the quince tree was firſt brought into Italy, and thence the fruit called by the Latins, malum Cydonium, or the Cydonian apple. Gortyna or Gortyn, an inland city, being according to Strabo [q], near ninety furlongs diſtant from the African ſea. The origin of Gortyna is as obſcure as that of moſt of the antient cities, ſome telling us, that it was founded by Gortyn the ſon of Radamanthus, and others aſcribing that glory to Taurus, who carried off Europa [r]. Be that as it will, Gortyna, in proceſs of time, eclipſed all the other cities of Crete, eſpecially after the iſland was reduced by the Romans, who made it their chief buſineſs to humble Gnoſſus, and raiſe, as it were upon her ruins, her rival Gortyna [s]. We may judge of the antient ſplendor and greatneſs of this city from its ruins, which are ſtill to be ſeen about ſix miles from mount Ida, at the entrance of the plain of Meſſaria, which is properly the granary of the iſland. Among theſe ruins Tournefort [t] obſerved one of the gates, which is an arch finely turned, ſtill remaining, with part of the wall joining to it, which he takes to be the wall that Ptolemy Philopater is ſaid by Strabo [u] to have built. Not far from the gate are two pillars of granate eighteen foot long, and near them divers pedeſtals ranged two by two, on the ſame line, for ſupporting the columns of the frontiſpiece of ſome temple. Among the many columns ſtill remaining, there are ſome of granate, fluted ſpirally, and wonderfully beautiful. Many of them having been carried away by the Turks. Our author obſerved at a village, not far diſtant from theſe ruins, two columns of an extraordinary beauty, with a hurdle between them, ſerving as a gate to a garden. The inhabitants are unacquainted with the value of theſe remains of antiquity. Few ſtatues are to be met with with, the Venetians, who were long maſters of the iſland, having tranſported the beſt part of them to Venice. The ſtatue, which ſtands on the fountain of Candia, and is deemed a maſter-piece, was found among theſe ruins; but is at preſent without a head, the Turks having a ſuperſtitious abhorrence to the repreſentation of the heads of living creatures, except upon coins, of which no people are more fond. Gortyna was in antient times famous for the temples of Apollo, Diana, and Jupiter Hecatombæus, ſo called, if we believe Ptolemæus Hepheſtion as quoted by Photius [w], becauſe Menelaus there ſacrificed to Jupiter an hundred oxen, when news was brought him of Helena's flight. At the further end of the ruins between the north and weſt, near a brook, without all doubt the river Lethe, which, as Strabo informs us, waſhed the walls of Gortyna [x], are to be ſeen ſome curious ruins with a piece of painting half effaced, but quite of the Gothic taſte. Theſe ruins are the remains of ſome antient church, which the modern Greeks would make us believe to have been built by Titus, to whom St. Paul wrote one of his epiſtles, and who was the firſt biſhop of Crete. Theophraſtus [y], Varro [z], and Pliny [a] ſpeak of a plain-tree near Gortyna which never ſhed its old leaves till new ones ſprouted forth. This ſeemed ſo ſtrange to the antient Greeks, that they feigned the firſt converſation between Jupiter and Europa to have happened under this ever-green plane-tree; and this fabulous adventure probably gave occaſion to the inhabitants of Gortyna to repreſent on a medal Europa ſitting melancholy and thoughtful on a plane-tree, and turning her back to an eagle hovering about her. On the reverſe is Europa, ſitting on a bull, encompaſs'd with a border of bay-leaves [b]. Pliny [c] tells us, that endeavours were uſed to multiply in the iſland this ſpecies of plane-tree, but to no effect, ſince they ſhed their leaves, when tranſplanted, in winter like the common plane-trees. Lychus was in antient times a city of no ſmall note, and originally a colony of the Lacedæmonians, as Polybius informs us [d]. It was an inland town, and is ſuppoſed to have ſtood where we now find Paleo Caſtro. Some place it near the preſent town of Auguſtini, and others pretend to diſcover ſome of its ruins near Girapietra. Hierapytna, called alſo Cyrrha, Pytna, and Camyros, is ſuppoſed to be the ſame place that Ptolemy calls Hiera Petra, or the ſacred rock. Strabo tells us, us, that it ſtood on a hill, which he calls Pytna, and ſuppoſes to have been a part of mount Ida. The ruins of this city are ſtill to be ſeen on the coaſt over-againſt the rocks called by the antients the Iſles of Aſſes [c]. Hierapytna was one of the ſtrongeſt places in the iſland, when Metellus undertook the conqueſt of Crete, but is at preſent only a village, known by the name of Girapietra. Eleuthera, called alſo Saorus and Aorus, was an inland city, and in the Roman times a place well peopled and of great ſtrength. Rithymna, Heraclea, Prœſos, Apteron, and Arcadia were in antient times cities of no ſmall note. Rithymna, now Retimo, is ſtill a place well peopled, and had formerly a very convenient haven, which is now utterly neglected. Heraclea ſtood, according to Pliny [f], oppoſite to the iſland of Via, or, as others will have it, Dia. It was the ſea port of the Gnoſſians, and is ſuppoſed to have ſtood on the ſame ſpot where the town of Candia, which gave name to the whole iſland, was built in after ages. Prœſos was the capital of the Eteocrates, mentioned by Homer, and famous for a temple conſecrated to Jupiter Dictæus. In the civil wars of the iſland it was razed by the inhabitants of Hieropytna. Apteron was in Ptolemy's time a very conſiderable place, and ſtood on a ſteep rock, at the foot of which, between the town and the ſea, lay that famous field, where the Syrens, being overcome by the Muſes in a trial of ſkill in muſic, forfeited their wings. From this fable ſome writers tell us [g], that the city took its name, the word Apteron ſignifying without wings. Euſebius ſays it was ſo called from one Apteras king of Crete, whom he ſuppoſes to have been the founder of it [h]. There are ſome ruins of this antient city ſtill to be ſeen, but nothing that deſerves particular notice. Arcadia is mentioned by Ptolemy, Theophraſtus, Seneca, Pliny, &c. they all tell us, that this town being once deſtroyed, all the ſprings in that neighbourhood dried up, and began again to run as ſoon as the city was rebuilt. Theſe were the moſt conſiderable cities of Crete in antient times.

Mountains. The chief mountains of Crete are, Ida, ſo much ſpoke of by the poets, and by many degrees the higheſt of the whole iſland. From the top of this mountain both ſeas are clearly diſcern'd; in all other reſpects it is inferior to the other

other hills of the country, being for the greateſt part of the year covered with ſnow, and ſo barren, that it produces nothing except the Tragacantha, a ſhrub ſo prickly, that the Greeks gave it the name of Goats Thorn. Theophraſtus [i] and Pliny [k] ſpeak of a ſort of vine growing here naturally; but our modern travellers have not been able to diſcover any ſuch thing. Theophraſtus advances many things upon the report of others, and Pliny frequently copies, or rather tranſlates, what he finds in Theophraſtus, without troubling himſelf with any further enquiries. It was called Ida from the fine proſpect it affords, the word Idein ſignifying in the Greek tongue to ſee [l]. Nay, Suidas tells us, that all places, whence a great extent of country could be ſeen, were called Idæ. Jupiter is ſaid to have been ſecretly nurſed here, and thence called Idæus. Some of the antients tell us, that the foreſts on this mountain being burnt by lightning, about ſeventy-three years after the deluge of Deucalion, the art of melting iron was firſt diſcovered on that occaſion by the Dactyli [m]. Ida is now known by the name of Pſiloriti. Dicte, now called Sethia, and alſo Laſthi, is next in heighth to mount Ida, and covered great part of the year with ſnow, whence it is called by Strabo, Pliny, and Ptolemy, the white mountain. However, cypreſs trees, as the ſame writers aſſure us, grew there antiently amidſt the ſnow, and throve as well as in the vallies. This mountain was called Dicte from Dictynna, a nymph of Crete, who is ſuppoſed to have firſt found out hunting-nets, and to have had the name of Dictynna from thence, having been called before Britomartis. Leuci, a long chain of mountains, ſo called from their whiteneſs, being like the others covered great part of the year with ſnow. They are now known by the names of Madura and Spacia.

Rivers. RIVERS of note in this iſland are but very few; the Nilopotamus, the Scaſinus, and the Epicidnus are ſpoke of by the antients, but none of them are at preſent navigable. This defect is ſufficiently ſupplied by a great many creeks and bays, and ſome capacious and ſafe harbours. Near mount Ida the preſent inhabitants pretend to ſhew ſome remains of the antient labyrinth made by Dædalus; but Bellonius takes this labyrinth to be nothing but an antient quarry, out of which were dug the ſtones that ſerved to build the towns of Gortyna and Gnoſſus. And indeed Pliny tells us, that in his time no footſteps of the antient labyrinth were to be ſeen in the iſland.

Inhabitants. THE firſt inhabitants of Crete, according to Diodorus Siculus, were the Idæi Dactyli who inhabited mount Ida: they were, as ſome authors write, a hundred in number; according to others only ten, being called Dactyli, as they Idæi Dactyli. ſuppoſe, from the ten fingers, to which they were equal in number. The Idæi Dactyli were, if we believe, Ephorus as quoted by Diodorus, originally from mount Ida in Phrygia, and paſſed from thence over into Europe with King Minos. They ſettled firſt in Samothrace, where they taught the inhabitants ſacred and religious rites, inſtituted ſacrifices, and introduced a ſet form of religious worſhip. Orpheus who was naturally inclined to muſic and poetry, is thought to have been their diſciple, and the firſt who carried ſacred rites and ceremonies over into Greece. The Dactyli are likewiſe ſaid to have firſt found out the uſe of fire, and to have diſcovered the nature of iron and braſs to the inhabitants of the country adjoining to mount Berecynthus, and to have taught them the way of working them. For this and many other uſeful diſcoveries they were after their death worſhipped as gods. One of them, they ſay, Hercules, who inſtituted the Olympic games, which were was called by poſterity thought to have been appointed by Hercules the ſon of Alcmena.

Curetes. NEXT to the Idæi Dactyli were the nine Curetes, ſome of them ſuppoſed to have ſprung from the earth, and others to be deſcended from the Idæi Dactyli: Theſe dwelt on the mountains, under the ſhade of thick trees, and in caves and other places, which naturally afforded them a ſhelter and covering, the building of houſes not being then found out. They were very ingenious, and invented many things that proved very uſeful to mankind: they firſt taught how to manage flocks, to gather honey, to tame horſes, to hunt, to caſt darts, &c. They brought men into ſocieties and communities, and ſhewed them by their example the happineſs of a peaceable and orderly life. They are likewiſe ſaid to have invented ſwords and helmets, and dancing in armour, and by the noiſe they made to have prevented Saturn from hearing the cries of Jupiter when he was an infant, and by that means to have ſaved him from being deſtroy'd by his father.

THE Titans were contemporary with the Curetes, and dwelt in the country where the city of Gnoſſus was built many ages after. The Titans were in number ſix men and five women, the off-ſpring, as ſome ſay, of Uranus and Terra; according to others, of one of the Curetes and Titæa, being called Titans after the name of their mother. The ſons were Cronus or Saturn, Hyperion, Cœus, Iapetus, Crius, and Oceanus; the daughters Rhea, Themis, Mnemoſyne, Phœbe, and Thetis. Each of theſe invented ſomething of great uſe to mankind, and were on that account placed among the gods. Saturn the eldeſt obtained the kingdom of Crete, and brought his ſubjects from a wild and barbarous to a more polite courſe of life, perſuading them to live according to the ſtricteſt rules of honeſty, which gave occaſion to the many fables of the poets concerning the golden age. Hyperion was the firſt who found out the motions of the ſun and moon and other ſtars, meaſuring by them the ſeaſons of the year; and hence he was called the father of the planets. Latona was the daughter of Cœus and Phœbe, and Prometheus, ſo famous among the poets, the ſon of Iapetus: he is ſaid to have found out the way of ſtriking fire out of flint, which gave occaſion to the poets to feign that he ſtole fire from the gods, and beſtowed it upon men. Mnemoſyne invented many things conducing to the help of man's memory, whence ſhe had her name, Mnemoſyne ſignifying in Greek memory. Themis taught the art of divination, inſtructed men in holy rites, and preſcribed laws for the worſhip of the gods, and for the preſervation of peace and good government amongſt men. Veſta, Ceres, Juno, Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto are ſuppoſed to have been the children of Saturn and Rhea. Veſta invented the building of houſes, Ceres the uſe of corn, Neptune the art of navigation, and Pluto funeral ſolemnities. Hence the latter was ſtiled king of the infernal ſhades, and the former prince of the ſea [n]. The Titans.

THE Curetes, mentioned here by Diodorus, were, according to Herodotus [o] and Strabo [p], originally Phœnicians, and accompanied Cadmus out of Phœnicia, ſome of them ſettling in Phrygia, where they were called Corybantes, ſome in Crete, where they were known by the name of Idæi Dactyli, ſome in Rhodes, where they bore the name of Telchines, &c. Clemens Alexandrinus calls the

the Idæi Dactyli barbarians, that is strangers, and tells us, that they were the first who brought letters into Greece, Phrygia, and Crete; and adds, that by their assistance king Minos built a fleet, and gained the sovereignty of the sea [q]. According to these authors the Curetes and Idæi Dactyli were one and the same people, and did not settle in Crete till the time of Minos. Bochart brings the Curetes from Palestine, induced thereunto by the likeness there is between their name and that of the Crethim or Cerethites, a people among the Philistines [r]. The Philistines indeed conquered Sidon, and it is not unlikely, that some of them, mixed with the Phœnicians, attended Cadmus into Crete and Greece. But long before they settled in Crete, a colony of Pelasgians had peopled the eastern coast of the island. After the Pelasgians, Teutamus, the grandfather of Minos, carried thither a colony of Dorians from Laconia and the territory of Olympia in Peloponnesus. These several colonies spoke different languages, and lived quietly in caves and huts on the spontaneous product of the earth, till the invention of tools in the reign of Asterius the son of Teutamus. They were at last reduced into one kingdom, and became one people in the reign of Minos, who was their first lawgiver, built many towns, and introduced plowing and sowing. According to this account, which is vouched by Strabo, Lucian, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, the two first kings of Crete, who reigned after the coming of the Curetes, were Asterius and Minos: Europa was wife to Asterius and mother of Minos, and the Idæi Dactyli came with her and her brother Alymnus into Crete, where they dwelt in the Idæan cave, and there educated Jupiter; so that Asterius, Europa, and Minos must be the Saturn, Rhea, and Jupiter of the Cretans. Minos is usually called the son of Jupiter; but the Phœnicians, as Sir Isaac Newton observes [s], upon their first coming into Greece, gave the name of Jaopater or Jupiter to all kings; and thus both Minos and his father Asterius were Jupiters, that is, kings. Minos, according to Echemenes as quoted by Athenæus [t], was the Jupiter who became so famous among the Greeks for justice and equity, being the greatest king of Greece in those days, and the only legislator. Plutarch tells us [u], that the inhabitants of Naxus

Naxus pretended, that there were two Minoſes and two Ariadnes, and that the firſt Ariadne married Bacchus, and the laſt was carried away by Theſeus. But Homer, Heſiod, Thucydides, Herodotus, and Strabo knew but of one Minos, whom Homer calls the ſon of Jupiter and Europa, the brother of Rhadamanthus and Sarpedon, the father of Deucalion the Argonaut, and grandfather of Idomeneus, who went to the ſiege of Troy. Herodotus [w] makes Minos and Rhadamanthus the ſons of Europa, and contemporary with Ægeus. Apollodorus [x] and Hyginus [y] tell us, that Minos, the father of Androgeus, Ariadne, and Phædra, was the ſon of Jupiter and Europa, and brother to Rhadamanthus and Sarpedon.

In the reign of Minos, Rhadamanthus the king's brother carried ſeveral colonies into the neighbouring iſlands, which he beſtowed upon the commanders of his army: The iſland of Lemnos he gave to one Thoas or Theins, who, as he was a diſciple of the Idæi Dactyli, and conſequently a worker in metals, is ſuppoſed, by Apollodorus, Suidas, and Apollonius Rhodius, to be the Vulcan of the Greeks. The iſlands of Carpathus, Syme, and moſt of the Cyclades were peopled by colonies from Crete, Rhadamanthus having rewarded the ſervices of his officers, as Diodorus informs us [z], by veſting them with the ſovereignty of the neighbouring iſlands, which gave riſe to innumerable petty kingdoms. The Cretans did not only people the neighbouring iſlands, but ſent colonies into Greece, Italy, Sicily, Troas, &c. The cities of Delphos in Phocis, Miletus in Ionia, and many in Iapygia having been founded by them. The Trojans, if we believe the moſt antient writers, were originally Cretans; as were alſo the Meſſapii in Italy, and the inhabitants of ſome of the iſlands of Arabia, &c.

Government. As to the government of the Cretans, it is agreed on all hands that it was at firſt monarchical; but there is a great diſagreement among authors about the beginning of the Cretan kingdom. Diodorus Siculus ſuppoſes Teſtamus to have been the firſt who reigned in that iſland. But Euſebius ſpeaks of one Cretes, who gave his name to the iſland, and reigned, according to him, four hundred years before Teſtamus. From Cretes to Cydon he reckons three hundred years, years, from Cydon to Apteras sixty-three, and from Apteras to Lapithas forty. This opinion, which is also followed by Clemens Alexandrinus and most of the antient chronologers, is agreeable to what we read in Pausanias, who mentions several kings reigning before Tectamus, and among the rest Cretes, Vulcan, and Rhadamanthus. Lactantius and Berosus add to these Milinus and Melisseus, whom they suppose to have reigned before the arrival of the Pelasgians or Dorians. Before we give an account of the reigns of these kings, we shall subjoin a list of them as we find it transmitted to us by Eusebius, Lactantius, and Berosus.

(K) As we have followed chiefly Eusebius and Lactantius in this series, we shall insert here a succinct account of the Cretan kings, according to the order we find them placed in by other writers. The first who reigned in Crete, according to Diodorus Siculus, was Jupiter, the first of that name. He married one Idea, who imparted her name to the whole island, and had by her a son named Cres, who was one of the Curetes, and succeeded his father in the kingdom (89). The Curetes were, according to Euripides (90), all sons of this Jupiter, whence they are stiled by him Diogenitores, or the children of Jupiter. Cres, who reigned after his father Jupiter, was according to Eusebius contemporary with Abraham and his son Isaac (91): From him, if we believe Isidorus (92), the island was called Crete. Cres was succeeded by Ammon, who had married his daughter Crete. Ammon first reigned in Lybia, where he married Rhea, the daughter of Cœlus and sister of Saturn. Rhea, falling out with her husband abandoned abandoned him, and married her brother Saturn, who, with the other Titans his brothers, made war upon Ammon, but were by him overthrown in battle. Afterwards Ammon leaving Libya, where he was greatly ſtraitened for want of corn, paſſed over into Crete, and there married the daughter of Cres, and in right of his wife, after the death of his father-in-law, took poſſeſſion of the iſland, changing the name of Idea into that of Crete, which was the name of his wife. The Titans purſued him into Crete, and there, tho' formerly conquered, renewed the war. But in the mean time Bacchus, returning victorious from India, joined Ammon, and with the aſſiſtance of ſome Egyptian forces utterly defeated and entirely aboliſhed the race of the Titans (93). Meliſſeus, according to Hyginus, ſucceeded Ammon. Jupiter, ſurnamed the great, was born in his reign, and brought up by his two daughters Amalthea and Meliſſe, who nouriſhed him with goats milk and honey. Upon the death of Ammon and Bacchus, Jupiter made himſelf maſter of the iſland of Crete, and by degrees extended his dominions to the confines of the world. Cydon reigned many years after; the names of the intermediate kings, who according to Diodorus were many, have not reached us. Cydon, as Athenæus informs us, had a daughter, by name Eulimene, famous for her beauty, and courted by all the chief men of the iſland; but her father was commanded by the oracle to ſacrifice her to the manes of the deceaſed heroes of the iſland, which he did accordingly. Pauſanias (94) and Stephanus make mention of another king bearing this name, who was the ſon of Mercury and Acacallis, who reigned many years after. Cydon was ſucceeded by Apterus or Apteras, to whom Eulimene had been betrothed. Euſebius ſays, that he began his reign in the eighth year of Moſes, and ſixty years after Cydon had begun his. Lapes, called by Euſebius Lapithas, began to reign, according to that writer, about the ninth year of Joſhua. He was ſucceeded, as Diodorus tells us, by Teutamus the ſon of Dorus, who arriving in Crete with a colony of Æolians and Pelaſgians ſettled there, and was for his eminent qualities raiſed to the throne (95). Aſterius, the ſon of Lapes, came to the throne, vacant by the death of his father. He married Europa the daughter of Agenor, whom Jupiter had carried over from Sarepta, a city of Phœnice, into Crete. Aſterius, having no children by her, adopted the three

Names of the Cretan kings Cres.

Cres was, according to Euſebius [a], the firſt who reigned in Crete. He is alſo mentioned by Clemens [b], Cedrenus [c], and Euſtathius [d]. The latter ſuppoſes him to be the ſon of Jupiter; wherein he is contradicted by all the antient as well as modern writers. Talus and Vulcan are only mentioned by ſons of Jupiter, viz. Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. Minos ſucceeded him in the kingdom, and had by his wife Iphone, the daughter of Lyctius, a ſon called Lycaſtes, who, upon the death of his father, was raiſed to the throne. Lycaſtes built the city of Lycaſtos, and dying left the kingdom to Minos, the ſecond of that name, whom he had by Ida, the daughter of Corybas. Minos, being aſſumed to the throne, equipped a mighty fleet, and made himſelf maſter of the Cyclades, which he beſtowed upon his brothers, after having driven out the Carians, who then held moſt of thoſe iſlands. This is the Minos, according to Diodorus and Thucydides, who made war upon the Athenians, for having put to death his ſon Androgeus (96). Minos had by his wife Paſiphae four ſons, Deucalion, Catreus, Androgeus, and Glaucus. Deucalion ſucceeded his father, and was ſucceeded by his brother Catreus, whom Euſebius names Creteus. Deucalion lived ſome time in Attica, and is ſuppoſed to have died there; for Pauſanias (67) tells us, that his tomb was ſtill to be ſeen in his time at Athens, near the temple of Jupiter Olympius. Catreus was killed thro' miſtake by his own ſon Althemenes, who, thereupon laying violent hands on himſelf, left the kingdom to Idomeneus the ſon of Deucalion, and Meriones the ſon of Molus. Molus was, according to Apollodorus, the ſon of Deucalion, according to Diodorus, the ſon of Minos and brother of Deucalion. Idomeneus and Meriones aſſiſted the Greeks in the Trojan war with a ſquadron of fourſcore ſhips. The former is mentioned by Homer, and commended as very expert at the bow (98). They were both after their death worſhipped by the Cretans as heroes or demi-gods. Virgil ſays (99), that Idomeneus was driven out of his kingdom after his return from Troy, but does not tell us by whom or on what account. Such is the ſucceſſion of the Cretan kings according to Apollodorus and Diodorus Siculus; but the accounts, which they give us of theſe princes, are ſo interwoven with fables, that it is almoſt beneath the dignity of hiſtory to take notice of them.

by Pausanias as reigning in Crete. This cannot be the Vulcan whom our writers suppose to have reigned in Sicily or the island of Lemnos, and whose skill in discovering mines and preparing metals gave rise to the fable of the poets. Radamanthus, mentioned by Strabo [e] as the first legislator of the Cretans, is supposed by Apollodorus to have succeeded Vulcan, and to have been famous for his justice. Aristotle likewise speaks of him as the first who made laws for the Cretans [f]. Milinus, according to Berosus, reigned in Crete, and obtained the sovereignty of the sea, but was at last killed by the Lybian Hercules. Melisseus, if we believe Lactantius, was the first who introduced into the island of Crete the worship of the gods and religious ceremonies. The same author adds, that his daughters Amalthea and Melissa nourished Jupiter, when he was an infant, with goats milk, which gave rise to the poetical fables on this subject. His daughter Melissa he appointed priestess of Cybele the great mother of the gods; and as she was the first who was employed in this ministry, all the priestesses of that goddess were afterwards called Melissæ. This Jupiter, as Lactantius observes, was different from the famous Jupiter of the Greeks and Latins, tho' most authors confound them. Cydon succeeded his father Melisseus, and reigned, as we read in the chronology of Eusebius [g], about the time of Cecrops I. king of Athens. Apteras succeeded Cydon, and is said by the same Eusebius to have built a town. Lapithas, according to some writers furnamed Taurus and Jupiter, carried away Europa, the daughter of Agenor king of Sidon, which gave rise to the fable of Jupiter's transforming himself into a bull [h]. Eustathius and Cedrenus [i] tell us, that Lapithas built the city of Gortyna, that he took the city of Tyre, and after, having performed great feats both at home and abroad, died in Crete, where his monument was to be seen even in the time of Eusebius. Solinus, Theophilus Antiochenus [l], and St. Jerom [m] speak of Jupiter's sepulchre in Crete, which was in all likelihood the sepulchre of Lapithas furnamed Jupiter and Taurus, as we have observed above. Asterius, according to Apollodorus [n] and Eusebius [o], was brother to Lapithas, thas, succeeded him in the kingdom, and married his widow Europa. Asterius is also mentioned by Manetho, who makes him contemporary with Pandion king of Athens. Lapithas had by Europa three sons, Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon. As Asterius died without issue male, the three sons of Lapithas raised great disturbances in the kingdom, each of them aspiring to the crown and forming parties

Minos. against one another. At last Minos prevailed and banished his brothers. Rhadamanthus fled first into Lycia, and thence into Bœotia, where he married Alcmena the mother of Hercules, and settled at Haliartus [p]. Strabo and Pausanias distinguish two Rhadamanthuses, and likewise two Minoses. The famous Radamanthus, who was, according to the poets, judge of the infernal regions, was brother to Minos II. But the accounts, which the antients give us of these princes, are so perplexed and interwoven with fables, that it is impossible to come at the truth. Sarpedon, being defeated by his brother Minos, and driven out of the island with all those who sided with him, settled in Mylias; for that was the antient name of the country, which was afterwards called Lycia. He was there raised to the throne, and kindly entertained Lycus the son of Pandion, when he was obliged by his brother Ægeus to quit Athens. From Lycus the inhabitants of the country, called before his arrival Solymi, had the name of Lycians [q]. Minos had one son, by name

Evander. Evander, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and married

Sarpedon. Deidamia the daughter of Bellerophon, by whom she had a son named Sarpedon. Evander was succeeded by his son, who went to assist the Trojans, and distinguished himself in that war, but was killed at last by Patroclus. Most authors confound this Sarpedon king of Crete with the king of Lycia bearing the same name [r]. Sarpedon was succeeded by Lycastes, the natural son of Minos by Itone. Lycastes had by his wife Ida Minos II. the greatest king who had reigned in Crete, and much spoke of by the ancients, especially the poets. Diodorus, as we have hinted above, differs in his account of the Cretan kings from Pausanias, Pliny, Eusebius, Clemens Alexandrinus and most of the antient as well as modern historians and chronologers. According to him, Testamus, the son of Dorus and grandson of Deucalion, arriving in Crete with the Æolians and Pelasgians, reigned there there as king, and marrying the daughter of Cretheus had by her Aſterius, in whoſe reign Jupiter carried away Europa, and had by her three ſons, Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon. Aſterius afterwards married Europa, but having no children by her, adopted the ſons of Jupiter, and left the kingdom to them. Radamanthus gave laws to the Cretans, and Minos took upon him the government of the kingdom, married Itone the daughter of Lyctius, and had by her Lycaſtes, who coming to the crown married Ida the daughter of Corybantus, by whom he had a ſon called alſo Minos. This Minos was the firſt of the Grecians who Minos.

equipped a fleet, and gained the dominion of the ſea. He married Paſiphae the daughter of Sol and Cretes, and had by her Deucalion, Aſtræa, Androgeus, Ariadne, and ſeveral other children. Androgeus, in the reign of Ægeus king of Athens, went to that city to ſee the Panathenean ſolemnities, and on that occaſion contracted ſuch an intimacy with Pallas the king's brother and his fifty ſons, as raiſed no ſmall jealouſy in Ægeus, who began to fear, leſt Pallas, with the aſſiſtance of the Cretan king, ſhould deprive him of the crown, and place it on his own head. He therefore cauſed Androgeus to be privately murdered, which Minos no ſooner heard, than he proclaimed war againſt the Athenians. But finding all the attempts to revenge the death of his ſon prove unſucceſsful, he had recourſe to the gods, committing the revenge of ſuch an unjuſt and treacherous murder to them. Hereupon the Athenians were grievouſly afflicted with a peſtilence, famine, and ſeveral other plagues, and told by the oracle of Delphos, that they muſt not expect any relief till they were reconciled to Minos. The Cretan king, reſolved to make them pay dear for their deliverance, impoſed upon them a yearly tribute of ſeven boys and as many girls, whom he condemned to be devoured by the Minotaur, during the ſpace of ſeven, or according to others of nine, years. Minos had already for three years ſucceſſively exacted this bloody tribute, when Theſeus, after having performed many glorious exploits, willingly offered himſelf to be one of the unhappy victims; and accordingly, ſailing with the reſt to Crete, there killed the Minotaur, and delivered his country from the bloody Cretan tribute, as we have related at length elſewhere [a]. The Minotaur is feigned by the poets to have been half man half bull, and begot by a The Minotaur.

bull upon Paſiphae the wife of Minos, by the contrivance of Dædalus. But, Servius [t] tells us, that Paſiphae falling in love with one Taurus, ſecretary to Minos, and privately carrying on with him a criminal converſation in the houſe of Dædalus, was brought to bed of two twin-brothers, one of which reſembled Minos and the other Taurus, and that this gave birth to the fable of the Minotaur. But of this fabulous monſter, ſo famous among the poets and ſome credulous hiſtorians, we have ſpoke already, in the hiſtory of the antient kingdom of the Athens, to which we refer the reader [u]. Minos highly incenſed againſt Dædalus, for being aſſiſtant to his queen Paſiphae in her unlawful amours, and hearing that he was fled into Sicily, and there entertained by Cocalus king of the Siculi, proclaimed war againſt that iſland, rigged out a mighty fleet, and ſetting ſail arrived on the coaſts of Agrigentum. The place where he landed his men was from him called Minoa, which name it retained to the time of Diodorus the hiſtorian [w]. Minos, on his arrival, ſent meſſengers to Cocalus, entreating him to deliver up Dædalus to juſtice, rather than to draw a war upon himſelf and his country. Hereupon, Minos and Cocalus came to an interview, wherein Cocalus having promiſed to do all Minos required of him, the latter truſting to the fair promiſes of that treacherous prince, was prevailed upon to go to his houſe without guards, where he was privately ſtifled in a bath. Cocalus delivered the body of the king to the Cretans, who had attended him in that expedition, giving out, that his death had been occaſioned by his ſlipping accidentally into the hot and ſcalding baths. His ſoldiers buried him with great pomp, and erected a magnificent monument to his memory, building near it a temple in honour of Venus, which was much reſorted to for many ages. In after-times, when Agrigentum was built, the bones of Minos were diſcovered, and ſent by Thero into Crete. The Cretans, who had followed Minos into Sicily, upon his death ſettled in that iſland, and built the city of Minoa, ſo called from Minos. In proceſs of time, they poſſeſſed themſelves of ſome places in the heart of the country, and built the city of Engyum. From Engyum they made frequent inroads into the neighbouring countries, and being ing reinforced with a new colony of Cretans, who were driven upon the coasts of Sicily, as they were returning home, under the conduct of Merion, after the destruction of Troy, they subdued many of the bordering states, and formed themselves into a republic, which was the most considerable in that part of the island [x].

Some writers, as we have observed above, acknowledged but one Minos; but others maintain, that there were two, and add, that they were both no less famous for the wise laws they published, than for the conquests they made. Be that as it will, the Minos we are here speaking of, was the father of Deucalion the Argonaut, the grandfather of Idomenes, and contemporary with Ægeus king of Athens; and this Minos was, according to Plato [y] and Aristotle [z], the author of the laws which are so highly commended by them, and which will not be improper to give some account of in this place. The main scope which Minos aimed at in the forming of his laws was, as Strabo informs us [a], to procure happiness for his subjects, by rendering them virtuous. To attain this end, he first banished idleness and luxury, the source, as he calls them, of all vice, from his dominions. He found means to keep all his subjects employed either at home or abroad, not suffering any, however distinguished above the rest, to lead an idle and indolent life; but obliging them either to serve in the army, or apply themselves to agriculture, which he brought into great reputation. In order to establish a kind of equality among his subjects, he decreed, that in each city the children should be brought up together, and early taught the same maxims, exercises, and arts. They were accustomed from their tender years to bear hunger and thirst, to suffer heat and cold, to walk over steep and rugged places, to skirmish with each other in small parties, and to exercise themselves in a kind of dance with their armour, which was afterwards called the Pyrric [b]. As Crete was a mountainous and uneven country, the youth were not taught here, as elsewhere, to ride or wear heavy armour, but to use their bow dexterously; and in this they far excelled all other nations in the world. One of Minos's institutions, which Aristotle greatly admires, mires, was, that all his ſubjects ſhould uſe the ſame diet, and frequently take their repaſts together, without any diſtinction between the poor and the rich. This, as Ariſtotle obſerves [c], introduced a kind of equality among all ranks of people, accuſtomed them to a frugal and ſober life, and cemented friendſhip and unity between them, by the uſual gaiety and mirth of the table. The public defrayed the charges of theſe meals, one part of the revenues of the ſtate being applied to the uſes of religion, and the ſalaries of the magiſtrates, and the reſt allotted for the public meals. After their repaſt, the old men diſcourſed of the actions and virtues of their anceſtors, and of ſuch as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves, either by their valour in war, or their wiſdom in peace; and the youth, who were preſent at theſe entertainments, were exhorted to propoſe theſe great perſons to themſelves, as their models for the forming of their manners and the regulation of their conduct. Another of Minos's, inſtitutions, which Plato admires the moſt [d], was, to inſpire early into the youth, a high reſpect for the maxims, cuſtoms, and laws of their own country, not ſuffering them to diſpute or call in queſtion the wiſdom of their conſtitution, but commanding them to look upon their laws as dictated by the gods themſelves. He had the ſame regard to the magiſtrates and aged perſons, whom he enjoined every one to honour in a peculiar manner; and that nothing might leſſen the reſpect due to their age, he ordained, that if any defects were obſerved in them, they ſhould never be mentioned in the preſence of the youth. A cuſtom eſtabliſhed by Minos in Crete, and, in after-ages, adopted by the Romans, gives us reaſon to believe, that even the ſlaves were better treated in Crete than any where elſe; for in the feaſts of Mercury the maſters waited on their ſlaves at table, and performed about them the ſame offices, which they received from them the reſt of the year. This was to put men in mind of the primitive world, in which all men were equal, and to ſignify to the maſters, that their ſervants were of the ſame condition with themſelves [e]. The laws of Minos were antiently in ſo great repute, that Lycurgus paſſed a conſiderable time in Crete, employing himſelf in the ſtudy of the Cretan conſtitution, and forming his laws upon upon the model of thoſe that then obtained in that iſland. Plato tells us, that Crete, under the government of ſo wiſe a prince, became the abode of virtue, probity, and juſtice, that the laws which he eſtabliſhed were ſo well founded on juſtice and equity, that they ſubſiſted in their full vigour even in his time, that is, above nine hundred years after they had been firſt publiſhed. It is true, the Cretans degenerated by degrees from their antient probity, and at length, by an intire change of manners, became the moſt vicious nation that was known either to the Greeks or Latins. Polybius writes [f], that the Cretans in his time were avaricious and ſelf-intereſted to ſuch a degree, as to think no lucre ſordid. Suidas and Callimachus [g] give them the character of lyars and impoſtors; and St. Paul quotes againſt them, as truth, the teſtimony of one of their own poets, perhaps Epimenides, who paints them in very diſgraceful colours. The impurity of their amours are but too well known, from the accounts given us of them by Strabo [h], Servius [i], and Athenæus [k]. But this change of manners, in whatever time it happened, does not affect the probity of the antient Cretans, nor leſſen the glory of their legiſlator. We cannot help adding here, that when we reflect on the juſtice, equity, and humanity of king Minos, and the high commendations which the moſt eminent and judicious writers among the antients have beſtowed upon him, we are inclined to believe thoſe authors miſtaken, who aſcribe to him the impoſing of that cruel tribute on the Athenians. Plato, Apollodorus, Strabo, Plutarch, Diodorus Siculus, &c. are indeed, of that opinion; but a learned modern proves with a great deal of erudition, that they were miſtaken, and confounded the legiſlator we are ſpeaking of with another Minos, who, to avenge the death of his ſon, made war upon the Athenians, and impoſed that bloody tribute, to which Theſeus put an end, by killing Taurus the king's general, and entirely defeating the troops under his command [l].

Minos was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Deucalion, who, renewing the antient alliance between the Cretans and Athenians, gave his ſiſter Phædra in marriage to Theſeus, by whom he had Acamentes and Demophon. Phædra is ſaid said to have fallen passionately in love with her son-in-law Hippolytus, and because he would not comply with her unlawful demands, to have accused him to her husband, as if he had attempted to ravish her. Hereupon Theseus, suspecting the truth of what she said, summoned Hippolytus to answer the accusation. But Phædra, fearing she should be discovered upon the trial of the cause, laid violent hands on herself [m]. Deucalion was, according to Hyginus, one of the Argonauts. Plutarch tells us out of Clidemus, that he was killed by Theseus at Gnossus in Crete [n]. After Deucalion reigned Creteus, or, as Diodorus and Pausanias call him, Catreus. He was brother to Deucalion, and son of Minos by Pasiphae, or, as others will have it, by Merope. Being told by the oracle, that he should be killed by his son Althemenes, he banished him his dominions. But, after some years, hearing that he had settled in the island of Rhodes, and being desirous to see him before he died, put to sea, and arriving with a few ships in the night, was taken by the inhabitants for a pirate, and, in the scuffle, accidentally killed by his own son [o]. Upon the death of Creteus, the kingdom fell to Idomeneus the son of Deucalion by Cleopatra. He assisted the Greeks at the siege of Troy with fourscore ships, and distinguished himself there, if we may believe the poets, in several single combats. After the destruction of that city, his ships being in great danger by a violent storm, he vowed to sacrifice, if he got safe home, the first person he met. It happened, that his eldest son came first out to meet him, whom he, pursuant to his vow, either did, or attempted to, sacrifice. Hereupon, his subjects refusing to receive him, he sailed into Italy, and built there the city of Petilia near Salentinum, a cape of Calabria [p] (L). (L) Joannes Tzezezes relates this in a quite different manner; for he tells us, that Idomeneus, on his departure from Troy, appointed one Leucos to govern the kingdom in his absence, promising to give him, on his return, his daughter Clisithere in marriage, and make him his heir. Leucos governed for some time with great justice and equity; but at last was prevailed upon by Nauplius

Cretenſis, was his ſecretary, as Euſtathius informs us [q]. This author is ſaid by Septimus, Cedrenus, Suidas, and Iſaacius Porphyrogenitus, to have wrote the hiſtory of the Trojan war in Greek, but with Phœnician letters. The book which now goes under the name of Dictys Cretenſis is a ſpurious piece. Upon the death or baniſhment of Idomeneus, Meriones, the ſon of Molus by Melphis and grand-ſon of Minos, was raiſed to the throne. He had attended Idomeneus to the Trojan war, and there ſignalized himſelf, as we read in Homer, Virgil, and the other antient poets. He died after a ſhort reign, and was buried in Crete, with great pomp, near the tomb of Idomeneus. The monuments of both theſe princes were ſtill to be ſeen in the time of Diodorus Siculus, not far from the city of Gnoſſus. On that of Idomeneus was the following inſcription, Idomeneus, who was born in Gnoſſus, lies in this tomb, and hard by J. Merion the ſon of Molus. They were both adored by the Cretans as demigods, and invoked in all the wars they undertook [r]. Many years after the death of Meriones or Merion, we find Etearchus reigning in Crete, and reſiding, not at Gnoſſus the ſeat of the former kings, but at Oaxes. The feats, and even the names, of the intermediate kings, are buried in oblivion. However, it is not improbable, that Etearchus was deſcended from Minos, and conſequently of the ſame family with the princes whoſe reigns we have hitherto deſcribed; ſince Suidas tells us, that the race of Minos enjoyed the ſovereignty of Crete to the deſtruction of that kingdom, that is, till monarchy gave way to a republican government. The family of Minos, tho' deprived of the ſovereign power, continued, even after that change, in great ſplendor, as Ttzetzes informs us [s]; and Suetonius tells us, that the emperor Sergius Galba pretended to be deſcended from Minos by the mother's ſide [t]. All we know of Etearchus, the laſt king of Crete, is, that, by the wicked contrivances and groundleſs calumnies of his queen, he Nauplius king of Eubœa to put to Death Meda the wife, and Cliſithere the daughter, of Idomeneus, and ſeize the kingdom for himſelf. Idomeneus finding, on his return, Leucos in poſſeſſion of the crown, attempted to drive out the uſurper, but was himſelf obliged to withdraw from the iſland, which was entirely addicted to Leucos, and ſeek a new ſettlement for himſelf and thoſe who had attended him to Troy.

he was so estranged from Chronima his daughter by his first wife, that he delivered her up to one Themison a merchant of Thera, enjoining him to drown her in the sea. Themison, tho' he had bound himself by an oath to do whatever Etearchus should command him, yet could not prevail upon himself to put this barbarous command in execution; having therefore, to comply with the obligation of his oath, let her down into the sea by a rope, he drew her up again unhurt, and carried her to Thera, his native country, where she was admitted among the concubines of Polymnestus, by whom she had Battus the founder of Cerene [r].

The republican government introduced.

MONARCHICAL government being abolished, in what manner, or on what account, we find no where recorded, the chief power was lodged in the senate, which was composed of thirty senators, and is called by Aristotle [s] the public council of the nation. In that assembly affairs of the greatest consequence were examined, and resolutions taken, which, however, were of no force till the people had confirmed them by their suffrages. Next in authority to the senate were the Cosmi, so called from the Greek word Cosmos, signifying order; these magistrates being appointed for the maintaining good order in the state. They had much the same power as the Ephori at Sparta, were ten in number, and chosen, like the Ephori, out of the body of the people, the meanest of the populace having an equal right to this dignity with the most illustrious families of the republic. They were, in a certain manner, the balance between the people and the senate, and a check upon both; for, without their approbation, no decree was of force. Out of their body the senators were chosen, none being admitted into the senate, who had not before given some proofs of their prudence, equity, and disinterestedness in the college of the Cosmi. In time of war they commanded the armies of the republic with an absolute and unbounded power; but were afterwards liable to be called to an account; whereas the senators were not accountable to any for their administration. In this condition continued the island of Crete for many ages. The inhabitants were ever at war among themselves, each city aspiring to the sovereignty of the whole island; but as the authors, who wrote the history of Crete, have not reached us, we are quite in the dark as to the particulars of those civil commotions. All we know is, that in the time of Philip the father of Perſes, the Gnoſſians and Gortynians had reduced all the other cities of the iſland, and divided their conqueſts; ſo that the Cretans were no longer free, but ſubject to one of theſe cities, and obliged to acknowledge their ſubjection by an annual tribute [t]. Theſe domeſtic troubles raged in Crete for many ages, and gave the inhabitants an opportunity of perfecting themſelves in all the arts of war; whence they were in ſuch repute among other nations, that moſt of the ſtates and princes then at war took care to have always in their armies ſome bodies of Cretan bowmen and ſlingers, the Cretans having been in all ages, as Pauſanias obſerves [u], remarkable for their ſkill and experience at the ſling and bow. They were a great help, as Xenophon informs us, in the retreat of the ten thouſand [w]. Many of Alexander's victories, if we believe Arrian, were owing to the Cretan auxiliaries [x]. Livy has not forgot the advantages which Eumenes and the conſul Manlius gained by means of the archers and ſlingers of Crete, the one over Antiochus, the other over the Gauls, in the famous battle fought near mount Olympus [y]. After the Romans once became acquainted with Crete, they employed the inhabitants in all their expeditions, keeping conſtantly in their pay numerous bodies of Cretan auxiliaries, which, generally ſpeaking, behaved with great gallantry. In the war of Antiochus, they entered into an alliance with Rome, having been induced thereunto by Eumenes king of Pergamus. But notwithſtanding the treaty of friendſhip ſubſiſting between the two republics, the Cretans entered into meaſures with other potentates, without conſulting the Roman ſenate. In the war which the Romans carried on againſt Mithridates, they were ſaid to maintain a private correſpondence with that prince, and likewiſe to have aſſiſted the pirates, who infeſted the Mediterranean, and committed great ravages on the coaſts of Italy itſelf. This gave the Romans a ſpecious pretence of enſlaving an iſland, which had, to that time, been free from all foreign ſubjection; but the true motive that prompted them to undertake take this war was, as Florus informs us [z], a deſire of conquering that iſland. The Romans, who were ſo fond of their own liberties, made it their chief buſineſs to deprive all other nations of theirs. This expedition being reſolved troops on, it fell to the lot of Q. Hortenſius to command the troops that were to be employed in it; but as he had ſpent his whole life in peaceable employments, and was altogether unqualified for military expeditions, he readily reſigned the command of the troops to his collegue Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who poſtponed ſetting ſail till the time of his conſulſhip was expired. In the mean time, the Cretans ſent an embaſſy to Rome, conſiſting of thirty of the moſt illuſtrious men of the iſland, who, by their earneſt ſolicitations and humble ſupplications, moved the ſenate to compaſſion; inſomuch, that they were ready to renew with them their antient treaties. But, P. Lentulus Spinther alone oppoſed the good-will of the ſenate towards the Cretans, by repreſenting, that Rome could never be miſtreſs of the ſeas, nor keep them clear of pirates, till Crete was reduced to the ſtate of a province. His oppoſition made the fathers change their minds, and ſo many and hard conditions were then demanded of the ſuppliants, that they choſe rather to maintain a war than comply with them. The embaſſadors being diſmiſſed, Metellus ſet ſail with three legions, and, arriving on the coaſt of Crete, landed his men without oppoſition. The Cretan republic was then governed by two chiefs, Laſthenes and Panares. The former had greatly contributed to the victory which the pirates had gained the year before over Antonius, and therefore not doubting but the Romans would make it a preliminary, that he ſhould be given up to their vengeance, encouraged the people to take up arms and raiſed forces in all parts of the iſland. In a ſhort time four and twenty thouſand men were armed and brought into the field. Metellus, in order to draw them to a battle, advanced towards Cydonia, at that time the capital of the iſland, as if he deſigned to beſiege it. Laſthenes to prevent the ſiege met the Roman general on his march, gave him battle, but was entirely defeated, and obliged to ſave himſelf by flight to Gnoſſus. Metellus, being maſter of the field, laid ſiege to Cydonia, which Panares after a faint defence delivered up to the conqueror, upon a promiſe that both he and the inhabitants ſhould be ſpared. From thence Metellus advanced to Gnoſſus, where Laſthenes had ſhut himſelf up. But the cowardly general, inſtead of putting the city in a condition to hold out a ſiege, ſet fire to it and retired. The city Lychus, though well fortified, ſurrendered as ſoon as the Roman army approached the walls. Thus Metellus in one campaign poſſeſſed himſelf of the beſt part of

of the iſland, though defended by the Cilician pirates as well as its own inhabitants [a].

THE next year early in the ſpring, Metellus took the field, and having defeated the united forces of the Cretans and Cilician pirates, drove the latter from the caſtles which they had built on the rocks near the ſea, and the former from moſt of their ſtrong holds in the center of the country. But as he treated both the inhabitants and the pirates with the utmoſt ſeverity, they ſent an embaſſy to Pompey, who had been lately appointed pro-conſul of the ſeas with an unbounded authority, entreating him to come and put the laſt hand to the reduction of Crete, and offering to ſurrender to him, without making the leaſt reſiſtance. Pompey, who was always ready to undertake the work of other generals, heard the embaſſadors with pleaſure, and promiſed to come and conclude an advantageous peace with them. Accordingly, having received hoſtages, he ſent from Pamphylia, where he then reſided, L. Octavius, one of his lieutenants, with orders to proclaim all over the iſland, that Pompey had the ſole right of making treaties in all the places of his pro-conſulate; and that Metellus had no right to aſſume the title of general in a country which was within the province the ſenate had given to Pompey [b]. This ſhameful claim of Pompey cauſed a kind of civil war in the iſland, the Romans diſputing with one another who ſhould give the laſt ſtroke to the Cretans. Octavius joined the pirates and people of the iſland to oppoſe Metellus's conqueſt; and he, on the other hand, not fearing the additional forces which Pompey had ſent againſt him, purſued his conqueſts with reſolution. He beſieged Eleuthera, and having gained over one of the chief citizens, who for ſeveral nights together poured down upon one of the towers ſo many barrels of vinegar as ſoftened it, made himſelf maſter of the town by beating it down. From Eleuthera he turned towards Lappa, a ſtrong city, which Octavius in perſon undertook to defend. But though Octavius made a vigorous defence, yet the place was at laſt taken by aſſault, and all the Cretans and Cilicians found in it put to the ſword. As for Octavius and the Romans, Metellus diſmiſſed them without their arms amidſt the hiſſes of his ſoldiers. Pompey therefore ſent new ſupplies to Octavius, and ordered Siſenna to ſail from the coaſt of Achaia to Crete. But, Siſenna dying ſoon after his arrival, Octavius took upon him the command of his troops, and in conjunction with the pirates and Cretans endeavoured to ſtop the career of Metellus's conqueſts. But that brave commander having taken Hierapytna, the ſtrongeſt place then in the iſland, obliged Octavius to ſave himſelf on board his ſhips, and abandon the iſland. Upon his departure Laſthenes and Panares laid down their arms, and all the inhabitants of the iſland ſubmitted to the yoke. Metellus changed their form of government, obliged them to live according to the laws of Rome, impoſed an annual tribute upon the whole iſland, and thereby reduced it to a Roman province, after it had enjoyed its liberties for a ſeries of many ages [c]. Oroſius tells us, that Metellus reduced the iſland in two years time [d]. But, Velleius Paterculus [e], Eutropius [f], and others write, that the Romans ſpent three whole years in that undertaking, haveing to do with men no leſs brave than themſelves. Metellus was honoured with a triumph, and the ſurname of Creticus or the Cretan, which Plutarch gives to Antonius the father of the famous Mark Anthony, who began indeed this expedition, but loſt in it both his fleet and his life.

The Hiſtory of Cyprus.

Names.

THE iſland which we are now to write of, was known to the antients by the following names; Acamis, Ceraſtis, Aſpalia, Amathus, Macaria, Cryptos, Colinia, Sphecia, Paphia, Salaminia, Æroſa, and finally Cyprus. It was called Acamis from one of its promontories, Amathus, Paphia, and Salaminia from three of its antient cities; Macaria from the fruitfulneſs of its ſoil; Æroſa from its copper mines; Colinia or Collinia from its many hills;

hills; Sphecia, from its antient inhabitants the Spheces; Ceraſtis from the many promontories which, like ſo many horns, as the Greek word intimates, ſhoot into the ſea. Whence it borrowed the name of Aſpalia, we know not; ſome etymologiſts have changed the name of Aſpalia into that of Aſperia, and pretend, that the iſland was ſo called from the unevenes of its ground: were we allowed in this manner to throw out, put in, and change, letters as we pleaſe, it would be no difficult matter to give etymologies. As to the name which it is now generally known by, ſome authors derive it from the Greek word Cryptos, ſignifying hidden, this iſland being often hid, ſay they, by the waves from the eye of the ſailor; others will have it called Cyprus from Cyrus, who is ſaid to have founded here the city of Aphrodiſia. But this etymology is ſtill worſe than the former, the iſland having been known by the name of Cyprus in Homer's time, that is, ſix hundred years before the birth of Cyrus. Iſidorus thinks it was called Cyprus, from a city of that name [g]. But the moſt common opinion is, that it borrowed its name from a ſhrub, called by the Greeks Cypros, which, though very ſcarce in other countries, grew here in great plenty. What kind of ſhrub this was is ſtill matter of diſpute among authors. With the flower of this ſhrub the antient inhabitants made a very ſweet oil, which is much commended by Pliny [h]. The name of Ceraſtis, as we have obſerved above, was given it from the great number of its promontories; and this appellation is founded on truth, no iſland, that we know of having more promonotories than Cyprus. On the weſt it has the promontories of Acamas, now Capo S. Piſano, Drepanum, now Trepano, Zephyrum, now Capo Calidoni or Punto Malota; on the ſouth, Phrurium, now Capo Bianco, Curias, or Capo delle Gatte, Gades, or Capo Chiti, Throni, or Capo Pila; on the eaſt, Pendalium, now Capo di Creco, Clides, now Capo di S. Andrea; on the north, Coronyon, now Capo Cronochitte, and beſides a great many others of leſs note. Androcles, as quoted by Tzetzes, tells us, that the iſland was antiently called Ceraſtis, becauſe inhabited by men with horns; which opinion has been followed by the poets, namely by Ovid [i].

Cities. THE cities of moſt note in Cyprus were, according to Ptolemy and Strabo [k], on the north ſide of the iſland;

The king followed his advice, and was ſo pleaſed with the new ſituation of his metropolis, that out of gratitude to Solon, who had given him ſuch good advice, he called it Solæ or Soli from his name [l]. Strabo takes notice of a famous temple

This city was in former times of ſo great note, that it gave the name of Lapithia to the neighbouring country. The two cities of Aphrodiſius and Carpaſia are likewiſe placed by Strabo and Ptolemy on the ſame coaſt, and mentioned by moſt of the antient geographers. Here

Tremitus is often mentioned by Sozomenus in the account he gives us of the miracles, which he ſuppoſes to have been wrought by the biſhop Spiridion, a native of that

On the eaſtern coaſt ſtood the following cities: Salamis, built by Teucer the ſon of Telamon, who being on his return from the ſiege of Troy, baniſhed by his father Telamon, for not revenging on Ulyſſes the death of his brother Ajax, retired to Cyprus, and there built a city, which he called Salamis after the name of his own country [n]. This city was in after-ages called Conſtantia, and ſome are of opinion that Famagoſta, the preſent metropolis of the iſland, was built on its ruins (M). On this ſide of the iſland, iſland, over-againſt the promontory called by Pliny Dinaretum, are the ſmall iſlands named Plides, two in number, according to Strabo, and three, according to Pliny. On the ſouth coaſt the antients place Throni, a town ſo called from the promontory on which it ſtood; Citium, the birth-place of Zeno the famous ſtoic. Here Cimon the Athenian died, after having reduced great part of the iſland [o]. Plutarch tells us, that he died at the ſiege of this place [p]; and Diodorus, that he took it before his death [q]. Joſephus is of opinion, that this city was built by Cittim the ſon of Javan, and from him called Citium, or, as Pliny will have it, Cetium. Malum, which was likewiſe taken by Cimon, as Diodorus informs us [r]. Ptolemæus Lagi ruined this city and tranſplanted the inhabitants to Paphus [s]. Amathus ſo called from his founder Amathus the ſon of Aerias. Tacitus tells us, that Cyprus was famous for three temples; one, and the moſt antient of all, was dedicated to Venus Paphia by Aerias, the next in point of antiquity was conſecrated to Venus Amathuſia by Amathus, the ſon of Aerias, and the third to Jupiter Salaminius by Teucer, the ſon of Telamon [t]. The city of Amathus, as moſt others in the iſland was conſecrated to Venus, as appears from Virgil [u] and the other antient poets. Ovid ſpeaks of copper mines in the neighbourhood of this city [w], and Pauſanis mentions a famous temple here, conſecrated to Venus and Adonis [x]. On the weſt ſide of the Greek cities in power and riches. Tacitus (1) ſpeaks of a magnificent temple built here in honour of Jupiter Salaminius, and Ammianus Marcellinus of three other temples dedicated to Pallas, Agraulos, and Diomedes. In that of Agraulos was yearly offered an human ſacrifice, till that cruel ceremony was aboliſhed by Diphilus king of Cyprus (2). Salamis in Cyprus is called by Lucan, Seneca, and Manilius, the other Salamis, to diſtinguiſh it from another city of the ſame name in an iſland adjacent to Eleuſis called alſo Salamis.

Palæpaphos. the island were the cities, Palæpaphos or Old Paphos, about ten furlongs from the shore. Here Venus is said to have first appeared after she was formed out of the froth of the sea; and hence the city was in a peculiar manner sacred to that goddess. The young women here used to prostitute themselves to such strangers as came ashore in order to raise money for their portions. About sixty furlongs Neapaphos. from Palæpaphos stood Neapaphos or New Paphos, built, according to Strabo [y], by Agapenor nephew to Lycurgus, and famous for its harbour and a stately temple dedicated to Venus. For both these cities were under the peculiar protection of Venus, whence they are often confounded by the antient writers, especially the poets. New Paphos was utterly ruined by an earthquake, but rebuilt by Augustus and thence called Augusta, a name which it did not long retain [z]. As to the inland towns, Ptolemy mentions only three, viz. Chybrus, Trimethus, and Tamassus or Tamascus, to which, Strabo adds, a fourth, viz. Limenia; but these were places of small note, though Ovid calls the territory of Tamascus, the most fruitful spot in Cyprus [a]. The copper, that was found in the mines adjoining to this city, was deemed the best in the world. The following cities are mentioned by Pliny, Diodorus Siculus, Pausanias, Stephanus, and others, but we are quite at a loss as to their situation, Cingria, Marium, Golgi, Epidarum, Cresium, Erysthea, Lacedæmonia, Tegessus, Mesina, Hyle, Tembro, Ledrum, or Leuteon. Diodorus tells us, that Marium was governed by a king of its own [b]. Golgi was a small but very antient town, for the Cyprians, as Pausanias informs us [c], worshipped Venus in the small town of Golgi, before Agapenor settled with his colony at Paphus. This city is mentioned by Catullus [d], Lycophron [e], and Theocritus [f], who spake of it as a place consecrated in a special manner to Venus.

Besides the cities we have mentioned, Meursius places in Cyprus those of Berytus, Cnidus, and Cythera [g], being led into this mistake by misunderstanding the antient writers, whom he quotes. To prove that Berytus stood in Cyprus,

Cyprus, he produces a passage out of Strabo [h], wherein that author, after having spoke of Citium, and told us, that it was the birth-place of Zeno, adds, that it is fifteen hundred furlongs, that is a hundred and eighty-seven miles and a half distant from Berytus; and hence Meursius, in other respects a most accurate writer, concludes, that Berytus is reckoned by Strabo among the cities of Cyprus. But he ought to have inferred from these very words of Strabo, that Berytus could not stand in Cyprus, since no two places in the whole island, if we stand to the measures laid down by that geographer, can be at so great a distance from each other, the island being, according to him, but fourteen hundred furlongs long. Besides, it is very plain from the context, that Strabo, in the abovementioned passage, speaks of Berytus in Syria; and not of any city bearing that name in Cyprus. The city of Cnidus Meursius places in Cyprus, being induced thereunto by a passage in Joannes Tzetzes, where that writer, speaking of the country of Ctesias the historian, tells us, that he was a native of the Cyprian Cnidus, from which epithet our author concludes, that Cnidus stood in Cyprus. But it is very plain both from Pliny [i] and Pausanias [k], that the epithet of Cyprian was given to the city of Cnidus, because Venus, the Cyprian goddess as she is stiled by the poets, was the tutelary deity of the place, and no less religiously worshipped there than in Cyprus. But granting Tzetzes to have placed Cnidus in Cyprus, the authority of Strabo ought to have been of more weight with Meursius than that of the writer he quotes; that antient geographer tells us in express words, that Ctesias, the physician and historian, was born in Cnidus a city of Caria [l], wherein he is followed by all the writers both antient and modern who speak of that historian. As to Cythera, our author, in reckoning it among the cities of Cyprus, quotes in favour of his opinion two passages out of Virgil; in the first that poet joins together Cythera and the Idalian forest, which was without all doubt in Cyprus [m]; in the other he joins the city of Cythera with Amathus and Paphos, both cities of great note in this island [n]. But Venus, whom Virgil introduces in both places, speaking of the cities that were consecrated to her, does not confine herself to the cities of Cyprus alone. She mentions, as is evident from the context, such places as were peculiarly addicted to her worship, whether in Cyprus or elsewhere. Now the island of Cythera and its metropolis, bearing the same name, were both consecrated to Venus, who had there a famous temple much resorted to by all the nations of Greece, as we read in Pausanias [o]. 'Tis true, the scholiast of Hesiod places Cythera in Cyprus; but herein he contradicts, which is often the case, the author whom he pretends to explain. For that poet speaking of the froth from which Venus is supposed to have sprung, says, that it was first carried to Cythera, and from thence to the island of Cyprus [p]. From these words it is manifest, Cythera was not, according to Hesiod, a city of Cyprus.

Division. Cyprus was by the antient geographers divided into four distincts or provinces, viz. Paphia to the west, Amathusia to the south, Lapitha to the north, and Salaminia to the east. In after-ages it was divided into twelve provinces by the princes of the Lusignan family, who were put in possession of it by Richard I. of England, and held it for seventeen generations. The names of these twelve divisions were, Nicosia, Famagusta, Paphia, Audima, Limissa, Masorum, Salines, Messoria, Crusocus, Pentalia, Carpassus, and Cerines. These were so denominated from the chief cities of each district; besides which cities and several others of less note, there were no fewer than eight hundred villages. This island, even under the tyrannical yoke of the Turks, is so considerable as to be governed by a beglerbeg, who has seven sangiacks under him.

Extent, climate, &c. Cyprus extends from east to west along the coast of Cilicia about a hundred and eighty miles, being but forty-five broad. It lies between the 34th and 35th degrees of north latitude, and was antiently deemed one of the most fruitful islands of the Mediterranean; but is at present in great part uncultivated, and the air in most places very unwholsome by reason of the fens and marshes. The honey of Cyprus is much commended by the ancients, and likewise the wine, oil, wool, &c. but above all the copper, of which we have spoke already. Among the rarities of Cyprus we may reckon a certain kind of insects, which, as Aristotle

Ariſtotle [q] informs us, were produced and lived in the fire, but died when taken out of the flames. This, in our opinion, is no leſs improbable than what Pliny tells us of the earth of Cyprus, which never failed, if that author may be credited, to throw up in the night the dead bodies that were committed to it in the day-time [r].

Inhabitants.

THIS iſland was firſt diſcovered by the Phœnicians, as Eratoſthenes informs us [s], about two or three generations, according to Sir Iſaac Newton's computation [t], before the days of Aſterius and Minos kings of Crete, that it, about one thouſand and ſix years before the chriſtian æra. It was, ſays Eratoſthenes, when firſt diſcovered, ſo overgrown with wood, that it could not be tilled, and the Phœnicians firſt cut down the wood for the melting of copper; and afterwards when they began to ſail without fear on the Mediterranean, (that is preſently after the Trojan war) they made uſe of that wood to build ſhips and even great navies. But not being able thus to deſtroy the wood, they gave every man leave to cut down what trees he pleaſed, and to poſſeſs all the ground he could clear. Thus far Eratoſthenes. Herodotus likewiſe ſuppoſes the Phœnicians to have been the firſt who peopled the iſland. But Joſephus tells us, that the deſcendants of Cittim, the ſon of Javan and grandſon of Japhet, were the original inhabitants of Cyprus. According to his account Cittim, ſeeing his brother Tarſhiſh ſettled in Cilicia, where he built the city of Tarſus, ſettled with his followers in this oppoſite iſland, and either he or his deſcendants laid the foundations of the city of Citium, which, according to Ptolemy, was the moſt antient in the iſland. As Cyprus was too narrow to contain the great numbers of thoſe who attended him and their deſcendants, he left here ſo many as might ſerve in time to plant the country, and with the reſt paſſed over into Macedon, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of that antient kingdom. In proceſs of time other nations, invited by the fertility of the ſoil, came and ſettled here, namely the Phœnicians, Athenians, Salaminians, Arcadians, and Æthiopians; for Herodotus [u] ſays, that Cyprus was inhabited by colonies from theſe different countries.

Government and kings.

THE government of Cyprus was without all doubt monarchical; for we find kings reigning here in the earlieſt ages. The

The first king we read of in history is Cinyras, the grandson of Pygmalion and father of Adonis. He was the son of Paphus, who is supposed to have been the first that introduced into the island the worship of Venus, and is said to have built the city which bears his name [w]. He had Adonis by his own daughter Myrrha. His father Paphus is feigned by the poets to have been the son of Pygmalion, by a woman who had been before an ivory statue. Pygmalion, say they, coming into the island of Cyprus, and seeing all the women living there very licentiously, resolved never to marry. Afterwards, as he was a famous statuary, he made an ivory statue of such perfection, that falling in love with it, he prayed the goddess Venus to procure him a wife as beautiful as the statue he had made. The Goddess heard his prayer, and changed the statue into a fair damsel, by whom he had Paphus, the father of Cinyras and first king of Cypras [x]. Cinyras is said to have possessed immense riches, insomuch, that the wealth of Cinyras became a proverb [y], to express an overgrown estate. As the worship of Venus was first established in Cyprus by Paphus, the father of Cinyras, both he and his descendants were buried in the temple of Venus at Paphus, an honour which was granted to no other family. The priesthood of Venus was likewise entailed, we may say, on their race, a dignity which they maintained for many ages after the throne was seized by others; nay, we read of one of this family, by name Sostratus, enjoying the priesthood of Venus in the reign of Vespasian, and greatly favoured by that prince and his son Titus, who often consulted him about future events [z]. Belus, one of the successors of Cinyras, is said to have reigned in Cyprus at the arrival of Teucer the son of Telamon, and to have assisted him in laying the foundations of Salamis, which in process of time became the metropolis of the whole island. Cinyras and his successors, whose names have not reached us, were not kings of the whole country, but only of Paphos and the adjoining province. Besides the kingdom of Paphos we find eight other kingdoms mentioned by the antients. Of the kings of Salamis we shall have occasion to speak at length hereafter. The names of the others that have been transmitted to us are; Philocyprus king of Soli, contemporary with Solon, as Plutarch informs us [a]; Aristocyprus son ſon of the former, mentioned by Herodotus [b]; Paſicrates or Paſicyprus, ſaid by Athenæus to have ſucceeded Ariſtocyprus [c]. Timonax, Pygmalion, Praxippus, Staſioecus, Idomeneus, Moſchion, Diphilus, Solon, and Themiſon are ſpoke of by the antients as reigning in Cyprus, but what kingdoms they held is what we find no where recorded. The kingdom of Salamis was by far the moſt powerful in Cyprus, the Salaminian princes having in proceſs of time ſubdued the whole iſland, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

History of Cpprus.

THE iſland of Cyprus was parcelled out, as we have obſerved already, among ſeveral petty kings, each of them reigning with an uncontrolled authority till the time of Cyrus the Great, who ſubdued them by his lieutenants, and left them at the ſame time in poſſeſſion of their reſpective kingdoms, obliging them only to pay an annual tribute to him and his ſucceſſors, and to ſend ſupplies of men, money, and ſhips, when required. The Cyprian princes lived thus ſubject to the Perſians till the reign of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, when they attempted to ſhake off the yoke, being encouraged thereunto by Oneſilus king of Salamis. But as from this period the hiſtory of Cyprus, as tranſmitted to us, is no other than that of the kingdom of Salamis; before we relate the event of this war we ſhall give an account of that kingdom and of the princes, who reigned there before the acceſſion of Oneſilus to the throne.

Kings of Salamis and hiſtory of that kingdom. Teucer.

THE firſt king of Salamis and founder of that kingdom was Teucer the ſon of Telamon, who ſignalized himſelf at the ſiege of Troy, if we may believe the poets. Upon his return being baniſhed his country he retired to Cyprus, where he built the city of Salamis and founded a new kingdom, about 895 years before the chriſtian æra. Juſtin tells us, that before he ſettled in Cyprus he went into Spain and left ſome of his retinue in that country, where in after-ages New Carthage was built; and Philoſtratus ſpeaks of Teucer's belt, which was to be ſeen many ages after in the temple of Hercules at Gades now Cadis. Virgil [d] makes Teucer cotemporary with Belus, the father of Dido, which is a great miſtake in point of chronology; ſince Carthage was built by Dido, only ſixty years before Romulus laid the foundations of Rome [e]. Lactantius [f] tells us, that Teucer introduced into the iſland of Cyprus the barbarous cuſtom of offering offering human sacrifices to Jupiter, which continued till the reign of the emperor Adrian. Ajax, the son of Teucer, is said to have built a stately temple at Olbus in Cilicia, and to have transmitted the priesthood to his posterity, a dignity greatly valued in antient times, the chief priest of Olbus being lord of that part of Cilicia, which was known to the Greek by the name of Tracheotis. After the descendants of Ajax were deprived both of the priesthood and the sovereignty annexed to it, the name of Ajax was still retained, and given to all those who enjoyed that dignity, though noways related to the Teucrian family. As to the immediate successors of Teucer in the kingdom of Salamis we are quite in the dark. Many years after him reigned Nicocreon; but did nothing which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity. His daughter Arsinoe is mentioned by Ovid [g]. The next king we find reigning in Salamis is Euelthon, who, as we read in Herodotus [h], first submitted to the Egyptians, and afterwards to the Persians, assisting Cambyses in his expeditions with men, money, and ships. In his reign, Pheretima, queen of the Cyrenæans, being driven out of her kingdom with her son Arcesilaus, fled to Salamis, and being there kindly entertained, solicited Euelthon to assist her with an army, in order to re-establish her family in Cyrene. But the king, not caring to engage in a war, made her rich presents, hoping to content her by that means and redeem himself from her importunities. The queen accepted the presents, and seemed to be highly pleased with them, but always added, that though they were very valuable, yet an army would be far more acceptable to her. At length Euelthon presented her with a reel and distaff of gold, and finding she repeated her acknowledgment in the same terms, told her plainly, that these were more proper presents for women than armies [i]. He sent a censer of great value and most curious workmanship to the temple of Delphos, which was to be seen in Herodotus's time in the treasury of the Corinthians [k].

Euelthon.

Siromus. Chersis. Georgus.

Siromus and Chersis are mentioned by Herodotus as reigning at Salamis [l]; but performed nothing which that writer has thought worth relating. The latter left three sons, Gorgus, Oncsilus, and Philaon. Gorgus succeeded his father, but was soon driven out by his brother Onesilus in the following manner. Onesilus, having often solicited the

the king to ſhake off the Perſian yoke, and finding that he could not prevail upon him to revolt, reſolved to poſſeſs himſelf of the crown, not doubting, but, as he was a declared enemy to the Perſians, all the Cyprians would join him; the iſland being then grievouſly oppreſſed by the Perſian governors. He had ſcarce taken this reſolution when news was brought him of the Ionian revolt. Whereupon he renewed his inſtances with greater earneſtneſs than ever, and did all that lay in his power to perſuade his brother to join the rebels; but finding him inviolably attached to the Perſian intereſt, he gained a conſiderable party among the Salaminians, and with their aſſiſtance, while Gorgus was one day out of the city, he ſeized on the gates and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king. Gorgus, being thus excluded, fled to the Perſians, and Oneſilus, ſending embaſſadors to all the cities and princes of the iſland, prevailed upon them to take up arms and drive out the Perſian gariſons. The city of Amathus alone refuſed to come into his meaſures; whereupon he cloſely beſieged it, but the inhabitants making a vigorous defence, before he could reduce the place, the Perſians, having drawn together all the forces they had in Cilicia and the neighbouring provinces, paſſed over into Cyprus, and having landed their men marched ſtrait to Salamis. Oneſilus, not finding himſelf in a condition to make head againſt ſo numerous an army, ſent meſſengers to the Ionians ſoliciting their aſſiſtance, and inviting them to join againſt the common enemy. The Ionians with all poſſible expedition equipped a fleet and ſet ſail for Cyprus. Upon their arrival the Cyprian kings, having ſummoned a council of war, invited to it all the commanders of the Ionian fleet, and ſpoke to them thus: "Men of Ionia, we give you the choice "either to engage the Perſians by land, or the Phœnicians, "who are cruiſing with their fleet off the iſland, by ſea. "If you chuſe to fight the Perſians, bring your men aſhore, "that we may go on board your ſhips and fight the Phœnicians. But if you had rather try your ſtrength againſt "the Phœnicians, do as you think beſt, for we are ready "either to engage the Perſians by land, or the Phœnicians "by ſea, being determined at all events to preſerve the "liberties of Cyprus and Ionia." The Ionians anſwered, "that they were ſent by the general council of Ionia to defend the iſland by ſea, and not to deliver their ſhips to the "Cyprians in order to fight the Perſians by land; and that "they would endeavour to do their duty according to the "in-

" instructions they had received." The council was scarce dismissed, when the Persian army appeared in the plains of Salamis; upon which the confederate kings of Cyprus, drawing up their forces in order of battle, placed the flower of their army, consisting of Salaminians and Solians, against the front of the Persians, and the rest of the Cyprians against the enemy's auxiliaries. Onesilus took upon him to engage Artybius commander in chief of the Persian forces, who was mounted on a horse, as our historian tells us, that had been taught to stand upright and tread under his feet the person he was pushed against. Onesilus therefore charged one of his officers, a man of great boldness and well experienced in military affairs, to mind nothing but the general's horse, and to prevent him from doing any mischief in the time of the engagement. As the armies drew near, the king of Salamis advanced against Artybius, whose horse beginning to rear, the officer struck him with a scythe and cut off both his feet at one blow; Onesilus having at the same time wounded Artybius, both the horse and the rider fell to the ground. But the Persians, not at all disheartened at the death of their leader, charged the Cyprians with incredible vigour; and the Cyprians on the other hand exerting themselves in imitation of their general, the victory was long doubtful, many falling on both sides. But at length, Stesenor king of Curium revolting to the enemy with all the forces under his command, and the Salaminians, who fought in chariots, soon after following his example, the Cyprians were put to flight with great slaughter. Among others Onesilus, who had been the occasion of this war, was killed in the fight, and with him Aristocyprus king of Soli, and son of that Philocyprus, whon Solon commended above all other kings in the verses he made during his stay in Cyprus. The Amathusians, to be revenged on Onesilus for having besieged their city, cut off his head and placed it over one of the gates of Amathus, where a swarm of bees having filled the skull with honey, the Amathusians, consulting on that occasion the oracle, were told, that if they interred the head and sacrificed yearly to Onesilus, as a hero, their affairs should prosper. The Amathusians obeyed the oracle, and continued to offer sacrifices to Onesilus to the time of our historian. The Persians, having thus gained a complete victory over the Cyprians, soon reduced all the cities that had revolted, except Soli, which held out for six months against the whole power of Persia, but at last, the walls being undermined by the enemy, was obliged to ſurrender. The Salaminians no ſooner heard of the death of Oneſilus, but they recalled Gorgus and placed him again on the throne. Thus the Cyprians, having enjoyed their liberty during the ſpace of one year, were reduced to their former ſtate of ſlavery [m].

Nicocrates. Timarchus.

GORGUS was ſucceeded in the kingdom of Salamis by his eldeſt ſon Nicocrates, and he by his brother Timarchus. But all we know of them is, that the former made a curious collection of books, which he purchaſed at a great rate, as Athenæus informs us [n]; and that the latter had, as we read in Pliny [o], a double row of teeth. This writer ſeems to inſinuate, that Timarchus was not only king of Salamis, but alſo of Paphus. In the reign of one of theſe princes, of which preciſely we cannot tell, the Greeks, having ſettled their affairs at home, reſolved to drive the Perſians out of all the Greek cities of Aſia and the neighbouring iſlands. With this view they equipped a powerful fleet, which ſailing to Cyprus under the command of Pauſanias admiral of the Lacedæmonians and Ariſtides the Athenian, drove from many cities in that iſland the Perſian gariſons, and reſtored the inhabitants to their former liberty [p].

Evagoras I. Year of the flood 2546. Before Chriſt 453.

TIMARCHUS was ſucceeded by Evagoras I. the ſon of Nicocrates, in whoſe reign the Athenians, having equipped a fleet of two hundred ſail, gave the command of it to Cimon, enjoining him to drive the Perſians from the iſland of Cyprus. Cimon purſuant to his orders landed his men in Cyprus, took Malum and ſeveral other cities of that iſland, and from thence, to make a diverſion, ſent ſixty ſail to the aſſiſtance of the Egyptians, who had revolted from the Perſians. As Artabazus, commander in chief of the Perſian forces in thoſe parts, lay off of Cyprus with a fleet of three hundred ſhips, Cimon, as ſoon as his ſquadron returned from Egypt, fell upon him, took a hundred of his ſhips, deſtroyed many others, and purſued the reſt to the coaſts of Phœnicia. Being fluſhed with this ſucceſs, on his return he landed his men in Cilicia, where he found Megabyzus with an army of three hundred thouſand men, marched againſt him, and having cut in pieces a numberleſs multitude of his men, returned to Cyprus with a double triumph, and laid ſiege to Citium, the ſtrongeſt city in the whole iſland.

EVAGORAS, notwithstanding the great advantages gained by Cimon, still adhered to the Persians, and, having raised a considerable army and prevailed upon several other petty princes of Cyprus to join him, marched to the relief of Citium, but was worsted by the Athenians, and obliged to retire to Salamis. Hereupon Artaxerxes, tired with a war in which he had sustained so great losses, resolved to put an end to so many calamities by coming to an accommodation with the enemy. Accordingly, he sent orders to his generals, who were charged with the management of the Cyprian war, to conclude a peace with the Athenians, on the best terms they could. Hereupon Megabyzus and Artabazus sent embassadors to Athens to propose an accommodation, which was agreed upon by the deputies of both sides on the following conditions: 1. That all the Greek cities of Asia should be made free, and allowed to live according to their own laws; 2. That no Persian ships of war should enter those seas that lie between the Cyanean and Chelidonian islands, that is from the Euxine sea to the coasts of Pamphylia; 3. That no Persian general should come by land within three days march of those seas; 4. That the Athenians should not commit any hostilities in the territories of the king of Persia. Pursuant to these articles the Persians withdrew all their garisons from Cyprus, leaving the several kings, among whom the island was parcelled out, to govern their respective kingdoms without any dependance on the king of Persia [q]. Not long after the conclusion of this peace Evagoras died, if we believe Diodorus Siculus, in banishment, having been driven out of his kingdom by his nephew Protagoras [r], who held it for some years, but formed nothing worth relateing. The island of Cyprus continued free from any foreign yoke from the conclusion of the peace we have spoke of till the 18th year of the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon king of Persia, when, by the famous treaty concluded by Antalcidas the Lacedæmonian with Tiribazus general of the Persian forces in Asia Minor, that island was again subjected to the Persians with all the Greek cities in Asia.

Protagoras.

Nicocreon. Year of the flood 2612. Before Christ 487.

At this time reigned at Salamis Nicocreon son of the usurper Protagoras, famous for his cruelty, of which the following instance is related by Laertius, Philo, Valerius Maximus, and Pliny. Taking offence at a satyrical saying

ing of the philoſopher Anaxarchus, he cauſed him to be put into a great mortar made for that purpoſe, and to be pounded to death with iron peſtles [s]. Upon the death of Nicocreon, Nicocles the ſon of Timarchus was raiſed to the throne. Nicocles. During his reign a ſtranger from Phœnicia, called by ſome authors Abdymon, coming to Salamis, and being kindly entertained by Nicocles, requited the favours he received at the king's hands by driving him, with the aſſiſtance of the Perſians, from the throne. Under this tyrant Evagoras II. was born, a prince of great merit and extraordinary virtue. Evagoras II. He was the ſon of Nicocles, and, being brought up by his parents with great care, gave early proofs of thoſe virtues, which, if Iſocrates may be credited, made him the perfect model of a good king [t]. He was diſtinguiſhed, as the ſame author tells us, among the youth by the beauty of his aſpect, the vigour of his body, and moſt of all by the modeſty and innocence of his behaviour, which are the greateſt ornaments of that age. He came into the world with the moſt happy diſpoſitions; a great fund of genius, an eaſy conception, a moſt lively penetration, which nothing eſcaped, &c. qualities, which might have exempted him from all ſtudy and application; and nevertheleſs, he ſpent great part of his time in improving his mind by reading, as if he had been quite deſtitute of talents, and obliged to ſupply by ſtudy what nature had denied him. As he advanced in years his virtues became ſo conſpicuous as to give no ſmall jealouſy to the tyrant then on the throne, who was well appriſed that ſo ſhining a merit could not continue in the obſcurity of a private life. And indeed Evagoras, after the death of his father, waited only for an opportunity of recovering the crown which was due to him by his birth. But in the mean-time, one of the principal citizens, having murdered the tyrant, ſeized on it for himſelf, and being ſupported by the Perſians, put all to the ſword who attempted to oppoſe him. On this occaſion Evagoras was obliged to ſave himſelf by abandoning the iſland, and retiring to the continent. Having ſpent ſome time at Soli in Cilicia, and hearing there that his countrymen were grievouſly oppreſſed by the new uſurper, he reſolved

resolved at all events to rescue them from the calamities they groaned under; and accordingly, being attended only by fifty followers, he passed over into Cyprus, and expelled the usurper, the Persians not being able to make head against the Cyprians, who joined him all to a man. Being thus, by his own valour and the affection of his subjects, restored to the throne of his ancestors, he soon rendered his small kingdom the most flourishing of the whole island. Artaxerxes, king of Persia, attempted to drive him out and place a new one on the throne of the usurper, who was greatly attached to the Persians; but that prince being diverted by the Greek war, and finding Evagoras determined to hold out to the last, put off the enterprize to a more proper season. In the mean-time, Conon by means of Ctesias the Cnidian, who was chief physician to Artaxerxes, made up all differences between Evagoras and that prince, the latter promising not to molest him in the possession of his small kingdom. Conon after his defeat at Ægospotamos had taken refuge with Evagoras, and being kindly entertained by him, had ever after sought for opportunities of requiting the favours, which he and his countrymen the Athenians had received at the king's hands in their distress. But Evagoras, who was every way qualified for great undertakings, could not content himself with the kingdom of Salamis alone. He extended his dominions, and by degrees made himself master almost of the whole island. The Amathusians, the Solians, and the Citians, alone of all those islanders, held out against him. These had recourse to the king of Persia, who, being alarmed at the rapid progress of Evagoras, promised them an immediate and powerful support, which, however, he could not afford them so soon as he expected, being employed elsewhere in more important affairs. But having at last concluded a peace with the Greeks, he bent all his force against Evagoras, being determined to drive him quite out of the island. The Athenians, notwithstanding their alliance with the Persians, and the many favours they had lately received from the king of Persia, could not deny their assistance to Evagoras, who had befriended them on all occasions, especially after their overthrow at Ægospotamos. Having therefore, with the utmost expedition equipped ten ships of war, they sent them under the command of Philocrates to his assistance. But a fleet which the Lacedæmonians had at sea, commanded by Teleutias the brother of Agesilaus, falling in with them near the island island of Rhodes, surrounded them so that not one ship could escape [u]. The Athenians, determined to assist their old ally at all adventures, sent Chabrias with another fleet, and a considerable number of land-forces on board, to join him. This new supply arrived safe, and in a short time the whole island was obliged to submit to Evagoras, which greatly redounded to the honour of Chabrias and the Athenian arms. But the Athenians being forced by a new treaty of peace, concluded between Artaxerxes and the states of Greece, to recal Chabrias, the Persians attacked with all their forces the island of Cyprus, not doubting but they should soon reduce it, since no new supplies could be sent thither from Greece. The Persian army consisted of three hundred thousand men, and the fleet of three hundred ships of war, besides a great number of transports. The land-forces were commanded by Orontes son-in-law to Artaxerxes, and the fleet by Gaus the son of Tamus. Tiribazus was commander in chief both of the sea and land-forces. Evagoras, seeing himself threatned with so dreadful a war, had recourse to all those princes, who were at enmity with the Persians, receiving supplies of men and money from the Egyptians, Lybians, Arabians, Tyrians, and other nations. Besides, as he was a wealthy prince, he hired a great many mercenaries of various nations, equipped a fleet of fourscore and ten gallies, and armed a great number of small vessels, which by intercepting the enemy's convoys reduced them, after they had landed in the island, to such straits, that they begun to mutiny and killed several of their officers. But the whole Persian fleet putting to sea, the army was again plentifully supplied with provisions from the continent. At the same time, Evagoras likewise received a great supply of corn and fifty ships from Egypt. Upon the arrival of the Egyptian squadron he resolved to attack the Persians at the same time by sea and land. His land-forces falling upon a great detachment of the Persian army put them to flight with great slaughter. But the sea-fight was not attended with the like success. At first he had the advantage, and took or sunk a great many of the enemy's ships. But the Persians, being animated by the example and warm remonstrances of Gaus their admiral, resumed courage, and returned to the charge with such vigour, that Evagoras,

after a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance, was obliged to retire into the harbour of Salamis, where he was cloſely beſieged both by ſea and land. After this victory Tiribazus went in perſon to acquaint the king with the ſucceſs that attended his arms in Cyprus, and having obtained two thouſand talents for the uſe of the army, he returned with that new ſupply to carry on the war more vigorouſly then ever. Dureing his abſence, Evagoras, leaving the defence of the city to his ſon Pythagoras, got through the enemy's fleet, in the dead of the night with ten ſhips, and ſailed for Egypt, in hopes of engaging Achoris king of that country to join him with all his forces. But not obtaining from him the aid he expected, and finding on his return the city reduced to the utmoſt extremity, he was obliged to capitulate. The terms offered him were, that he ſhould abandon all the cities of Cyprus, except Salamis, and that he ſhould hold this city of the king of Perſia, as a ſervant of his lord, and pay an annual tribute. The extremity, to which he was reduced, obliged him to comply with the firſt article, hard as it was; but he could not by any means be brought to conſent to the ſecond, declaring, that he would hold his kingdom no otherwiſe than as a king under a king. Tiribazus, who commanded in chief, would not make the leaſt alteration, nor abate any thing of his pretenſions; whereupon, Evagoras, being determined to die ſword in hand rather than to yield to ſuch terms, broke off the conference, and applied himſelf entirely to the defence of the city [w].

In the mean time, Orontes, who commanded the land-forces, not being able to brook the ſuperiority which Tiribazus had over him, as being intruſted with the whole management of the war, and jealous of the ſucceſs that attended him, wrote ſecretly to court, accuſing him of holding a private correſpondence with the Lacedæmonians, and ſpinning out the ſiege of Salamis, in order to bring about ſome change in the government with the aſſiſtance of Evagoras, a ſworn enemy to the Perſians. Upon the receipt of this letter, Artaxerxes immediately diſpatched letters to Orontes, enjoining him to ſeize Tiribazus, and ſend him priſoner to court. Orontes, without delay, put the king's orders in execution, and was rewarded for his ſuppoſed zeal with the chief command over all the Perſian forces in Cyprus;

Cyprus; but the army being greatly dissatisfied with the change, some left the service, and others refused to obey their new commander. This obliged Orontes to resume the negotiations of peace with Evagoras, and to conclude them upon the very terms which Tiribazus had rejected; for he consented that Evagoras should hold Salamis as king of that city, paying only a small tribute to the king of Persia. Thus the siege was raised, and an end put to the war, after it had cost the Persians 50,000 talents, that is, near ten million of our money [x].

Not long after the conclusion of this peace, Evagoras was murdered by one of his eunuchs, named Thrasidæus, and succeeded in the kingdom of Salamis by his son Nicocles. Diodorus, confounding the name of his son who succeeded him with that of the eunuch by whom he was murdered, tells us, that he was treacherously put to death by the enuch Nicocles, and that, upon his death, the eunuch seized on the kingdom [y]. That he was murdered by an eunuch, we are told also by Aristotle [z]; but the eunuch's name was Thrasidæus, as we read in Theopompus, who adds, that Nicocles the son of Evagoras, upon the death of his father, took quiet possession of the kingdom of Salamis [a]. Nicocles celebrated the funeral of his father with the utmost pomp and magnificence. The discourse intitled Evagoras served for his funeral oration. It was composed by Isocrates, to inspire the young king with a desire of treading in the steps of his father. The same philosopher wrote two other orations addressed to Nicocles, whose name they still bear. In the first of these Isocrates shews the duty of a king to his subjects; and in the second the duty of subjects to their king. Nicocles rewarded the author with twenty talents, as Plutarch informs us in the life of that philosopher [b]. Nicocles seems to have reigned but a few years for we find his son Evagoras in possession of the throne before the revolt of Cyprus, which happened in the very beginning of the reign of Ochus, who succeeded Atarxerxes Mnemon. It is surprizing, that most authors should confound this Nicocles with another of the same name who reigned at Salamis in the time of Ptole-

my the son of Lagus, and revolted from him to Antigonus. Nicocles, the son of that Evagoras, of whom we have spoke above, was succeeded by his son named also Evagoras, which has occasioned great confusion among those who have wrote of the affairs of Cyprus. Evagoras II. was, according to the learned bishop Usher [c], succeeded by his son Nicocles, and Nicocles again by his son Evagoras III. Evagoras, who was driven out by his uncle Protagoras. While the latter was in possession of the throne, the Cyprians, being ill used by their Persian governors, attempted to shake off the yoke by joining the Egyptians and Phœnicians, who had already revolted. Hereupon Ochus dispatched his orders to Idrieus king of Caria, enjoining him to invade the island of Cyprus, and make war upon the inhabitants. Idrieus, in compliance with his command, having equipped a fleet sent it with eight thousand Greek mercenaries, under the conduct of Phocion the Athenian and Evagoras, to make a descent in the island. This Evagoras was the son of Nicocles, as we have hinted above, and having been driven out by his uncle Protagoras, he gladly joined the Persians, in hopes of recovering his crown. His knowledge of the country, and the party he might still have in the island, made him a very proper person to command in this expedition. Cyprus had still nine kings, but subject and tributary to the king of Persia. They all joined in this confederacy, with a design to shake off the Persian yoke, and make themselves each independent in his own city. The troops under the command of Phocion and Evagoras landed in Cyprus without any opposition, and being reinforced with numerous bodies of voluntiers from Syria and Cilicia, enticed hither with the hopes of enriching themselves with the spoils of so wealthy an island, they began with the siege of Salamis, which they invested by sea and land. But Protagoras making a vigorous defence, Ochus, who was entirely bent on the reduction of Egypt, compounded with him and the other Cyprian princes, redressing all their grievances, and confirming them in the government of their respective territories [d]. The greatest difficulty which Ochus met with in bringing about this accommodation, was the contenting of Evagoras, who laid claim to the kingdom of

of Salamis; but he being convicted before Ochus of having committed the moſt flagrant oppreſſions during his reign, Protagoras was confirmed in the kingdom of Salamis, and amends was made Evagoras, by conferring on him the government of another place; but he being guilty there of the ſame miſdemeanors, was obliged to ſave himſelf by flight into the iſland of Cyprus, where he was ſeized and put to death by Protagoras.

Cyprus falls to Antigonus, but taken from him by Ptolemy.

FROM this time, to the reign of Ptolemy, the firſt of that name who reigned in Egypt, we find no mention made of the Cyprian kings. They ſubmitted, without all doubt, to Alexander, upon the ſame terms which had been granted them by the Perſian monarchs, as Arrian ſeems to inſinuate [e]. Upon the death of that conqueror, his generals divided the conqueſts he had made among them, in which diviſion Cyprus fell to Antigonus. But while that prince was engaged in Aſia Minor with Caſſander, Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, having invaded Cyprus with a powerful fleet, reduced moſt part of the iſland, and obliged the kings who reigned there to do him homage. Among theſe Nicocles king of Paphos, being accuſed of holding underhand a correſpondence with Antigonus, Ptolemy ſent two of his intimate friends, Argaus and Pallicrates, into Cyprus, with inſtructions to diſpatch Nicocles, leſt, by his inſinuations, the other princes ſhould revolt and join Antigonus. Theſe arriving in Cyprus, unexpectedly ſurrounded the houſe of Nicocles with a body of men ſent them for that purpoſe by Menelaus, who commanded in Cyprus for Ptolemy. Nicocles finding no means to eſcape, attempted firſt to clear himſelf of what was laid to his charge, but ſeeing no one hearkened to what he ſaid, he drew his ſword, and ſlew himſelf on the ſpot. Axiothea, his wife, hearing of her huſband's death, firſt killed all her daughters, leſt they ſhould fall into the enemy's hands, and then laid violent hands on herſelf. The news of ſuch a dreadful maſſacre ſo effected the brothers of Nicocles, that retiring each of them to their own habitations they ſet fire to their houſes, and periſhed with their whole families in the flames [f]. This Nicocles is ſuppoſed to have been the laſt of the Teucrian family, and to have poſſeſſed not only the kingdom of Paphos, but that that alſo of Salamis. Be that as it will, the kings of Cyprus from this time deſerved rather the title of governors than kings, being ſubjects and mere vaſſals to the kings of Egypt.

Demetrius invades Cyprus.

PTOLEMY had not been long in poſſeſſion of Cyprus, when Antigonus, bent upon the recovery of that rich and fruitful iſland, ordered his ſon Demetrius to tranſport thither what forces he could, in order to drive out Ptolemy's generals. Demetrius, in compliance with his father's commands, left Greece, where he then was, and ſailed over into Caria, whence he ſent embaſſadors to Rhodes, inviting the Rhodians to join him againſt Ptolemy. But the Rhodians refuſing to comply with his requeſt, and proteſting that they would maintain a ſtrict neutrality, he paſſed into Cilicia highly diſſatisfied with their conduct, and determined to make them feel in due time the effects of his reſentment. In Cilicia he raiſed an army of fifteen thouſand foot and four hundred horſe, which he embarked on a great number of tranſports, and conveyed over into Cyprus, under the convoy of one hundred and ſixty-three ſhips of war. Being landed without the leaſt oppoſition, he encamped near the ſhore, in the neighbourhood of Carpaſia, where he drew his ſhips to land, and ſurrounded them with a deep ditch and a double rampart. Having thus ſecured his navy, he advanced firſt to the cities of Urania and Carpaſia, which he took by ſtorm, and then leaving a ſufficient guard to defend his trenches, he marched to Salamis, with a deſign to lay ſiege to that important place [g]. Menelaus, Ptolemy's brother, who was then in Salamis, upon intelligence of the enemy's approach, drew out of the neighbouring gariſons a body of twelve thouſand foot and eight hundred horſe, with a deſign to divert him from beſieging the city; but Demetrius falling upon him, put his army to flight, and purſuing him to the very gates of the city, took three thouſand of his men priſoners, and killed about a thouſand in the flight and the purſuit. The priſoners he treated with great humanity, and incorporated them among his own troops; but finding they were ready on all occaſions to abandon him, and fly over to Menelaus, he put them on board his tranſports, and ſent then all to his father Antigonus [h].

MENELAUS being fully perſuaded that Demetrius, elated with his ſucceſs, would lay ſiege to Salamis, made the due preparations preparations on his ſide for a vigorous defence, and at the ſame time diſpatched three meſſengers to Ptolemy, acquainting him with the ſtate of affairs in Cyprus, and ſolliciting him to ſend what ſuccours he could with all poſſible expedition. In the mean time, Demetrius, having viewed the ſituation and fortifications of the place, began to prepare the neceſſary engines for the reduction of it, which, he foreſaw, would coſt him dear, the gariſon being very numerous, and Menelaus reſolved to hold out to the laſt extremity. Having ſent for workmen out of Aſia, and brought from thence a great quantity of iron, timber, and other materials, he had an immenſe number of warlike engines of an extraordinary bigneſs, and amongſt others the famous Helepolis, of which we have ſpoke in the hiſtory of Rhodes. When the engines were ready, Demetrius began to batter the walls with ſuch fury, that in a few days ſeveral breaches were opened; but when he thought himſelf already maſter of the place, Menelaus found means to ſet fire to his engines, which was ſo violent, that, notwithſtanding the endeavours of Demetrius's men to extinguiſh the flames, they conſumed in a ſhort time all the machines, together with the Helepolis, and the men that were in it. This obliged Demetrius to ſuſpend his attacks; and in the mean time Ptolemy, upon the intelligence he received of his brother's ill ſucceſs in the action againſt Demetrius ſet ſail from Egypt, with a fleet of an hundred and forty ſhips of war, and two hundred tranſports, carrying ten thouſand men for the land-ſervice. With this fleet he arrived at Citium, about two hundred furlongs from Salamais, and from thence diſpatched meſſengers by land to Menelaus, deſiring him to ſend the ſhips, which, to the number of ſixty, were in the port of Salamis, to join the fleet. But Demetrius, foreſeeing that Ptolemy's deſign was to venture an engagement by ſea, had the precaution to leave ten of his ſhips in the mouth of the harbour, which was very narrow, to prevent Menelaus's ſquadron from ſailing out. The reſt he drew up in line of battle, and having commanded the cavalry to keep near the ſea-ſide, that they might be ready, in caſe of any misfortune, to aſſiſt thoſe who ſhould ſwim to land, he advanced towards the enemy with an hundred and eight ſail. The two fleets engaged with the utmoſt fury and reſolution; that of Demetrius, conſiſting moſtly of Phœnicians, Samians, and Athenians, ſoon put Ptolemy's left wing in confuſion, and drove moſt of the ſhips aſhore. On the other hand,

Ptolemy overthrown in a ſea-fight

Ptolemy,

Ptolemy, who commanded in the right-wing, gained the like advantage over the enemy's left, took several of their best gallies, and obliged the rest to save themselves by flight; but having pursued them too eagerly, he was attacked on his return, while his men were tired, by Demetrius, and, after an obstinate resistance, put to flight. Demetrius chaced him with his ships in line of battle, and took seventy of his gallies, with all his transports, on board of which were all his provisions, arms, money, military engines, and eight thousand land-forces. After this overthrow, Ptolemy returned to Egypt, with eight gallies only, the rest of his numerous fleet being either broken or destroyed. Upon his retreat, the whole island of Cyprus, with all the forces, shipping, and magazines, which Ptolemy had there, fell into the hands of Demetrius. The prisoners at land amounted to about seventeen thousand men, besides the mariners taken on board the fleet. Menelaus the brother, and Lentisus the son, of Ptolemy, were among the captives; but Demetrius sent them both home with their friends and dependants, without ransom, to requite the like kindness shewn him by Ptolemy, after the battle of Gaza. All the rest he incorporated into his own forces, and thereby greatly reinforced both his fleet and army [h].

Cyprus submits to Demetrius.

Demetrius, immediately after this victory, dispatched Aristodemus the Milesian, with the news of it to his father Antigonus. When he arrived at court, and was brought in to Antigonus, he stood silent for some time, keeping him in suspence, and then, as in a transport of joy, he uttered aloud these words, Prosperity and happiness to king Antigonus; we have overthrown king Ptolemy at sea; Cyprus is ours; we have taken sixteen thousand eight hundred men prisoners. Antigonus answered, Prosperity and happiness to thee too; nevertheless, because thou hast kept me so long in suspence, thou shalt in some degree be punished, and wait in thy turn for thy reward [i]. Antigonus was so elated with this victory, that thenceforth he assumed the title of king, and gave it likewise to his son Demetrius; which the Egyptians hearing of, honoured Ptolemy with the same title, that he might, tho' defeated, be upon the level with the conqueror. This example was followed by Lysimachus, Cassander, ander, and Seleucus, who, from that time, in all their letters, orders, decrees, and other writings, ſtiled themſelves kings [k]. Antigonus, and, after his death, Demetrius, held the iſland of Cyprus for the ſpace of eleven years, at the end of which Ptolemy recovered it, while Demetrius was engaged againſt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians. He equipped a numerous fleet, and landing in Cyprus, over-ran the whole iſland before Demetrius had the leaſt notice of his deſign. The city of Salamis alone held out ſome time againſt him, but was at length obliged to ſurrender, and open its gates to the conqueror. In this city he found the mother, wife, and children of Demetrius, whom he generouſly ſet at liberty with all their friends and domeſtics, loading them with rich preſents, and appointing a ſquadron of his beſt ſhips to convey them, with whatever belonged to them, into Greece, where Demetrius then was [l].

Cyprus recovered by Ptolemy.

FROM this time Cyprus, according to what we read in profane writers, continued ſubject to the king of Egypt, till they were, with the utmoſt injuſtice, deprived of it by the Romans; but from the book of the Maccabees [m], where Ptolemeus Macron and Nicanor are mentioned as governing that iſland under Antiochus Epiphanes, it is plain, that Cyprus was again, at leaſt for ſome time, brought under ſubjection to the kings of Syria. Be that as it will, the ſeizing of it by the Romans is reckoned the moſt flagrant piece of injuſtice their republic was ever guilty of. We ſhall, in a few words, give a diſtinct account of this memorable event, which will for ever reflect ignominy and diſgrace on the Roman name. Ptolemy Lathurus, king of Egypt, left two ſons, who divided their father's dominions between them. One known by the name of Ptolemy Auletes, that is, the Flute-player, had for his ſhare the kingdom of Egypt. The other called Ptolemy, without any ſirname, had the iſland of Cyprus. While the latter reigned in Cyprus, Publius Clodius, a young Roman nobleman, of a very bold and enterprizing genius, being taken by the pyrates on the coaſts of Cilicia, ſent to Ptolemy king of Cyprus, entreating him to ſend him a ſum of money wherewithal to pay his ranſom. As Ptolemy was a prince of a ſordid and covetous temper, he ſent him only two talents, which the pyrates deſpiſing, they they chose rather to release him without ransom than to accept of so small a sum. Some years after Clodius being adopted by a plebeian, and chosen tribune of the people, he employed all his power and authority, which were very great, against the king of Cyprus, representing him as a most wicked man, and one who was unworthy to wear a crown. He was indeed a vicious prince, but what right had Rome to reform the manners of independent kings? However, as Ptolemy possessed immense riches, the people were easily prevailed upon to concur with the revengeful Clodius to his ruin, and pass a decree, declaring that Ptolemy had forfeited his throne by his ill conduct, and that his dominions were fallen to the Roman people [n]. The senate did not oppose this unjust decree, for they had long sought for some pretence to strip that wealthy prince of his treasures, and the only shew of justice they could find for it was, that Alexander the late king of Egypt, dying at Tyre, had left the Roman people his heirs, and, that therefore the kingdom of Egypt, and with it Cyprus, which was then deemed a part of the kingdom of Egypt, had, in virtue of that donation, passed to the Romans. This will had been insisted on at Rome soon after the death of Alexander, and motions had been there made for the seizing both of Egypt and Cyprus; but as they had some years before taken possession of Bythinia, by virtue of the will of Nicomedes, and of Cyrene and Lybia by the like will of Apion, and reduced them to Roman provinces, the senate thought it would bring them under the imputation of being too desirous of grasping all foreign dominions, should they, on this pretence, make themselves masters likewise of Egypt and Cyprus; wherefore, dropping at that time their claim to the deceased king's dominions, they only sent to Tyre, for the effects he had left there at his death [o]. But now this claim as to Cyprus was revived, and, to gratify the revenge of Clodius, and the insatiable avarice of the people of Rome, a decree passed for the seizing of Cyprus, tho' the king then on the throne had been declared a friend and ally of Rome, and had never done any thing to incur the displeasure of that haughty and imperious republic [p].

THE decree for the disposessing of Ptolemy being passed, Clodius's next care was to find out a proper person to put it in execution. Cato was then using his utmost endeavours to guard the republic against the attempts of Clodius; so that his presence was not at all agreeable to the factious tribune, who therefore resolved to get rid of so troublesome a censor, by sending him out of the way on this expedition. He paid him a visit, and acquainted him, that the people had honoured him with a commission, which was very reputable for him, and necessary for the good of the public. Vice reigns, said he, in Cyprus, and the throne is debased by it. Rome has therefore made choice of a man of spotless probity to establish virtue there. Go then, Cato, and make the purity of the Roman laws be revered in an island, which is infamous for its vices. Cato, who was well apprised of the snare, replied, That he could leave his country, when it was threatened with far greater and nearer dangers. Well then, replied Clodius, I will compel you to do what you refuse to the request of your friends; and accordingly having assembled the comitia, he procured an order for Cato to set out without delay for Cyprus, and dethrone the king. Thus the virtuous Romans, by the most unjust and iniquitous decree possible, ordered a friend and ally of theirs to be deprived of his dominions; and the rigid Cato had so little sense of justice as to obey and execute those wicked orders. The tribune, after the decree was passed, pressed Cato to depart immediately, but did not provide so much as a ship to carry him to Cyprus. He was commissioned to drive the king from his throne, but was not allowed either men or money to execute the enterprize, or even a guard to protect him against the insults of a provoked enemy. He therefore went on board the first ship he met with bound for Cyprus, and, being attended only with a few domestics, arrived at Rhodes, whence he sent one Canidius into Cyprus, charging him, to try whether he could prevail upon Ptolemy, by fair means to give up his dominions to the republic. Canidius offered him, in Cato's name, the high-priesthood of Venus and Paphos, on the revenues of which he might have lived in a state of plenty and honour. This offer Ptolemy rejected; but, on the other hand, not having courage enough to engage in a war with Rome, he resolved to put an end to his life and reign at the same time. Accordingly having put his beloved treasures, which he had been accumulating for many years, on board one of his largest ships he sailed out of the harbour, harbour, with a design to sink the vessel, and perish together with his riches; but when he came to the execution of his design, he could not find in his heart to destroy his treasure, tho' he persisted in the resolution of destroying himself; he therefore returned a shore, and having laid up all his wealth again in the treasury, poisoned himself, not bein able to survive his disgrace, tho' he could not bear that his wealth should be lost. Upon the king's death, Cato, without opposition, took possession of the island in the name of the republic, and seized the treasures, which had been the chief cause of that unfortunate prince's ruin. They amounted to 7000 talents, that is, 1,356,250l. Ster. and were the next year carried to Rome by Cato, and lodged there in the public treasury [q]. This wicked and unjust proceeding of the Romans is generally ascribed to the tribune Clodius; but the senate was no less to blame than the tribune, for they not only approved of the decree, depriving Ptolemy of his kingdom, but conferred extraordinary honours upon Cato, for having put it in execution. Cato himself, notwithstanding his boasted virtue, shewed no more integrity, on this occasion, than the wicked Clodius; for he not only accepted of that commission, but, after his return, gave a plain instance of his approving whatever had been done. As soon as Clodius ended his tribuneship, Cicero accused him before the senate, and endeavoured to persuade the fathers to annul all the laws he had made during his authority: But on this occasion Cato declared, in favour of his greatest enemy, against his best friend, saying, that if the acts of Clodius were annulled, the treasures brought from Cyprus ought to be restored to the inhabitants of that island; and to prevent this, the virtuous Cato prevailed upon the senate to confirm such acts of Clodius, as regarded the deposing of the king, and the seizing of his moveable riches and dominions [r].

SECT. VI.

The Hiſtory of Samos.

THE name of Samos was in antient times common to three iſlands, viz. Cephalenia, Samothracia, and this which we are now to write of. Cephalenia had the name of Samos from its metropolis Sama, as Thucydides informs us [s], and Samothracia from a colony of Samians, who, being driven out of their own iſland by their domeſtic tyrants, ſettled in that [t]. The iſland, ſtill known by the name of Samos, was in former ages diſtinguiſhed from the other two by the epithet of Ionian, being inhabited chiefly by the Iones, to whoſe confederacy it belonged. It had alſo the following names, Parthenia, according to Ariſtotle the moſt antient of all [u], Dryuſa, Anthemuſa, Melampyllus, Cypariſſia, Parthenoaruſa, Stephane [w], Anthemus, and Parthenias [x]. Whence it had the name of Samos, which in proceſs of time prevailed over all the reſt, is uncertain: Some writers, quoted by Strabo [y], are of opinion that it was ſo called from the Saæ, a people of Thrace, who ſettled in the iſland; but Strabo himſelf ſeems to inſinuate, that it borrowed this name from ſome hero, a native of the country. As this iſland is full of eminences and precipices, it is not unlikely, that the name of Samos was given it on that account, ſince the word Samos was uſed by the antient Greeks, as Conſtantine Porphyrogenitus informs us, to ſignify any high place or eminence. Name.

SAMOS lies between the continent of Aſia and the iſland of Icaria, being divided from the former by a ſtrait, according to Strabo 875, but in reality above a thouſand paces broad, and from the latter by another which is eight miles over. The ſtrait, which parts Samos from the continent of Aſia, is called by the Turks the little Bogazi, the word ſignifying Situation.

ſignifying in their language a canal or ſtrait, and the other which ſeparates it from the iſland of Icaria, the great Bogazi: As all the veſſels, trading from Conſtantinople to Syria and Egypt, paſs through one of theſe ſtraits, the courſe by Mycone and Nexia being too long, they were ſtill frequented by pyrates as they were in Strabo's time. In the middle of the little ſtrait ſtands a rock, between which and the iſland of Samos lies the ſmall iſland of Nartecis mentioned by Strabo [z], who places it over-againſt the cape Poſidium in Samos, famous for a ſtately temple built there by the Samians in honour of Neptune, whence it had the name of Poſidium, or Neptune's cape. The iſland of Samos lies between the 38th and 39th degrees of north latitude, and is about eighty-ſeven miles in circumference.

The city of Samos.

THE metropolis of Samos, and the only city in the country mentioned by the antients, bore the ſame name as the iſland. It ſtood on the ſouth-coaſt, partly in the plain and partly on the hills, being divided into the upper and lower town. The former took up the hills about the preſent city of Cora, which is near three miles from the ſea, and the latter the plain which extends from the preſent port of Tigani to the cape of Juno [a]. Strabo tells us, that this city was built by Tembrio and Procles, or, as ſome read it, Patrocles, who ſettled here with a colony of Ionians. But Vitruvius [b] is of opinion, that Samos and the thirteen towns of the Ionian confederacy were all built by Ion the Athenian, who gave his name to the country of Ionia. The city of Samos was in the flouriſhing times of Greece very populous, wealthy, and well fortified. We may judge of the antient ſplendor and greatneſs of this city, from the ruins of it, which are ſtill to be ſeen, and are fully deſcribed by a modern traveller [c]. Herodotus [d] takes notice of three things very remarkable at Samos; the firſt was a way opened through a mountain, ſeven furlongs in length, eight foot in height, and as many in breadth. A canal twenty cubits deep, and three foot broad was carried along the ſide of the aperture, and ſerved to convey, through various pipes, the water of a plentiful ſpring into the city. Eupalinus of Megara, the ſon of Nauſtrophus, was the contriver and director of this work. A modern traveller is of opinion, that the ſpring, which tempted the Samians to undertake ſo great a work, was

was that which is ſtill to be ſeen at Metelinous; for that ſpring is by far the beſt of the iſland, and the bored mountain ſtands between the ſmall town of Metelinous, and the ruins of antient Samos [e]. The entrance of the opening, which was carried quite through the mountain, is to be ſeen to this day, but the other parts have been long ſince filled up. The ſecond thing, which Herodotus obſerved at Samos, was a mole or pier, a hundred and twenty foot high, which formed the harbour and advanced above two furlongs into the ſea. Such an extraordinary work in thoſe early times ſhews, that the Samians were among the firſt of the Greeks who applied themſelves to navigation; and indeed we find them employing Aminocles the Corinthian, the ableſt ſhip-builder of his time, near three hundred years before the Peloponneſian war [f]. The third thing, counted by Herodotus among the wonders of Samos, was the famous temple of Juno, the moſt ſpacious, as that hiſtorian affirms, which he ever ſaw [g]. The ruins of this edifice are ſtill to be ſeen about half a mile from the ſea, and the like diſtance from the river Imbraſus. A modern traveller gives us a diſtinct account of them, which it would be too long to inſert here [h]. Menodorus the Samian, who wrote a treatiſe on the curioſities of that iſland, tells us, that this temple was built by Caricus, and certain nymphs [i]; for he ſuppoſes the iſland to have been firſt poſſeſſed by the Carians, ſo called from Caricus their leader. Pauſanias writes, that it was the work of the Argonauts, who brought from Argos to Samos a ſtatue of the goddeſs, and placed it in a magnificent temple built by them in this iſland, which was in a particular manner ſacred to Juno, who was ſuppoſed to have been born here on the banks of the river Imbraſus, under one of thoſe trees which we call Agnus Caſtus. The ſtump of this tree was ſhewn, as the ſame author informs us, for many ages in the temple, and no leſs honoured than Juno herſelf [k]. The ſtatue of the goddeſs, as the ſame Pauſanias tells us, was the work of Smilis, a famous ſculptor of Ægina, and contemporary with Dædalus. Clemens Alexandrinus [l] ſpeaks of this temple, as one of the moſt ſtately buildings of antiquity, and adds out of Æthlius, a very antient author, that the Samians at firſt worſhipped only the ſtump of a tree, which was afterwards wards formed into a ſtatue. The Tyrrhenian pirates, if we believe Menodotus [m], having attempted to carry away this ſtatue, and put it already on board one of their ſhips, were kept in the harbour with contrary winds till they carried it back to the temple; the fame of this pretended miracle drew crowds of votaries from all parts, and greatly increaſed the worſhip which was paid to the Samian Juno.

The Heræan games were inſtituted by the Greeks in honour of Juno, whom they called Here, were celebrated in this iſland with the utmoſt magnificence. The fabulous opinion, which prevailed in Samos, that Juno had lived there from her earlieſt infancy, till ſhe became marriageable, and that Jupiter had married her there, gave riſe to the ſolemnity which they annually celebrated in honour of that goddeſs. The Samians then renewed the nuptial rejoycings in her temple, where was amongſt other ſtatues one of this their tutelary goddeſs, under the figure of a new-married woman, to perpetuate the memory of her marriage with Jupiter. We have ſtill remaining, in the antient monuments, ſeveral traces of the zealous worſhip the Samians paid to Juno. Moſt of the Samian medals are ſtamped with the figure of this goddeſs, holding a ſcepter in her hand, to ſhew her dominion over the iſland, and have on the reverſe a peacock her favourite bird. The temple of Juno, where the Heræan ſolemnities were performed, was one of the moſt antient of Greece, having been built, if we believe Herodotus [n] by one Rhœcus the ſon of Phileus, a native of Samos, ſoon after the Ionians ſettled in the iſland. This antient temple was burnt down to the ground by the Perſians, but ſoon after rebuilt, and ſo enriched with gifts that there was no room for ſtatues and pictures [o]. Verres on his return from Aſia, notwithſtanding the miracle, which had ſaved the goddeſs from the Tyrrhenians, did not ſcruple to rifle the temple, and ſtrip it of all its rich moveables, as appears from Tully, who upbraids him with this impiety [p]. The pirates ſhewed no more reſpect to the goddeſs and her temple in Pompey's time. In a court adjoining to the temple was an immenſe number of ſtatues, done by the moſt famous ſtatuaries of Greece, and amongſt other three of a coloſſean ſize, all on the ſame baſe, repreſenting Jupiter, Minerva, and Hercules. They were the work of Myron, who made the brazen cow ſo much much celebrated by the Greek wits of thoſe days in their epigrams, which have been tranſlated by Auſonius into Latin. Mark Antony carried theſe three ſtatues to Rome; but Auguſtus reſtored thoſe of Minerva and Hercules to the Samians; that of Jupiter he kept at Rome, and placed it in a little temple which he cauſed to be built on the capitol. The amours of Jupiter and Juno were painted on the ceiling of the temple, and repreſented ſo naturally, that Origen reproaches the gentiles with expoſing them to the eyes of the multitude [q].

Soil. THE fruitfulneſs of its ſoil is highly commended by the antients, namely by Strabo, who ſeems to prefer it in this reſpect to the moſt fertile countries of Aſia. Here the trees, if we believe Æthlius as quoted by Athenæus, yielded fruit twice a year [r]. Pliny takes notice of the pomgranates of Samos, ſome of which had red grains, others white [s]. The only thing which Strabo did not admire in Samos was the wine, which was but very indifferent in his time, though all the neighbouring iſlands were famous on account of their excellent wines.

Arts, &c. THE Samians applied themſelves very early to trade and navigation; for Herodotus ſpeaks of them as trading to Egypt, Thera, and Spain, before any of the other Greeks, except Soſtratus of Ægina, were acquainted with thoſe countries. They are ſaid by Pliny to have been the firſt contrivers of veſſels fit for the tranſporting of cavalry [t]. Samos was in former ages famed for earthen ware, which, if we believe Gellius [u], was firſt made in this iſland, and in great requeſt among the antients, who uſed the Samian earthen ware in their moſt ſplendid entertainments [w]. The earth about the preſent village of Bavonda is ſtill deemed very proper for potter's ware; but no-body in the iſland now follows that profeſſion, the inhabitants being ſupplied with that ware from Ancona and Scio.

Inhabitants and government. THE iſland of Samos was firſt peopled, according to Strabo [x] and other antient writers, by the Carians, and afterwards by colonies from Ithaca and Cephalenia. Some ages after the Ionians, having ſeized part of Caria, paſſed over into the iſland of Samos, and ſettling there under the conduct of Tembrio and Procles, united the city of Samos to the Ionian confederacy. This happened, as Eusebius informs us [y], in the twelfth year of the reign of Rehoboham king of Hierusalem. Heraclides [z] tells us, that this island lay desolate till the time of Macareus, the son of Æolis, who having killed the wild beasts that infested it, settled there, and continued in possession of the island till the arrival of the Carians. But whoever were the first inhabitants, it is certain, that the city of Samos in after-ages held a considerable rank among the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy, being celebrated by the antients, as no way inferior either to Miletus or Ephesus, which were the chief cities of the Ionians.

The Samians were first governed by kings; for Herodotus [a] names one Amphicrates reigning at Samos; but how long this kind of government continued, or on what account it was abolished, is what we find no-where recorded. From the kings the administration passed into the hands of the Geomori, who formed a kind of senate and had much the same power as the ephori of Sparta. This form of government gave room to a democracy, and the democracy to an oligarchy. The Samians continued for many ages free from all foreign subjection, but were often reduced to a state of slavery by their domestic tyrants, as we shall relate in their history.

History of Samos.

The first enterprize of the Samians, mentioned in history, is their sailing to Egypt, and planting a colony there in the city of Oasis, which, as Herodotus informs us [b], was inhabited by Samians of the Æschrionian tribe, but as to the time of this expedition we are quite in the dark, as also of their first voyage to Tartessus in Spain, which is related by Herodotus thus: A Samian vessel, bound homeward from Egypt, under the command of one Colæus, was by stress of weather driven into the harbour of Platæa, an island of Lybia. From thence Colæus set sail with a design to recover the coasts of Egypt, but had scarce left the island, when a violent easterly wind arising carried him, in spite of all his endeavours, beyond the pillars of Hercules, nor did it ever cease or abate till he arrived at Tartessus. As no foreign traders had ever before touched at that port, the

the inhabitants flocking to the ſhore bought their commodities at ſuch prices as they were pleaſed to ſet upon them; whence the profits they made were ſo conſiderable, that upon their return to Samos they made with the tenth part of their gain, amounting to ſix talents, a baſon of braſs, ſurrounded with the heads of griffins inclining to each other, and placed it in the temple of Juno, ſupported by three ſtatues of braſs in a kneeling poſture ſeven foot high [c]. In the reign of their king Amphicrates they made war upon the inhabitants of Ægina; but all we know of this expedition is, that it reduced both parties to great extremities [d]. This war happened before the reign of Cambyſes king of Perſia, for in his time the Æginates, entering into an alliance with the Cretans, revenged themſelves on the Samians for the evils they had ſuffered on this occaſion, as we ſhall ſee anon. The Samians, as the ſame Herodotus informs us [e], maintained their liberties both againſt Crœſus and Cyrus, after thoſe princes had reduced the other Ionian ſtates on the continent. They were expert mariners, and had a conſiderable fleet, which protected them againſt any foreign invaſion. However, they were very early brought under ſubjection by their own tyrants. Among theſe we may reckon the Geomori, that is, the nobility of Samos, ſo called from their dividing the lands among themſelves, after they had entirely ſuppreſſed the popular faction. During the uſurpation of the Geomori, the inhabitants of Megara having attacked the city of Perinthus, which the Samians had built and peopled, a war was kindled between theſe two nations. The Geomori, who then governed with an abſolute ſway, commanded thirty ſhips of war to be equipped, and committed the management of the war to nine commanders, each of which had an equal power. Theſe falling upon the Megarenſes routed them with great ſlaughter, and took ſix hundred priſoners. Being elated with this victory they reſolved to try whether they ſhould be attended with the ſame ſucceſs againſt their domeſtic enemies; for theſe commanders were all of the popular faction. Accordingly having armed the ſix hundred Megarenſes, whom they had taken priſoners, on their return they attacked the Geomori while they are aſſembled in council, put moſt of them to the ſword, and reſtored the democracy [f]. Not long after a war breaking out between the Samians and Æolians, the former choſe one Syloſon to command their forces, who, as he was an ambitious man, inſtead of attacking the enemy, remained at Samos under various pretences, till ſuch time, as he had gained both the officers and ſoldiers over to his party, and then made himſelf maſter of the city in the following manner. The Samians uſed annually to perform with great ſolemnity certain ceremonies in honour of Juno in the temple of that goddeſs, which ſtood without the walls of the city. As they were then ready to engage in a war, Syloſon under pretence of piety prevailed upon the citizens to march all at once in proceſſion from the market-place to the temple. This proceſſion he led himſelf, but ſtealing away aſſoon as the crowd got into the temple, he returned to the city, and, by means of the ſoldiers he had left on board the fleet in the harbour, poſſeſſed himſelf of all the important poſts; ſo that the citizens on their returning home were forced to ſubmit to their new tyrant, having neither courage nor arms to oppoſe him [g].

About this time the Samians, by diſobliging the Corinthians, ſowed the ſeeds of thoſe annimoſities, which broke out between the two nations in the following age. The matter is thus related by Herodotus [h]: Periander tyrant of Corinth, to revenge the death of his ſon on the Corcyreans, by whom he had been murdered, ſeized three hundred youths of the chief families of Corcyra, and put them on board certain Corinthian ſhips in order to ſend them to Sardis, where they were to be made eunuchs, and as ſuch ſerve Halyattes king of Lydia. But the ſhips that tranſported them touching at Samos, the Samians adviſed the Corcyræan youths to take ſanctuary in the temple of Diana, and would not ſuffer the Corinthians to remove them from thence, ſaying, that they were under the protection of the goddeſs. The Corinthians beſet the temple in order to prevent any proviſions from being conveyed to them, and by that means oblige them to abandon their aſylum. But the Samians aſſembling their youth of both ſexes, under colour of celebrating a feſtival in honour of Diana, ordered them to dance round the temple with cakes of flower and honey in their hands, to the end that the Corcyræans might ſnatch them from them, and by that means ſuſtain themſelves. This practice they continued till the Corinthians, after having ing waited a long time, thought fit to leave the iſland; when the Samians, putting the youths of Corcyra on board their ſhips of war, conveyed them ſafe to their native country. This the Corinthians remembered, and many years after joined the Lacedæmonians in the war which they made upon the Samians, as we ſhall relate in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

Æaces. THE Samians after the death of Syloſon enjoyed their liberty for ſome time, but were again brought under ſubjection by one of their chief citizens named Æaces, of whom mention is made by Herodotus [i]. Æaces had three ſons, Polycrates, Pantagnoſtus, and Syloſon. Polycrates in his father's life-time formed a deſign of ſeizing on the government, but could not put it in execution till ſome years after his death, the Samians guarding themſelves with great care againſt any attempts of that nature. However, he at length compaſſed his deſign in the following manner. As his father had left him an immenſe treaſure, he gained the affection of the populace by living in a moſt ſplendid and elegant manner. He made frequent entertainments, inviting to them even thoſe of the loweſt rank among the people. He provided at a vaſt expence the richeſt furniture that had ever been ſeen till his time in the iſland, and was ever willing to lend his ſilver and gold plate or ſtately beds to ſuch as were to ſolemnize marriages or make entertainments. Being by this means become the darling of the people, he imparted his deſign of making himſelf abſolute to his brothers, promiſing to ſhare with them the iſland and ſuch other acquiſitions as he might make. They readily came into his meaſures; where-upon it was agreed, that they ſhould fall upon the people with a body of armed men, whom Polycrates had gained with large promiſes, while they were celebrating a feaſt in honour of Juno, and that Polycrates ſhould at the ſame time poſſeſs himſelf of the city. The antients tell us, that Poiycrates in this undertaking was aſſiſted by fifteen men only, not venturing to admit others into the conſpiracy for fear of being betrayed; ſo univerſally did the love of liberty prevail among the Samians [k]. With this ſmall body he made himſelf maſter of the moſt important places of the city, reduced the citadel called Aſtipalæa, and maintained himſelf in it, againſt the utmoſt efforts of the Samians, till he was relieved by a body of Naxians, ſent him by Lygdamis tyrant of Naxus. With this reinforcement he ſettled himſelf on the throne after having either baniſhed or put to death all thoſe who had declared againſt him. Having thus got rid of his enemies, he amply rewarded his friends by conferring upon them the chief employments of his new kingdom; he divided the iſland, purſuant to his promiſe, with his two brothers; but ſoon after repenting of what he had done cauſed Pantagnoſtus to be put to death, and baniſhed Syloſon. By this means being maſter of the whole iſland, he began to entertain thoughts of inlarging his dominions, and that he might not be diverted by the king of Egypt, he entered into an alliance with Amaſis, who then reigned there. The friendſhip between theſe two princes was cultivated with mutual preſents: amongſt others Amaſis ſent to Samos two ſtatues of himſelf curiouſly carved in wood, which are ſtill to be ſeen in the time of Herodotus, ſtanding behind the gates of the temple of Juno. Having nothing to fear on the ſide of Egypt, which was than a powerful kingdom, he equipped a fleet of an hundred gallies, and putting on board a thouſand choſen archers and other land-forces, he fell upon the neighbouring iſlands, being in all his enterprizes attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that he attacked no place without maſtering it. He did not ſpare even his friends and allies, ſaying that they would be more obliged to him if he reſtored to them what he had taken, than if he had left them in the quiet poſſeſſion of their lands and dominions. After he had reduced moſt of the iſlands he landed his forces on the continent of Aſia, and made himſelf maſter of many cities on the coaſt; inſomuch, that embaſſadors were ſent to him from all the neighbouring ſtates, offering to ſubmit upon what terms he was pleaſed to impoſe. The Leſbians alone oppoſed him, but were entirely defeated in a ſea-fight, in which he took a great many priſoners, and condemning them all to the chain employed them in ſurrounding the city of Samos with a deep and wide ditch. When news was brought to Amaſis of the ſucceſs that attended him in all his expeditions, he is ſaid to have wrote to him in the following terms. Amaſis to Polycrates: I have heard with pleaſure the fortunate ſucceſſes that attend the enterprizes of a friend and ally. But the unuſual greatneſs of your proſperity alarms me, being well appriſed that the gods are envious. As for me, me, I would rather chuſe that my affairs and thoſe of my friends ſhould be alternately attended with good and bad fortune through the whole courſe of my life, than be always accompanied with an uninterrupted felicity. For I do not remember to have ever heard of a man, who having been always happy did not at laſt periſh by ſome ſignal calamity. Be adviſed therefore by me, and guard yourſelf againſt the bad conſequences of good fortune in this manner: conſider what you value moſt, and would be greatly concerned to loſe, and of that, be it what it will, deprive yourſelf. If your proſperity ſtill continues without any viciſſitude, repeat the ſame remedy. Polycrates, having read the letter, approved of the advice given him by his friend, and after deliberating with himſelf what thing he would be moſt unwilling to part with, came at laſt to this reſolution. He had a ſeal cut in an emerald, and ſet in gold by one Theodorus a Samian. This he valued above all his treaſures, and therefore to counterbalance his good fortune, going on board a galley of fifty oars, and advancing far into the deep, in the preſence of all thoſe who attended him, he threw the emerald into the ſea. He then commanded them to ſail back, and on his return was greatly grieved for the loſs of ſuch an ineſtimable treaſure. But a few days after a fiſherman having taken a fiſh of an extraordinary ſize, and thinking it a preſent worthy of Polycrates, carried it to the palace. Polycrates was highly pleaſed with it, and having invited the fiſherman to dine with him, ordered it to be dreſſed that very day. When the ſervants opened the belly of the fiſh they found, to their great ſurprize, the emerald lodged there, and immediately carried it to Polycrates, who being perſuaded that ſuch an extraordinary event could not be imputed to chance, but to a particular providence of the gods, acquainted Amaſis with his throwing the ſignet into the ſea, and the manner in which he had recovered it. Amaſis, having read his letter, and not doubting but ſome great misfortune would ſoon or late befal him, immediately diſpatched an herald to Samos, enjoining him to renounce in his name the friendſhip of Polycrates, and diſſolve all the obligations of hoſpitality, that had been contracted between them; leſt the calamities, which threatened Polycrates, ſhould affect him with that grief which a friend owes to the misfortunes of a friend [1].

Polycrates, being no longer under any engagements with the king of Egypt, sent embassadors to Cambyses king of Persia, enjoining them to conclude an alliance with that prince, and offer him what forces he required for the expedition he was meditating against Egypt. Cambyses readily accepted of the offer made him by the embassadors, and at the same time accquainted Polycrates that he stood in no need of land-forces, but wanted a fleet to convey his troops into Egypt. Hereupon Polycrates having equipped forty gallies sent them to Cambyses, with all those Samians on board, whom he suspected of seditious designs, requesting him not to suffer them ever to return to their native country. Some writers affirm, that these Samians never arrived in Egypt, but in their passage having called a council of war resolved not to proceed farther than the Carpathian sea. Others tells us, that they arrived in Egypt, but finding themselves there carefully watched by the Persians, laid hold of the first opportunity to make their escape, and on their return to Samos met the fleet of Polycrates, which they defeated, and landed safe in their own country, where they fought an unsuccessful battle at land, and afterwards set sail for Lacedæmon. Some writers say, that in this action too they carried the day; but this opinion as Herodotus rightly observes, is quite groundless; for they would not have been obliged to implore the assistance of the Lacedæmonians, if they had found themselves in a condition to make head against the forces of the tyrant. Besides, it is very improbable, that one, who had a numerous army of mercenaries, and a chosen body of Samian bowmen in constant pay, should be overcome by so unequal a number as those were who returned from Egypt, especially if we consider, that Polycrates, as Herodotus informs us, to prevent any treachery had shut up the wives and children of all the Samians in the arsenal, resolving to burn them together with the naval stores, if he found himself betrayed to the exiles [m].

These Samians,* thus expelled by Polycrates, had recourse to the Lacedæmonians, by whom they were at first received but very indifferently, for having made a long speech setting forth the calamities they had suffered, the Lacedæmo-

Lacedæmonians gave them no other anſwer, than that they had forgot the firſt part of their ſpeech, and therefore did not underſtand the laſt. The Samians being a ſecond time admitted into the aſſembly brought with them an empty baſket, and ſhewing it, only ſaid, it is empty, ſignifying thereby that they wanted bread. The Lacedæmonians anſwered that the baſket alone ſufficiently declared their wants, and immediately decreed to aſſiſt them. The Samian writers, quoted by Herodotus, tell us, that the Lacedæmonians undertook the defence of the exiles, in requital of the aſſiſtance they had formerly received from them in a war with the Meſſenians; but the Lacedæmonians ſay, that they eſpouſed their cauſe not out of any good will to the exiles, but to be revenged on the Samians for having formerly intercepted a curious baſon, which they had ſent as a preſent to Crœſus king of Lydia, and robbed them the year before of a rich preſent, which the king of Egypt had ſent them. But whatever was the motive that prompted them to aſſiſt the baniſhed Samians, they equipped a powerful fleet, and being joined by the Corinthians, whom the Samians had formerly diſobliged as we have related above, ſet ſail for Samos and laid ſiege to the capital of the iſland. Polycrates made a vigorous defence, and frequently ſallying out, cut great numbers of the aggreſſors in pieces. In one of theſe ſallies the Samians being entirely routed were purſued great with ſlaughter to the very gates of their city, which the Lacedæmonians would have taken had they followed the example of their leaders Archias and Lycopes. For theſe two entered the city together with the flying Samians, and finding their retreat cut off, died valiantly fighting within the walls. The Lacedæmonians continued before the place for the ſpace of forty days; but finding they could not maſter it, raiſed the ſiege and returned to Lacedæmon. Some writers tell us, that Polycrates, having agreed to pay them on their departure a large ſum of money, cauſed a great many pieces of lead to be coined and gilt, and with theſe purchaſed a peace without leſſening his treaſures or enriching the enemy [n].

AFTER their departure, thoſe Samians, who had brought the war upon Polycrates, finding themſelves abandoned, ſet ſail for the iſland of Siphnus, which is one of the Cyclades. The affairs of the Siphnians were then in a flouriſhing

ing condition, and their riches immenſe, that iſland ſo abounding in mines of gold and ſilver, that the tenth of the money they coined being ſent yearly to Delphos equalled the greateſt treaſure there; for they divided once a year the riches which they drew from their mines, ſending the tenth part of the whole as a preſent to Apollo. One year, after having made the uſual offering, they conſulted the oracle to know whether their proſperity ſhould continue long, and received this anſwer from the Pythian. When the public ſtructures ſhall be cloathed in white, let the wiſe men beware of a wooden force and red embaſſadors. The prytanean court and porticos at Siphnus were then adorned with Parian marble; and yet the Siphnians did not underſtand the meaning of the oracle even upon the landing of the Samians, though they ſent immediately one of their ſhips, which acording to the Samian faſhion was painted red, with embaſſadors to the city of Siphnus. The Samians, being admitted to audience deſired a loan of ten talents; but receiving a denial returned to their companions and ravaged the territories of Siphnus. Whereupon the Siphnians drawing together all their forces engaged the Samians, but were defeated and many of them taken priſoners, for whoſe ranſom the Samians received an hundred talents. With this ſupply they repaired their ſhips and ſailed to Hermione, the inhabitants of which place, through fear of being treated by them as the Siphnians had been, gave them the iſland of Thyrea, ſituate near Peloponneſus, which they committed to the care of the Trœzenians, and purſued their courſe to the iſland of Crete, where they founded the city of Cydonia, after having driven out of that part of the iſland the Zacynthians. They continued in this ſettlement five years, and built the temple of Dictynna with ſeveral others, which were ſtill ſtanding in the time of our hiſtorian. But in the ſixth year they were entirely defeated together with the Cretans in a ſea-fight by the inhabitants of Ægina, who took off the prows of their ſhips, and placed them in the temple of Minerva. Thus the Æginates revenged themſelves on the Samians, for having formerly made war upon them without any provocation under the conduct of their king Amphicrates, as we have hinted above [o]. The Samians, being driven from Crete, ſailed, if we believe Euſebius [p], to Italy, and there founded the

the city of Dicæarchi, called afterwards Puteoli, and at preſent Puzzoli.

But to return to Polycrates; upon the departure of the Lacedæmonians and Samian exiles, he began to entertain thoughts of ſubduing all Ionia, together with the Aſiatic iſlands, an enterprize, as Herodotus obſerves, which no one before him had ever attempted. He raiſed a numerous army, equipped the greateſt fleet that had been ſeen in thoſe ſeas till that time, and made all the other neceſſary preparations for ſo difficult an undertaking. But before he could accompliſh his deſign, he was cut off by an untimely death, which is thus related by Herodotus. Oroetes a Perſian, who had been appointed governor of Sardis by Cyrus, another of the ſame nation, by name Mitrobates, governor of Daſcylium, falling one day out, Mitrobates upbraided Oroetes for not having reduced the iſland of Samos, which lay ſo near his government, and had been brought under ſubjection by Polycrates, with the aſſiſtance only of fifteen men. This reprocah left a deep impreſſion on the mind of Oroetes, who from that time watched all opportunities of being revenged, not on Mitrobates, who had affronted him, but on Polycrates as the cauſe of the affront, though he had never ſeen him or been any ways injured by him. Other antient writers ſay, that Oroetes ſent a meſſenger to Polycrates about ſome private affairs, and that Polycrates happening on the arrival of the meſſenger to be lying on a couch, Anacreon of Teos, the famous lyric poet, ſitting by him, he did not condeſcend to give the meſſenger any anſwer, or even to look at him, continuing the whole time he delivered his meſſage with his face towards the wall. This, they ſay, was what provoked the haughty Perſian, and prompted him to put Polycrates treacherouſly to death. Oroetes reſided at that time in the city of Magneſia, whence he ſent one Myrſus the ſon of Gyges, a Lydian, to Samos, enjoining him to acquaint Polycrates, that he had heard what great things he had in view, but had been at the ſame time informed that he wanted money to put his projects in execution. Wherefore he deſigned to aſſiſt him with great treaſures, provided he would engage to protect him againſt Cambyſes, who was determined, according to the private intelligence he had received, to take away his life. The meſſenger was ordered to add, that if Polycrates queſtioned the truth of what he ſaid concerning the treaſures, he might eaſily ſatisfy himſelf ſelf in that particular, by ſending one of the moſt truſty perſons he had about him to ſee them. Polycrates received this propoſal with joy, and immediately ſent his ſecretary Mæandrus to take a view of the treaſures. When Oroetes heard he was coming with this deſign he cauſed eight cheſts to be filled with ſtones, which he covered with ſome pieces of gold, and by that means deceived Mæandrus, upon whoſe information Polycrates reſolved to go in perſon to Oroetes, though he was earneſtly diſſuaded by his friends, and, if we believe Herodotus, by the gods themſelves (N). But he deſpiſing their advice ſet out with divers of his friends, among whom was Democedes the Crotonian, the moſt ſkilful phyſician of his time. When he arrived at Magneſia, the treacherous Oroetes cauſed him to be ſeized and crucified, a death, as Herodotus obſerves, unworthy a man, who far excelled in all reſpects the greateſt heroes of his age [p]. Valerius Maximus [q] and Tully [r] tells us, that he was crucified by Oroetes, for ſo they call him, governor under Darius Hyſtaſpis, upon the top of mount Mycale, which is a promontory of Ionia over-againſt Samos. But it is very plain from all the ancients, that Darius was then only one of Cambyſes's guards, and that Polycrates came to this tragical end while Cambyſes was delirious in Egypt. Pliny [s] in this agrees with Hero-

(N) Herodotus tells us, that his daughter dreamt ſhe ſaw her father elevated in the air, and anointed by the ſun, and that being deeply affected with her dream, ſhe endeavoured by all means to divert him from his intended voyage, accompanying him even to the ſea-ſide, and aſſuring him that nothing but misfortunes could attend his enterprize. But Polycrates rejecting all advice embarqued on a galley of fifty oars, threatening his daughter, who left no ſtone unturned to prevent his journey, that if he returned ſafe, ſhe ſhould long continue unmarried. Upon his arrival at Magneſia being ſeized by Oroetes and crucified, the dream of his daughter ſays Herodotus, was accompliſhed; for as he hung on the croſs expoſed to the heat of the ſun, he was firſt all covered over with the ſweat of his body, and afterwards a violent ſhower happening to fall, waſhed we may ſay by Jupiter who ſent it (3). By the help of ſuch diſtorted interpretations there is no dream, but what may be eaſily fulfilled.

Herodotus; for according to him Polycrates was put to death in the 230th year of Rome, which, if we follow Varro, fell upon the sixty-fourth Olympiad. Thus died Polycrates, a prince, who to the hour of his death had never felt the least shock of adverse fortune, being attended, during the whole course of his life, in every thing he undertook, with all the success and prosperity he could have wished for. All the ancients speak of his prosperity as miraculous, and amongst others Valerius Maximus, who tells us, that he never formed a design, which he did not with great ease put in execution, nor earnestly wish for a thing which he did not obtain, as if fortune had been wholly employed in waiting upon him [t]. He was, without all doubt, a man of most extraordinary parts, and, if we believe Herodotus [u], superior in wisdom, greatness of mind, and other princely qualities to all the Greek tyrants, not even those of Syracuse excepted. He took great delight in the conversation of learned men, and used to spend great part of his time, when at leisure from public affairs, with Anacreon and Pythagoras. The former he once presented with five talents, and the latter he recommended in a very obliging manner to Amasis king of Egypt, when that philosopher undertook for his improvement a journey into that kingdom. He embellished the city of Samos with many magnificent and stately buildings, which, as Aristotle informs us [w], were still standing in his time; nay great part of the palace, which he built for himself, was remaining in the time of the Roman emperors; for Caligula, as we read in Suetonius [x], had some thoughts of repairing that noble fabric, which was a subject of admiration even in those days. As to his character there is no small disagreement among authors, some painting him as a cruel tyrant, and others representing him as a prince of great humanity and moderation. Diodorus Siculus [y] tells us, that he oppressed his own subjects in a most tyrannical manner, and with no less cruelty treated such strangers as happened to come into his country: which so shocked Amasis king of Egypt, that, after having advised him in vain to rule with more humanity and moderation, he at last renounced the friendship which he had contracted with him, saying, that he foresaw the miserable fall that would soon overovertake one who governed so tyrannically. This, as we have seen above, is related in a very different manner by Herodotus, who seems to have entertained a far better opinion of Polycrates; for he commends him as a prince of great generosity, and speaking of this unhappy end says, that he was put to death in a manner unworthy of a man of his dignity and grandeur, and not to be mentioned without indignation [z]. But Diogenes Laertius, Porphyrius, Jamblichus, Gellius, and Eusebius seem to agree with Diodorus, for they are all unanimous in telling us, that Pythagoras (O) abandoned his native country, because he could not endure the tyranny of Polycrates.

Polycrates

[z] Herodot. ubi supra.

(O) This celebrated philosopher was a native of Samos, and for some time a great favourite of Polycrates; but on his return from Egypt, Phœnice, and Chaldea, whither he had travelled for his improvement, not being able to endure the tyranny of Polycrates, he retired to that part of Italy, which was called Magna Græcia, and founded there a famous sect of philosophers. Most writers acknowledge him to be the inventor of arithmetic, which Plato (4) ascribes to the Egyptian Mercury, and some others to Palamedes (5). St. Austin (6) speaks of a goddess Numeria, whom the Pagans worshipped as the goddess of numbers, believeing they had been first introduced by her. Pythagoras is said to have been the first who taught the immortality of the soul. As to the transmigration of souls, which was the principal part of his philosophy, some writers endeavour to excuse him, saying, that he meant only the sensitive soul or vital principle of the animal. We are told, he was never seen to weep or laugh. Diogenes Laertius, Porphyrius, Jamblichus, and others, who have wrote his life, greatly vary among themselves as to the particulars and circumstances of his death; some saying he was assassinated, others that he died suddenly, &c. He died, according to Eusebius (7), in the fourth year of the seventieth olympiad, and eightieth or ninetieth of his life. Cedrenus tells us, that he wrote an account of the war which Cyrus made upon the Samians, and relates from him that Cyrus was killed in this war. But that writer was certainly mistaken, since Plutarch, Lucian, and Porphyrius

Polycrates was succeeded in the tyranny by Mæandrus his secretary, whom upon his departure for Magnesia he had appointed to govern during his absence. When Mæandrus heard of his death, he took the whole power into his own hands, Syloson the late king's brother being then in banishment. Mæandrus was a man of great probity, and phyrius assure us, that Pythagoras resolved to leave nothing in writing. Josephus likewise (8) informs us, that in his time no one piece ascribed to this philosopher was allowed to be genuine; and Rufinus, in his answer to S. Hierom, who had quoted Pythagoras, urges, that there were no genuine writings of that philosopher remaining; to which Hierom replied, that what he had said of him was not meant of his writings, but of his opinions, which he had learnt from Cicero, Brutus, and Seneca. However, Diogenes Laertius in his life mentions three books written by him, namely of instruction, politics, and natural philosophy. The book of verses, which bears his name and is a collection of the opinions and maxims of the Pythagorean philosophers, was not written by him, but by one Lysis, if we believe Laertius, a Pythagorean of Sarepta, who retired from Thebes, and was preceptor to Epaminondas. Others ascribe this book to Philolaus, some to Epicharmus, and some to Empedocles.

Pythagoras was not the only great man this island produced; Chœrilus, Conon, Cacophylus, Pythagoras the statuary, &c. were natives of Samos, and are mentioned by Strabo and other antient writers as the ornaments of the ages they lived in (9). Chœrilus wrote in verse the actions of Xerxes and Darius kings of Persia, and of Archelaus king of Macedon. Josephus quotes some of his verses on the expedition of Xerxes into Greece, wherein he speaks of a nation serving under that prince come from Phœnice using an unknown language, and dwelling on the mountains of Solyma near a great lake; which, in the opinion of Josephus, is plainly meant of the Jews, the mountains of Solyma and the lake of Asphaltites being in their country. Suidas and Strabo (10) cite other verses from the same poem, and Hesychius tells us, that the Athenians gave him a stater of gold for each verse of the poem he wrote on the victory obtained by the Greeks over Xerxes. Some writers have confounded Chœrilus the Samian with another poet bearing the same name, who lived in the time of Alexander and therefore no ſooner ſaw himſelf inveſted with the ſovereign power, but he reſolved to reſign it, and reſtore his countrymen to their former liberty. Having therefore erected an altar to Jupiter the deliverer, and marked out the ground for a temple, he ſummoned a general aſſembly of the citizens, and addreſſed

The latter was a wretched writer, as appears from what Horace ſays of him in the following verſes:

Rettulit acceptos, regale numiſma, Philippos (11):

And elſewhere (12),

Chœrilus the Samian lived before Alexander, and withdrew from Samos to the court of Archelaus, where he died. Some of his verſes, which have been tranſmitted to us by Ariſtotle (13) and Tatian, ſhew that he was no contemptible poet.

Conon was a famous mathematician, and is ſaid to have wrote ſeven books of aſtronomy. He lived in an intimate friendſhip with Archimedes, and taught him, as Pomponius Mela informs us, the firſt rudiments of mathematics. It was he who gave out, that the hair of Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes, was taken up into heaven, and there transformed into ſeven ſtars, called from thence Coma Berenices. He is mentioned by Strabo (14), Virgil (15), and others. Creophylus was an excellent poet and contemporary with Homer, who preſented him, as we read in Strabo (16), with a poem on the taking of the city of Oechalia. This poem is mentioned alſo by Pauſanias and Callimachus; but both theſe writers make Creophylus, and not Homer, the author of it. Creophylus entertained Homer in his houſe, and is ſaid by ſome to have been his maſter, and to have had great ſhare in the compoſing of the divine work, as Cicero ſtiles it, which paſſes under the name of that inimitable poet. Hierophyle, one of the ſybils, was likewiſe a native of Samos, and is commonly known by the name of the Samian Sybil.

dreſſed them thus: "You know that I was entruſted with "the ſceptre and all the power of Polycrates, and that the "government is wholly in my hands. But I will not be "guilty of a crime, which I ſhould condemn in another. "The arbitrary power aſſumed by Polycrates over men "equal to himſelf was never approved of by me; neither "ſhall I ever approve of it in any other perſon. Now "that the decree of the gods has been fulfilled in him, "I ſurrender the government into your hands, and pro-"claim an equal liberty to all. Only I deſire you would "grant me ſix talents out of the treaſures of Polycrates, "and confer upon me and my deſcendants for ever the "the prieſthood of the temple of Jupiter the deliverer, "as a juſt reward of the benefits you are to receive by "my means." Having thus ſpoke, one Teleſearchus, a leading man among the Samians, bitterly inveighing a-gainſt him, inſiſted upon his giving an account of the public money he had ſpent, during the ſhort time he had governed. Mæandrus perceiving by the tenor of this ſpeech that, if he diveſted himſelf of the power, he could be no longer ſafe in his own country, and that ſome other would ſoon uſurp it, reſolved to keep poſſeſſion of the govern-ment; and accordingly retiring to the citadel, and ſending for the citizens under colour of giving them an account of the public treaſures, he ſeized their perſons and kept them under cloſe confinement to prevent inſurrections in the city. In the mean time, Mæandrus falling ſick, his brother Lycaretus, imagining he could not recover, put all the priſoners to death, that he might with more eaſe uſurp the ſovereignty. But Mæandrus recovered and ruled quiet-ly in Samos, till he was driven out by the Perſians, who placed Syloſon, the brother of Polycrates, in his room. This event is related by Herodotus [a] in the following man-ner. Syloſon being baniſhed by his brother, as we have related above, retired into Egypt, where Cambyſes was at that time making war upon Amaſis king of that country. While he reſided at Memphis, Darius, who was one of Cambyſes's guards and made then no great figure, was greatly taken with a ſcarlet cloak which Syloſon wore, and aſked him whether he would ſell it. Syloſon, perceiving him to be paſſionately fond of the garment, anſwered, that he would not part with it for any riches, but would willingly give it him, if he cared to receive it as a preſent. Darius accepted the offer, and Syloſon, who was then but in very indifferent circumſtances, thought himſelf a loſer by his forward generoſity. But when he heard that Darius, after the the death of Cambyſes and deſtruction of the mages, was advanced to the throne, he haſtened to Suſa, and deſired audience of the king, telling the guards that he had been a benefactor to him; which when Darius heard, he anſwered with ſurprize; What Grecian is this who pretends to have conferred benefits upon me, and to be reſpected on that account? I have but lately taken poſſeſſion of the kingdom, and have ſeen here few or none of that country; neither can I remember that I am at all obliged to any Grecian. However, bring in the man that I may hear what he ſays from his own mouth. Syloſon was immediately introduced, and aſked by the interpreters who he was, and what he meant by ſaying that he had been a benefactor to the king. Then Syloſon related what had paſſed in Egypt between Darius and himſelf, which the king remembering anſwered: O thou moſt generous man! art thou then the perſon from whoſe hands I received that preſent, which, though ſmall in itſelf, yet at that time, when I had no power, was of more value to me than any thing that can be offered me at preſent? I will reward thee plentifully with gold and ſilver, that thou mayeſt not repent thy kindneſs to Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpis. Syloſon replied, that he neither aſked gold nor ſilver, but only that he would ſave his country, which ever ſince the death of his brother Polycrates had been poſſeſſed by one who had no claim to it. Give me, ſaid he, Samos without blood, and without expelling my countrymen. Darius, having heard his requeſt, immediately ſent an army under the conduct of Otanes, one of the ſeven, to Samos, ordering him to act agreeable to the directions of Syloſon. Otanes arriving on the coaſt of Samos landed his forces without the leaſt oppoſition. As they drew near the city, Mæandrus with thoſe of his party offered to depart the iſland under a promiſe of indemnity and protection. Otanes, readily agreed to the propoſal, and a truce was concluded on both ſides. But in the mean time, Charilaus, another brother of Mæandrus, who had been ſhut up in a dungeon for ſeveral crimes he was guilty of, having overheard what was doing, and from an aperture of his priſon obſerved the Perſians ſitting before the caſtle without the leaſt apprehen-

ſion, demanded to ſpeak with his brother. He was accordingly brought into his preſence, when he began with moſt opprobrious and reviling language to ſtir him up againſt the Perſians, calling him a coward for parting ſo tamely with a kingdom, and demanding leave to do for him what he had not courage enough to do for himſelf. He engaged, if he would but truſt him with the command of his forces for a few days, not only to make the Perſians repent their coming, but to drive them out of the iſland. Mæandrus accepted the offer, not that he imagined his troops able to cope with the Perſians, but out of envy to Syloſon, and in order to weaken the power of the Samians before he took poſſeſſion of the iſland. For he knew, that the Perſians would not fail to take a ſevere revenge on the Samians for the outrages they ſhould ſuffer; and as for himſelf, he could make his eſcape out of the iſland when he pleaſed, having made a private paſſage under-ground, leading from the caſtle to the ſea. Charilaus no ſooner ſaw himſelf at the head of the troops, but ſallying out of the citadel upon the Perſians, who expected no hoſtilities, every thing having been already agreed on, he ſurprized and killed the chief men among them. But the reſt of the army, taking the alarm, came in to their relief, and repulſed the Samians into the caſtle. Otanes, being provoked at the great loſs he had ſuſtained, commanded his army, notwithſtanding the orders given him by Darius not to kill or take any Samian priſoner, to put all they met to the ſword without diſtinction of ſex or age. So that while one part of his forces was employed in beſieging the caſtle, the reſt were buſied in plundering the houſes and murdering the inhabitants, without ſparing even ſuch as had taken ſanctuary in the temples. Mæandrus made his eſcape by ſea, and fled to Lacedæmon, where ſoon after his arrival having commanded his ſlaves to take out and cleanſe his gold and ſilver plate, he conducted Cleomenes, the ſon of Anaxandrides, then king of Sparta, to his houſe, hoping he might take a fancy to ſome of his rich moveables, and thereby give him an opportunity of gaining him over to his views. The king was greatly ſurprized at the workmanſhip of ſome cups, which Mæandrus perceiving preſſed him to take whatever he pleaſed, and repeated his offer ſeveral times. But Cleomenes conſtantly refuſed to accept of any thing; and being afterwards informed that other citizens had received his preſents, he went immediately to complain of him to the ephori, who, fearing leſt he ſhould introduce luxury among them, commanded him to depart Peloponneſus that very day [b].

Syloſon. THE Perſians, upon the flight of Mæandrus, put Samos, plundered and depopulated as it was, into the hands of Syloſon. Otanes, the Perſian general, is ſaid to have repeopled it upon a viſion he ſaw in a dream, and a diſtemper with which he was ſeized. Syloſon, ſeeing himſelf in poſſeſſion of the iſland and ſupported by the Perſians, oppreſſed his ſubjects to ſuch a degree, that moſt of them, abandoning their native country, ſettled either in the neighbouring iſlands or on the continent, ſo that Samos became again almoſt quite deſtitute of inhabitants, the lands lying every-where untilled, and the whole country reſembling a Æaces. deſart [c].

SYLOSON after a ſhort reign was ſucceeded by his ſon Æaces, who attended Darius in his expedition into Scythia, and is counted by Herodotus among the Ionian tyrants, who had no ſmall ſhare in the eſteem of Darius. Æaces being driven out, as well as the other tyrants of Ionia, by Ariſtagoras the Mileſian, the Samians openly declared againſt Darius and joined the other Ionians in the revolt. But when the two fleets, the Ionian conſiſting of three hundred and ſixty-three ſhips and the Perſians of ſix hundred, were ready to engage near Lade, a ſmall iſland over-againſt Miletus, Æaces, who ſerved on board the Perſian fleet, ſent a meſſenger to the Samians, exhorting them to abandon the confederacy, ſince they could not poſſibly prevail againſt the king, who, if that fleet were deſtroyed, could fit out another five times as powerful. The Samians hearkened to this meſſage, and in the heat of the engagement hoiſtin ſail abandoned their confederates, and returned with fifty ſhips to Samos. However, eleven of the Samian ſhips refuſed to obey their leaders, and together with the Chians fought till they were quite diſabled. The commanders of theſe were rewarded by the community of Samos with an inſcription on a pillar, declaring their names and families, in order to tranſmit their memory to poſterity, and this monument was ſtill ſtanding in Herodotus's time [d]. The example example of the Samians, who retired in the beginning of the fight, being followed by the Leſbians and all the confederates, except the Chians, the Perſians gained a complete victory, took Miletus, and were preparing to invade Samos, in order to replace Æaces, to whom they were chiefly indebted for their ſucceſs, on the throne of Samos. But many of the Samians, chuſing rather to abandon their country than to live in ſubjection to him and the Perſians, ſet ſail for Sicily, being invited thither by the Zanclæans, who were deſirous to have in their territory a city inhabited by the Ionians, and had allotted for that purpoſe a place on the coaſt which faces the Tyrrhenian ſea, and was then called the beautiful coaſt. Upon their arrival in Sicily they found the city of Zancle quite abandoned, the Zanclæans being with their king Scythes employed in the ſiege of a Sicilian city. Hereupon Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium and an enemy to the Zanclæans, inſinuated to the Samians, that it would be more advantageous for them to ſeize on the city of Zancle in the abſence of the inhabitants, than to ſettle on the coaſt deſigned for their eſtabliſhment. The Samians were eaſily prevailed upon to follow his advice, which the Zanclæans underſtanding, haſtened to recover their city, calling in to their aſſiſtance Hippocrates tyrant of Gela their ally. But Hippocrates, betraying his friends, agreed with the Samians to leave them in poſſeſſion of the city, and deliver up to them the reſt of the Zanclæans, provided they yielded to him one half of the ſlaves and of the plunder of the city, with all the booty that ſhould be found in the country. Thus the Samians made themſelves maſters of one of the greateſt and moſt beautiful cities of Sicily. As to the Zanclæans, they were either baniſhed or reduced to ſlavery by Hippocrates, to whom they were delivered by the Samians purſuant to their agreement. Scythes their king was baniſhed with his brother Pythogenes to Inycum, whence he made his eſcape to Himera, and there imbarking paſſed over into Aſia to Darius [e].

In the mean time, the Perſians, after the reduction of Miletus, put over with their fleet to Samos, and reinſtated Æaces in his former government, for the eminent ſervice he had rendered them, by perſuading his countrymen to abandon the reſt of the Ionians in the engagement at Lade.

Lade. Samos by this means was the only city, of all those which revolted from Darius, that escaped undestroyed. Æaces, being thus restored to his authority, continued faithful to the Persians, and served under Xerxes in his expedition against Greece, obliging the Samians, contrary to their inclinations, to assist the Persians, with their navy against their countrymen. During the Grecian war Æaces died, and was succeeded by Theomestor, whom Xerxes raised to that dignity for his couragious behaviour in the sea-fight at Salamis on which occasion he took several of the Greek ships, and distinguished himself in a most eminent manner; as also did Phylacus another Samian, who was not only admitted into the number of those, who from deserving well of the king were called by the Persians Orosanges, but rewarded with large possessions and great wealth [f].

Theomestor. Year of the Flood 2520. Before Christ 479.

The Samians continued thus subject to the Persians and their own tyrants, who were but mere tools of the Persian kings, till the famous victory gained by the Greeks at Mycale, when they were restored to the full enjoyment of their antient liberties. Before this engagement, while the Grecian fleet was anchored at Delos, under the command of Leotychides the Lacedæmonian, the Samians, without being suspected either by the Persians or their own tyrant Theomestor, sent three of their chief citizens, Lampon, Athenagoras, and Hegesistratus, to assure the commanders of the Greek navy, that the Ionians would not fail to revolt from the Persians as soon as their fleet appeared. Hegesistratus, who spoke for the rest, added, that if they entertained the least suspicion of their sincerity, they were all three ready to remain with them as hostages. Leotychides after hearing him had the curiosity to ask his name, and understanding that he was called Hegesistratus, which in Greek signifies leader of an army, he resolved forthwith to set sail and attack the Persian fleet which lay then off of Samos. Having therefore obliged the three Samian embassadors to confirm with an oath the truth of what they had said, he retained Hegesistratus, taking his name for a presage of success, and suffered the other two to return home. The next day Leotychides, having offered a solemn sacrifice to the gods, put to sea, and standing towards Samos came to an anchor near the temple of Juno

But

But the Perſians, being informed of their approach, made towards the continent, and hawling their ſhips aſhore fled to their land-forces, which were encamped at Mycale to the number of ſixty thouſand men. In the mean time, the Perſian generals cauſed all the Samians to be diſarmed, fearing they were diſpoſed to favour the enemy, becauſe they had already redeemed all the Athenians taken in Attica by the forces of Xerxes, brought them to Samos, and thence ſent them back to Athens, furniſhed with proviſions for their voyage. The Samians, though thus diſarmed, in the very beginning of the engagement revolted to the Greeks, and aſſiſted them in the beſt manner they could. Their example was immediately followed by the reſt of the Ionians, who abandoning the Perſians joined their countrymen, and greatly contributed to that victory, which put an end to the deſigns of Xerxes upon Greece [g].

The Samians and other iſlanders enter into an alliance with the Athenians.

FROM Mycale the Greeks returned to Samos, where it was propoſed, in a council held by the chief commanders, to tranſplant the Ionians out of Aſia, where they were expoſed to the inſults of the Perſians, into Greece, and there beſtow upon them the cities and lands of thoſe Greeks who had ſided with the Perſians. But this motion was not approved of by the Athenians, who, apprehending that the Ionians, if once tranſplanted into Greece, would no longer look upon Athens as their mother city, engaged to protect them on all occaſions againſt the common enemy. Wherefore, having obliged the Samians, Chians, Leſbians, and other iſlanders, who had revolted to them from the Perſians, to ſwear, that they would continue in their alliance, they ſet ſail together with them for the Helleſpont to purſue the war on that ſide againſt the Perſians.

The Samians revolt from the Athenians.

THE Samians, being thus delivered from the Perſian yoke, continued ſtedfaſt in their alliance with the Athenians for the ſpace of thirty-ſeven years, governing themſelves entirely by their own laws, and enjoying the full poſſeſſion of their antient liberties. But in the ſixth year of the thirty years peace concluded between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, they revolted from the Athenians on the following occaſion. The Mileſians and Samians falling out about the city of Priene in Caria, to which both parties laid claim, the

the former not finding themſelves in a condition to maintain a war againſt the Samians, gained over ſuch of them as deſired to alter the form of government, and with them repaired to Athens, where they complained of the injuries they had ſuffered from the republic of Samos, which had driven them by force from a city, which they had as good a right to as themſelves. Hereupon the Athenians ſent meſſengers into Samos, requiring the Samians to forbear all hoſtilities, and refer their differences to their arbitration; which they refuſing to do, by reaſon they apprehended the Athenians more favourable to the Mileſians than to them, Pericles prevailed upon his republic to declare war againſt Samos, not out of any motive of juſtice, but to gratify the famous courteſan Aſpaſia, who was the daughter of Axiochus a Mileſian, and greatly beloved by Pericles, not ſo much on account of her beauty as of her wit. The management of this war was committed to Pericles himſelf, who, having equipped a ſquadron of forty gallies, ſet ſail for Samos, laid ſiege to the city, and reduced it without any conſiderable loſs. He no ſooner ſaw himſelf maſter of the place, but he changed the ariſtocracy into a democratical kind of government, and having impoſed a fine of eighty talents on the inhabitants, and received fifty Samian youths for hoſtages, he committed them to the care of the Lemnians and returned to Athens. He was ſcarce gone, when ſuch of the Samians as diſliked the popular government, entering into an aſſociation, ſent deputies over into Aſia to Peſſuthnes, or, as Diodorus calls him, Peſſuthines, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes and governor of Sardis, ſoliciting him to ſend them ſuccours againſt the Athenians the antient enemies of Perſia. Peſſuthnes, hoping by means of theſe troubles and domeſtic broils to bring Samos under his power, lent them a body of ſeven hundred men. With theſe the Samian deputies ſetting ſail from Aſia in the dead of the night, with the aſſiſtance of their friends in the iſland, ſurprized the city, and having ſeized on the heads of the popular faction, and taken the Athenians, who were there in gariſon, priſoners, ſent them all as a preſent to Peſſuthnes. Having thus aboliſhed the democracy eſtabliſhed by Pericles, they paſſed over into the iſland of Leſbos, reſcued their hoſtages, and then proclaimed war againſt the Athenians. When news of this revolt was brought to Athens, Pericles was again diſpatched to Samos with ſixty ſail well manned, in order to reduce the revolters. Pericles arriving on the coaſt

of Aſia detached ſixteen ſhips of his ſquadron to obſerve the motions of the Phœnicians, whom Peſſuthnes had ſent to join the Samians, and to bring in ſuccours from Chios and Leſbos; which when the Samians heard, they immediately recalled twenty ſhips, which they had ſent to attack Miletus, and, joining to them fifty more, went to meet Pericles, who with forty-four ſhips entirely defeated their fleet conſiſting of ſeventy. Soon after this victory the Athenian ſquadron being reinforced with forty ſail from Athens and twenty-five from Chios and Leſbos, Pericles landed his men in the iſland of Samos, overthrew the Samians in a pitched battle, and laid ſiege to their metropolis, incloſing it with a triple wall on the land-ſide, and blocking it up by ſea with his fleet. But in the mean time, Pericles receiving intelligence by letters from Caria and Caunus, that the Phœnician fleet was advancing to the relief of the beſieged city, and that Steſagoras, the Samian admiral, had already joined them with a ſquadron under his command, charged his collegues to purſue with all poſſible vigor the ſiege, while he with threeſcore ſail went out in queſt of the enemy. The Samians, taking advantage of his abſence, made a ſally at the inſtigation, and under the conduct, of one Meliſſus the ſon of Ithogenes, routed the Athenians, poſſeſſed themſelves of their camp, and obliged them to retire from before the city. Being elated with this ſucceſs they attacked the enemies fleet, which blocked up the harbour, ſunk many of their ſhips, and forced the others to ſhelter themſelves in the neighbouring iſlands. But Pericles, receiving notice of this overthrow, returned with all poſſible expedition, and being reinforced with forty ſhips from Athens under the command of Thucydides, Agnon, and Phormio, and ſoon after with twenty more commanded by Tlepolemus and Anticles, and moreover with forty from Chios and Leſbos, he attacked Meliſſus, and defeated the Samians both by ſea and land, began the ſiege with new vigor, and brought the citizens into great diſtreſs. The town was battered both day and night without intermiſſion; but the Samians, though quite tired out with frequent aſſaults on all ſides, and reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions, yet ſuſtained the ſiege for the ſpace of nine months, without once offering to capitulate. On this occaſion the battering rams, ſcorpions, and galleries are ſaid to have been firſt invented by one Artemon of Clazomenæ, whom Ephorus the hiſtorian confounds with Artemon Periphreſus, mentioned by Anacreon, creon, as quoted by Athenæus [h]. The Samians at length, seeing they had no hopes of relief, and that their walls were in great part ruined, surrendered. The only terms they could obtain were the following, viz. that they should demolish their walls, give hostages for their fidelity in time to come, deliver up their navy, and pay the charges of the war. The Byzantines, who had joined the Samians in this war, submitted at the same time to the Athenians. Thus Pericles, having put to death the authors of the revolt and re-established the democracy, returned to Athens [i]. This war happened according to Thucydides in the sixth of the thirty years truce between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians; but Diodorus Siculus places it in the fourth year of the eighty-fourth olympiad, that is, after the said truce was expired.

From this time the Samians continued subject to the Athenians till the twentieth year of the Peloponnesian war, when the common people of Samos taking up arms against the nobility, who had again usurped all the power, slew two hundred of them, banished the rest, and divided their lands and houses among themselves. This so pleased the Athenians, at whose instigation the people had revolted, that they restored to them all their antient privileges, and allowed them to govern their republic according to their own laws. The ensuing year, when the government of the four hundred was set up at Athens, the great men among the Samians, to the number of three hundred, formed a new conspiracy against the democracy, and being assisted by Pisander and other Athenians, who favoured the oligarchy, they attempted to make themselves masters of the city, with a design to murder all those who were for the popular faction. But the people, having timely notice of their design, and being supported by Leon, Diomedon, Thrasybulus, and other Athenians, who were then in Samos and professed enemies to the oligarchy, repulsed them, and having killed about thirty of the three hundred conspirators, obliged the rest to submit to the democracy. In this state the island of Samos continued long subject to the Athenians, and was resorted to by such of them as could not endure the tyranny of the four hundred usurpers. When Athens was besieged and taken by Lysander the Lacedæmonian admiral, after

after his famous victory at Ægos-potamos, the iſland of Samos was alſo reduced by the conqueror, who aboliſhed the popular government, and put the whole power into the hands of ten men, who from their number were called the Deciarchæ. This form of government continued for the ſpace of near ten years, till the Athenians, having regained the ſovereignty of the ſeas by their ſignal victory over the Lacedæmonians at Cnidus, reſtored the democracy, and took anew poſſeſſion of the iſland. But ſoon after the Samians revolting from Athens entered into a confederacy with the Lacedæmonians; but being in the mean time attacked by Tigranes, one of the Perſian governors of the Leſſer Aſia, and by him brought under ſubjection to the king of Perſia, they had recourſe to the Athenians their antient allies, who immediately ſent Timotheus to their aſſiſtance. Timotheus, landing his men in the iſland, laid ſiege to the city, and in a few days obliged the Perſians, who held it, to capitulate and leave the Samians in the full poſſeſſion of their antient liberties [k]. From this time the iſland of Samos continued faithful to the Athenians till they were reduced by the Romans, who obliged the Samians and other iſlanders to pay a yearly tribute to Rome. But in the Roman times the Samians were a very inconſiderable people, and had quite degenerated from the valour of their anceſtors. Not being able to defend themſelves, they were an eaſy prey to the princes of Macedon, Syria, and Pergamus. They became ſubject to Rome upon the death of Eumenes the laſt king of Pergamus, who bequeathed, as the Romans pretended, his dominions to their republic. Auguſtus reſtored them, for what ſervice we know not, to their former liberty, ſuffering them to live according to their own laws, in the ſame manner as they had done during their alliance with Athens. By this indulgence the iſland, which had come into the hands of the Romans in a mean condition, began to flouriſh again, and in a ſhort time became ſo populous, that many of the inhabitants were obliged to abandon their country, which could not maintain ſuch multitudes, and ſettle in the neighbouring iſland of Icaria, which was then but thinly inhabited [l]. In this happy ſtate they continued till the reign of Veſpaſian, who reduced Samos, with the other Greek iſlands, to a Roman province [m].

The Hiſtory of the other Greek iſlands.

BESIDES the Greek iſlands we have already deſcribed, there are many others, which if we diſmiſſed this ſubject without taking ſome notice of, as they make no ſmall figure in the antient hiſtory of Greece, we ſhould after all look npon ours as maimed and imperfect. Theſe lie partly in the Ægean and Icarian, and partly in the Cretan, Myrtoan, and Ionian, ſeas, or in the Propontis; whence we ſhall, with Strabo [n], begin our account of rhem, deſcribeing firſt ſuch as are on the coaſt of Aſia, and therefore reckoned by all geographers among the Aſiatic iſlands. In the Propontis, now the Sea of Marmora (P), the following iſlands are taken notice of by Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny, Mela, &c. viz. Proconneſus, Beſbicus, Phœbe, Alone, Phyſia, Ophioeſſa, Gonimi, and Liparæ. Proconneſus, or, as others write it, Præconneſus, was antiently known likewiſe by the name of Elaphonneſus, that is, the iſland of Stags [o], it being particularly remarkable, as the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius obſerves, for the vaſt number of ſtags with which it was ſtocked. Pliny [p], Strabo [q], and Vitruvius [r] greatly greatly commend the marble quarries of Proconnesus, and tell us, that the stately palace of Mausolus at Halicarnassus was lined with this marble, which, according to Vitruvius, received a brighter polish than any other. Hence Constantine the Great, if we believe Zosimus [s], made use of Proconnesian marble only in embellishing the public structures of his new city. Ptolemy places this island on the coast of Thrace, wherein he contradicts all the antient geographers, who speak of it as lying on the coast of Asia over-against Cyzicum; whence the Proconnesian marble, as Pliny observes, is often from that city called Cyzican (Q) [t].

(Q) Stephanus and Scylax speak of Proconnesus and Elaphonnesus as two different islands, and tell us, that in the former were antiently two cities both bearing the name of the island, and distinguished by the epithets of the New and the Old Proconnesus; the first, they say, was built by the Milesians, and the other by the inhabitants of the island. Aristæas and Bion were both natives of Proconnesus. Aristæas was born, according to Suidas, in the fiftieth olympiad, and lived in the reigns of Cyrus and Crœsus, he was the son of Democharis, or as others will have it of Caustrobius. He wrote a Theogony in prose, and the history of the Arimaspians, an Hyperborean people, in verse. This poem, as Suidas informs us, was comprised in three books. He is quoted by Herodotus in the following words (18). Aristæas, a poet of Proconnesus, and son to Caustrobius, says in in his verses, "that he was transported by Apollo into the territories of "the Issedonians; beyond whom the Arimaspians dwell, who "are a people having but one eye; that the next region abounds "with griffins, which guard the gold of the country; and that "the Hyperboreans are situate beyond them, their country "bordering on the sea; that all these nations, except the Hyper-"boreans, were continually employed in making war on their "neighbours; that the Issedonians were expelled by the Arima-"spians, the Scythians by the Issedonians, and the Cimmerians, "inhabiting the coasts of the south-sea, by the Scythians." Our historian adds, that Aristæas was in no respect inferior to any of his fellow citizens, and that entering one day into a fuller's shop, he there died suddenly. Hereupon the fuller, having shut his door, went to acquaint the relations of the deceased ceased with what had happened. The news of his death being spread over the city, a certain Cyzicenian, arriving from Artace, disputed the truth of the report, affirming, that he had met him and conversed with him in his way to Cyzicus. While he obstinately persisted in maintaining his assertion, the relations of Aristæas came with all things necessary for removing the body; but could not find Aristæas either alive or dead. Seven years after he appeared again in Proconnesus, composed those verses which are by the Greeks called Arimaspian, and then disappeared a second time. Herodotus adds, that three hundred and forty years after this second disappearing of Aristæas, he shewed himself anew in the city of the Metapontins, exhorting them to erect an altar to Apollo, and a statue by the altar, which should bear the name of Aristæas the Proconnesian; he told them on that occasion, that they were the only nation of the Italian coast that had ever been favoured with the presence of Apollo, and that he himself attended the god in the shape of a raven. Having pronounced these words, he vanished; and the Metapontins, going to consult the oracle of Delphos concerning the apparition, were admonished by the Pythian to do as they had been directed, if they desired their affairs to prosper. In pursuance therefore of this oracle they erected an altar to Apollo, and near it a statue to Aristæas, which were still remaining in our historian's time (19). The same story is related by Pliny (20), Apollonius (21), Maximus Tyrius (22), Origenes (23), Hesychius (24), and Tzetzes (25); Strabo, Tatian, and Pausanias likewise mention this author. Longinus in his treatise of the sublime quotes some of his verses, as does also Julius Pollux. Gellius ranks him among the writers of extraordinary events and fables (26), and Pliny cites him to prove, that the Arimaspians, who had but one eye, were continually at war with a kind of wild beasts called Griffins, that guarded the gold, which the Arimaspians dug out of the mines (27). All these relations are fabulous, and therefore, in the opinion of Dionysius Halicarnassus, the poem, entitled Arimaspians, was a spurious piece falsly ascribed to Aristæas. Tatian iſlands which, being firſt joined to the continent, were ſeparated from it by the violence of the ſeas or earthquakes. The others, to which he ſuppoſes the ſame misfortune to have happened, are Sicily, Cyprus, and Eubœa, the firſt having been ſeparated, according to him, from Italy, the ſecond from Syria, and the laſt from Bœotia. The other iſlands in the Propontis are of no note, and therefore leaving them, ſince we know nothing of them but their bare names, we ſhall proceed to the Ægean ſea (R), deſcribing ſuch iſlands as lie on the coaſt of Aſia and make any figure in hiſtory.

Tatian tells us, that Ariſtæas flouriſhed before Homer; but Strabo will have him to be that poet's maſter.

Bion was contemporary with Pherecydes, who flouriſhed about the fiftieth olympiad. He copied the titles, and abridged the works, of Cadmus the Mileſian, as Clemens Alexandrinus informs us (28). The ſame author quotes ſeveral of his apothegms. Cadmus, whoſe works Bion is ſaid to have abridged, was the firſt who wrote a hiſtory in proſe (29), and is commonly believed to have lived before the Trojan war. Strabo mentions this Cadmus (whom we muſt diſtinguiſh from another Cadmus, a Mileſian alſo, but of a much later date) and ſays, that he, Pherecydes, and Hecatæus, were the firſt three writers in proſe (30).

(R) The Ægean ſea, now the Archipelago, is that ſea which ſeparates Europe from Aſia, waſhing on the one ſide Greece and Macedon, and on the other Caria, Ionia, and Phrygia. There is a great variance among authors about the etymology of its name. Pliny will have it to be ſo called from Ægis an iſland, or rather a rock, ſacred to Neptune, and lying between the iſlands of Tenos and Chios (31). Solinus and the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius agree with Pliny. The iſland of Ægis borrowed its name, according to the ſame Pliny (32), from the Greek word Aix, ſignifying a goat, which that iſland at ſome diſtance reſembles. Feſtus offers three different opinions; the Ægean ſea, ſays he, was ſo named either from its iſlands, which, lying ſcattered up and down, look at a diſtance like ſo many goats, or from Ægea queen of the Amazons, who was drowned in it, or becauſe Ægeus, the father of Theſeus, apprehending his ſon might be devoured by the Minotaur, threw himſelf out of grief into the ſea and periſhed. Strabo (33) derives it from a city of Eubœa called Ægæ; Statius from Ægeon, one of the giants that warred againſt Jupiter, and

The islands of the Ægean sea on the coast of Asia.

THE antient geographers reckon fifty-three islands from Tenedos to Crete, and comprehend them all under two general denominations. Those which form a circle round Delos, a little island revered by the antients for being reputed the birth-place of Apollo and Diana, they call the Cyclades from the Greek word cyclos, signifying a circle; such as are at a great distance from Delos they call Sporades from the Greek word Speiro, importing to scatter or sow, these islands being scattered up and down the Ægean sea. To begin with the Sporades on the coast of Asia, Pliny[w] mentions the following islands at the mouth of the Hellespont over-against the country of Troas, viz. the Ascanian islands, so called, according to some, from Ascanius the son of Æneas, according to others, from Askenaz one of Gomer's sons, the islands of Platæa, Lamia, Plitania, Plate, Scopelos, Gethone, Arthedon, Cælæ, Laguſſæ, and Didymæ. These islands are very small, and therefore scarce taken notice was by Neptune, who overcame him, chained to a rock in the sea; and Nicocrates from Ægeus, a name antiently given to Neptune. Bochart recurs, according to his custom, to the Phœnician language, and forms the name of Ægeum from the word Az, signifying among the Phœnicians wild, cruel, and violent, which he pretends to have been given to this sea by the Phœnicians, who first inhabited the islands, by reason it is subject to frequent storms, which among so many rocks and islands prove very dangerous (34). The Icarian, Carpathian, Cretan seas, so called from the islands they wash, and also the Myrtoan, are but parts of the Ægean sea taken in its full extent. The *Myr*toan lies, according to Strabo (35), Pliny (36), and Pausanias (37), &c. between Crete, Peloponnesus, Attica, and Eubœa, and not on the side of Asia, as Ptolemy (38) would have it. That author places, Miletus, Jassus, Myndus, and the other maritime cities of Caria on the Myrtoan sea, wherein he contradicts all the antient geographers as well as historians. This sea borrowed its name, either from an island called Myrtus, as Pliny informs us (39), or from Myrtilus the son of Mercury, or a nymph named Myrton, as Pausanias insinuates (43). The Ægean is now called the Archipelago, from the Greek words ἀρχὸς chief, and πέλαγος the sea, it being the chief and greatest sea in those parts.

tice of by other geographers or hiſtorians. Near them lies the iſland of Tenedos about two leagues from the ſhore. Behind this iſland the Greeks, as is well known, feigning to return into their own country, lay concealed till their plot againſt Troy took effect. But as we have already given an account of this iſland [x], we ſhall only add here, that the learned Bochart derives the name of Tenedos from the Phœnician word Tin-edum, ſignifying red clay, which was found here, and in great requeſt for the making of earthen-ware [y]. Tenedos.

Leſbos. Names.

Lesbos, one of the moſt conſiderable iſlands of the Ægean ſea or Archipelago, was antiently called Pelaſgia, from the Pelaſgi, by whom it was ſuppoſed to have been firſt peopled; Macaria, from Macareus the grandſon of Jupiter, who ſettled here; Leſbos, from the ſon-in-law and ſucceſſor of Macareus, who bore that name, &c. It is, according to Strabo [z], ſixty-two, according to Pliny, fifty-ſix, miles diſtant from Tenedos, divided from the continent of Aſia by a ſtraight ſeven miles and a half over, in length ſeventy miles, and an hundred and ſixty-eight in compaſs. All the antient hiſtorians, geographers, and others, who ſpeak of the greater iſlands in the Mediterranean and Ægean ſeas, conſtantly reckon Leſbos in the ſeventh place, tho' no two of them agree in the diſpoſing of the reſt. This Bochart, who, if we may be allowed to uſe the common ſaying, ſees farther into a mill-ſtone than any other, ſurmiſed to be myſterious; and accordingly, with the help of his Phœnicician etymologicon, found out, that the iſland of Leſbos was without change put in the ſeventh place, becauſe its name was derived from the Phœnician word Eſbuith, ſignifying ſeven. But to derive Leſbos from Eſbuith requires ſeveral alterations, and withal a greater ſtock of anagrammatical wit than is fallen to every body's ſhare. This iſland had in former times, if we believe Pliny [a], eight cities of note; Herodotus [b] ſpeaks of ſix, but Pomponius Mela and Scylax name only five; the former leaves out Methymna, and the latter Ariſba. Theſe cities were, Ariſba, which was quite ruined by an earthquake; Pyrrha, ſeated on the weſtern coaſt of the iſland towards Greece, and diſtant from Mitylene, which ſtands on the other ſea, eighty furlongs [c]. Cities.

This city underwent the same fate as Arisba, and also the cities of Hiera and Agamis [d]. Ereſſus or Ereſus, placed by Ptolemy between Pyrrha and Mela, the moſt ſouthern promontory of Leſbos, but by Strabo between Pyrrha and Sigrium, the moſt northern promontory of the iſland. Ereſſus was the birth-place of the famous philoſopher Theophraſtus, who ſucceeded Ariſtotle in the Peripatetic ſchool. Antiſſa, which was, according to Strabo [e], in antient times an iſland by itſelf, and thence called Antiſſa, becauſe it lay over-againſt Leſbos, then known by the name of Iſſa. This city, having diſobliged the Romans, was deſtroyed by Labeo, and the inhabitants tranſplanted to Methymna [f]. Methymna, the native city of Arion, who is ſuppoſed to have been the firſt inventor of tragedies and of the Dithyrambic verſe. This city borrowed its name from Methymna, one of the daughters of Macareus [g], of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak anon; and was the ſecond city in rank of the whole iſland, eſpecially after the inhabitants of Antiſſa were tranſplanted hither by the Romans. Methymna was famous for the fruitfulneſs of its territory and the excellent wines it produced. When the other cities of Leſbos revolted from the Athenians, Methymna continued ſtedfaſt in its former alliance, and proved very ſerviceable in the reducing of the reſt [h]. Mitylene, the capital of the whole iſland, ſo called from the daughter of Macareus, who married Leſbos, as we have hinted above. Cicero [i] and Vitruvius [k] greatly commend this city, on account of the ſtatelineſs of its buildings and the fertility of its ſoil. Strabo tells us, that it abounded with the neceſſaries and delights of life [l], and Horace beſtows on it the epithet of famous or renowned [m]. A modern traveller is of opinion, that the preſent city of Caſtro was built on the ruins of Mitylene, there being to this day many veſtiges of a great city to be ſeen in Caſtro and its neighbourhood [n]. But Mitylene was not ſo renowned on account of its magnificent buildings and fruitful ſoil, as for the many great men it produced. Pittacus one of the ſeven ſages of Greece; Alcæus, the famous Lyric poet; Sappho, called by Strabo a prodigy, by others the tenth muſe; Terpander, who was the firſt that fitted ſeven ſtrings to the lyre, which gave occaſion to the fable fable of Orpheus's head being heard to ſpeak in this iſland, after it was cut off in Thrace, as Euſtathius ingeniouſly explains it [o]; Hellanicus, the celebrated hiſtorian, and Callias famous for his notes on Alcæus and Sappho, were all natives of Mitylene. To theſe we may add, with Strabo, Diophanes, a famous rhetorician, who was tutor to Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, and afterwards preſſed him to revive the Licinian law, which occaſioned great diſturbances in the republic; Potamon, Leſtode, Crinagoras, and Theophanes, all mentioned by Strabo as men of great parts and learning. Theophanes had a great influence over Pompey, who honoured him with his confidence and an employment of diſtinction in his troops; and the Greek, in gratitude to his benefactor, wrote the hiſtory of his glorious conqueſts. Mitylene was in antient times the ſeat of all polite arts and literature. There Epicurus read public lectures at thirty years of age [p], and Ariſtotle reſided two years to improve by the converſation of the learned men of the place [q]. In the Roman time ſuch as were diſſatisfied with the government et home, or deſirous to perfect themſelves in polite literature, retired to Athens, Rhodes, or Mitylene. Among the former was Marcellus, who after the battle of Pharſalia withdrew to this city, and was ſo taken with the converſation of the many learned men he found there, that Cicero could not prevail upon him to abandon the place and return to Rome, even after he had obtained his pardon from Cæſar [r]. This city ſuffered greatly in the Peloponneſian war, after it had revolted from the Athenians, as we read in Thucydides [s]. In the Mithridatic war it was the only city that refuſed to ſubmit to the Romans, after the treaty of peace was concluded between Mithridates and Sylla. Wherefore it was beſieged, taken, and razed to the ground by Minucius Thermus. Julius Cæſar, who was then making his firſt campaign, ſignalized himſelf at this ſiege, and was honoured with ſeveral civic crowns. The city was ſoon after rebuilt, and in favour of Theophanes reſtored by Pompey to the full enjoyment of all its antient privileges [t]. Pliny ſays, that in his time it enjoyed the ſame liberty which Pompey had granted it. The emperor peror Trajan embellished it with many costly buildings, and called it from his own name Trajanopolis; but the antient name prevailed, and in process of time became common to the whole island, which to this day is called Metelin.

Soil. The fruitfulness of this island is much spoke of by the antients; it produced great quantities of delicious fruits and exquisite wines, which, if we believe our modern travellers, still deserve the mighty praises bestowed upon them by Strabo, Horace, Athenæus, Ælian, &c. We are told, that while Aristotle was dying, a dispute arose among his disciples about the person who should succeed him, some thinking Menedemus of Rhodes the most proper man to keep up the reputation of the Peripatetic school, and others declaring in favour of Theophrastus the Lesbian. The matter was at last referred to Aristotle himself, who, having called for some wine of both islands, and tasted them, said they were both excellent wines, but that the Rhodian was not to compare to the Lesbian; thereby giving to understand, that Theophrastus excelled his competitor as much as the wine of Lesbos did that of Rhodes[u]. Tristanus mentions a medal of the emperor Geta, who, according to Spartianus, did not dislike good wine, with a fortune on the reverse, holding in her right hand the rudder of a ship, and in her left a cornucopiæ with a bunch of grapes, and underneath the inscription Mitylene. Pliny tells us, that the wine of Lesbos was deemed no less wholesome than pleasant by Erasistratus, one of the greatest physicians of antiquity. The same author speaks of the jasper of Lesbos, and of a certain kind of pine-trees yielding pitch. As the morals of the antient Lesbians, we cannot say any thing in their commendation; they were given to all kind of lewdness and debauchery, insomuch, that to express the lewd and dissolute life of a debauchee, the antients used to say, that he lived like a Lesbian[w]. Goltzius exhibits a medal, which does no great honour to the Lesbian women.

Inhabitants. This island, according to Diodorus Siculus, was first peopled by the Pelasgi; for Xanthus the son of Triopas, prince of the Pelasgians, who came from Argos, having first settled in Lycia, and there reigned sometime over the Pelasgians, who had attended him in his expedition, sailed from thence to to Leſbos, which, as it lay at that time deſolate, he divided among his followers, changing its antient name of Iſſa into that of Pelaſgia. In proceſs of time, that is, after ſeven generations, the inhabitants being all deſtroyed by Deucalion's flood, the iſland lay waſte and deſolate, till Macareus, happening to touch there, and being taken with the pleaſantneſs and fertility of the country, ſettled in it, and built the city of Olanus. The fame of his juſtice and humanity drew many Ionians to him, by whoſe means he poſſeſſed himſelf of ſome of the neighbouring iſlands, and in a ſhort time became very powerful. In his time Leſbos, the ſon of Lapithas and grandſon of Æolus, arriving in this iſland, by the direction of the oracle at Delphos, with a new colony, was kindly received by the inhabitants, and being allowed to enjoy, with his followers, the ſame rights and privileges as thoſe who were there before him, he married Methymna the eldeſt daughter of Macareus, after whoſe death he called the iſland from his own name Leſbos [x]. This is the account Diodorus gives us of the firſt inhabitants of Leſbos; but Strabo [y], Herodotus [z], Thucydides [a], Pauſanias [b], Ptolemy [c], Velleius [d], unanimouſly tells us, that it was firſt peopled by the Æolians, and conſtantly ſpeak of the Leſbians as having come originally from Æolis.

Government and hiſtory.

THE Leſbians were, like moſt of the other Greek nations, firſt governed by kings; but of theſe we find four only mentioned in hiſtory, viz. Marcareus, Leſbos, Æolion, and Penthilus. Macareus is ſaid to have ſubdued ſome of the neighbouring iſlands, viz. Samos, whither he ſent one of his ſons, by name Chycholaus, who divided the iſland among his followers, and ruled over them as king; Cos, over which he appointed his ſecond ſon Nicander king; and Rhodes, great part of which was held by his third ſon Leucippus. Theſe conqueſts Macareus made, if we believe Diodorus [e], ſoon after the flood of Deucalion, that is, about 1046 years before the Chriſtian æra, when the iſlands were but thinly peopled. But Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus tells us, that Xanthus the Pelaſgian, long before the reign of Macareus, had peopled Lesbos, and that Macareus did not ſubdue, but only peopled ſome of the adjacent iſlands [f].

Macareus was succeeded by Lesbos the son of Lapithas, who, marrying Methymna the daughter of Macareus, had the island for her dowry. Æolion is mentioned by Homer as reigning in Lesbos; and Penthilus by Pausanias [g], who tells us, that Penthilus was king of Mycenæ, and that he subdued great part of Æolis, with the island of Lesbos, whence he placed him among the Lesbian kings. In process of time the democratical form of government universally prevailed in all the Greek states, and, amongst others, in Lesbos, the Lesbians having driven out their kings, as Aristotle informs us [h], when they began to rule not as kings, but as tyrants. Upon this revolution great troubles arose in the island, each city aspiring to the same power over the others, which they could not bear in one man. In this contest the city of Mitylene at last prevailed, and by that means became so powerful, that the Mityleneans, being disengaged from all wars at home, began to entertain thoughts of making conquests on the continent. Accordingly, having equipped a fleet, they made a descent on the country of Troas, which they in great part reduced, and held undisturbed till the time of Pisistratus tyrant of Athens, who took from them the city of Sigeum, and put it in the hands of Hegesistratus his natural son by a woman of Argos. This occasioned a war between the Athenians and Mityleneans, which was carried on with great vigour by the contending parties, till they were reconciled by the mediation of Periander tyrant of Corinth. The terms of accommodation were, that each party should retain what they possessed, and that the Lesbians should be allowed to make what conquests they pleased on the continent of Asia. Thus the Athenians remained masters of Sigeum, and the Mityleneans quietly possessed the rest of Troas. In a battle fought during this war, the poet Alcæus is said to have betaken himself to flight, leaving his armour behind him, which the Athenians, who carried the day, hung up in the temple of Minerva at Sigeum. This disgrace the poet lamented in a poem, which he inscribed to Menalippus, who had attended him in his flight [i]. This war was scarce ended, when the other cities of Lesbos, not being able to brook the yoke laid upon them by Mitylene, revolted. Thus a civil war was kindled anew, which which Myrcilus, a man of great wealth and authority in the iſland, taking advantage of, ſeized on the ſovereignty, and ruled without controul. Alcæus compoſed bitter invectives againſt him, as well as his ſucceſſor in the tyranny Megalagyrus [k]. The other tyrants mentioned in hiſtory are Cleanactis, Archæanax, and Melanchrus. Archæanax is ſaid to have raiſed ſome ſtately buildings with materials brought from Troy [l], Melanchrus was driven out by Pittacus, with the aſſiſtance of Alcæus, who, on this occaſion, wiped off the diſgrace he had incurred in the Athenian war. Pittacus, having delivered his country from tyrants, took upon himſelf to govern it, being warmly preſſed thereunto by his fellow citizens; but after having reigned ten years, he reſigned all the power which he had been veſted with, and ſpent the remainder of his life in ſtudy and retirement. He was not only a great philoſopher but an experienced officer. In the above mentioned war between the Athenians and Mitylenians, he had the chief command of the army, on which occaſion he gave a ſignal proof both of his courage and good nature; for being unwilling to hazard the lives of his fellow citizens, he challenged Phrynon the Athenian general to a ſingle combat, notwithſtanding he had been victor at the Olympic games. Phrynon accepted the challenge, but was conquered and killed by Pittacus, who is ſaid to have entangled him in a net, which he had hid under his ſhield. During his adminiſtration he made many wiſe laws, which he comprehended in ſix hundred verſes. One of theſe laws, taken notice of by Ariſtotle, Plato, and Plutarch, was, that every fault committed by a man, when drunk, deſerved double puniſhment. Many of his ſentences were written on the walls of the temple of Apollo at Delphos; ſo great was the eſteem which the ancients entertained of his wiſdom. He died ten years after he had reſigned the government, in the third year of the fifty-ſecond olympiad, and ſeventieth of his age [m]. The Lesbians maintained their liberties from the time of his reſignation to the reign of Cyrus the great; but were in that interval greatly haraſſed by Polycrates tyrant of Samos, who, having defeated their fleet, obliged him to pay him an annual tribute. After the defeat of Crœſus king of Lydia, they ſubmitted with the other iſlanders islanders to the conqueror, and even agreed, as some authors write, to deliver up to him Pactyas, who, after having persuaded the Lydians to revolt, had taken sanctuary in the city of Mitylene [n]. Being thus made tributaries to the kings of Persia, they served Darius in his wars, both against Scythia and Greece. In the former Coes, the son of Erxandrus, commander of the Mityleneans, dissuaded Darius from breaking down the bridge, which he had laid over the Ister, on his march into Scythia; for which piece of good advice he was rewarded with the sovereignty of Lesbos, which he did not long enjoy, being driven out by Aristagoras, at the beginning of the Ionian revolt. He was afterwards seized by one Itragoras, and delivered up to the Mityleneans, who stoned him to death [o]. The Lesbians, being thus delivered from the tyranny of Coes, readily came into the measures of Histiæus and Aristagoras; but in the sea-fight near Lade, over-against Miletus, followed the example of the Samians, retiring in the heat of the engagement and abandoning their allies. By this means the Persians having gained a complete victory, soon reduced Lesbos, as well as the other islands. The Lesbians, after the defeat of the confederate fleet, had joined Histiæus, and subdued the island of Chios; on which account they were treated by Darius with more severity than the other islanders. This treatment they forced to endure till the battle of Mycale, when they revolted with the other Grecks, and joined their countrymen against the common enemy. After the signal victory obtained at Mycale by the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, they entered into an alliance with the conquerors, who promised to protect them, whenever they should be attacked by the Persians [p]. In the course of the war, being provoked at the haughty behaviour of Pausanias the Lacedæmonian commander, they, together with the other allies, deserted him, and put themselves under the command and protection of the Athenians, by which means the Lacedæmonians lost the chief command [q]. Neither did the Lesbians long continue faithful to the Athenians, but abandoned them in the third year of the Peloponnesian war. But of this revolt, and the evils which it brought upon Mitylene, we have spoke at length in the sixth volume [r]. After the the great overthrow received by the Athenians in Sicily, they revolted anew from Athens; but were ſoon again brought under ſubjection, as we have related in the hiſtory of Athens [s]. From this time to the reign of Alexander, we find nothing upon record concerning the Lesbians worth mentioning. In the war which that prince made upon the Perſians, the Lesbians readily joined him; whereupon Memnon the Rhodian made a deſcent upon the iſland, and reduced it, not without great loſs, the city of Mitylene having ſtood a long ſiege. At laſt the Mityleneans ſurrendered, upon condition, that the Macedonians, who were there in gariſon, ſhould be ſuffered to depart unmoleſted; which ſo pleaſed Alexander, that after he had regained the city, he reſtored the inhabitants to their former liberty, enlarged their territory, and confirmed many privileges, not on them only, but on all the Lesbians [t]. Alexander having made himſelf maſter of the whole iſland, by driving the Perſians from all the places they poſſeſſed there, delivered up the tyrants, namely, Ariſtonicus and Chryſolaus, to thoſe whom they had oppreſſed, allowing them to inflict upon their oppreſſors what puniſhments they pleaſed. They were both firſt cruelly racked, and then put to death, which, as Diodorus obſerves, prevented others from aſpiring to the tyranny, even after the death of Alexander. Thus they enjoyed their liberty till the time of Pompey the great, who reduced the iſland of Lesbos to a Roman province, for having delivered up to Mithridates M. Aquilius, the chief of the Roman deputies ſent into Aſia. However, he ſoon reſtored Mitylene to the enjoyment of its ancient privileges, as we have related above, whence it is counted by Pliny among the free cities.

In the ſtrait which ſeparates Lesbos from the continent, are a great many ſmall iſlands called Hecatonneſi, from Apollo, named antiently Hecatos, to whom they were conſecrated [u]. Between the promontory Malea in Lesbos and that of Cane in Æolis, lie the three iſlands Arginuſæ, famous for the victory which the Athenians gained there in the Peloponneſian war [w]. Cicero, who mentions this battle, calls the iſlands Arginuſſæ [x]. The largeſt of the three, called Hecatonneſi.

led by Pliny Arginusa, had a town bearing the same name y.

Chios. Chios, now Scio, distant from Lesbos about four hundred furlongs, and nine hundred in circuit, lies between Lesbos and Samos, opposite to the peninsula of Ionia, on which stand Erythræ, Clazomenæ, and Teos z. It is divided from Ionia by a channel which is but three leagues over. This island was known to the antients by the names of Æthalia, Macris, Pithyusa, &c. but that of Chios prevailed over all the rest, which some derive from the name of a nymph, others from the Greek word Chion, signifying snow, the mountains of the island, especially mount Pelenæus, being often covered with snow. But Isidorus a is of opinion, that the name of Chios was borrowed from the Syriac, that word signifying in the Syriac tongue, mastic, with which this island abounds above all other places.

Names.

Soil, &c. As for its soil, Athenæus calls it a mountainous and rugged country; however, it produced excellent wine, and is on that account highly commended by the antients. Oenopion, the son of Bacchus, if we believe Theopompus as quoted by Athenæus, taught the Chians the manner of cultivating the vine, and they the rest of mankind. The same author adds, that the first red wine was made in this island. Virgil, Horace, and Silius Italicus seem not to have disliked the wine of Chios, especially that which was squeezed from the grapes of Ariusa or Arisia, and is called by Virgil b Arvisian nectar, by Silius Arisian ambrosia c. Strabo prefers this to all the wines of Greece d. Pliny often speaks of it, and quotes Varro to prove, that it was often prescribed at Rome as an excellent stomachic e. The same author adds, that Hortensius left to his heir ten thousand casks of this wine. Julius Cæsar used to regale his friends with the Arvisian wine in his public entertainments, that wine being, as Athenæus subjoins, an excellent digester, exceeding wholesome, and far surpassing all other in taste and flavour f. Hence we may easily comprehend, why we find so many medals of Chios in Goltzius g, with bunches of grapes, casks, and other implements for making wine. The figs of Chios were likewise in great reputation, and are no less commended commended by the antient writers than the wine. Strabo takes notice of the quarries of Chios, and Pliny tells us, that the firſt jaſper was diſcovered in this iſland. Cicero happening to be here when it was firſt made uſe of, the inhabitants ſhewed him it as a curioſity; but the Roman, after having viewed it with attention, ſaid, that he ſhould be better pleaſed with the fabric they were then carrying on, if it were built with ſtone from Tibur, a city in the neighbourhood of Rome. But the chief produce of this iſland is maſtic, which is produced by the lentiſk-trees in greater plenty here than any where elſe. But for the deſcription of the maſtic, and the trees that produce it, we refer the readers to our modern travellers [h], who give a very diſtinct account of them. Vitruvius mentions a ſpring in Chios, which deprived of their ſenſe all thoſe who taſted its waters; for which reaſon an epigram was placed over it, warning all paſſengers of the danger [i]. Chios, the chief town of the iſland, ſtood on the eaſtern coaſt, in the moſt pleaſant and fruitful part of the country, and was, according to Strabo, forty ſtades in circumference [k]. This city pretended to be the birth-place of Homer; and Leo Allatius, a native of Scio, has taken a great deal of pains to ſhew, that this pretenſion was well grounded [l]. The inhabitants, to this day, ſhew the ſchool they ſuppoſe he went to, which is cut out of a rock at the foot of mount Epos, on the ſea-ſide, about four miles from the preſent town of Scio. They likewiſe pretend to ſhew his dwelling-houſe in a place which bears the poet's name, on the north ſide of the iſland, near Voliſſo, called Boliſſus by Thucydides and the author of Homer's life. Boliſſus ſtands in the midſt of the Arviſian fields, ſo famed for the wines they produced. Theſe perhaps did not a little contribute to the raiſing of the poet's vein. The inhabitants of Chios were ſo prepoſſeſſed with this opinion that Homer was born in their iſland, that according to Julius Pollux, they ſtamped his figure of their money. Several medals are ſtill to be ſeen, which preſerve the traces of this antient tradition. On one mentioned by Beger, Homer is repreſented ſitting in a chair, and holding the Iliad in his hand; and on the reverſe, an harp, the ſymbol of poetry, with a ſphinx, which agrees very well well with what is ſaid of Homer, viz. that he knew how to inculcate the fineſt maxims of morality under beautiful allegories and alluſions, and that his fables are ſo many myſtical veils which conceal the moſt important truths and profound knowledge [m]. This iſland has given to the world other very extraordinary men, namely, Ion, Theopompus, Theocritus, and Metrodorus (S).

[m] Leo Allat. ibid.

(S) Ion flouriſhed about the eighty-ſecond olympiad, and is often mentioned and commended by Ariſtophanes, Athenæus, and Suidas, as an elegant writer of tragedies. His firſt performance was exhibited in Athens, in the eighty-ſecond olympiad, and met with general applauſe. This cannot be the Ion, whom Plato, in one of his dialogues, introduces reaſoning with Socrates, as ſome writers have imagined; for this tragic poet was of Chios, and the other a native of Epheſus.

Theopompus flouriſhed in the reigns of Artaxerxes Occhus in Perſia and Philip the father of Alexander the great in Macedon. He was diſciple to Iſocrates, and, in the opinion of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſus, far excelled his maſter. The ſame author tells us, that he wrote ſeveral books, viz. orations, in imitation of thoſe by Iſocrates, among which was a funeral oration on Mauſolus, called by ſome, the epitaph of Mauſolus; a book of epiſtles; an epitome of Herodotus; a treatiſe on the doctrine of Plato; another of wonderful things, and two hiſtories. His epiſtles, as Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus informs us, were ſtiled Ἀρχαικὰς, or as others read it, Ἀχαικὰς. Athenæus quotes two of his epiſtles, one addreſſed to the inhabitants of Chios, and the other to Alexander. Harpocration mentions a third written to Tizamenes. Suidas mentions his abridgment of Herodotus, and ſays, that he was therein aſſiſted by Ephorus. His treatiſe on the doctrine of Plato is quoted by Athenæus; and that of wonderful things by the ſcholiaſt of Ariſtophanes, by Apollonius, and Laertius. The ſame ſcholiaſt mentions a treatiſe of his on piety and religion. The ſcholiaſt of Apollonius quotes the twenty-firſt and twenty-ſecond books of his Philippics. Longinus, in his treatiſe on the ſublime, produces two paſſages out of Theopompus, the one relating to Philip, and probably taken from his Philippics, where he ſays, that Philip ſwallowed, without reluctancy, ſuch affronts, as the neceſſity of his affairs obliged him to bear. This expreſſion is cenſured by Cecilius, but approved of by Longinus, as juſt and proper. The other paſſage relates to the deſcent of the king of Perſia into Egypt, where the author, in the opinion of Longinus,

THIS island was first peopled, according to Strabo, by the Pelasgians; according to Diodorus by Macareus and his followers, after they had made themselves masters of Lesbos. But the opinion of Herodotus, who will have the Chians to be Ionians, has generally obtained [n]. As to their government Inhabitants, government, history.

Longinus, enters into a detail of too mean particulars, which greatly lessen the beauty of his relations; but the chief works of Theopompus were his two histories, the one comprehending the last years of the Peloponnesian war, and the other the actions of Philip. Both these pieces are highly commended by Athenæus and Dionysius Halicarnasseus. The former praises Theopompus as a lover of truth, and one who spared no pains in the search of it. The latter tells us, that his diction was pure and simple, and yet sublime and noble; that it had something very pompous, but was tempered with a just harmony; that the whole was well connected, plain, and easy, &c. However, some authors have found fault with him as an ill-natured writer, and one who took pleasure in railing. Cornelius Nepos, in the life of Alcibiades, and Lucian think his invectives too bitter, and add, that his design seems to have been rather to censure, than to relate, facts. Josephus ranks him among the historians, whose chief aim was to disparage cities and nations. Dionysius of Halicarnassus endeavours to excuse him in this particular, telling us, that he acted like a prudent and skilful surgeon, who cuts off, or burns, the corrupted part of the body, making deep incisions, and applying caustics, without ever hurting such parts as are sound and vigorous. Theon blames his digressions as too long, and making the reader forget the mean subject. Quintilian, and with him most of the antients agree, that he wrote in the stile of an orator rather than of an historian. His history of Philip consisted of 58 books, as Diodorus Siculus and Photius inform us, and not of 72, as Suidas affirms. These Philip of Macedon, the father of Perses, reduced to 16, by retrenching the many digressions with which he had filled them. His history of the Peloponnesian war was comprised in 11 books, according to the anonymous author of the olympiads, in 12 according to Suidas. He began where Thucydides left off, and ended with the sea-fight near Cnidus. Some authors have ascribed to him the eighth book of Thucydides; but this opinion is rejected by Marcellinus. Anaximenes of Lampsacus published a history under his name, which was looked upon as a spurious piece. Photius epitomized one of the books government, they were firſt ſubject to kings; but of theſe we find Hippoclus alone mentioned in hiſtory. This prince being murdered by his ſubjects, as Strabo informs us [o], for a pretended affront offered to the bride of one of the chief men of the iſland, the Chians formed themſelves into a republic; but as to the laws and conſtitutions of their new government, we are altogether in the dark. In proceſs of time, with the aſſiſtance and under the direction of Iſocrates, they new-modelled their republic, forming it on the plan of that of Athens [p]; but they did not long enjoy the bleſſings of liberty, being, like the other ſmall ſtates of Greece, brought under ſubjection by their domeſtic tyrants. Athenæus ſpeaks of Amphicus and Polytechnus, as the firſt who aſpired to the ſovereignty of the iſland, and aſſumed all the power into their own hands [q]. In the reigns of Sadyattes and Halyattes kings of Lydia, they aſſiſted the Mileſians againſt theſe princes, remembering, ſays Herodotus, that the Mileſians had aſſiſted them in their wars with the Erythræans [r]; but neither the occaſion, nor the ſucceſs of this books of his hiſtory; and this epitome is the only part of his works that has reached our times. The ſame Photius gives a very particular account of his birth, education, manner of life, works, &c. which it would be too tedious to inſert here (41).

Theocritus was contemporary with Theopompus and Ephorus, and wrote, as Suidas witneſſes, ſome learned epiſtles, and the hiſtory of Libya. Strabo (42) calls him a ſophiſt, and ranks him and Theopompus among the illuſtrious men of Chios, who, with mutual emulation, ſtrove for the adminiſtration of affairs in their republic. This perhaps is the Theocritus, whom Fulgentius quotes in his Mythology, in the fable of Perſeus and the Gorgons (43).

Metrodorus flouriſhed in the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon king of Perſia, and was, according to Suidas, preceptor to Hippocrates and Anaxarchus. He was by profeſſion a philoſopher and a phyſician, and wrote ſeveral books relating to phyſic, which are often quoted by Pliny. Athenæus informs us, that he likewiſe wrote a book intitled Troica; but none of his works have reached us.

this war, nor even the time in which it happened, have been tranſmitted to us. After the defeat of Crœſus by Cyrus, they ſubmitted with the other iſlanders to the conqueror, and even delivered up to him Pactyas the Lydian, who had ſtirred up his countrymen to revolt againſt the Perſians. This Pactyas, not finding himſelf in a condition to make head againſt Mazares, whom Cyrus, had ſent againſt him, fled for refuge to the city of Cymæ. The Cymeans, being unwilling to deliver him up to Mazares, and, on the other hand, not caring to draw a war on themſelves by protecting him, ſent him to Mitylene; but the Mityleneans, at the requeſt of Mazares, agreeing to deliver him into the hands of the Perſians, the Cymeans diſpatched a veſſel to Lesbos, and tranſported him to Chios. The Chians, terrified at the threatening meſſages of Mazares, dragging him from the very altar of Minerva, the tutelary goddeſs of their city, put him into the hands of Mazares, who, for their ready compliance with his requeſt, beſtowed upon them the city of Atarneus in Myſia, over-againſt Lesbos, with its territory. Our hiſtorian adds, that for many years after, the Chians, declined uſing in their ſacrifices the growth of land thus acquired, looking upon the corn and fruits of Atarneus as unhallowed, and not fit to be offered to the gods [s]. Being reduced by the Perſians, they were, like the other iſlanders, employed by them in all their naval expeditions. They ſerved Darius, as the ſame hiſtorian tells us, in his expedition againſt the Scythians; on which occaſion Strattias, ſtiled by Herodotus tyrant of Chios, ſignalized his affection to that prince, by ſtrenuouſly oppoſing ſuch of the Ionians as were for abandoning him and returning home [t]. In the Ionian revolt the Chians readily joined Ariſtagoras, ſhook off the Perſian yoke, and equipped an hundred ſhips, each of which had forty choſen citizens on board. In the ſea-fight at Lade, they diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very particular manner; for the Samians, Lesbians, and moſt of the other Ionians betaking themſelves to flight in the very beginning of the engagement, the Chians fought to the laſt, took many of the enemy's ſhips, and gave ſuch proofs of their valour and zeal for the common cauſe, that, had the other Ionians followed their example, Ionia had been that day day delivered from the Perſian yoke; but, as they were abandoned by all their allies, except eleven Samian ſhips, they were at laſt overpowered, and obliged to ſave themſelves by running their ſhips a-ground at Mycale; whence they marched into the territory of Epheſus. As they arrived in the neighbourhood of the city by night, while the women were celebrating the rites of Ceres, the Epheſians, not knowing what had happened, and ſeeing an armed multitude making towards them, took them for robbers come to ſtrip the women, and without examining further into the matter, ſallying out of the city with their whole force, killed all the Chians on the ſpot[u]. Nor did the misfortunes of Chios end here; for Hiſtiæus, after the defeat of the Ionians, retiring to Chios, and not being received there, attacked thoſe who oppoſed him, and, with the aſſiſtance of the Lesbians, reduced the whole iſland, the Chians being greatly weakened by the loſs they had ſuſtained in the fight at ſea. Thus were the Chians rewarded by Hiſtiæus, who had been the chief cauſe of their revolt, and whom they had aſſiſted to the utmoſt of their power, in hopes of reſcueing their country, under his command, from the Perſian bondage. Hiſtiæus not being able to keep poſſeſſion of the iſland, abandoned it to the Perſians, who puniſhed the Chians with the utmoſt ſeverity. The moſt handſome of their youths they made eunuchs, and their daughters they ſent to the king of Perſia, after having deſtroyed both their houſes and temples, ravaged their territories, and reduced the few inhabitants that remained to a ſtate of ſlavery[w]. Before this laſt cataſtrophe, two great misfortunes befel the Chians, which our hiſtorian looks upon as previous ſigns of the many calamities they were to ſuffer from the Perſians. They had ſent an hundred young men of the chief families of the iſland to Delphos, perhaps with ſome offering; but of that number two only returned home, all the reſt dying of the plague. Not long before the ſea-fight off of Lade, the ſchool, where their youth were educated, falling down, buried an hundred and nineteen of them in the ruins[x]. Thus they continued ſubject to the Perſians, whom they aſſiſted with a conſiderable ſquadron in their expedition againſt Greece, till the battle of Mycale, when they revolted with the other Ionians, and entered into an alliance with the Athenians and Lacedæmonians againſt the common enemy[y].

The

The Chians, being thus delivered from the Perſian yoke, and reſtored to their antient liberty, flouriſhed, if we believe Thucydides above all the ſtates of Greece, Lacedæmon alone excepted[z]. When the ſupreme command was, by the unanimous conſent of the allies, conferred upon the Athenians, the Chians, who greatly contributed thereunto, were favoured by the Athenians above the other allies, being exempted from all manner of tribute, and obliged only to furniſh a certain number of ſhips[a]. They continued faithful to the Athenians till the twentieth year of the Peloponneſian war, when they revolted to the Lacedæmonians, upon the dreadful overthrow received by the Athenians in Sicily; and tho' in this they acted, as Thucydides owns, a very prudent part, yet they were, after the loſs of three battles, conſtrained to return to their antient alliance, in which they continued till the ſocial war, when, growing weary of their alliance with Athens, they joined the Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantines, with a deſign to throw off the Athenian yoke, and ſet themſelves free. In this they were attended with better ſucceſs than they had been in their former revolt; for, after having maintained the war three years, they concluded a peace almoſt upon their own terms[b], as we have related in the hiſtory of Athens[c]. From this time they enjoyed a profound peace and tranquillity till the downfal of the Perſian empire, when they, together with the other Greek ſtates in Europe and Aſia, became ſubject to the Macedonian princes. Their city was beſieged and reduced to great ſtraits by Philip the father of Perſes, who, finding he could not take it by force, proclaimed liberty to all the ſlaves who ſhould revolt, and beſides promiſed them their maſters wives in marriage; but, notwithſtanding this offer, not one ſingle ſlave, and there were more ſlaves in the city of Chios than in any other of Greece, attempted to revolt or betray their maſters: Whereupon Philip was obliged to break up the ſiege, after he had loſt a great number of his men[d]. In the war which the Æolians waged with the ſame Philip and Pruſias king of Bithynia, they ſided with the former, which coſt them dear, their territories being laid waſte, and all the open places in the iſland utterly deſtroyed by the troops of the confederate princes. Afterwards they aſſiſted the Romans in their wars againſt Philip, his ſon Perſes, and Antiochus

Antiochus ſurnamed the great, king of Syria, and were, for their eminent ſervices, not only declared free, but honoured with the title of friends and allies of the people of Rome. They were ſtrangely oppreſſed and loaded with taxes by Zenobius, one of Mithridates Eupator's lieutenants, for refuſing to join that prince againſt the Romans, but amply rewarded by Sylla, after he had overthrown Mithridates, for their attachment to the intereſt of Rome. The Roman general reſtored them to the full enjoyment of all their antient rights and privileges, which they maintained undiſturbed, living in great eaſe and plenty, till the reign of Veſpaſian, who reduced Chios, with the other iſlands of the Ægean ſea, to a Roman province; but, at the ſame time, allowed the Chians to live according to their own laws, under the ſuperintendence of a Roman prætor, whoſe province comprehended all the iſlands in the Ægean ſea, from the mouth of the Helleſpont to Rhodes.

Iſlands lying round Chios.

SEVERAL ſmall iſlands lie round Chios, which were formerly ſubject to that ſtate, viz. Thaluſſa or Daphnuſa, Oenuſſa, Elaphitis, Eurynaſſa; and over-againſt Epheſus, at a greater diſtance from Chios, the iſlands of Piſiſtratus, as Pliny ſtiles them, viz. Anthinæ, Myonneſos, and Diarrheuſa[e]. Theſe iſlands are alſo mentioned by Thucydides[f], Herodotus[g], Strabo[h], &c.

Icaria.

ICARIA, now Nicaria, lies about twenty miles weſt of Samos, and is, according to Strabo, three hundred furlongs, that is, thirty-ſeven miles and a half in circumference. It was antiently called Doliche, Macris, and Iſchſiæſa. The name of Icaria it is ſuppoſed to have borrowed from Icarus the ſon of Dædalus, who is ſaid to have been drowned near this iſland, whence the neighbouring ſea took the name of the Icarian ſea, which, according to Pliny, extends from Samos to Mycone. Bochart derives the name of Icaria from the Phœnician word Icaure, which ſignifies full of fiſh, and agrees with the name of Ichthueſſa, given to this iſland by the antient Greeks. Icaria, if we believe Strabo, was never well peopled; however, it had two pretty conſiderable towns, viz. Dracanon and Ænoe. It had good paſture ground, and was on that account, as the ſame writer tells us, of great uſe to the Samians, who were long maſters of it[i]. The inhabitants of Icaria were particularly addicted to the worſhip of Diana, whence Callimachus did not ſcruple to

to ſay, that the goddeſs took more delight in the iſland of Icaria, than in any other of the Ægean ſea. He alluded, without doubt, to the famous temple erected by the Icarians in honour of Diana, and called by the antients Tauropolium. Soms medals of this iſland are ſtill to be ſeen, repreſenting Diana in the attire of a huntreſs, and on the reverſe a woman on a bull, whom ſome take for Europa; but Nonius is of opinion, that the woman repreſents the ſame Diana, and the bull the richneſs of the paſtures for which this iſland was once famous.

PATMOS, or, as others write it, Pathmos, lies forty-five miles ſouth of Icaria, and is, according to Pliny, thirty, according to our modern geographers, only eighteen, miles in compaſs. It is a barren, mountainous, and rocky country. It had formerly, and has ſtill, ſeveral ſafe and capacious harbours; that which is now called port La Scala, is one of the beſt in the Archipelago. Near this harbour are to be ſeen ſome pieces of broken columns, which the antiquaries reckon the moſt antient in the Archipelago. The chief town of this iſland, as Galen informs us, bore likewiſe the name of Patmos. The Romans uſed this iſland as a place of baniſhment, under which puniſhment St. John reſided here, and wrote his revelations. The preſent inhabitants pretend to ſhew the houſe he lived in, which they call the Apocalypſe. Patmos is now known by the name of Palmoſa. Patmos.

LEROS is a ſmall iſland, about eighteen miles in compaſs, lying ſouth of Patmos. It was antiently very populous, and furniſhed the neighbouring countries with aloes [k]. It had formerly two convenient havens. The inhabitants, called Lerii, were reckoned very corrupt by the antients. Leros.

Pharmacuſa is placed by Stephanus over-againſt Miletus. Pharmacuſa. In this iſland king Attalus was killed, and near it Julius Cæſar taken priſoner by the pirates [l]. Between Pharmacuſa and the continent, over-againſt Miletus, is the iſland of Lade, mentioned by Thucydides [m], Strabo [n], Pauſanias [o], Herodotus [p], Arrian [q], &c. It was antiently called Late, as Pliny informs us, and inhabited by the Ionians [r]. Minyia, Arceſine, Belgialis, Amorgus, and Carianda are mentioned by Ptolemy, and placed between Patmos and Cos. geographers have placed Caryanda in a lake near the coast of Ionia; but Pliny, and Scylax, who was a native of this island, counted it among the other islands of the Archipelago.

Cos, Coos, or Cous is counted by Pliny [s] among the most considerable islands of the Ægean, or rather Myrtoan, sea. It was formerly known by the names of Merope, Cea, Nymphæa, and Caris. It lies, according to some, in the Carpathian, according to others, in the Myrtoan, sea, at a small distance from the coast of Caria, and fifteen miles from Halicarnassus. It was once very famous for its excellent wines, which are highly commended by all the antients. Strabo and Pliny agree in making it about eighty miles in compass. The chief city of the island was first called Astypalæa, and afterwards Cos. This city is mentioned by Homer, who calls it a place well-peopled. Strabo speaks of a stately temple erected by the Coans in honour of Æsculapius, the tutelar god of their island, and enriched with offerings and presents of great value; but the chief ornament of the place was a Venus rising out of the sea, done by Apelles, and reckoned one of the best performances. This inimitable piece was by Augustus conveyed to Rome, and there dedicated to Cæsar, Venus being reckoned the mother of the Julian family. To make some amends to the Coans for the loss of so valuable a treasure, the same Augustus eased them of a considerable part of their annual tribute [t]. This island was, in the Roman times, famous for a kind of fine stuff, which was in great request among the women of distinction at Rome. It covered them indeed, says the historian, but at the same time shewed them naked [u]; and hence it is so much spoke of, and inveighed against by the Latin poets [w]. But nothing has rendered this island more famous than the many great men it has produced, viz. Hippocrates, the reviver of physic, Senius, another famous physician, Ariston, a peripatetic philosopher, and Apelles, the so much celebrated painter (T). This island was, according to Homer and Strabo,

(T) To these we may add Sisyphus, who is said to have been secretary to Teucer, and to have possessed the records of the Trojan war, which Homer made use of. He is mentioned by Tzetzes, and in a manuscript chronology quoted by the learned Leo Allatius. As to Hippocrates, he learned, if we believe Pliny

Strabo, inhabited by Greeks before the Trojan war, a colony of Dorians having paſſed over into it from the continent [x]. The Coans were firſt governed by kings, among whom we find mention made of Eurypylus contemporary with Hercules; of Chalchon, Antiphus, and Phidippus. The two latter are ſaid by Homer and Theocritus to have ſerved at the ſiege of Troy. The kingly government gave room to a democracy, and this, as Ariſtotle informs us [y], to an ariſtocracy, which was aboliſhed by ſome private men, who, taking the whole power into their hands, governed with an abſolute ſway. Among thoſe Nicippus and Scythes are mentioned by Ælian [z]. Hippocrates, in one of his letters, tells us, that the Coans refuſed to give earth and water to the meſſengers of Darius and Xerxes; but this does not agree with what we read in Herodotus, who counts the Coans among the Greeks who ſerved as auxiliaries in the army of Xerxes [a]. In the twentieth year of the Peloponneſian war, the city of Cos, as we read in Thucydides [b], was thrown down by an earthquake, the moſt violent one that had ever happened in thoſe parts. Soon after this calamity, before they had time to repair the walls of their city, Aſtyochus the Lacedæmonian making a deſcent on the iſland, for the Coans ſided with the Athenians, laid waſte the whole country, plundered the city, the inhabitants having fled to the mountains, and retired to Cnidus with an immenſe booty. When Mithridates

Theſe tablets Hippocrates is ſaid to have copied and followed when he firſt began to practiſe. A tablet of this nature was diſcovered at Rome, not many years ago, among the ruins of the antient temple of Æſculapius, with this inſcription in Greek; Julianus being afflicted with vomiting of blood, and abandoned by men, the gods haſtened to his relief, and having nouriſhed him for the ſpace of three days with honey, reſtored him to his health; for which favour he came to return them thanks in the preſence of the people.

dates commanded all the Romans in Asia to be massacred, the only place that shewed any regard to them was the island of Cos, where they were suffered to enjoy the common rights of Asylum in the sacred places [c]; Mithridates soon after invaded the island, took the metropolis, and committed great devastations in their territory; but the Coans no sooner saw Lucullus's quæstor appear off their coast, than they rose up in arms, drove out the king's garrison, and received the Romans, by whom they were amply rewarded, Sylla having exempted them from all manner of tribute, and allowed them to live according to their own laws [d]. Tacitus tells us, that the Coans continued ever faithful to the Romans, did them many good services, and greatly contributed to some victories gained by their fleets. However, in the reign of the emperor Claudius, we find them, like the other Greek states, paying an annual tribute to Rome, which that emperor eased them of, in compliance with the request of Xenophon his physician, whom he pretended to be one of the descendants of Æsculapius [e]. This immunity from all impositions, taxes, and tributes they enjoyed till the reign of Vespasian, who, reducing, them to a Roman province, exacted the same tribute from them as from the other Asiatic islands. Strabo tells us, that the island of Nisyra, called formerly Porphyris, was once joined to Cos [f], but separated from it by the violence of the winds and seas. This island is sixty furlongs from Cos, and as many from Telos, being, according to Strabo eighty furlongs in compass.

Nisyra.

Carpathus. Carpathus lies between Rhodes and Crete in the sea, which from this island is called the Carpathian sea, and has to the north the Ionian, to the south the Egyptian, to the west the Cretan and African seas [g]. This island is two hundred furlongs in compass, and an hundred in length [h]. It had antiently, according to Strabo, four cities; according to Scylax only three. Ptolemy mentions but one, which he calls Posidium. This island is now called Scarpanto. Divers other islands lie dispersed on this coast, and are mentioned by Pliny, Strabo, Ptolemy, Thucydides, &c. viz.

Casos, &c. Casos eighty furlongs in compass; Synic, over-against the continent of Caria, between Eorima and Cnidus; Chalæ, distant diſtant from Carpathus four hundred furlongs; Telos, over-againſt Triopium, an hundred and forty furlongs in circuit; Arconneſus, lying off of Halicarnaſſus, with ſeveral other iſlands mentioned by Pliny [i], in the Ceramic gulph, that is, in the ſea between the city of Halicarnaſſus and the iſland of Cos. This bay was ſo called from the city of Ceramus, which Pliny places in the iſland of Arconneſus; but all other geographers on the continent, between Cnidus and Halicarnaſſus. This bay is called by ſome writers the Ceraunean bay, and the city, from which it borrowed its name, Ceraunus [k].

THE Cretan ſea is properly that part of the Ægean ſea which lies about Crete, and formerly belonged, together with the iſlands it contained, to the Cretans. Theſe iſlands are, Claude, Dia, Letoa, Ægilia, Calymna, Aſtypalæa, Thera, &c. Claude, which is mentioned in the Acts [l], and had, in Pliny's time, a city called Gaulos, and now Gozo, lies ſouth of Crete. Dia, now Standia, is about three leagues diſtant from Crete, and rather a rock than an iſland. Letoa is now known by the name of Criſtina, and Ægilia by that of Cerigo. The former lies near Crete, the other not far from Peloponneſus. Calymna is celebrated by the antients for its excellent honey [m]. Aſtypalæa, now Stampala, lies off the ſouth-weſt coaſt of Cos, is about ſixty miles in compaſs, and had formerly a city bearing the ſame name, with two ſafe harbours. Iſlands in the Cretan ſea.

THERA is placed by Strabo between Crete and Egypt, and ſaid to be twenty-five miles in compaſs; but the modern geopraphers more rightly place it between Crete and the Cyclades, and allow it thirty-ſix miles in circuit, wherein they agree with Stephanus Byzantinus. This iſland was firſt peopled by the Phœnicians; for Cadmus as Herodotus [n], Pauſanias [o], and Strabo [p], inform us, arriving here in ſearch of his ſiſter Europa, left ſome of his followers, under the command of his kinſman Membliares, to people the iſland, which was then called Calliſta. This name it changed in proceſs of time to that of Thera, from Theras the Lacedæmonian, the ſon of Auteſion and grandſon of Tiſamenes, who led into this iſland a colony of Lacedæmonians and Mynians. The ſtory is thus related by Herodotus [q]; the Thera

Argonauts, on their return from Colchis, ſtopped at Lemnos, where their poſterity retained the name of Mynians. Theſe being driven out of Lemnos by the Pelaſgians, ſailed to Lacedæmon, and arriving at Taygetus landed there. When the Lacedæmonians heard of their arrival, they diſpatched a meſſenger to enquire who they were, and whence they came. They anſwered, that they were Mynians, deſcended from thoſe heroes who had attended Jaſon to Colchis. The Lacedæmonians, underſtanding that they were of Mynian extraction, ſent another meſſenger to enquire with what deſign they had landed in their territories. To this they anſwered, that being expelled Lemnos by the Pelaſgians, they were deſirous to return to and ſettle in the country of their anceſtors. The Lacedæmonians readily complied with their deſire, allowing them to ſhare with them their lands and privileges, and even to marry Lacedæmonian women; but not long after theſe new-comers conſpired together to ſeize on the lands of the antient proprietors, and uſurp the ſupreme authority; but their plot being diſcovered, they were all apprehended and ſentenced to die. As the ſentence, according to the cuſtom of the country, was to be put in execution in the night, the wives of the Mynians, who were daughters to the principal perſons of Sparta, aſked leave to take their laſt farewel of their huſbands; which being granted, they changed their garments with them, the women remaining in the priſon, and the men making their eſcape diſguiſed like women, to the city of Taygetus. At this time Theras, who had been regent of the kingdom of Sparta during the minority of his nephews Euryſthenes and Procles, the ſons of Ariſtodemus, having reſigned to them the government, and not liking to obey after he had taſted the pleaſures of commanding, declared his reſolution to leave Lacedæmon and ſettle in the iſland of Calliſta, which was then held by the Phœnicians. As the Lacedæmonians purſued the Mynians to Taygetus, with a deſign to ſeize them there and put them to death, purſuant to the ſentence pronounced againſt them, Theras interceded in their behalf, promiſing to tranſport them out of the country, and by that means free the Lacedæmonians from their troubleſome gueſts. The Lacedæmonians complied with his deſire, and Theras, with the Mynians and a great many of his countrymen, ſet ſail to Calliſta, where they all ſettled. Thus was the iſland peopled, firſt by the Phœnicians, and afterwards by the

the Mynians, and Lacedæmonians under the conduct of Theras. Herodotus, who gives us this account of the inhabitants of Thera, names two of theſe deſcendants of Theras who reigned here, viz. Æſanius and his ſon Grynus. The latter went to Delphos to ſacrifice an hecatomb in honour of Apollo, attended by the moſt eminent citizens of the place, among whom was Battus the ſon of Polymneſtus or Cyrnus, a man of great diſtinction among the Mynians. While Theras conſulted the oracle about other affairs, the Pythian commanded him to build a city in Libya; from the execution of which command he excuſed himſelf on account of his age, deſiring the oracle to employ therein ſome of the young men there preſent, at the ſame time pointing to Battus. On their return they ſlighted the oracle, nor did they know in what part of the world Libya was; but a drought, which laſted ſeven years in Thera and deſtroyed all the trees in the iſland, except one, obliged the king to return to the oracle, which commanded them again to build a town in Libya, and ſend a colony thither. Thus ſeeing no end of their calamity, they diſpatched ſome of their citizens to Crete, with orders to enquire, whether any of the Cretans, or other inhabitants of that iſland, had ever been in Libya. Theſe meſſengers, travelling from place to place, arrived in the city of Itanus, where having met with one Corobius a dyer of purple, who told them, that he had, by diſtreſs of weather, been driven to an iſland of Libya called Platæ, they prevailed upon him, with the promiſe of a great reward, to go with them to Thera. The Theræans found means to perſuade him to conduct a ſmall number of men to the iſland of Platæa, whence they ſoon returned to give an account of the place to their countrymen, leaving Corobius there with proviſions for two months; but as they did not return within the time appointed, Corobius was reduced to the laſt extremity, when a ſhip from Samos, bound homewards from Egypt, arrived in the harbour. The Samians being informed by Corobius of all that had happened, left him ſubſiſtence for a year; during which time the Theræans returned with a numerous colony, and having divided the lands among them, choſe Battus for their king. Battus, ſeeing himſelf raiſed to this dignity, made many wiſe laws, governed his new kingdom with great prudence, and built a city, which, by order of the oracle, he called Cyrene. This city, in proceſs of time, became very famous, mous, and one of the moſt powerful ſtates of Africa, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory [r].

The iſlands of Thera and Melos were the only two places, that, in the Peloponneſian war, ſided with the Lacedæmonians, and held out to the laſt againſt the Athenians, tho' ſollicited, with advantageous offers, to join the other iſlands. Thera made then, as Herodotus informs us [s], a very conſiderable figure, was well peopled, and had no fewer than ſeven cities of no ſmall note. It has ſtill five towns pretty well peopled, viz. Apanomeria, Scaro or Caſtro, Pyrgos, Emperio or Nebrio, and Acroteri. Near Apanomeria is a capacious harbour, in the ſhape of a half-moon; but ſhips cannot anchor in it, no bottom having ever yet been found. In this harbour there are two ſmall iſlands, and at a little diſtance from it two others, called by Pliny, Strabo, and Seneca, Hiera or Automate, and Therafia. Seneca tells us [t], that the iſland of Therafia appeared firſt in his time; and Pliny [u] ſpeaks of another, which he calls Thia, and places near Hiera, as quite new. This iſland, ſays he, has been ſeen iſſuing out of the ſea in our days; and Juſtin [w] tells us, that in his time, a great earthquake happening between the iſlands of Thera and Therafia, a new iſland ſprung up, to the great ſurprize of all who beheld it. Dion Caſſius [x] alſo ſpeaks of an iſland appearing here in the reign of Claudius, which Aurelius Victor [y] calls a conſiderable iſland, and Syncellus mentions as appearing firſt in the forty-ſixth year of the Chriſtian æra. Cedrenus [z] tells us, that in the tenth year of Leo Iſauricus there appeared, for ſome days together, a thick fog between the iſlands of Thera and Therafia, and a ſmoke, as if a burning kiln or furnace were riſing up; and that, on a ſudden, there appeared, floating on the ſurface of the water, a new iſland, which at laſt faſtened to the iſland of Hiera, and conſiderably increaſed its bulk. At the ſame time ſuch vaſt quantities of pumice-ſtone were caſt up, as covered the coaſts of Macedon and Aſia, as far as the Dardanelles. This happened, according to Theophanes, in the year of Chriſt 712, according to Nicephorus in 720. A modern writer, who deſcribes the iſland of Thera, called by the inhabitants Santorin,

Santorin, tells us, that, in his time, there were many old men in the iſland, who aſſured him, that they had ſeen, in 1573, a violent fire break out of the ſea, and ſoon after a new iſland appear, which from thence they called Micri Cammeni, that is, the little burnt iſland [a]. This ſeems to confirm what Strabo ſays [b], viz. That in his time the ſea between Thera and Therafia was obſerved to boil four days together, and that an iſland 1500 paces in compaſs ſuddenly appeared, as if it had been plucked up by engines from the bottom of the water. A modern traveller tells us, that, a few years before his arrival in the iſland, an immenſe quantity of pumice-ſtone aroſe out of the harbour of Thera, with ſuch a dreadful noiſe, that at Scio, which is above 200 miles diſtant from Thera, they imagined the Venetian and Ottoman fleets had engaged [c]. In 1707 a new iſland appeared, if we may credit the accounts from the Levant, near Santorin or Thera, which was two miles in circuit at its firſt appearance, and was a few months after conſiderably increaſed by additional rocks caſt up in violent earthquakes by the ſea. The preſent inhabitants of Thera never fail to acquaint ſtrangers, that the many rocks, which are ſeen about their iſland, were all brought into the world by earthquakes. Pliny tells us [d], that Thera itſelf firſt appeared after a violent earthquake; and that Thia, which is but two furlongs from it, was caſt up by the ſea in his time, on the eighth of the Ides of July, M. Junius Silanus and L. Balbus being then conſuls. What Pliny advances is vouched by many other antient writers.

THERE are ſtill to be ſeen in Thera the ruins of the temples of Neptune and Minerva, mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, and the ſcholiaſt of Pindar. The iſland was conſecrated to Apollo, and thence is called by Pindar the holy iſland [e]. The many inſcriptions, that are ſtill remaining, ſhew, that this iſland made no ſmall figure even in the Roman times. It is now known by the name of Santorin or Santorino, probably derived from St. Irene, the tutelary ſaint of the iſland. Theſe are the chief iſlands in the Ægean, Icarian, and Cretan ſeas on the coaſts of Aſia.

We ſhall now proceed to the Cyclades, the number and order of which is, according to Strabo [f], as follows, Helena, The Cyclades.

Iena, Ceos, Cynthus, Seriphus, Melos, Siphnus, Cimolis, Prepoſinthus, Olearus, Naxus, Parus, Syrus, Myconus, Tenus, Andrus, Gyarus. Moſt of theſe iſlands lie ſouth of Delos; ſo that this iſland is not ſtrictly in the midſt of the Cyclades, as the antients ſeem to have ſuppoſed.

Helena. Helena, now Macroniſi, was antiently known by the names of Macris and Cranae; but that of Helena prevailed over the other two, and was borrowed, according to Strabo [g], Pauſanias [h], and Stephanus, from the Grecian beauty of that name, Paris having ſtopped ſome time with her in this iſland. It is about three miles in breadth and eight in length, whence it is called the Long iſland. Pliny ſays it was ſeparated from the iſland of Rubæa by an earthquake. It is a barren and inhoſpitable place, being covered over with a deep ſand, and having but one ſpring, and that, as our modern travellers inform us, but a very poor one. Some have been of opinion, that this iſland was never inhabited; but Goltzius mentions two medals relating to its antient inhabitants. It is ſeparated from the continent of Attica by a ſtraight eight miles over [i].

Ceos. Ceos, Cea, or Cia, lies oppoſite to the promontory of Achaia called Sunium, and is fifty miles in compaſs [k]. This iſland is commended by the antients on account of its fertility and richneſs of its paſtures [l]. The firſt ſilk-ſtuffs, if Pliny and Solinus are to be credited, were wrought here. Ceos was particularly famous for the excellent figs it produced, as the ſame Pliny informs us [m]. It was firſt peopled by Ariſteus, the ſon of Apollo and Cyrene, who, being grieved for the death of his ſon Actæon, retired from Thebes, at the perſuaſion of his mother, and went over with ſome Thebans to Ceos, at that time uninhabited [n]. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that he retired to the iſland of Cos; but the antients, as Servius obſerves, called both theſe iſlands by the ſame name of Cos. Be that as it will, the iſland of Ceos became ſo populous, that a law obtained there, commanding all perſons upwards of ſixty to be poiſoned, that others might have wherewithal to ſubſiſt; ſo that none above ſixty were to be ſeen in the iſland, being obliged, after they arrived at that age, either to ſubmit to the law, or abandon abandon the country, leaving all their effects behind them [o]. Ceos had, in former times, four famous cities, viz. Julis, Carthæa, Coreſſus, and Præeeſſa. The two latter were, according to Pliny, ſwallowed up by an earthquake [p]. The other two flouriſhed in Strabo's time. Carthæa ſtood on a riſing ground, at the end of a valley, about three miles from the ſea. The ſituation of it, as deſcribed by Strabo, agrees with that of the preſent town of Zia, which gives name to the whole iſland. The ruins both of Carthæa and Julis are ſtill remaining; thoſe of the latter take up a whole mountain, and are called by the modern inhabitants Polis, that is, the city. Near this place are to be ſeen the ruins of a ſtately temple, with a great many pieces of broken pillars and ſtatues of the moſt exquiſite workmanſhip. The walls of the city were made of marble, and ſome pieces are ſtill remaining of above twelve feet in length. Julis was, according to Strabo, the birth-place of Simonides, Bacchylides, Eraſiſtratus, and Ariſto (U). The Oxford marbles tell

(U) The antients mention two great men natives of Ceos, both bearing the name of Simonides. The elder, the ſon of one Leoprepis, was born in the fifty-ſixth olympiad, and died in the ſeventy-eighth, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. He wrote in the Doric dialect the hiſtory of Cambyſes and Darius Hyſtaſpis and deſcribed in Lyric verſes the battles of Artemiſium and Salamis. He is ſaid to have added to the Greek alphabet the four letters H, Ω, Ξ, Ψ. He had, according to Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus and Quintilian, a particular talent in moving his readers to compaſſion; and to this probably Catullus alluded in the following lines:

Paulum quidlibet adlocutionis
Mœſtis lacrymulis Simonideis.

He was highly favoured by the greateſt princes of Greece and Sicily, eſpecially by Pauſanias and Hiero. He wrote ſeveral books, a catalogue of which may be ſeen in Suidas and the anonymous author of the chronology of the olympiads (35). He carried tell us [q], that Simonides, the ſon of Leoprepis, invented a ſort of artificial memory, whereof he ſhewed the principles at Athens, and add, that he was deſcended of another Simonides, who was a poet no leſs renowned than himſelf. One of theſe two poets invented thoſe doleful verſes, which are ſung at funerals, and are called by the Latins, Næniæ [r]. Strabo tells us, That the Athenians having beſieged the city of Julis, raiſed the ſiege, upon advice, that the inhabitants had reſolved to murder all the children under a certain age, that other uſeful perſons might not be employed in looking after them [s]. Ceos was, with the other Greek iſlands, ſubdued by the Romans, and beſtowed upon carried the prize of poetry, probably in Syracuſe, being then in the eightieth year of his age. After his death the Syracuſans erected a magnificent monument to his memory, which was afterwards demoliſhed by Phœnix general of the Agrigentines. On this occaſion Callimachus wrote a piece againſt Phœnix, wherein he introduced Simonides, complaining of that general, for not ſhewing the ſame regard to him, which Caſtor, and Pollux had ſhewn, when they reſcued him from the danger he was in of being cruſhed under the ruins of a houſe that was ready to fall, as Phædrus relates in his fables.

The other Simonides was grandſon of Simonides the elder, and flouriſhed a little before the Peloponneſian war. He was, as Suidas informs us, author of the three books of inventions, and wrote as many of genealogies, whence the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius gives him the ſurname of the Genealogiſt. Bacchilides was nearly related to Simonides, and wrote ſome tragedies. Ariſto was a Peripatetic philoſopher of no mean character. Eraſiſtratus was an eminent phyſician, the grandſon of Ariſtotle, and flouriſhed under Ptolemy Philadelphus or Antiochus Nicanor. He is ſaid to have been the firſt who diſcovered that Antiochus Soter was in love with his mother-in-law Stratonice, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of that prince's reign. Eraſiſtratus is mentioned by Pliny (36), Plutarch (37), Appian (38), Gellius (39), Valerius Maximus (40), &c.

upon the Athenians by Marc Antony the triumvir, together with Ægina, Tinos, and ſome other adjoining iſlands [t], which were all reduced to one Roman province by Veſpaſian.

CYTHNUS, about twelve miles eaſt of Ceos, is counted, by Strabo, among the moſt fruitful iſlands of the Ægean ſea. It was the birth-place of Cyadias, an eminent painter, mentioned by Dionyſius and his commentator Euſtathius. The cheeſe of Cythnus was, according to Stephanus and Julius Pollux, in great requeſt among the antients. The iſland is now called Thermia, from the Greek word Thermos, ſignifying hot, by reaſon it abounds with hot ſprings, which are much commended by the antients. There are ſome remains of an antient and very magnificent city on the ſouthern coaſt. Cythnus.

SERIPHUS, now Serpho, is a barren rock rather than an iſland, whence Tacitus calls it the Seriphian rock [u]. Pliny allows it only twelve miles in compaſs [w]; but, according to our modern travellers, it is thirty-ſix. The rugged and ſteep mountains of Seriphus gave the poets occaſion to feign, that Perſeus transformed the inhabitants into ſtones. Strabo tells us, that on this coaſt was found the cheſt, wherein Acriſius had ſhut up Perſeus and his mother Danae [x]. Origen ſpeaks of the inhabitants of this iſland with great contempt [y]; but Herodotus lets us know, that the inhabitants of Seriphus, Siphnos, and Melos were the only iſlanders that refuſed to admit the fleet and troops of Xerxes [z]. The ſame author adds, that the Seriphians were originally Athenians, and that they aſſiſted their countrymen with two gallies againſt the Perſians. They were in antient times governed by kings, but of theſe we find one only mentioned in hiſtory, viz. Polydectes, and of him we know nothing but what we read in the poets. To this place the Romans confined enormous offenders. Here died Caſſius Severus the famous orator, baniſhed by Auguſtus for ſpeaking with too much freedom; a fault which ſeventeen years of baniſhment in the iſle of Crete had not cured him of [a]. Veſtilia the wife of Labeo, being convicted of adultery, was ſent to Seriphus to ſpend the remainder of her life Seriphus.

there [b]. One Stratonicus, mentioned by Plutarch [c], being baniſhed to this iſland, found the place ſo very diſagreeable, that he one day aſked his landlady, what crimes were puniſhed in his country with baniſhment? The Seriphian anſwered, Perjury. Why then, replied Stratonicus, don't you forſwear yourſelf, that you may be baniſhed from ſuch an execrable place? Pliny [d] and Ælian [e] tell us, that the frogs of Seriphos are naturally mute, but as noiſy as any others when tranſported out of the iſland. Jupiter, ſay the poets, ſtruck the frogs dumb at the requeſt of Perſeus, who could not ſleep here for the noiſe they made; but Theophraſtus aſcribes their ſilence to the chillneſs of the waters in this iſland. The waters, as our modern travellers obſerve, are not colder than elſewhere, nor the frogs leſs noiſy [f]. However, this groundleſs report gave riſe to the proverb, quoted by Stephanus and Suidas, as ſilent as a frog of Seriphus. This iſland abounds with mines of iron and load-ſtone, and had antiently a very convenient harbour. The onions of Seriphos are highly commended by Spon; they grow on ſmall ſpots of ground between the rocks, and are cultivated by the inhabitants with extraordinary care, being the only commodity the iſland affords.

Melos. MELOS lies about twenty-four miles off of cape Scyllæum, now Schilli, in Peloponneſus, is ſixty miles in compaſs, and, according to Pliny [g], almoſt round. This iſland though ſmall made a very conſiderable figure in the flouriſhing ages of Greece. Melos, ſays Thucydides [h], enjoyed its liberty ſeven hundred years before the Peloponneſian war. The inhabitants, ſays the ſame Thucydides [i], were originally Lacedæmonians, and therefore refuſed in the time of the Peloponneſian war to join the Athenians, declaring that they would maintain a ſtrict neutrality, which they did accordingly. Stephanus and Feſtus will have the Melians to be a colony of Phœnicians, and the iſland to have borrowed its name from one Melos who led the colony. Be that as it will, the Melians could never be prevailed upon to join the other iſlanders and Athenians againſt the Lacedæmonians: which the Athenians reſenting, ſent ſent Nicias with a fleet of threeſcore ſail and two thouſand land-forces to beſiege the capital of the iſland. Nicias landed in the iſland, laid waſte the country, but was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of the town, the Melians having made a more vigorous reſiſtance than he expected [k]. Some time after, the Athenians made another deſcent with three thouſand men under the command of Cleomedes and Tiſias, but could not reduce the town, till they were reinforced with new troops from Athens, which arriving with Philocrates brought the Melians to ſuch ſtraits, that they were forced to ſurrender at diſcretion. The Athenians, at the inſtigation of Alcibiades, treated them with great cruelty, putting to the ſword all thoſe who were able to bear arms, and carrying into Attica the women and children, where they were ſold for ſlaves. The iſland being thus quite unpeopled, a new colony was ſent thither from Athens. But not long after Lyſander the Lacedæmonian general, having obliged the Athenians in their turn to ſurrender at diſcretion, releaſed the captive Melians, and reſtored them to their native country, after having driven from thence the Athenian colony [l]. Melos afterwards underwent the ſame fate as the other iſlands of the Ægean ſea, that is, it fell under the yoke of the Romans, and was by them reduced with the other iſlands to a province. Melos was the birthplace of the philoſopher Diagoras, who was the firſt, as Lactantius informs us, that aſſerted there were no gods, whence he had the ſurname of Atheiſt. This iſland abounds with iron mines, and was in former ages famed for its wine and honey; from the latter ſome are of opinion it took the name of Melos. Clemens Alexandrinus [m] and Julius Pollux [n] greatly commend the paſtures and mineral waters of this iſland; but Hippocrates ſpeaks of one, who, being cured of the itch by uſing the waters of Melos, fell into a dropſy, of which he died [o]. The allom of Melos was in great requeſt among the Romans, who preferred it, as we read in Pliny [p], to that of any other country except the Egyptian.

Siphnus. Siphnus, now Siphanto, is about thirty ſix miles diſtant from Melos, and, according to Pliny, twenty-eight in circumference, though our modern geographers allow it to be forty. It was antiently known by the names of Merope, or Merapia, and Acis. The name of Siphnus, if we believe Stephanus, is of a later date, and borrowed from Siphnus the ſon of Sunion, who ſettled here with a colony. The air of Siphnus is exceeding wholeſome, and the ſoil equally fruitful, producing great plenty of delicious fruits, and corn enough to ſupport its inhabitants. The morals of the antient Siphnians were very depraved; whence it was proverbially ſaid of perſons leading a debauched and diſſolute life, that they lived like Siphnians [q]. Siphnus had formerly ſeveral good harbours, and has ſtill five very ſafe ones, viz. Faro, Vati, Chitriani, Chironiſſo, and Calanca. There were formerly here rich mines of gold, as Pauſanias informs us [r], and great plenty of lead; whence the inhabitants were reckoned very rich, and the iſland diſtinguiſhed with the epithet of happy [s]. Theophraſtus [t] Pliny [u], and Iſidorus [w] mention certain cups of ſtone made in Siphnos, which were in great eſteem among the Romans. In the laſt century the Grand-Signior ſent ſome Jews to examine into the lead-mines; but the inhabitants, apprehending they ſhould be obliged to work in them, bribed the captain of the veſſels, which brought the Jews, to ſink his ſhip; by which means the cargo of ore was loſt, and the Jews, who deſigned to farm the mines, all drowned. Some time after other undertakers came upon the ſame errand, but as they met with no better ſucceſs, the undertaking was dropt [x].

Cimolis: Cimolis is ſeparated from Melos by a ſtraight, which is ſcarce a mile over. It is, according to Pliny, twelve miles in compaſs, and was antiently called Echinuſa, or the iſland of Vipers. It is not known by the name of Argentiere, which it borrowed from the ſilver mines, with which it is ſaid to abound. The preſent inhabitants ſhew theſe mines to ſtrangers, but are afraid to meddle with them, leſt the Turks ſhould load them with taxes under pretence that they reaped great advantages from them. This iſland is a very barren place, place, and full of rocks and mountains. It is ſcarce ever mentioned in hiſtory, having always followed the fate of Melos. The terra Cimolia, or Cimolian earth, is greatly commended by Pliny [y]; it is a kind of chalk uſed by the preſent inhabitants, as it was by their forefathers in Pliny's time [z], in waſhing linen and whitening it. The ſame author ſpeaks of the medicinal virtues of this earth; but theſe it has no more at preſent, and perhaps never had. The whole iſland is covered with this ſort of chalk, whence it is called by Ovid a chalky country [a].

PREPESINTHUS is a ſmall iſland between Siphnus and Melos, about four miles in compaſs. It is mentioned only by Artemidorus and Strabo [b], and contains nothing worthy of notice. Prepeſinthus.

OLEARUS, or Oliaros, mentioned by Strabo [c], Pliny [d], Virgil [e], Ovid [f], &c. is ſixteen miles in compaſs, and ſeparated from the iſle of Paros by a ſtraight ſeven miles over. This iſland was, according to Heraclides Ponticus as quoted by Stephanus, firſt peopled by a Phœnician colony from Sidon. This iſland, now known by the name of Antiparos, exhibits one of the greateſt curioſities in nature, namely the vegetation of ſtones, which is deſcribed at length by a modern traveller, to whom we refer our readers [g]. Olearos.

NAXOS now Naxia, was formerly known by the names of Strongyle, Dia, Dionyſias, Callipolis, and Little Sicily. It was called Strongyle from a Greek word ſignifying round, though in reality it is rather ſquare than round. The names of Dia or Divine, and Dionyſias was given it as being conſecrated in a peculiar manner to the fabulous god Dionyſius or Bacchus. The name of Callipolis Pliny and Colinus derive from the metropolis of the iſland, formerly a moſt beautiful city, which is the import of the word Callipolis [g]. The great fruitfulneſs of the country gave riſe to the name of Little Sicily, Naxus being the moſt fruitful Naxus.

ful of all the Cyclades, as Agathemerus informs us [h], and no lefs fertile than Sicily itfelf. As for the name of Naxus, fome tell us that it was borrowed from one Naxus, under whofe conduct the Carians poffeffed themfelves of the ifland; others pretend it received this name from Naxus the fon of Endymion. Stephanus, Suidas, and Phavorinus derive the name of Naxus from the Greek word Naxai, fignifying to facrifice, and will have it to have been fo called from the many facrifices offered here to Bacchus. With thefe Bochart agrees as to its being called Naxos from the facrifices performed here in honour of Bacchus, but will have the word Naxos to be a corruption of the Phœnician Nacfa or Nicfa, fignifying a facrifice or offering. Naxos is, according to Pliny [i], feventy-five, according to the prefent inhabitants, an hundred miles in compafs. It has Paros to the weft, Myconos and Delos to the north, and Ios to the fouth. This ifland is the moft fruitful of the Archipelago, and was in former ages famed for the excellent wines it produced: Archilochus, as quoted by Athenæus, compares them to the nectar of the gods; and Afclepiades, cited by Stephanus, tells us, that Bacchus took more delight in Naxus than in any other place whatfoever, having himfelf taught the inhabitants to cultivate their vines. The wine of Naxus maintains to this day its antient reputation, being by fome deemed the beft of the Levant. Befides wine, this ifland abounds with all forts of delicious fruits, the plains being covered with orange, olive, lemon, cedar, citron, pomgranate, mulberry, and figtrees. It was formerly famous for quarries of that fort of marble, which the Greeks called Ophites, from its being green and fpeckled with white fpots like the fkin of a ferpent. The beft emeril is found here on mountains near the weftern coaft, whence the neighbouring cape is called by the Italians Capo Smeriglio, or the Emeril Cape. As to the inhabitants of Naxus, Diodorus tells us, that the ifland was firft peopled by the Thracians, who fettled here on the following occafion.

Boreas had two fons, Butes and Lycurgus, by different mothers. Butes, who was the younger, entered into a plot againft his brother; which being difcovered, Boreas commanded commanded him to leave Thrace and find himſelf ſome other habitation. Butes imbarqued with his accomplices, and ſteering his courſe to the Cyclades, poſſeſſed himſelf of Naxos, then called Strongyle, and lived upon plunder, ſeizing all the ſhips that ſailed that way. But as Butes and his Thracians wanted women, and the neighbouring iſlands were either thinly inhabited or quite deſolate, they ſailed to Theſſaly, and landing there ſeized upon ſome women, while they were celebrating the myſteries of Bacchus on a mountain near the ſhore called Diros. Butes having uſed violence on this occaſion to Coronides, ſhe made her complaints to Bacchus, who ſtruck Butes with madneſs, which occaſioned his death, he having thrown himſelf down a precipice and died of the fall. The other Thracians returned with the Theſſalian women to Strongyle, carrying with them, amongſt others, Iphimedia the wife of Aloeas and Pancratis his daughter, both women of extraordinary beauty. On their return they created Agaſſamenus king of the iſland in the room of Butes, beſtowing upon him Pancratis, as he did Iphimedia on one of his intimate friends, whom he had appointed commander in chief of his forces. In the mean time Aloeas ſent his two ſons Otus and Ephialtes in queſt of his wife and daughter. Theſe landing in the iſland with a ſtrong body of men, engaged the Thracians, routed them, took their metropolis by ſtorm, and made themſelves maſters of the whole iſland. Not long after the two brothers fell out, which occaſioned a civil war, wherein many were killed on both ſides, and amongſt the reſt the two brothers by one another; but the Theſſalians afterwards adored them as demigods or heroes. After the Theſſalians had held the iſland for the ſpace of two hundred years and upwards, they were at length obliged by a drought and famine to abandon it. After the Trojan war the Carians, being then powerful at ſea, ſettled here, and called the iſland Naxus from their king, who was the ſon of Polemon. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Leucippus, and Leucippus by his ſon Smardius, in whoſe reign Theſeus coming out of Crete landed here with Ariadne, whom he was, as Diodorus tells us, commanded in his ſleep by Bacchus to leave in this iſland, which he did accordingly, and Bacchus having retired with her to mount Arius, they both soon after disappeared [k] (W). In process of time a colony of Cnidians and Rhodians settled here, under the conduct of Hippothous and Xuthus; and last of all the Ionians, who by degrees possessed themselves of the whole island, whence the Naxians are by Herodotus called Ionians, and ranked among the Athenian colonies [l].

Naxus was formerly a very flourishing republic, and by far the most powerful of the Cyclades, as Herodotus informs us [m], and had several cities of note, amongst others Naxus the metropolis of the island mentioned by Ptolemy [n]; the present city of Naxia, which is the capital, was perhaps built on the ruins of the antient Naxus, whence it retains the same name.

The Naxians were first governed by kings, as we have hinted above out of Diodorus, but afterwards formed themselves into a republic, and enjoyed their liberties till the time of Pisistratus tyrant of Athens, who having subdued Naxus bestowed it upon Lygdamis a native of the island, for having assisted him with men and money in usurping the sovereign power [o]. Upon the death of Lygdamis they recovered their liberty, and even possessed themselves of the neighbouring islands of Paros and Andros. In the reign of Darius Hystaspis, Aristagoras, governor of Miletus in Ionia, formed a design of surprizing Naxus, under colour of restoring

(W) The antients mention two women, who had the common name of Ariadne; and in honour of both festivals were yearly solemnized in the island of Naxos. The one was thought to be of a gay and pleasant temper; and therefore her festival was observed with music and many other expressions of joy and mirth. The other was the same whom Theseus is supposed to have left big with child on the coast of Naxus, and is said to have been of a melancholy disposition, whence the solemnity dedicated to her had a shew of sorrow and mourning. In memory of her being left by Theseus, it was usual on this occasion for a young man to lie down and counterfeit all the agonies of a woman in labour. This festival is said to have been first instituted by Theseus, to atone in some degree for his ingratitude to her (41).

ſtoring the nobles, who had been driven out by the popular faction and taken refuge in Miletus. Darius furniſhed him with two hundred ſhips and a conſiderable body of land-forces to be employed in this expedition. But the Naxians, being forewarned by Megabates the Perſian general, with whom Ariſtagoras happened to fall out, put themſelves in a poſture of defence, and obliged Ariſtagoras, after a ſiege of four months, to drop the enterprize, and retire to the continent. On the miſcarriage of this expedition Ariſtagoras, as we have related in the hiſtory of Perſia, revolted from the Perſians, and prevailed upon the Iohians to join in his revolt, which brought endleſs calamities upon Ionia. Not long after the Perſians made a ſecond deſcent on Naxus, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, and meeting with no oppoſition, the inhabitants having at their approach abandoned their habitations and fled to the mountains, they poſſeſſed themſelves of the iſland, ravaged the whole country, and laid the city with its temples in aſhes [p]. The Naxians, being thus brought under the Perſian yoke, could not help ſending ſome ſhips of war to their aſſiſtance in their expedition againſt Greece; but the officers who commanded them, at the perſuaſion of Democritus, the moſt wealthy and powerful citizen of Naxos, inſtead of joining the Perſians, went over with their ſhips to the Athenians. At the battle of Platæa the Naxians gave ſingular proofs of their valour, as we read in Diodorus Siculus, being above the other iſlanders zealous in the defence of the common liberties of Greece [q]. They were at that time, according to Herodotus, in a very flouriſhing condition, had a great number of ſlaves, a ſquadron of ſhips well appointed, and eight thouſand land-forces [r]. In the Peloponneſian war they declared for the Athenians, as did moſt of the other iſlands of the Ægean ſea; but, being treated by them more like ſubjects than allies, attempted to ſhake off the yoke. The Athenians ſent a powerful fleet againſt them, beſieged their capital, and forced them to accept what conditions Athens was pleaſed to impoſe. Thucydides obſerves, that Naxus was the firſt of the confederate cities which the Athenians deprived of their liberty [s]. From this time they continued ſubject to the Athenians till they fell into the hands of the Romans, which happened in the Mithridatic war. After the the battle of Philippi Mark Anthony bestowed Naxos, Andros, and some other islands on the Rhodians, who oppressed them to such a degree, that he was soon obliged to drive them out, and restore those islanders to their former state of liberty, which they enjoyed till the reign of Vespasian [u].

WITHIN a stone's cast from Naxus is a rock, on which is still to be seen a very beautiful gate of marble, which the inhabitants call the gate of Bacchus's palace; but is without all doubt part of the magnificent temple, which the Naxians built here in honour of that god. For they had a tradition that Bacchus was born in their island, and educated among them by the nymphs Philias, Chronidis, and Cleidis, and that out of gratitude for the kindness shewn him in his infancy by the Naxians, he had taken the island under his protection, and on several occasions assisted them in a miraculous manner against their enemies. The gate we are speaking of is eighteen foot high, eleven foot three inches broad, and remarkably beautiful. This temple and the island on which it stood were joined to Naxus by a stone bridge, on which were to be seen in 1547 the conduits which served to convey the wine from Naxus into the cellars of the temple. This is what we learn from Bennedetto Berdonio [w]; but our more modern travellers take no notice of this bridge.

Paros. THE island of Paros was antiently called Pactia, Minoa, or Minoia, Demetrias, Zacynthus, Hyria, Hileassa, and Cabarnis [x]. The name of Cabarnis is borrowed, according to Stephanus, from one Cabarnus, who first acquainted Ceres with the rape of her daughter Proserpine; or, according to Hesychius, from the Cabarni, the priests of Ceres being so called by the inhabitants of this island. Bochart [y] tells us, that the word Cabarnis in the Phœnician tongue signifies to sacrifice, whence the priests were called in some places, such especially as had any communication with Phœnice, Cabarni, that is, sacrificers. The name of Minoa it borrowed from Minos king of Crete, who subdued this as he did most of the other islands of the Ægean sea [z]. It was called Paros, which name it retains to this day, from Paros the son of Parrhasius, or, as Stephanus will have it, of Jason the Argonaut. Paros, according to Pliny's computation [a], computation [a], is diſtant from Naxus ſeven miles and a half, and twenty-eight from Delos. Some of the modern travellers will have it to be fourſcore [b], others only fifty miles, in compaſs [c]. Pliny ſays it is half as large as Naxos, that is, between thirty-ſix and thirty-ſeven miles in compaſs. It was antiently a rich and powerful iſland, being called by Stephanus the moſt wealthy and happy of the Cyclades, and by Cornelius Nepos an iſland elated with its riches [d]. The city of Paros, which was the metropolis of the iſland, is ſtiled by Stephanus a potent city, and ſaid to have been one of the largeſt in the Archipelago; the preſent city of Paros, or, as the natives call it, Parichia, is ſuppoſed to have been built upon its ruins, the neighbouring country abounding with valuable monuments of antiquity; the very walls of the preſent city are built on columns, architraves, pedeſtals, mingled with pieces of antient marble of a ſurprizing bigneſs, which were once employed in more noble edifices. Every one knows, that Paros was formerly famous for its marble, which was of an extraordinary whiteneſs, and in ſuch requeſt among the antients, that the beſt ſtatuaries uſed no other [e]. Pliny tells us [f], that the Parian marble and no other was made uſe of in adorning the frontiſpice of the celebrated labyrinth in Egypt, which was counted one of the wonders of the world. The beſt quarries were thoſe of mount Marpeſus or Marpeſſus, mentioned by Virgil [g] and his interpreter Servius. In this mountain are ſtill to be ſeen caverns of an extraordinary depth, which the modern inhabitants and travellers take to be the antient quarries. The quarries of Paros, if Pliny is to be credited, were ſo deep, that even in the cleareſt weather the workmen were obliged to uſe lamps, whence the marble was called by the Greeks Lychnites, that is, worked by the light of lamps [h]. The ſame author tells us, that in a block of marble, dug up in one of theſe quarries, when broken by the workmen, there appeared a beautiful repreſentation of Silenus engraved on the ſtone by the hand of nature [i]. In one of the quarries, diſtant about four miles from the preſent city of Parichia, is ſtill to be ſeen a baſſo-relievo cut in the rock, and containing twenty-nine figures of nymphs and fatyrs ſatyrs dancing a kind of brawl. This was done, as appears from the inſcription, by one Adamas Odryſes in honour of the nymphs. Though Pliny greatly commends the Parian marble, yet he prefers to it that of Luna in Italy, as being both whiter and of a cloſer grain [k]. The iſland is provided with ſeveral capacious and ſafe harbours, and was antiently much reſorted to by traders. Archilochus, the inventor of the Iambic verſe, was a native of Paros. Horace was in the right when he ſaid, that rage armed him with Iambics [l]; for his verſes were ſo ſatirical and biting, that Lycambes, againſt whom he wrote, hanged himſelf out of deſpair. Lycambes, after having betrothed his daughter to him, beſtowed her upon another, which affront the poet revenged by compoſing thoſe bitter invectives, which obliged Lycambes to lay violent hands on himſelf. His books were forbidden at Sparta for their wanton and obſcene expreſſions, and himſelf baniſhed the country. He was contemporary with Gyges king of Lydia. The author of the moſt valuable monument of antiquity now extant, that is, of the Oxford marbles, was born in this iſland, as Gaſſendus informs us [m], but his name has not reached us. He lived, according to the learned Uſher, in the third century before the chriſtian æra. As to the inhabitants of Paros, this iſland was, according to Thucydides [n], firſt peopled by the Phœnicians, who were before other nations maſters of the ſea. Afterwards the Carians ſettled here, as we are told both by Thucydides [o] and Diodorus [p]. But it is no eaſy matter to reconcile theſe two authors as to the time when the Carians came firſt into the iſland; for Thucydides tells us, that the Carians were driven out by the Cretans under the conduct of Minos; and Diodorus writes, that the Carians did not ſettle here till after the Trojan war, and that they found the Cretans in the poſſeſſion of the iſland. Stephanus is of opinion, that the Cretans mixed with ſome Arcadians were the only nations that ever poſſeſſed this iſland. Minos himſelf, if we believe Pliny [q], reſided ſome time in the iſland of Paros, and received the melancholy news of the death of his ſon Androgeus, who was killed in Attica, after he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the public games.

games. When Hercules paſſed through Paros, going in queſt of the girdle of Hippolita by order of Euryſtheus, he found there Eurydemon, Chryſes, Nephalion, and Philolaus, the ſons of Minos, and with them a great many Cretans [r].

As to the hiſtory of Paros, we find the inhabitants of this iſland choſen from among all the Greeks by the Mileſians to compoſe the differences, which had for two generations rent the unhappy ſtate into various parties and factions [s]. They acquitted themſelves of this charge with great prudence, and reformed the government in the manner we have related in the hiſtory of Miletus. They joined Darius in his expedition againſt Greece, aſſiſting him with a conſiderable ſquadron, but after the victory obtained by Miltiades at Marathon they were reduced to great ſtraits by that general. The matter is thus related by Herodotus [t]: Miltiades having by his ſucceſs at Marathon acquired a much greater reputation at Athens than he had before, demanded ſeventy ſhips of the Athenians with men and money in proportion, aſſuring them, without declaring his deſign, that he would lead them into a country, from whence they ſhould bring home great riches without any manner of trouble. The Athenians, accepting the propoſal with joy, prepared the ſhips, and Miltiades, being ſupplied with all things neceſſary for his enterprize, ſet ſail for Paros, under colour of chaſtiſing the Parians for having aſſiſted the Perſians at Marathon. But the true motive of his expedition was his private hatred againſt the Parians, becauſe one Lyſagoras the ſon of Tiſeus, who was of Parian extraction, had ſpoke ill of him to Hydarnes the Perſian. Miltiades on his arrival at Paros beſieged the capital, threatening to take it by ſtorm and plunder the houſes, unleſs the citizens ſent him an hundred talents. The Parians inſtead of granting him his demand, applied themſelves wholly to the defence of their city, repairing the fortifications and working in the night, till they had made their walls twice as high as they were before in that part where they were leaſt defenſible; inſomuch, that Miltiades could not by any means make himſelf maſter of the city. That great general, ſeeing he could not reduce the Parians by force, had recourſe to one Timo, prieſteſs of the national gods, and

and then his priſoner, who adviſed him to perform ſome ſecret ceremony in the temple of Ceres near the city. Miltiades followed her advice, went directly to the incloſure of the temple, and after having endeavoured in vain to open the gate, mounted the wall and leaped down with a deſign to enter the ſacred place. But while he ſtood before the door of the temple, being ſeized with a ſudden terror, he reſolved to return, and leaping down from the ſame place, had the misfortune to break his leg. The ceremony either did not ſucceed, or was not at leaſt attended with the promiſed ſucceſs; for Miltiades, after having kept the city blocked up for the ſpace of twenty-ſix days was obliged to drop the enterprize and return to Athens with diſgrace [u]. Upon his departure, the Parians being informed of the counſel which Timo had given to Miltiades, and deſirous to bring her to juſtice, ſent deputies to conſult the oracle of Delphos, whether they ſhould puniſh her with death for endeavouring to betray the city to the enemy, and diſcovering the ſacred myſteries to Miltiades, which was a great crime to reveal to any man. The Pythian anſwered, That Timo was not the author of that advice, but that the gods, having determined to deſtroy Miltiades, had only made her the inſtrument of his death [w]. Cornelius Nepos likewiſe relates the ſiege of Paros by Miltiades, but varies in ſome particulars from Herodotus; for that writer tells us, that the Athenian general having inveſted the city by ſea and land, reduced it to ſuch ſtraits, that the inhabitants deſired to capitulate. But in the mean time, a wood in the continent taking fire, by what accident was never known, the Parians imagined it to be a ſignal given them by the fleet of Darius advanceing to their relief; whereupon they broke off the conferences, and would no more hearken to the terms offered them by the enemy. Miltiades likewiſe, apprehending that the Perſian fleet approached, ſet fire to the engines, and weighing anchor returned to Athens, where he was condemned to defray the charges of that unſucceſsful expedition, amounting to fifty talents [x]. Stephanus tells us, That the Parians had already agreed to ſurrender their city; but that a foreſt on the ſide of Mycone taking fire, and

and the Parians, not doubting but it was a ſignal given them by the Perſian general Datis, who was haſtening to their relief, would not ſtand to their agreement; which gave riſe to the proverb, to keep one's word after the Parian manner. After the battle of Salamis Themiſtocles ſubjected Paros and moſt of the other neighbouring iſlands to Athens, obliging them to ſupply him with large ſums, by way of puniſhment for having favoured the Perſians [y]. It appears from the famous monument of Adulas, which Coſmos of Egypt has deſcribed with great exactneſs [z], that Paros and the other Cyclades were once ſubject to the Ptolemies of Egypt, theſe iſlands being mentioned in that monument, which was erected in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes. However, Paros fell again under the power of the Athenians, who continued maſters of it till they were driven out by Mithridates the great. But that prince being obliged to yield to the good fortune of Sylla, to the valour of Lucullus, and to the greatneſs of Pompey, as Florus expreſſes it, this and the other iſlands of the Archipelago ſubmitted to the Romans, who reduced them to a province with Lydia, Phrygia, and Caria.

Syros. SYROS is placed by Strabo between Paros and Delos [a], and ſaid by Pliny to be twenty miles in compaſs [b]. Mutianus, as quoted by Pliny, makes it an hundred and ſixty, but our modern travellers agree with Pliny. This iſland had formerly a town of no ſmall note bearing the name, as appears from an antient inſcription ſtill to be ſeen in the preſent town of Syra, and from many ruins of ſtately buildings at a ſmall diſtance from the harbour. Syros, according to Homer's account of it, abounded with corn, wine, and all other neceſſaries of life, and was reckoned one of the moſt healthy places of the Ægean ſea, the plague never having raged there with any violence [c]. This iſland, as we learn from the ſame poet, was frequented in the earlieſt ages by the Phœnician merchants, who, after having paſſed a whole year here, carried off with them one of the concubines of Cteſias king of the place, ſhe being a native of Sidon, and the daughter of Arybas king of that city. Pherecydes, one of the moſt antient philoſophers of Greece, the diſciple of Pittacus and and maſter of Pythagoras, was born in Syros. Strabo, Porphyrius, Apuleius, and the author of the chronology of the olympiads tell us, that he was the firſt, or one of the firſt, that wrote in proſe; Tzetzes ſays, he was the firſt who obſerved the periods of the moon and foretold eclipſes, that he was the maſter of Thales the Mileſian, and that he wrote ten books on the origin of the gods. He was the firſt, according to Cicero [d], who taught the immortality of the ſoul. He is charged by Suidas with being the author of the metempſychoſis, or tranſmigration of ſouls out of one body into another. He is greatly commended on account of his knowledge by Diogenes Laertius, Apuleius, Jamblichus, Lactantius, Euſtathius, &c. who all agree him to have been one of the greateſt philoſophers that Greece ever produced, and add, that he learnt his philoſophy of the Phœnicians, being well acquainted with their language and books (X). Stephanus reckons Syros among the Ionian colonies; it is at preſent known by the names of Siro, Sira, and Zyra, and by many confounded with the iſland

[d] Cic. Quæſt. Tuſc. l. i. c. 158.

(X) Some writers tell us, that Pherecydes was a native of Babylon, and in favour of this opinion quote Euſtathius; but there is evidently a miſtake in the paſſage which they alledge, ſince Euſtathius in the very ſame place calls him a native of Syros. Some therefore in the text of that writer inſtead of Βαβυλόνιος read Βαβιὸς, as it is in Suidas and the chronology of the olympiads, or Βάβυος, as in Laertius, that is, the ſon of Babis or Badis. Heraclides, Apuleius, Ælian, Pauſanias, Porphyrius, and Jamblichus mention two other writers bearing the ſame name; the one of Athens and the other of the iſland of Leros; ſome take theſe two to be but one, born according to them at Athens, and brought up in Leros; others are of opinion that there was but one Pherecydes, and make the Athenian, Lerian, and Syrian one and the ſame perſon; and indeed the paſſages quoted out of the other two by Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, Germanicus, Hyginus, Marcellinus, Euſebius, and Suidas, ſeem to be taken out of the books, which have been aſcribed to Pherecydes of Syros. He was called the Athenian, ſay they, becauſe he wrote a book, entitled, The genealogy of the Athenians; and as to the name of Lerian, it might have been given him becauſe he lived ſome time in the iſland of Leros. Strabo no-where mentions Pherecydes of Leros, but often ſpeaks of the other two, calling the one iſland of Skyros, antiently Scyrus, which we ſhall deſcribe in its proper place. Off the eaſtern coaſt of Syros lie three ſmall iſlands called Gadroniſi.

MYCONUS lies between Icaria and Delos, about three miles diſtance from the latter, and is thirty-ſix in circuit. It borrowed the name of Myconus or Mycone from one Myconus, the ſon of Ænius and grandſon of Caryſtus and Rhyas [e]; but who theſe were, neither Strabo nor Stephanus his tranſcriber have thought fit to acquaint us. This iſland was long uninhabited by reaſon of the frequent and dreadful earthquakes to which it was ſubject; but they no ſooner ceaſed, than the inhabitants of the adjoining iſlands ſettled in it, and built a town to which they gave the name of the iſland [f]. The poets feigned, that the centaurs killed by Hercules were buried here, whence took riſe the proverb, To place all things under one Mycone, applied to thoſe, who under one and the ſame title touched upon quite different ſubjects [g]. Strabo, and after him Euſtathius [h], obſerves, that the Myconians grew bald very early, whence they were called, by way of contempt, the bald heads of Mycone. Our modern travellers confirm Strabo's obſervation, aſſuring us, that the preſent Myconians loſe their hair when twenty or twenty-five years old [i]. Pliny tells us, that in this iſland children are all born without hair, and that both men and women ſoon loſe that ornament given by nature [k]. They were heretofore reckoned arrant paraſites; whence Archilochus, as quoted by Athenæus [l], taxes one Pericles with coming to a Myconus.

a philoſopher, and the other an hiſtorian. Cicero (42), the ſcholiaſt of Euripides (43), Macrobius (44), and Origen (45) quote Pherecydes without mentioning his country; whence ſome have concluded, that there was but one writer of that name. Though it is no eaſy matter to decide this queſtion, yet the authority of Strabo, a moſt accurate writer, is of more weight with us than that of our modern critics.

feaſt after the Myconian manner, that is, without being invited. In this iſland there is great ſcarcity of water, but the wine it formerly produced is highly commended by Pliny [m]. Wheeler ſpeaks of a medal which he purchaſed here, with Jupiter's head on one ſide, and a bunch of grapes on the other. Virgil gives the iſland of Mycone the epithet of high [n], wherein he diſagrees with Ovid, who calls it a low iſland [o]. But Virgil in all likelihood alluded to mount Dimaſtos, mentioned by Pliny as the higheſt in the iſland [p]; ſince the iſland itſelf lies, according to Strabo, very low. Between Mycone and Delos, about a mile from the former, lies the iſle of Tragoniſi about three miles in compaſs. It formerly abounded with goats, whence it had the name of Tragoniſi or the Goat-iſland.

Tenos. THIS iſland was firſt called Hydruſia from the Greek word hydor, ſignifying water, being more plentifully ſupplied with ſprings than the other iſlands; afterwards it had the name of Ophiuſa, from the ſerpents which infeſted the iſland, the Greek word Ophis ſignifying a ſerpent; and laſtly the name of Tenos was given it from one Tenos the firſt who ſettled here [q]. Bochart pretends the word Tenos to be derived from Tannoth, which in the Phœnician language ſignifies a ſerpent [r], and anſwers the Greek word Ophiuſa or Ophiuſſa. Pliny places Tenos one mile from Andros, fifteen from Delos, and ſays 'tis fifteen miles in extent. Tournefort will have it to be ſixty miles in compaſs, Porchachi forty, and Ferrarius but five and thirty. It is very mountainous, but nevertheleſs produces great plenty of excellent fruit. The wine of Tenos was in great requeſt among the antients; whence ſeveral medals of this iſland are ſtill to be ſeen with bunches of grapes on the reverſe [s]. The name of Tenos was common to the iſland and its capital [t], which, according to Strabo, was not a great, but a well-built, city, and had a ſtately temple in an adjoining grove dedicated to Neptune [u]. This temple and grove enjoyed the privileges of an aſylum, which were abridged by Tiberius, as were thoſe of the moſt famous temples in the Levant [w].

Philocorus, as quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus [x], tells us, that Neptune was worſhipped by the Tenians as the god of phyſic. Goltzius, Triſtanus, and others exhibit ſeveral medals of this iſland repreſenting Neptune, with his trident on the reverſe; the ſerpent, which is on ſome medals joined to the trident, was among the ancients an emblem of phyſic; beſides, Tenos was antiently called Ophiuſa, or the Snake-iſland, as we have obſerved already; and Heſychius tells us, that it was cleared of the ſerpents, which infeſted it, by Neptune, who for that purpoſe brought great flights of ſtorks into the iſland. The Tenians were once very powerful by ſea, as Herodotus informs us [y]; but nevertheleſs were ſo terrified at the approach of the Perſian fleet, that they ſubmitted without making the leaſt oppoſition, and aſſiſted Xerxes in his expedition againſt Greece. This iſland afterwards underwent the ſame fate as the others of the Archipelago, being firſt ſubdued by the Athenians, who drove out the Perſians, afterwards by the Macedonian princes, and laſtly by the Romans.

THE iſland of Andros lies between Tenos and Eubæa, being diſtant from the former one mile, and ten from the latter [z]. Pliny will have it to be ninety-three miles in compaſs; but the inhabitants ſay it is an hundred and twenty. The antients give it various names, viz. Cauros, Laſia, Nonagria, Epagris, Antandros, and Hydruſia. The name of Andros it borrowed from one Andreus, who was, according to Diodorus Siculus [a], one of the generals, whom Rhadamanthus appointed to govern the Cyclades, after they had of their own accord ſubmitted to him. Conon will have this Andreus to be the ſon of Anius, and grandſon of Apollo and Creuſa, and to have been the firſt who ſettled in this iſland. As to the name of Antandros, the ſame author tells us, that Aſcanius the ſon of Æneas, being taken priſoner by the Pelaſgians, gave them this iſland for his ranſom, which on that account was called Antandros, that is, delivered for one man [b]. It had formerly a city of great note bearing the ſame name, and ſituated very advantageouſly on the brow of a hill, which commanded the whole coaſt [c]. There are ſtill to be ſeen about three miles from the preſent town Andros.

town of Arna the ruins of a great and ſtrong wall, with the fragments of many columns, chapiters, baſes, broken ſtatues, and ſeveral inſcriptions, ſome of which mention the ſenate and people of Andros, and the prieſts of Bacchus; for in the town of Andros ſtood, as we read in Strabo and Pliny, a famous temple dedicated to that god. The territory of Andros was antiently, and is ſtill, one of the moſt fertile and pleaſant countries in the whole Archipelago, abounding with all kinds of delicious fruit, and watered with innumerable ſprings, whence it had the name of Hydruſia, a name given by the Greeks to all places plentifully ſupplied with water. Mutianus, as quoted by Pliny [d], tells us, that near the temple of Bacchus was a ſpring, called the gift of Jupiter, the waters whereof had the taſte of wine in the month of January, during the feaſts of Bacchus, which laſted ſeven days. The ſame author adds, that the water, if carried to a place whence the temple could not be ſeen, loſt their miraculous taſte [e]. Pauſanias makes no mention of this ſpring, but ſays, that during the feaſts of Bacchus wine flowed, or was at leaſt by the Andrians believed to flow, from the temple of that god; the prieſts, no doubt, found their account in keeping up this belief by conveying through ſecret conduits a great quantity of wine into the temple. The Andrians were the firſt of all the iſlanders who joined the Perſians; wherefore Themiſtocles, after the ſignal victory gained at Salamis, reſolved to attack the city of Andros, and oblige the inhabitants to pay large contributions for the maintenance of his fleet. Having landed his men in the iſland, he ſent heralds to the magiſtrates, acquainting them, that the Athenians were come againſt them with two powerful divinities, perſuaſion and force, and therefore they muſt part with their money by fair means or by foul. The Andrians returned anſwer, that they likewiſe had two mighty deities, who were very fond of their iſland, poverty and impoſſibility, and therefore could give no money. Themiſtocles, not ſatisfied with this anſwer, laid ſiege to the town [f]. Our hiſtorian does not acquaint us with the event of this undertaking; but we may ſuppoſe that the Athenian general made himſelf maſter of the place, ſince Pericles, as we read in Plutarch [g], a few years after ſent thither a colony of two hundred and fifty Athenians.

Athenians. It did not long continue ſubject to Athens, being re-taken by the Perſians, and beſieged in vain by Alcibiades, who after having taken and fortified the caſtle of Gaurium, left Thraſybulus in it with a ſtrong gariſon, and retired firſt to Rhodes, and thence to the iſland of Cos [h]. This, as the other Greek iſlands, ſubmitted to Alexander, after whoſe death it ſided with Antigonus who was driven out by Ptolemy, whoſe ſucceſſors held it to the Roman times, when Attalus king of Pergamus beſieged the metropolis at the head of a Roman army, and having taken it, was by the Romans put in poſſeſſion of the whole iſland. Upon the death of that prince, the people of Rome claimed the iſland of Andros, as well as his other dominions, in virtue of his laſt will [i].

Gyarus, Gyara, or Gyaræ, lies near Delos, and is ac- Gyarus.
cording to Pliny [k] twelve miles in compaſs. It is the moſt abandoned and diſagreeable place of the whole Archipelago. In Strabo's time it had but one ſmall village, and that inhabited by a few beggarly fiſhermen, who after the battle of Actium ſent a deputation to Auguſtus to obtain a diminution of their annual tribute, which was ſet at an hundred and fifty denarii [l]. We are told by the antient writers, that this iſland was once infeſted by ſwarms of field-mice of an extraordinary ſize, which, after having driven out the inhabitants, were forced to live upon the iron that was dug out of the mines, finding nothing elſe to ſubſiſt on in ſo barren a place [m]. It was not therefore without reaſon that the Romans uſed to baniſh offenders to this iſland; for they had not in their wide-ſpreading dominions a more wretched and uncomfortable place to ſend them to.

These are the iſlands counted by Strabo, Artemidorus, Pomponius Mela, Stephanus, and Scylax among the Cyclades. We ſhall now proceed to Delos itſelf, and ſuch iſlands as lie north of it on the coaſts of Greece, Theſſaly, and Thrace.

from Myconus, eighteen from Naxus, and fifty from Icaria [n]. But that writer was certainly mistaken in his measures with regard to Myconus and Naxus, the former being distant from Delos but three miles, and the latter forty. Delos was known to the antients by the names of Cynethos or Cynthos, Asteria, Pelasgia, Chlamydas, Lagia, Pyrpylis, Scythias, Midia, and Ortygia [o]. It was named Ortygia and Lagia from the two Greek words ortyx and lagos, the former signifying a quail, and the latter a hare, there being antiently great store of both in this island. The scholiast of Apollonius [p] says, it was called Ortygia from a sister of Latona bearing that name, and Pynethos from the son of Apollo. Pyrpylis Pliny derives from the Greek word Pyr, signifying fire, which he pretends to have been first found out here [q]. As to the name of Delos the etymologists all agree in deriving it from a Greek verb signifying to appear, but vary as to the reason of its being appropriated to the island before us. Pliny, after Aristotle, pretends, that the name of Delos was given it because it rose unexpectedly out of the sea, and appeared floating on the water [r]. Solinus thinks it was the first of the islands that began to appear after it had been with the others of the Archipelago for the space of nine months under water in the famous deluge that happened in the time of Ogyges. But this opinion is altogether groundless and repugnant to reason; for allowing all these islands to have been drowned in that deluge, yet the island we are speaking of could not appear the first after the waters began to retire, it being much lower than the islands of Andros, Tenos, Myconus, Syros, and Naxus. Stephanus tells us, that the name of Delos was given it on account of the oracle of Apollo, which made things, that were perplexed and obscure, clear and apparent. The poets will have it to be named Delos, because Latona, being delivered of Apollo and Diana, shewed herself first here, not having dared to appear before for fear of Juno. It is still called by the Greeks Dili or Deli in the plural, because under that name they comprehended another island known to the antients by the name of Rhenæa, which at some distance seems to be joined to Delos. These two the present inhabitants distinguish by the epithets of little and great; the Delos

Delos of the antients they ſtile the little Delis, it being but ſeven miles in compaſs, whereas the other is eighteen. Pliny ranks Delos among the floating iſlands, and the poets tell us, that it was faſtened, ſome ſay by Neptune, others by Apollo, with ſtrong chains to the neighbouring iſlands of Gyarus and Myconus (Y).

As Latona was ſuppoſed to have been delivered in this iſland of Apollo and Diana, three moſt magnificent temples were erected here to theſe deities. That of Apollo was, according to Strabo [s], begun by Eryſichton the ſon of Cecrops, but afterwards enlarged and embelliſhed at the common charges of all the ſtates of Greece. Plutarch tells us, that it was one of the moſt ſtately buildings in the univerſe, and ſpeaks of an altar in it, which, in his opinion, deſerves a place among the ſeven wonders of the world. It was built with the horns of various animals, ſo artificially joined and adapted to one another, as to hang together without being faſtened by any kind of cement [t]. The trunk of the famous ſtatue of Apollo, mentioned by Strabo and Pliny, is ſtill an object of great admiration to all travellers. It is without head, feet, arms, or legs; but, from the parts that are yet remaining, it plainly appears, that the antients did not exaggerate when they commended it as a wonder of art. It was of a gigantic ſize, tho' cut out of one ſingle block of marble, the ſhoulders being ſix feet broad, and the thighs nine feet round. At a ſmall diſtance from this ſtatue lies, amongſt confuſed heaps of broken columns, architraves, baſes, chapiters, &c. a ſquare piece piece of marble, fifteen feet and a half long, ten feet nine inches broad, and two feet nine inches thick, which, without all doubt, ſerved as a pedeſtal to this coloſſus. It bears, in very fair characters, this inſcription in Greek, The Naxians to Apollo. Plutarch tells us, in the life of Nicias, that he cauſed to be ſet up near the temple of Delos, a huge palm-tree of braſs, which he conſecrated to Apollo; and adds that a violent ſtorm of wind threw down this tree on a coloſſean ſtatue raiſed by the inhabitants of Naxus [u]. Round the temple were magnificent porticoes built at the charge of various princes, as appears from inſcriptions which are ſtill very plain. The names of Philip king of Macedon, Dionyſius Eutyches, Mithridates, Euergetes, Mithridates Eupator king of Pontus, and Nicomedes king of Bithynia, are found on ſeveral pedeſtals. Moſt of our modern travellers take this Dionyſius to be one of the tyrants of Syracuſe; but the ſurname of Eutyches or happy does not at all ſuit Dionyſius the younger, who was far from being happy, as is plain from the account we have given of his reign in the hiſtory of Sicily. As to Dionyſius the elder, we find him every where plundering and deſtroying the temples of the gods, even in his old age; we are therefore inclined to believe, that this Dionyſius was tyrant of Heraclea; for both Memnon [w] and Diodorus Siculus [x] ſpeaks of one Dionyſius tyrant of Heraclea, whoſe reign laſted thirty years, and was very happy. The ruins of the temple, which take up great part of the iſland, are carefully deſcribed by Spon, Wheeler, Tournefort, and others, to whom we refer our readers. To this temple the inhabitants of the neighbouring iſlands ſent yearly a company of virgins, to celebrate, with dancing, the feſtival of Apollo and his ſiſter Diana, and to make offerings in the name of the reſpective cities.

As Delos was the reputed birth-place of Apollo and Diana, it was highly revered by all nations, even by the Perſians themſelves, who, after having laid waſte the other iſlands, and every-where deſtroyed the temples of the gods, ſpared Delos; nay Datis, who commanded the Perſian fleet, would not even permit his ſhips to anchor in that harbour; but from Naxus, where he had committed great devaſtations, and burnt the city with all its temples, he proceeded proceeded to Rhenæa. There he received intelligence, that the Delians had on his approach abandoned their iſland, and retired with their effects to Tenos; whereupon he ſent a herald to them with a meſſage: Sacred men, upon what account have you abandoned your habitations, and by your flight diſcovered the ill opinion you have of me? I am not your enemy by inclination; and beſides, I have been commanded by the king to forbear practiſing any ſort of hoſtilities in a country where two gods were born, or uſing violence of any kind againſt the inhabitants of the place. Return therefore to your houſes, and reſume the poſſeſſion of your lands. Upon the return of the meſſenger, he ſent the weight of three hundred talents of frankincenſe to be burnt on the altar of Apollo, and ſet ſail with his whole fleet, without ſuffering any of his ſoldiers to land in the iſland. The Delians ſay, that, ſoon after his departure, the iſland was ſhaken by a violent earthquake, the firſt that had ever been felt there; and that Apollo thereby foretold the many calamities that were ready to fall upon the Greeks of that age; for the misfortunes they ſuffered under Darius, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes were far greater than all the evils they had undergone for twenty generations before, as our hiſtorian rightly obſerves [y]. In this iſland no hoſtilities were practiſed, even by nations that were at war with each other, when they happened to meet here. Of this we have an inſtance in Livy, who tells, that the Roman deputies, Caius Pompilius, Caius Decimius, and Caius Hoſtilius, being obliged to put in at Delos on their voyage to Syria and Egypt, found the gallies of Perſes king of Macedon and thoſe of Eumenes king of Pergamus anchored in one and the ſame harbour, tho' theſe two princes were then making war upon one another. The ſame author adds, that the Romans, Macedonians, and Pergameans, converſed and viſited the temple together, as if they had been friends, the ſanctity of the place ſuſpending, to uſe Livy's expreſſion, all manner of hoſtilities [z].

The offerings, that were made to Apollo in this iſland, were, according to an antient cuſtom, firſt wrapped up in wheat-ſtraw. This ceremony paſſed from the Hyperboreans to the Scythians, and ſpread gradually through the bordering nations, as far weſtward as the Adriatic ſea, and ſouthward to Dodona, the Dodonæans having been the firſt among the

the Greeks who embraced this cuſtom. Afterwards it prevailed in the cities on the gulf of Melis, in the iſland of Eubœa, and reached to Caryſtus. The Caryſtians introduced it among the Tenians, and theſe among the Delians. Thus was that ceremony firſt brought into Delos [a]. Our hiſtorian adds out of the antient Delian writers, that, long before the time we are now ſpeaking of, the Hyperboreans had ſent two young women, named Hyperoche and Laodice, to propagate this ceremony, appointing five perſons of diſtinction to attend them, whoſe memory was in our hiſtorian's time in great veneration among the Delians. As none of thoſe, whom the Hyperboreans had ſent out upon this errand, returned home, they diſpatched others to the bordering countries, injoining them to introduce this ceremony among their neighbours, and prevail upon them to impart it to other nations. Thus, if we believe the Delians, theſe ſacred rites were introduced, through many other nations and countries, into their iſland. The Hyperborean young women, Hyperoche and Laodice, are ſaid to have died in Delos, where their memory was honoured by the Delian maids and young men in the following manner. The maids cut off a lock of their hair before marriage, which they uſed to put upon a diſtaff, and offer it to theſe Hyperborean virgins on their tomb, which was within the temple of Diana. The young men likewiſe offered their hair on the ſame monument, twiſted round a ſmall tuft of graſs. In the ſame age, but before the arrival of Hyperoche and Laodice, two other Hyperborean women, Argis and Opis, landed in Delos, and brought into the iſland the firſt knowledge of the ceremony, which was afterwards eſtabliſhed by the two former. Argis and Opis were on that account honoured with great ſolemnity by the Delian women, who uſed to aſſemble at ſtated times, and ſing hymns in their praiſe, compoſed by one Olen a Lycian, the author of ſeveral other hymns ſung in the iſland of Delos. The aſhes of the ſacrifices, which were burnt on this occaſion, were thrown upon their ſepulchres, which, in our hiſtorian's time, were ſtill to be ſeen behind the temple of Diana [b].

The oracle of Apollo in Delos was one of the moſt famous oracles in the world, as well for antiquity, as for the truth truth and perſpicuity of its anſwers, the number and richneſs of the ſacred preſents dedicated to the god, and the multitudes of people that from all parts reſorted thither for advice; in which reſpect it ſurpaſſed not only all the oracles of other gods, but thoſe of Apollo himſelf, that of Delphos alone excepted. Some writers tell us [c], that the iſland had the name of Delos from the anſwers that were returned here by the oracle in moſt clear and plain terms, without any ambiguity or obſcurity; whereas in other places they were delivered in words capable of different, nay, oppoſite, ſenſes: But theſe anſwers were not to be expected all the year; Apollo only kept his ſummer reſidence in this place, and in winter retired to Patara a city of Lycia [d]. The preſents, which the votaries offered here to Apollo were laid on the altar which we have mentioned above. Some writers tell us, that this altar was erected by Apollo himſelf, when he was but four years old, and that it was formed of the horns of goats only, killed by Diana on mount Cynthus [e]. It was not lawful to ſacrifice any living creature upon this altar, it being the will of Apollo, that it ſhould be preſerved pure from blood and all manner of pollution. The whole iſland enjoyed the privileges of an aſylum, which extended to all living creatures, and on that account it abounded with hares, no dogs being ſuffered to enter it [f]. Piſiſtratus tyrant of Athens was commanded by an oracle, as Herodotus informs us [g], to purify the iſland, which he did accordingly, cauſing the dead bodies to be taken up, and removed from all places within the proſpect of the temple. In the ſixth year of the Peloponeſian war, the Athenians, by the advice of an oracle, purified it anew, by digging up all the dead bodies, and carrying them over to the iſland of Rhenæa, where they were interred. Having thus cleared it from ſepulchres and graves, in order to preſerve it from pollution, they put forth an edict, whereby it was enacted, that for the future no perſon ſhould be ſuffered to die, nor any woman to be brought to bed, in the iſland; but when they were near the time of the one or the other, they ſhould be carried over into Rhenæa [h]. In memory of this purification, the Athenians,

Athenians inſtituted a ſolemn feaſt, which was celebrated every fifth year, people flocking on that occaſion to Delos from the neighbouring iſlands and all parts of Greece. A few years after, the Athenians, to complete the purification of the iſland, drove out all the antient inhabitants, whom they pretended to be polluted, on account of a crime by them committed in former times, but not mentioned by our hiſtorian. The Delian exiles retired to the continent, and ſettled in the city of Adramyttium, beſtowed upon them by Pharnaces the Perſian governor of Aſia Minor. The Athenians ſuffered great loſſes, both by ſea and land, after their expulſion; whereupon they ſoon recalled them, and put them anew in poſſeſſion of the iſland. Some choſe to remain in Adramyttium, where they were barbarouſly murdered by the command of one Aſtacus, deputy to Tiſaphernes governor of Lydia [i].

We muſt not omit in this place the annual proceſſion made by the Athenians to the iſland of Delos. The author of this ceremony was Theſeus, who being ſent with other Athenian youths into Crete to be devoured by the Minotaur, made a vow to Apollo, that if he granted them a ſafe return, they ſhould make a ſolemn voyage to his temple in Delos every year. This was called Dorias; the perſons employed in it Theori and Deliaſti, from the name of the iſland; the chief of them Architheoros, and the ſhip, in which they went, Theoris or Delias, which was the very ſame that carried Theſeus and his companions to Crete, being preſerved, ſays Plutarch, by the Athenians, till the time of Demetrius of Phaleros; they reſtored always what was decayed, and put new planks in the room of the old ones, inſomuch, that it furniſhed the philoſophers with matter of diſpute, whether, after ſo many alterations and reparations, it might be ſtill called the ſame ſhip. The beginning of the voyage was computed, as Plato informs us [k], from the time that the prieſt of Apollo firſt adorned the ſtern of the ſhip with garlands; and it was held unlawful to put any perſon to death till it returned: this was the reaſon why Socrates was reprieved for thirty days after his condemnation [l]. Upon their arrival at Delos, they offered a ſolemn ſacrifice, and celebrated a feſtival in honour of Apollo, Apollo, and then, repairing to their ſhips, ſailed back to Athens, where they were received with great Demonſtrations of joy. Another feaſt was inſtituted by Theſeus on his return from Crete, and celebrated every fifth year by the Delians in honour of Venus, whoſe ſtatue Theſeus received from Ariadne, and left in that iſland. The chief ceremonies on this occaſion were the following: They crowned the ſtatue of the goddeſs with garlands, appointed horſe-races, and performed a remarkable dance called the Crane, wherein they repreſented, by their motions, the various windings of the Cretan labyrinth, out of which Theſeus, who was the inventor of the dance, made his eſcape [m].

THE city of Delos took up, as is manifeſt from the magnificent ruins that are ſtill to be ſeen, that ſpacious plain which reaches from one coaſt to the other, and extends eaſtward as far as the iſthmus. It was well peopled, and the richeſt city of the Archipelago, eſpecially after the deſtruction of Corinth, merchants flocking thither from all parts, both in regard of the immunity they enjoyed there, and of the convenient ſituation of the place between Europe and Aſia. Strabo calls it one of the moſt frequented empories of the world [n]; and Pliny tells us, that all the commodities of Europe and Aſia were ſold, purchaſed, or exchanged there [o]. It contained many noble and ſtately buildings, namely, the temples of Apollo, Diana, and Latona, the porticos of Philip of Macedon and of Dionyſius Eutyches, a gymnaſium, an oval baſon, made at an immenſe expence, for the repreſentation of ſea-fights, and a moſt magnificent theatre.

STRABO [p] and Callimachus [q] tell us, that the iſland was watered by the river Inopus; but Pliny [r] calls it only a ſpring, and adds, that its waters ſwelled and abated at the ſame time with thoſe of the Nile, as if there had been ſome communication between the Nile and the Inopus, which, in Strabo's opinion [s], is carrying prodigies too far. At preſent there is no river in the iſland; but one of the nobleſt ſprings in all the Archipelago, being twelves paces diameter, and incloſed partly by rocks, and partly by a wall. Mount Cynthus, whence Apollo had the ſurname of Cynthius, is by Strabo placed near the city, and ſaid to be ſo high as to cover the whole iſland with its ſhadow; but our our modern travellers ſpeak of it as a hill of a very moderate height. On mount Cynthus Latona is ſaid to have been delivered of Apollo and Diana; whence it was looked upon by the antients as ſacred. It is but one block of granite of the ordinary ſort, cut out on that ſide which faced the city, in regular ſteps, incloſed on both ſides with a wall. On the top of the mountain are ſtill to be ſeen the remains of a ſtately building, with a Moſaic pavement, many broken pillars, and other valuable monuments of antiquity. From an inſcription, which has been lately diſcovered there, and mentions a vow made to Serapis, Iſis, and Anubis, ſome have conjectured, that on this hill ſtood a temple conſecrated to theſe Egyptian deities, tho' nowhere ſpoke of by the antients.

The iſland of Delos, was, it ſeems, in antient times, governed by kings; for Virgil mentions one Anius reigning here in the time of the Trojan war. He was, according to the poet, both king and high-prieſt of Apollo, and entertained Æneas with great kindneſs. This Anius was deſcended from Cadmus, and had by his wife Dorippe three daughters, Oino, Spermo, and Elais, who are feigned by the poets to have received from Bacchus the power of changing whatever they touched into wine, wheat or ſeed, and oil, as their names import, Oinus in Greek ſignifying wine, Sperma ſeed, and Elaion oil. The great quantity of wine, wheat, and oil, which accrued to their father Anius from the offerings made to Apollo, gave riſe to this fable [t]. The Perſians, as we have hinted above, allowed the Delians to enjoy their antient liberties, after they had reduced all the other Greek iſlands. In after-ages the Athenians made themſelves maſters of Delos, and held it till they were driven out by Mithridates the Great, who plundered the rich temple of Apollo, and obliged the Delians to ſide with him. Mithridates was, in his turn, diſpoſſeſſed of it by the Romans, who granted the inhabitants many privileges, and exempted them from all ſort of tribute and taxes. It is at preſent quite abandoned, the lands being ſo covered with ruins and rubbiſh, as not to admit of any ſort of culture. The inhabitants of Mycone hold it now, and pay but ten crowns land-tax to the Grand-Signior for an iſland, which was once one of the richeſt countries in the world.

Rhenæa. The iſland of Rhenæa, Rhenia, or Rhene, is ſeparated from Delos by a ſtraight about five hundred paces over. It

[t] Vide Servium in l. iii. Æn. ver. 80.

It is now called the Great Sdili or Deli, and is about eighteen miles in compaſs. Polycrates tyrant of Samos, having made himſelf maſter of this iſland, conſecrated it to Apollo, faſtening it to Delos with a long chain [u]. It has excellent paſture grounds; but nevertheleſs is at preſent quite abandoned, none daring to ſettle there for fear of the pirates who infeſt the Archipelago. On the coaſt facing Delos are ſtill to be ſeen the ruins of a great city; and near to the city was the burying-place of the Delians, as is plain from ſome inſcriptions on tomb-ſtones found there. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that Strabo ſhould call Rhenæa a little uninhabited iſland, ſince it is three times as big as Delos, and was in former times, ſo far as we can gueſs from the ruins of antient buildings, as well peopled as Delos itſelf.

SCYRUS, now Sciro, lies over-againſt Eubœa, from which Scyrus is about eight and twenty miles diſtant. It is ſixty miles in compaſs, but a very barren and inhoſpitable country, being full of hills and rocks; whence it had the name of Scyros; that is rugged or barren. However, in Strabo's time, it yielded excellent wine, and was famed, as the ſame author tells us, for its goats [w]; but ſo unprovided with corn and all other neceſſaries of life, that any poor and barren country was proverbially called the principality of Scyrus [x]. The ſame writer commends the marble quarries of this iſland; and Pliny ſpeaks of a kind of ſtone found here, which ſwam when entire, and ſunk when broken. Scyrus was, according to Plutarch [y], firſt peopled by the Pelaſgians and Carians (Z); but there is no mention

(Z) Marcianus of Heraclea tells us, that after the iſland had been long held by the Pelaſgians and Carians, the inhabitants of Chalcis, the capital of Eubœa, ſent thither a colony, which ſettled on the coaſt, leaving the inland places to the antient proprietors. The Dolopes likewiſe, as Plutarch informs us (47), inhabited part of the iſland, and uſed to ſeize and ſtrip ſuch as came to traffic with the Chalcidians and other inhabitants. Some of theſe being ſentenced to reſtore to the merchants of Theſſaly, the goods which they had taken from them, to prevent the execution

tion made of it in hiſtory till the reign of Lycomedes, who was king of this iſland, when Theſeus retired to it to take poſſeſſion of his paternal eſtate. That prince, either jealous of the ſuperior genius of Theſeus, or not caring to provoke Mneſtheus, who had driven him out of Athens, by entertaining the exile, led him to the top of a rock, under pretence of ſhewing him his father's lands, and from thence threw him treacherouſly into the ſea[z]. In this iſland, and in the court of the ſame Lycomedes, Achilles lay concealed till he was diſcovered by Ulyſſes, and ſent, with other Greek princes, to war againſt Troy, which, according to the oracle, could not be conquered without his aſſiſtance. While he lived among the king's daughters, diſguiſed under the apparel of a woman, he had by Deidamia, who was one of them, Neoptolemus, called Pyrrhus on account of his yellow hair. Neoptolemus was brought up in this iſland, and raiſed here the brave troops which he carried to the war of Troy, to revenge his father's death. Many ages after the Trojan war, Scyrus was reduced by the Athenians, under the command of Cimon, who, being ordered by an oracle to make diligent ſearch after the bones of Theſeus, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to find out the place where they had been buried. After he had ſearched in vain for a long time, he at laſt obſerved an eagle on a riſing ground, digging up the earth with its beak and talons. This prompted him to ſearch carefully the ſame place, where he diſcovered the coffin of a tall man, with a ſword and pike lying by him. He made no further ſearch, but taking for granted, that in the coffin was the body of Theſeus, he put it on board a galley richly adorned and carried it to Athens, about 400 years after that hero's death. The cution of the ſentence, betrayed the town to Cimon the Athenian, as we read in Thucydides (48). The city bore the ſame name as the iſland, and was famous for a magnificent temple built on the ſea-ſide, in honour of Pallas, the tutelary goddeſs of the country. Of this temple and of another dedicated to Neptune, there are ſtill ſome remains to be ſeen near the preſent port called St. George's haven. Goltzius exhibits the type of a medal of this city, with Neptune holding his trident on one ſide, and the prow of a ſhip on the other.

The remains of ſo great a man were received at Athens with great demonſtrations of joy, and placed in the heart of the city, where they ſerved as an aſylum for offenders [a] (A). The iſland of Scyrus was taken from the Athenians by the Perſians, but afterwards reſtored to them by the articles of the famous peace of Antalcidas. After the death of Alexander, to whom this iſland ſubmitted, Demetrius, ſurnamed Poliorcetes or the Town-taker, made himſelf maſter of it, and reſtored the inhabitants to their antient liberty [a], which they enjoyed, till they were with the other Greek ſtates brought under the Roman yoke.

FROM Scyrus Strabo proceeds to the iſlands of Sciathus, Peparæthus, Icos, and Haloneſus, which according to him lie in the Ægean ſea, near the coaſt of Magneſia [b]. Sciathus, now Sciato and Sciatta, lies about four leagues north of Eubœa, is thirty miles in compaſs, and ſeparated from the continent of Magneſia by a narrow ſtraight [c]. Pomponius Mela places it more to the ſouth, over-againſt the Pegaſæan bay, called now the gulf of Volo. It had formerly two cities, one of which, called alſo Sciathus, was demoliſhed by Philip the father of Perſes, leſt the Romans ſhould ſeize it [d]. In the Roman times it ſerved as a place of retreat for pirates; wherefore Bruttius Sura, having made himſelf maſter of it, crucified all the ſlaves he found in the iſland, and cut off the right hands of all the inhabitants he could ſeize [e]. Seneca calls it a barren and abandoned iſland, and ſuch it is to this day, Sciathus.

(A) Solemn ſacrifices were offered on this occaſion; and, to perpetuate the remembrance of this event, a yearly conteſt for tragic writers was inſtituted, which became very famous, and greatly contributed to the improvement of dramatic compoſitions, by the emulation it excited among the tragic poets. On this occaſion Sophocles brought his firſt performance on the ſtage, and won the prize, tho' he had Æſchylus for his competitor; which the conquered poet, who, till that time, had been conſidered as the beſt tragedian of his age, not being able to brook, left Athens, and withdrew to Sicily, where he ſpent the remainder of his life.

day; being uninhabited on account of the pirates who ſtill continue to infeſt it.

Peparæthus. PEPARÆTHUS is placed by Stephanus in the neighbourhood of Eubœa, wherein he diſagrees with all the antients, who ſpeak of it as lying between the iſlands of Sciathus and Scyrus, thirty leagues from mount Athos, and eight from the coaſt of Magneſia. Some of the modern geographers, namely Benjamin, give the iſland of Peparæthus the name of Opula; others, as Niger, that of Lemene; and ſome, particularly Caſtaldus, call it Seraquino; but in the ſea-charts it is commonly known by the name of Piperi. It is about twenty miles in circumference, and formerly abounded with excellent olives, as Ovid informs us [f]. Pliny boaſts of the excellency of its wines, and tells us, that Apollodorus, a famous phyſician, in a book which he wrote about the choice of wines, and dedicated to Ptolemy king of Egypt, preferred that of Peparæthus to any other. The ſame author adds, that it was not in great requeſt, as not being palatable, till it was ſeven years old [g]. From the excellence of its wines, it was called in the moſt early ages Euœnus, that is, producing good wine, or the wine-iſland [h]. In this iſland was formerly a city of the ſame name, which was deſtroyed together with Sciathus, by Philip of Macedon, in his war with the Romans [i].

Icos. Icos is by Stephanus counted among the Cyclades, and placed near Eubœa; but by Livy [k], between the iſlands of Sciathus and Scyrus. It is a very ſmall iſland, but nevertheleſs had antiently two cities, whence it was alſo called Dipolis.

Haloneſus HALONESUS is placed by Pliny [l] between Samothrace and the Thracian Cherſoneſus at an equal diſtance, that is, of fifteen miles, from both. But Strabo [m] and Mela [n] ſpeak of it as lying between Icos and Scyros, over-againſt Magneſia. It had formerly a town of the ſame name, and, being claimed both by the Athenians and by Philip of Macedon, gave riſe to a war, as Stephanus informs us, between thoſe two powers. It is at preſent called Pelagniſi and Pelagiſi.

BETWEEN theſe iſlands on the coaſt of Magneſia and Leſbos on the coaſt of Aſia, lies a ſmall iſland, called by the antients Chryſe, and now known by the name of S. Strato. There were formerly two iſlands bearing this name, whereof one, if Pauſanias [o] may be credited, ſunk into the ſea, and never afterwards appeared. Chryſe.

THE iſland of Lemnos lies between mount Athos (B) and the Thracian Cherſoneſus, being, according to Pliny's account [p], diſtant twenty-two miles from Imbros, eighty-ſeven from mount Athos, twenty-two from Samothrace, and five from Thaſos. The ſame author makes it an hundred and twelve miles in compaſs; and Stephanus tells us, that it was called Lemnos from Juno, whom the antient inhabitants worſhipped under that name, ſacrificing yearly to her a young woman. It was alſo called Hypſipylea, from the daughter of Thoas king of the iſland; but is now known by the name of Stalimene or Stalimini. It had in former times two cities, Hepheſtias and Myrina. The former was the capital of the iſland, and took Lemnos.

(B) Mount Athos reaches a great way into the ſea, in the form of a peninſula, and is joined to the land by an iſthmus twelve furlongs over. It extends towards the confines of Thrace and Macedon, between the gulfs of Strymon and Singum, of which the former is now called the gulf of Monte Santo, and the latter gulf of Conteſſa. Stephanus tells us, that it borrowed its name from a giant who lived in that neighbourhood. We may judge of its height by what the antient writers ſay of it, viz. in the ſummer ſolſtice its ſhade reached as far as the market-place of Myrina in the iſland of Lemnos; that is, according to Pliny, eighty-ſix miles. It is reckoned to be an hundred and fifty miles in circumference, and has been known ſince the Greek monks made it the place of their retreat, by the name of Monte Santo, or the holy mountain. In the market-place of Myrina ſtood a ſtatue of white marble, repreſenting an ox, which, being ſhaded by mount Athos, gave riſe to the proverb, Mount Athos darkens the white ox of Lemnos, applicable to thoſe, who, with calumnies and falſe reports, endeavoured to tarniſh the reputation of deſerving men (49).

took its name from Hephaiſtos or Vulcan, the tutelary god of the place, and is now known by the name of Cochino, as the latter is by that of Lemno and Stalimene. The country is full of hills and vales, which, in ſome places, are well cultivated, and produce all ſorts of fruit. The eaſtern part of the iſland is dry and barren, but the country lying on the weſtern and ſouthern coaſts, as it abounds more with ſprings, is very fruitful. It has two high mountains, one of which, called by Heſychius and Nicander Meſchilæ, vomits flames like mount Ætna in Sicily; and hence the iſland was called in antient times Æthalia, which Bochart derives from a Greek verb ſignifying to burn. The iſland was conſecrated to Vulcan, whom the inhabitants worſhipped as their tutelar god. They were believed to have been the firſt black-ſmiths, which gave the poets occaſion to feign, that Vulcan, when he was thrown down from heaven, fell in the iſland of Lemnos, where he built his forge. Theſe fabulous opinions were recorded on their medals, ſome of which are ſtill to be ſeen ſtamped with head of a Vulcan, and his uſual ſymbols, viz. his anvil, pincers, and hammer, which, according to the fictions of the poets, he uſed in making new thunderbolts for Jupiter. This iſland has ever been famous for a certain kind of earth, or rather chalk, called Terra Lemnia from the place, and Terra Sigillata, from the ſeal or character that is imprinted on it. It has been always deemed an excellent remedy againſt poiſons, ſtings of ſerpents, wounds, and bloody fluxes. In the time of Dioſcorides they uſed to mix this earth with goats blood, and ſell it made up in ſmall pellets, each pellet being ſealed with the figure of a goat. This manner of preparing it was no more uſed in Galen's time; for that great man undertook a voyage to Lemnos, with no other view but to inquire, on the ſpot, into the nature, virtue, and qualities of that wonderful earth. He tells us, that it was then dug up with a great many religious ceremonies; that the prieſts went in proceſſion to a riſing ground, at a ſmall diſtance from the city of Hepheſtias, the only place where they ſuppoſed this earth to be found; and there, after ſowing a certain meaſure of wheat and barley, and performing other myſterious ceremonies, they loaded a cart with the earth, which they attended in proceſſion to the city. The ceremonies deſcribed by Galen have been long ſince aboliſhed, and others, which are ſtill practiſed, brought in probably by the Venetians

netians in their room; for on the ſixth of Auguſt, and on no other day, all the chief men of the iſland, whether Turks or Chriſtians, aſſemble at a chapel called Sotira, ſtanding half way between the city, or rather the village, of Cochino, and the hill where the earth is found, to the top of which they walk in proceſſion. There the Caloyers or Greek prieſts read their liturgy; which being done, certain perſons, appointed for that purpoſe, begin to dig, and having diſcovered a vein of the earth they look for, give notice thereof to the Caloyers, who fill with it certain ſmall hair ſacks, delivering them to the Turkiſh governor and other officers there preſent. When they have taken up as much as they think proper, they fill up the place again, and return in proceſſion to the city. Some of the bags are ſent to the Grand-Signior and the reſt marked with his ſeal, or with thoſe two words, Tin Imachton, that is, ſealed earth, ſold by the Sangiack, or his deputies, to the inhabitants and foreign merchants. The Sangiack is accountable to the Grand-Signior's treaſury for the money ariſing from the ſale of the whole which is yearly diſpoſed of, it being a capital crime for any of the inhabitants to keep in their houſes, export, or any ways diſpoſe of it, without the governor's knowledge and licence. There is no doubt, but earth of the ſame nature might be found in other places of the iſland; but none of the orientals would make uſe of it, unleſs it were dug up with the uſual ceremonies, and in the preſence of the Caloyers; nay, it would be in no requeſt among them, as our modern travellers inform us, unleſs it were dug up on the uſual day, the ſixth of Auguſt.

THE labyrinth of Lemnos is much ſpoke of by the antients, and, in the opinion of Pliny [q], preferable to thoſe of Egypt and Crete. It was a magnificent building, ſupported by forty columns of extraordinary height and thickneſs. The architects, employed in raiſing this admirable edifice, were Zmilus, Rholus, and Theodorus, a native of the iſland. Some remains of this ſtately fabric were ſtill to be ſeen in Pliny's time; but Belonius tells us, that he could not diſcover, in any part of the iſland, the leaſt veſtiges of it. The labyrinth

the expedition of the Argonauts, whoſe deſcendants, known by the name of Minyans, ſettled here, but ſoon abandoned the country, and retired to the city of Lacedæmon, from whence they went to Triphilia, and ſtopt in the neighbourhood of Arena, in a country which in Strabo's time was called Lypeſia [r]. Many years after their departure from Lemnos, the Pelaſgians, being driven out of Attica, poſſeſſed themſelves of this and the adjacent iſlands, and governed them according to their own laws, till they were brought under ſubjection to Athens by Miltiades. As to the motive which prompted the Athenians to drive them out of Attica, there is a great diſagreement among authors, ſome pretending, that they were juſtly expelled, and others maintaining, that the Athenians therein were guilty of the greateſt injuſtice and treachery. Herodotus leaves the cauſe undecided, and only relates what was reported by writers of both ſides. Hecatæus (C), as quoted by him [s], tells us, that the Athenians ſeeing the lands about Hymeſſus, which they had given to the Pelaſgians in payment for the wall they built round the Acropolis or citadel of Athens, improved, from a barren and unprofitable ſoil, into a beautiful and well-cultivated country,

(C) Hecatæus was a native of Miletus, flouriſhed, according to Suidas, in the ſixty-fifth olympiad, and wrote the lives of Cyrus and Cambyſes. Laertius ſays, that he was a diſciple of Heraclitus. He is frequently mentioned by Herodotus, who tells us, that Hecatæus, being at Thebes in Egypt, had the vanity to give out, that he was deſcended from one of the Egyptian deities, whereby he became the ſcorn of the prieſts of the country (50). The ſame author informs us, that he did all that lay in his power to diſſuade Ariſtagoras from engaging in a war with the Perſians, and ſending colonies into Sardinia. Beſides the lives of the two above-mentioned princes, he wrote, it ſeems, other books; for Stephanus cites the firſt and fourth books of his Genealogies. Harpocration the ſecond, and Athenæus the third. Stephanus, Athenæus, and Rufus Feſtus quote a deſcription of Aſia, Europe, and Lybia compiled by Hecatæus; but Callimachus, in his catalogue of authors, aſcribes this work to another Hecatæus whom he ſurnames the iſlander. Diodorus Siculus and Pauſanias tell us, that the hiſtory of Hecatæus, as likewiſe thoſe of Cadmus and Hellanicus, was full of fables.

country, drove them out without any provocation whatſoever, and reſumed the country which they had beſtowed upon them. On the other hand, the Athenians affirm, that the Pelaſgians, while they were poſſeſſed of the country under mount Hymeſſus, frequently offered violence to their ſons and daughters, who were ſent for water to a place called the nine fountains. They add, that the Pelaſgians, not contented with theſe attempts, conſpired to poſſeſs themſelves of Athens itſelf; which conſpiracy being detected, the Athenians, to ſhew themſelves as generous as the others had been baſe, inſtead of puniſhing with death, as their treachery deſerved, commanded them only to depart the country. The Pelaſgians, being thus driven from Attica, paſſed over into Lemnos, and ſettled there; but deſiring to be revenged on the Athenians, they fitted out a fleet, and having laid an ambuſcade for the Athenian women, as they celebrated the feaſt of Diana in Brauron, they ſurprized a great many of them, carried them to Lemnos, and there kept them for concubines. Theſe women having many children by the Pelaſgians, taught their ſons the language of Attica and manners of the Athenians. Being thus brought up, they not only refuſed to converſe with the ſons of the Pelaſgian women, but if any of their number was injured or abuſed by the Pelaſgians, they all conſpired to revenge the injury. By this means they gained ſuch an aſcendant over the ſons of the Pelaſgian women, that they were obeyed by them, as maſters are by their ſlaves. The Pelaſgians, obſerving this their haughty behaviour, concluded, that if they began ſo early to uſurp a ſuperiority over the children of their lawful wives, they would not fail to treat them as their ſlaves when they attained to man's eſtate. This apprehenſion made ſo deep an impreſſion in their minds, that they reſolved to murder the children they had by the women of Attica; which they did accordingly, extending their cruelty likewiſe to the mothers. After this barbarous murder, their lands, as we are told, became barren, their wives unfruitful, and their flocks did not yield their uſual increaſe; whereupon they ſent perſons to conſult the Delphian oracle, about the means they might uſe to be delivered from their calamities. The Pythian adviſed them to give ſatisfaction to the Athenians in the manner they ſhould require. Having received this anſwer, they diſpatched embaſſadors to Athens, declaring, that they were ready to undergo any puniſhment the Athenians ſhould think fit to impose upon them for the injuries they had received at their hands. The Athenians hearing their offer, prepared a magnificent feast in the Prytaneum, and shewing them the tables furnished with all kinds of provisions, commanded them to surrender their country in as good a condition. The Pelasgians answered, that they would comply with their command, when a ship should come in one day with a north wind from the territories of Athens to their island. This they conceived impossible, Athens lying to the south of Lemnos; but, in virtue of this solemn promise, Miltiades many years after summoned them to deliver up their island to the Athenians.

As to the government, it was at first monarchical; but Thoas is the only king of Lemnos we find mentioned in history. In his reign, and, if we believe Herodotus [t], with his assistance, the Lemnian women killed all the males of the island, with a design to turn Amazons; for which action, and the murder of the Athenian women, which happened long after, any black treachery or cruel murder was called a Lemnian action [u]. Other writers tell us, that Thoas, whom Homer honours with the epithet of divine, was no-ways concerned in the above-mentioned murder, but saved by the piety of his daughter Hypsipyle in the common slaughter of all the other males, as we have related in a foregoing volume [w]. Some writers tell us [x], that she was banished the island for sparing her father; others, that she was raised to the throne, and reigned in Lemnos when the Argonauts touched at that island. Jason, say they, by whom she had two children, and other Argonauts, were so kindly entertained by her and her female subjects, that they stopt there two years, and almost forgot their intended expedition into Colchis for the golden fleece [y]. The Lemnians, after having enjoyed their liberty for many ages, were at last reduced by Miltiades, under the power of the Athenians, in the manner we have related elsewhere [z]. In process of time they shook off the Athenian yoke, but were again subjected to their antient masters by the Romans after the Macedonian war, and continued in that state till Sylla made them tributary to Rome.

IMBROS, now Embro and Lembro, lies over-againſt the Thracian Cherſoneſus, from which it is divided by a narrow ſtraight, being diſtant, according to Thucydides [a], from Lemnos two and twenty miles, and two and thirty, as Pliny informs us [b], from Samothrace. The ſame Pliny makes it twenty-ſeven miles in circumference; but the modern travellers only twenty. It had antiently a very ſafe harbour on the eaſt ſhore, and a city bearing the name of the iſland. The whole iſland was ſacred to the Cabiri and to Mercury; whence it is ſtiled by Homer the divine Imbros. In honour of theſe deities an annual ſolemnity was kept by the Imbrians, Lemnians, and Samothracians; and ſuch as were initiated into their myſteries were thought effectually ſecured againſt ſtorms at ſea and all other dangers [c]. The chief ceremony was this: the perſon who was to be initiated, being crowned with olive-branches, and girt about his loins with a purple ribband, was placed upon a throne, round which the prieſts and perſons already initiated danced and ſported [d]. Imbros, like the other iſlands of the Ægean ſea, was governed ſome time by its own laws, but afterwards ſubjected to the Perſians, Athenians, Macedonians, and to the kings of Pergamus. At the peace concluded between Philip and the Romans, it was by the latter delivered up to the Athenians, who held it till Rome, becoming powerful in the eaſt, reduced this and the other iſlands to a Roman province. Imbros.

THASOS or Thaſſus lies on the coaſt of Thrace, at a ſmall diſtance from the mouth of the Neſſus. It was formerly known by the names of Odonis, Æria, Æthria, Ogygia, Acte, Cereſis, and Chryſe. This laſt name it borrowed from its rich mines of gold much ſpoken of by the antients. It was called Thaſos from Thaſus the brother of Cadmus, who ſettled here, and built a city of the ſame name, as Herodotus [e] and Conon [f] inform us. It is about forty miles in compaſs, and ſo fruitful, that the fertility of Thaſos was uſed by the antients by way of proverb, to expreſs a country yielding great plenty of all the neceſſaries of life [g]. The wine of Thaſos is highly commended by Apuleius [h], and the Thaſian marble by Seneca [i]. This iſland was firſt peopled by the Phœnicians, whom Cadmus, Thaſos.

while he was going in search of his sister Europa, left her under the conduct of his brother Thasus, as we hinted above. Some ages after, the inhabitants of Paros sent a colony hither, being directed by an oracle to build a city in the island of Aëria, and to send thither a sufficient number of citizens to people it [k]. The city of Thasus was besieged in vain by Histiæus tyrant of Miletus; but afterwards taken and dismantled by Darius Hystaspis king of Persia. The Thasians did not continue long subject to the Persians, but laid hold of the first opportunity that offered to join the Greeks against the common enemy, entering into an alliance with the Athenians, from whom they revolted after the battle fought on the river Eurymedon in Pamphylia. The Thasians had made themselves masters of the gold mines in Thrace between the rivers Nessus and Strymon; these the Athenians laid claim to, and the Thasians refusing to part with them, Cimon was sent against them with a mighty fleet. That brave commander engaging them at sea gained a complete victory, and laid siege to their metropolis. The Thasians, not finding themselves in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy, had recourse to the Lacedæmonians, who promised to make a diversion by invading Attica; but were prevented by their domestic troubles from performing the promise they had made. However, the Thasians with their own strength made a most obstinate defence, but, being without any hopes of relief, submitted to the Athenians in the third year of the siege upon very disadvantageous terms, viz. to raze their walls; to deliver up their gallies; to pay the usual tribute; and to quit the mines, and whatever else they possessed on the continent [l]. In the twenty-first year of the Peloponnesian war, they revolted anew from the Athenians, who were for establishing an oligarchy in their city, and with the assistance of the Lacedæmonians recovered their antient liberty, after having driven out all those who were attached to the interest of Athens [m]. They maintained themselves a free people till the time of Alexander, to whom they submitted of their own accord, and continued subject to the kings of Macedon, till they were delivered from the Macedonian yoke, and declared free by one of the articles of the peace concluded cluded between Philip the father of Perſes and Flaminius the Roman conſul [n] (D).

SAMOTHRACE was antiently known by the names of Melites, Leucaſia, Samothrace, or Lucania, Saocis, Electria, and Dardania. It was called Dardania, according to Pliny[o] and Pauſanias [p], from Dardanus, who retired thither. The ſame authors add, that it changed the name of Dardania into that of Samothrace, from the time that a colony of Thracians, mixed with ſome fugitives from the iſland of Samos, ſettled there. But Diodorus Siculus [q] pretends, that the Amazon Myrina, in the courſe of her conqueſts on the coaſt of the Ægean ſea, conſecrated this iſland to Cybele under the name of Samothrace, a term, ſays he, then uſed to ſignify a conſecrated place. Before, and in the time of, the Trojan war, it was called Samos, and diſtinguiſhed from Samos on the coaſt of Ionia, and from Cephalenia named likewiſe Samos, by the epithet of Thracian, Imbrian, or Lemnian. It is by Homer conſtantly ſtyled the Thracian Samos, which appellation the Latins, as Virgil [r] informs us, changed into that of Samothracia. Strabo [s] is of opinion, that it took the name of Samos from a Greek word ſignifying high, this iſland being one of the higheſt in the Ægean ſea. Hence Priſcian ſtiles it the high Samos,

(D) Steſimbrotus, who is frequently quoted by Plutarch, was a native of Thaſos, and contemporary with Cimon, as Plutarch obſerves in the life of that great commander. The ſame writer owns, that in his lives of Themiſtocles, Cimon, and Pericles, he took ſeveral particulars from the hiſtory of Steſimbrotus. Tatian mentions this hiſtorian in the book he wrote againſt the Gentiles. The etymologiſt on the word Ἰδαῖαι tells us, that this author's book was intitled, of the beginnings or origins, and that in the ſaid book he maintained the Idæi Dactyli to be the ſons of Jupiter and the nymph Ida. Fulgentius (51) quotes Steſimbrotus the Thaſian in his account of the death of Polycrates tyrant of Samos. He is alſo cited by Apollonius and others (52).

Samos, and Homer [t] tells us, that from this iſland mount Ida, the city of Troy, and the Greek and Trojan camps, might be ſeen. It is, according to Pliny [u], about two and thirty miles in compaſs, two and twenty diſtant from Lemnos, two and thirty from Imbros, and eight and thirty from the coaſt of Thrace. The modern travellers place it only at three leagues diſtance from the coaſt of Thrace, and allow it but twenty miles in circumference. As to the firſt inhabitants of Samothrace, Diodorus tells us [w], that there is nothing handed down to poſterity relating to them, which we may depend on. Others ſay [x], that it was firſt peopled by Thracians, and that after their arrival in the iſland, the Pelaſgians, Samians, and Phœnicians, ſent thither numerous colonies. They had antiently a peculiar language not underſtood by any other people of Greece, whereof ſome words were ſtill uſed in the worſhip of their gods, when Diodorus Siculus wrote his hiſtory [y]. The iſland of Samothrace was famous on account of the worſhip paid there to the gods called Cabiri (E), who were had

(E) There is ſuch a diſagreement among authors in their accounts of theſe deities, that, notwithſtanding all the mythologiſts have ſaid of them, we are ſtill in the dark as to many particulars, and can only form a confuſed idea of their nature, origin, and attributes. Bochart (53) derives their name from the Hebrew word Cabir, that is, great and powerful. This opinion he confirms with the authority of Euthymius and Cedrenus. The former tells us, that the Saracens, who had been idolaters, to the time of the emperor Heraclius, worſhipped Venus under the name of Chabar, that is, the great or powerful; the latter obſerves, that the ſame people gave the name of Cubar to the conſtellation of Venus; whence Bochart infers, that the gods Cabiri were the great and powerful gods; and indeed they are frequently ſo ſtiled by the writers of the earlieſt ages. But Steſimbrotus, as quoted by Strabo (54), ſays they were called Cabiri or Cabires from Cabirus, a hill in Phrygia, where they were worſhipped in a very ſolemn manner. It is no leſs perplexing to diſcover who the Cabiri were, than to trace out the origin of their

their name. Some confine the number of Cabiri to two, viz. Jupiter and Bacchus ; but Manaſeas enumerates four, Ceres, Proſerpine, Pluto, and Mercury, whom he diſguiſes under the myſterious names of Axioros, Axiokerſa, Axiokerſos, and Kaſmilos ; to theſe Dionyſiodorus adds a fourth, whom he ſtiles Caſmilus, called by others Camillus, and the ſame with Mercury ; but he was looked upon as one of an inferior rank, and, if we believe Varro (55), only as an attendant or ſervant of the Samothracian deities. The ſame author tells us, that by the great gods of Samothrace were meant only the heaven and earth. Several writers have confined the appellation of Cabiri to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus and Caſſius Hemina, as quoted by Macrobius, took the Cabiri to be the ſame as the Dii Penates, or houſhold gods. Dardanus, ſay they, brought them from Samothrace into Phrygia, whence they were carried into Italy by Æneas. In a Greek inſcription quoted by Alexander ab Alexandro they are called Dioskouroi, which appellation being alſo given by the antients to Caſtor and Pollux, ſome have thought them the ſons of Jupiter by Calliope or Proſerpine. The moſt common opinion is, that they were the ſons or grandſons of Vulcan ; this the Egyptian prieſts held, as Herodotus informs us (56), and ſome medals are ſtill extant, which ſeem to confirm this opinion. Goltzius exhibits two, one of the city of Theſſalonica, the other of the emperor Claudius, ſurnamed the Goth ; on the reverſe of both is a Cabir, as appears from the Greek inſcription, with a hammer in his hand, which ſymbol ſignifies, as all the mythologiſts agree, his being of the race of Vulcan. Thus ſome writers make the Cabiri to have been the firſt who introduced and taught the art of working iron. A modern writer endeavours to prove, that the Cabiri were the ſame as the Curetes, Corybantes, and Telchines. The latter were called by the Greeks, Deſtroyers, being ſuppoſed to make uſe of the ſecrets of magic to hurt mankind. The Telchines were deemed the authors of all the miſeries which laid waſte the earth ; and the ignorant populace imagined they could by their inchantments raiſe ſtorms, and bring plagues, famines, and diſeaſes, whenever they pleaſed (57). All we can infer from the various accounts of the antient mythologiſts, which are but an odd jumble of contradictions, is, that the Pagans themſelves were ignorant of the origin of theſe imaginary deities. However, heroes of antiquity were initiated into the myſteries of theſe deities. Such as were admitted to partake of the ſacred ceremonies uſed to meet in a wood, which became a place of refuge for offenders, and was more reſpected than even the temple of Delphos or the iſland of Delos. To this iſland Perſes king of Macedon fled for refuge, and took up his habitation in the temple dedicated to Caſtor and Pollux, hoping, that the Romans would not prophane a ſanctuary revered by all the nations of the world; and indeed the Romans did not make any attempts upon his life or perſon ſo long as he ſtaid there; for the Pagans carried their prejudices ſo far in favour of theſe pretended deities, that they were ſtruck with an awful dread upon the bare mention of their names. Of all the oaths that were in uſe among the antients, that by the gods of Samothrace was deemed the moſt ſacred and inviolable. Such as were found not to have obſerved this oath were looked upon as the ever they were worſhipped in ſeveral parts of Greece and Aſia, chiefly in the cities of Lemnos, Theſſalonica, Thebes, Rhodes, &c. Pauſanias tells us, that the country of Pergamus was conſecrated to the Cabiri, and that they had a temple at Memphis in Egypt, which no one, except the prieſt who performed the ſacred rites, was allowed to enter (58). Lactantius ſpeaks of a god named Cabirius, to whom the Macedonians paid a particular worſhip. But the iſland of Samothrace was, as it were, the center of the ſuperſtitious ceremonies obſerved in honour of the Cabiri. There, and no-where elſe, people were initiated into their myſteries. Thoſe who were to be admitted were placed on a kind of throne, and crowned with laurel, having bands of purple tied round their bellies. Then the prieſts and others there preſent danced round them, and this ridiculous mummery ended in oaths and execrations on the perſon, who ſhould ever reveal what paſſed in their aſſemblies. Heſychius tells us, that even children were initiated, their parents fancying them, when under the protection of the Cabiri, ſafe from thunder, lightning, tempeſts, and all ſorts of dangers. Several writers, namely Clemens Alexandrinus and Bochart, have collected the various opinions of the fabulous ages concerning the names, origin, number, myſteries, offices, and worſhip of the Cabiri, and their ſiſters, called the Catarides; to theſe we refer our readers for a more full account of what relates to the Samothracian deities.

(58) Pauſan. in Bœot.

the curſe of mankind, and perſons devoted to deſtruction. Diodorus [z] tells us, that theſe gods were always preſent, and never failed to aſſiſt thoſe who were initiated, and called upon them in any ſudden and unexpected danger; that Jaſon, Dioſcurus, Hercules, Orpheus, &c. being initiated into their rites, proſpered by their favour in all their wars, and that none ever duly performed their ceremonies without being amply rewarded for their piety.

DIODORUS Siculus ſpeaks of an inundation, which laid great part of Samothrace under water, drowned all the cities on the coaſt of Aſia, and overwhelmed ſeveral iſlands in the Ægean ſea, ſome of which never afterwards appeared. In Samothrace the waters roſe to ſuch a height, that they not only covered the champion country, but reached near the tops of the higheſt mountains, and changed the face of the whole country. This deluge is ſuppoſed to have happened before the Argonautic expedition, and is ſaid to have been occaſioned by the overflowing of the Pontic ſea; which being ſwelled by the waters of the many great rivers that fall into it, diſcharged itſelf through the Boſphorus Thracius into the Propontis, and through the Helleſpont into the Ægean ſea. When the Waters abated, the inhabitants of Samothrace conſecrated to the gods the places where they had been preſerved, erecting altars, and offering up yearly ſacrifices in memory of their deliverance. This they continued to do in Diodorus's time, who adds, that even then chapiters of pillars and other pieces of architecture were frequently found under water; which ſhews, ſays he, that this deluge is not a poetical fiction, but real truth [a]. In the opinion of the antients the Pontus Euxinus was only a lake or ſtanding pool, which being overcharged with waters broke firſt into the Propontis, and then into the Ægean, waſhing away by degrees the earth, which kept it within its firſt bounds, and forming the two channels of the Boſphorus Thracius and the Helleſpont, which Helleſpont in the ſenſe of the antients is another Boſphorus, that is, an arm of the ſea narrow enough for an ox to ſwim over. In the hypotheſis of the antients the Palus Mæotis, the Pontus Euxinus, the Propontis, the Mediterranean were originally ſo many lakes, which, after having broke down, as it were, the dikes that parted them, with the impetuoſity of their their waters, opened themſelves a paſſage between the mountains of Atlas and Calpe into the ocean. It is perhaps more likely, that the ocean, having with the impetuoſity of its waters diſmembered the mountain of Calpe from the lands of Africa, poured itſelf into that vaſt ſpace now called the Mediterranean, and penetrating to the north produced the Propontis, the Pontus, and the Palus Mæotis.

After the above-mentioned deluge, one Saon a native of Samothrace, the ſon of Jupiter and Nympha, as ſome ſay, or as others will have it, of Mercury and Rhena, gathered the inhabitants, before living ſcattered and diſperſed, into a body, made laws for their better government, and divided them into five tribes, which he called after the names of his ſons. Some time after the government was thus ſettled, Dardanus, Jaſion, and Harmonia were born in the iſland. They were the children of Jupiter and Electra one of the daughters of Atlas. Dardanus paſſed over into Aſia, where he founded a new kingdom, which was afterwards called the Trojan kingdom from the city of Troy built there. Jupiter, deſirous likewiſe to advance his other ſons to a high degree of honour and reputation, diſcovered to them the rites of the ſacred myſteries antiently obſerved, but then newly revived, in the iſland, which it was not lawful for any to ſee, but thoſe who were initiated. About this time Cadmus, arriving in the iſland to ſeek after his ſiſter Europa, was initiated into the ſacred myſteries, and married Harmonia the ſiſter of Jaſion. Jaſion married Cybele, by whom he had Corybas, who after his father's death, paſſing over into Phrygia with his mother and Dardanus, taught the Phrygians the myſteries of Cybele. Corybas called thoſe who celebrated the ſacred myſteries of his mother, after his own name, Corybantes [b].

The iſland of Samothrace was in antient time governed by its own kings; for Coritus, Dardanus, and his brother Jaſion are ſaid to have reigned there, as we have related elſewhere [c]. The monarchical form of government gave place to the republican, which continued till the iſland was reduced by the Perſians. Alexander reſtored this, as moſt of the other Greek iſlands, to the enjoyment of their antient liberties; but his ſucceſſors in the kingdom of Macedon brought the Samothracians again into ſubjection. The Romans after the defeat of Perſes declared them a free people; people; whence Pliny [d] ſtyles Samothrace a free iſland. They lived according to their own laws from the reduction of the kingdom of Macedon to the reign of Veſpaſian, who reduced all the ſtates of Greece to a Roman province [e].

FROM the Ægean we ſhall proceed with Strabo to the Ionian ſea (F), giving a ſuccinct deſcription of the iſlands on the coaſt of Greece, of which the moſt northerly is that of Safon lying between Aulon, now La Valona, a city of Macedon, and Brunduſium in Italy at the entrance of the Ionian ſea. Lucan counts it among the iſlands of Italy [f], and Ptolemy [g] among thoſe of Macedon. It is mentioned by Polybius [h], Scylax [i], Mela [k], Pliny [l], &c. and deſcribed by Silius Italicus as a barren, ſandy, and inhoſpitable place [m]. Iſlands on the coaſts of Greece.

CORCYRA, now Corfu, was in more ancient times called Drepane, Scheria, and Phæacia. The name of Corcyra, which was alſo given to another iſland lying in the Adriatic over-againſt Illyricum, it took from a nymph ſo called, whom Neptune is ſaid to have raviſhed in this iſland. It is about forty-five miles in length, twenty-two in breadth, and two hundred and ten in compaſs. Corcyra was once famous for the delightful gardens of king Alcinous, who with great courteſy entertained Ulyſſes after his ſhipwreck [n]. The ſouthern parts of the iſland are barren, mountainous, and but indifferently provided with water; the northern coaſt is very fruitful, and yields all kinds of delicious fruit, excellent wines, olives, all ſorts of grain, &c. whence it is ſtiled by Homer the fruitful Scheria [o]. It had antiently two cities of Corcyra

(F) The Ionian gulf, or the Ionian ſea, lies between Sicily and Greece, extending from the iſland of Crete to the Acroceraunian hills in Epirus, or, as others will have it, to the city of Apollonia in Macedon. It was ſo called either from Ionius the ſon of Dyrrhachius, Hercules having given it that name to preſerve the memory of his friend whom he had killed by miſtake, and thrown into the ſea; or from Ionia, a country, according to Solinus, in the extremity of Calabria; or from Io, the daughter of Inachus, as Lycophron has it.

no ſmall note, viz. Corcyra and Caſſiope; the former was the metropolis of the iſland, and once very powerful, as appears from Thucydides and others, who have given us an account of their wars; the latter is commended by Pliny [p] and Ptolemy [q] as a wealthy and well-built city; but Cicero calls it only a haven [r]. This iſland is ſaid to have been firſt inhabited by the Phæaces, whence it was named Phæacia; but afterwards the Corinthians ſent thither a numerous colony, which made Thucydides [s] reckon Corcyra among the countries peopled by the Corinthians. The Corcyræans were ſkilful mariners, and, as the ſame Thucydides informs us, for ſome time maſters of their ſea. The government was firſt monarchical; but afterwards they formed themſelves into a republic, and made a very conſiderable figure in the flouriſhing times of Greece. Herodotus tells us [t], that they were very powerful by land, and had more ſhips than any other people of Greece, except the Athenians. That author greatly blames them on account of their deceitful conduct with reſpect to the aſſiſtance they promiſed the Greeks againſt Xerxes; for, being invited by the Athenian and Lacedæmonian embaſſadors to join in the common cauſe, they readily promiſed to ſend powerful ſuccours, aſſuring them, that they would not neglect the ſafety of Greece in ſo imminent a danger, well knowing that, if the enemy prevailed, they ſhould ſoon be reduced to the condition of ſlaves. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians departed well ſatisfied with this anſwer; but the Corcyræans having fitted out a ſquadron of ſixty ſhips ſailed to the coaſt of Peloponneſus, and having anchored about Pylus and Tænarus, waited in that ſtation to ſee the event of the war, being reſolved to join the party that ſhould prevail. When news was brought them that the Perſians were defeated at Salamis, they left their ſtation, and joined the reſt of the Greeks, pretending that they had been prevented by the Eteſian winds from doubling the cape of Malea and being preſent at the battle [w]. Their war with the Corinthians and Epidamnians, which brought on the Peloponneſian war, and the dreadful ſedition which happened in their iſland (whence all ſeditions, when terrible in their effects, effects, were ſtiled Corcyræan) we have related elſewhere[x]. The Corcyræans ſubmitted to Alexander, and continued ſubject to his ſucceſſors kings of Macedon, till they were delivered by the Romans in the reign of Perſes, from which time they enjoyed their liberty till the reign of Veſpaſian, when they underwent the common fate of the other iſlands and Greek ſtates both in Europe and Aſia.

BETWEEN Corcyra and the continent lie two ſmall iſlands, called by Strabo[y] and Thucydides[z] Sybota; and at a ſmall diſtant from the eaſtern coaſt of Corcyra, the iſland of Ptychia, which Ptolemy confounds with a city of that name in the iſland of Corcyra, but Thucydides deſcribes it as a diſtinct iſland[a]. Five miles eaſt of Corcyra are the iſlands Paxi or Paxæ, mentioned by Pliny[b] and other antient writers, but containing nothing remarkable. They are but two in number, and at preſent known by the names of Pachſu and Antipachſu. Pliny enumerates ſeveral other iſlands on the coaſt of Epirus, viz. Ericuſa, Marathe, Elaphuſa, Malthace, Trachie, Pythionia, and Tarachia, of which Ericuſa was alſo known to Ptolemy, who places it between Corcyra and Cephalenia.

LEUCAS, now known by the name of Santa Maura, was antiently a peninſula, joined to the main land of Acarnania by an iſthmus, which was cut by the Carthaginians, or, as others will have it, by the Corinthians. We have deſcribed this iſland elſewhere[c], and therefore ſhall only add here, that in the middle of it was a ſtately temple conſecrated to Venus the mother of Æneas, who is ſuppoſed to have landed here on his voyage to Italy. Homer ſpeaks of three cities of no ſmall note in this country, viz. Nericus, Crocylea, and Agylipe. Iſaac Voſſius is of opinion, that in the time of Thucydides it was ſtill a peninſula, ſince that hiſtorian, in deſcribing the countries of Leucas and Arcanania, makes no mention of the iſthmus being cut[d]. In Homer's time it was, without all doubt, joined to the land, ſince he calls it the coaſt of Epirus[e]. It is about ſeventy miles in compaſs, and was in antient times called Neritis, as Pliny informs us[f]. Leucas.

THE iſlands, known to the antients by the names of Taphiæ and Teleboides, lay to the eaſt of Leucas, near the coaſt of Achaia. They were ſo called from Taphus and Telebous, the ſons of Pterelas, and grandſons of Neptune by Hippothoe the daughter of Neſtor [g]. Bochart [h] derives the name of Taphiæ from the Hebrew word hataph, which ſignifies to rob, the inhabitants of theſe iſlands being antiently famous pirates. The Echinades were five ſmall iſlands on the coaſt of Acarnania over-againſt the mouth of the river Achelous, from which the fartheſt diſtant is but fifteen furlongs, and the neareſt only five. They were thought to have been formed by the mud, which this river carried into the ſea; whence aroſe the fable of their having been once ſea nymphs, but afterwards by the god Achelous changed into iſlands [i]. Some writers tell us, that they were called Echinades from the Greek word echinos, becauſe that part of the Ionian bounded with ſea-hogs. They are now known by the name of Curzolari. Dulichium, which formerly belonged to Ulyſſes, is counted by Strabo [k] among the Echinades.

ITHACA, between Dulichium and Cephalenia, was once famous for being the birth-place of Ulyſſes the ſon of Laertes. It is about five and twenty miles in compaſs, and at preſent known by the name of Val di Compare. It had a town in former times bearing the name of the iſland, and ſituated, according to Homer [l], at the foot of mount Neius, which by ſome geographers is thought to be the ſame with mount Neritus mentioned by Virgil [m]. Pomponius Mela [n] miſtakes mount Neritus for another iſland in the Ionian ſea.

CEPHALENIA or Cephallenia, known in Homer's time by the names of Samus and Black Epirus, or Epirus Melæna, is about eighty miles in length, forty in breadth, and a hundred and thirty in compaſs. It had antiently four cities, but Ptolemy takes notice of one only, which bore the name of the iſland. Strabo tells us, that in his time there were only two cities remaining; but Pliny [p] ſpeaks of three, and adds, that the ruins of Same, which had been deſtroyed by the Romans, were ſtill to be ſeen. Same was the metropolis of the iſland, and is ſuppoſed to have ſtood in the place, which the Italians call Porto Guiſcardo. The names of the four cities, cities, were, according to Thucydides, Same, Prone, Cranii, and Palæ [q]. This iſland was ſubdued by the Thebans under the conduct of Amphitryon, who is ſaid to have killed Pterelas, who then reigned here. While Amphitryon was carrying on the war in Cephalenia then called Samos, one Cephalus, a man of great diſtinction at Athens, having accidentally killed his wife Procris in ſhooting at a deer, fled to Amphitryon, who pitying his caſe not only received him kindly, but made him governor of the iſland, which thence-forth was called Cephalenia. After it had continued long ſubject to the Thebans, it fell under the power of the Macedonians, and was taken from them by the Ætolians, who held it till it was reduced by M. Fulvius Nobilior, who having made himſelf maſter of the metropolis after a four months ſiege, and ſold all the citizens for ſlaves, added the whole iſland to the demeſns of his republic [r]. The iſland of Zacynthus, which lies twelve miles ſouth of Cephalenia, we have deſcribed at length elſewhere [s], and therefore ſhall proceed to the Strophades, which are two ſmall iſlands lying over-againſt Arcadia in Peloponneſus, and now known by the name of Strivali. They are about thirty five miles ſouth of Zacynthus, and according to Strabo [t] four hundred furlongs from the continent, the largeſt of the two being but five miles in compaſs. They were firſt called Plotæ, that is, ſwimming iſlands, as Pliny informs us [u], and afterwards Strophades, from a Greek verb ſignifying to return, becauſe Zethus and Calais, the winged iſſue of Boreas and Orithyia, are feigned to have purſued the Harpyes to theſe iſlands, and thence to have returned, being admoniſhed by Iris or Jupiter to give over the purſuit. Virgil deſcribes them as frequented in the time of Æneas only by theſe ravenous monſters [w]. At preſent they are inhabited by Greek friars, who, to the number of thirty, live there and enjoy the iſlands to themſelves. In one of them there is a fine ſpring of freſh water, which is ſaid to have its fountain in Peloponneſus, and to paſs under the ſea. The other iſlands mentioned by Pliny [x], as lying between Zacynthus and the Aſinæan gulph, are Letoia or Letoa, now Criſtina, near Cephalenia, the

the three Spagiæ or Sphacteriæ oppoſite to Pylus of Meſſenia, and as many known by the name of Oriuſæ lying over-againſt the city of Meſſene. The iſlands of Sphacteriæ are famous in hiſtory for a victory gained there by the Athenians over the Lacedæmonians, after which Cleon poſſeſſed himſelf of the iſlands, taking the Lacedæmonians who gariſoned them priſoners [y]. Theſe iſlands are now called Le Sapienze, and the ſea round them the ſea of Sapienza. In the Laconic gulf are, according to Pliny, the following iſlands, Teganuſa, Cothon, and Cythera. Teganuſa, or Theganuſa, is placed by Strabo [z] and Pauſanias [a], not in the Laconic, but the Meſſenian, gulf, before the promontory Acritas, between Metho and Caron two cities of Meſſenia. Pomponius Mela [b] places Cothon in the Ægean ſea, and Salmaſius on the coaſt of Africa, but Stephanus agrees with Pliny. Over-againſt Gythium in Peloponneſus lies the ſmall iſland of Cranae mentioned by Pauſanias [c], and ſaid by Homer to have been the firſt place, where Paris ſtopt as he was carrying off Helena [d].

Cythera, now Cerigo, lies over-againſt Malea a promontory of Laconia, from which it is diſtant, according to Strabo [e], forty furlongs. It was named Cythera, if Stephanus is to be credited, from one Cytherus a Phœnician, who is ſaid to have ſettled here. Before his arrival it was known by the name of Porphyris or Porphyriſſa, either becauſe it abounded with Porphyry, as Solinus is of opinion, or by reaſon the beſt ſcarlet was died here, as Stephanus affirms on the authority of Ariſtotle. It is about ſixty miles in compaſs, bleſſed with a fruitful ſoil, and has ſeveral havens, one eſpecially very ſafe and capacious, called antiently Scandea, about ten furlongs from the city of Cythera, a city once famous for the temple of Venus ſurnamed Urania or Heavenly. In this temple, which was believed to be the moſt antient which Venus had amongſt the Greeks, was a ſtatue of that goddeſs in complete armour, holding, like Pallas a javelin in her hand. She is ſaid, upon her firſt ſpringing out of the froth of the ſea, (for ſuch was her origin) to have been by gentle zephyrs carried to this iſland, and from hence to Cyprus; on which account both iſlands were in a peculiar manner ſacred to her.

From Cythera Venus had the ſurname of Cytherea, often uſed by Virgil and other poets. We have already related how this iſland, formerly ſubject to Lacedæmon, was reduced by the Athenians under the conduct of Nicias [f], and therefore ſhall paſs to the other iſlands. In the Argolic bay, Pliny places the following [g], Pityuſa, Irine, Ephyre, Tiparenus, Aperopia, Colonis, Ariſteria, and Calauria. This laſt lay, according to Strabo [h], in the bay of Hermione over-againſt Trœzen a maritim city of Argia, from which it was diſtant four furlongs, being thirty in compaſs. It was famous for a temple conſecrated to Neptune and an aſylum [i]. Here Demoſthenes poiſoned himſelf, and was buried within the incloſure of the temple [k]. The other iſlands contain nothing remarkable.

In Saronic gulf (G) are the iſlands of Ægina and Sa- Ægina
lamis, both equally famous in antient hiſtory. The former was antiently known by the names of Oenone, or Oenopia [l], and Myrmidonia; but Æacus, who reigned here,

(G) The Sinus Saronicus, or Saronic gulf, now called the gulf of Engia, lies between Attica to the north, and Peloponneſus to the ſouth, extending from Cenchreæ on the iſthmus of Corinth to the promontory of Sunium (59). It was named the Saronic gulf according to Pliny (60) from a grove of oaks called by the antient Greeks Saronides. Some derive this appellation from a city, others from a harbour, and ſome from a river, which fell into this bay (61). It was alſo called the bay of Salamis from the iſland of that name, and bay of Eleuſis from that city. The entrance into the Saronic gulf is formed by two promontories, that of Sunium on the ſide of Attica, now ſtiled Capo delle colone, from certain columns that are ſtill ſtanding there, and ſuppoſed to be the remains of a temple of Minerva; and that of Scylla, now Capo di Scilli, on the ſide of Peloponneſus. The bay, where broadeſt, is three and twenty miles over, its length twenty-five, and its compaſs fourſcore (62). Strabo and other geographers call the iſlands in this gulf the Æacides, becauſe they were held by the deſcendants of Æacus the ſon of Jupiter and Ægina.

here, called it Ægina, from his mother the daughter of Aſopus king of Bœotia (H). It was called Myrmidonia becauſe inhabited by the Myrmidones, ſo famous among the poets. It lies between the territory of Athens and that of Epidaurus a city of Argia, being diſtant eighteen miles from the coaſt of Athens and fourteen from Peloponneſus. It is about twenty-ſix miles in compaſs, and had antiently a city of the ſame name [m], which being deſtroyed by an earthquake, the inhabitants were exempted by Tiberius for the ſpace of three years from paying any kind of tribute [n]. Pauſanias [o] ſpeaks of two magnificent temples in this iſland, the one conſecrated to Venus, the other to Jupiter; the ruins of a ſtately edifice, which are ſtill to be ſeen at a ſmall diſtance from the preſent village of Engia, are probably the remains of one of theſe temples. The country is ſaid to have been at firſt very ſtony and barren, but being inhabited by a laborious and thriving people, who digging up the earth cleared it of the ſtones, it became very fruitful. From this their induſtry they were ſurnamed Myrmidones, that is emmets, as Strabo informs us [p], and not becauſe the emmets, as the poets feign, were at the prayers of Æacus changed into men to repeople the iſland, after all the antient inhabitants, king Æacus alone excepted, had been ſwept away by a plague. This iſland was firſt peopled by the Epidaurians, who were originally Dorians, and afterwards by colonies from Crete and Argos [q]. Theſe were in proceſs of time driven out by the Athenians, who, making themſelves maſters of the iſland, divided the lands among themſelves, but did not hold them long, being driven out by the Lacedæmonians, who reſtored the iſland to the antient proprietors [r]. The Myrmidones were not diſtinct people from thoſe we have already mentioned, this being only only a surname given to the inhabitants on account of their industry. The Æginetes applied themselves very early to trade and navigation, and sent colonies into the neighbouring islands, namely Imbros and Crete, the city of Cydon in the latter having been built, according to Strabo [s], and peopled by them. In the time of Amasis king of Egypt they erected a magnificent temple in Naucratis, a city of that country, to Jupiter, following therein, as Herodotus informs us [t], the example of the Samians, who in the same kingdom had built one in honour of Juno. Ephorus, as quoted by Strabo [u], tells us, that the first money was coined in Ægina by one Phidon. Pliny commends the brass of this island, preferring it even to that of Delos, and adds, that the famous statue of brass, representing an ox, which stood in the forum boarium at Rome, was carried from hence to adorn that capital [w].

The Æginetes were first governed by kings, and afterwards formed themselves into a republic, which in process of time became so powerful as to vie with Athens herself. The first king that reigned there was Actor, the son of Dioneus and grandson, as the poets feign, of Æolus. He was born in Phocis, whither his father Dioneus, or as others call him Deion, had carried a colony out of Æolia; from Phocis he led a colony into Phthia, where he married Ægina the daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia, and by a second migration went into the island of Oenone, where he settled. By his wife Ægina he had three sons, Æacus, Mœnetius, and Irus. Æacus the eldest succeeded his father Actor in the kingdom of Oenone, which he called from his mother's name Ægina, and peopled with new colonies invited thither from the continent and neighbouring islands. His piety and justice in the administration of public affairs gave rise to the fable of his being appointed by Pluto judge of the Europæans after their death. He had by his first wife, named Endeis, Telamon and Peleus, and by Psamathe his second Phocus. Telamon and Peleus conspiring against Phocus put him to death, on which account they were both banished the island by their father. Æacus is said to have assisted the Athenians against Minos king of Crete, and to have been the first who paid divine honours to Hercules. His descendants were called Æacidæ,

Æacidæ, and are much ſpoken of by all the antients, having reigned in different countries, and moſt of them attained to a great pitch of power and glory. Cicero obſerves [x], that they were for the moſt part better warriors than ſtateſmen, and Juſtin, that few of them attained to the thirtieth year of their age. Æacus was, according to Macrobius [y], about two generations older than the Trojan war, and the firſt who built a temple in Greece. As to the ſucceſſors of Æacus in the iſland of Ægina we are quite in the dark. The monarchical form of government being abrogated, the Æginetes became ſubject, on what occaſion we know not, to the Epidaurians, depending upon them, as Herodotus [z] informs us, in all things, and particularly in matters relating to the adminiſtration of juſtice. But afterwards applying themſelves to navigation and the building of ſhips, they acquired great power by ſea, revolted from the Epidaurians, ravaged their territory, and carried off, among other things, the two famous ſtatues of Damias and Auxeſias (I). This gave riſe to an irrecon-

(I) The Epidaurians, ſeeing their country become unfruitful, ſent to conſult the oracle of Delphos about the cauſe of that calamity. The Pythian anſwered, that if they erected ſtatues in honour of Lamia, or, as Herodotus calls her, Damias, and Auxeſias, their affairs would proſper. Lamia and Auxeſias were two virgins, who coming from Crete to Trœzen a city of Argia, in time of a tumult, had fallen a ſacrifice to the fury of the people, by whom they were ſtoned to death. The Epidaurians, having received the above-ſaid anſwer, conſulted the oracle anew to know whether the ſtatues ſhould be made of ſtone or braſs; the Pythian replied, of neither, but of the wood of olive-tree. Upon this anſwer, the Epidaurians deſired leave of the Athenians to cut down an olive-tree in their territory, either becauſe they believed thoſe of that ſoil to be the moſt ſacred, or, as others ſay, by reaſon olive-trees at that time grew in no other country. The Athenians ſhewed themſelves ready to grant their requeſt, provided they promiſed to come annually to Athens, and there to offer ſacrifice to Minerva and Erectheus. This condition the Epidaurians accepted, and having obtained their requeſt, they formed out of that wood two ſtatues, which were no ſooner erected than their cilable enmity between the Æginetes and Athenians, the effects whereof we have elſewhere related at length [a]. The iſland was at laſt reduced by the Athenians, and continued ſubject to them, till it was at the end of the Macedonian war declared free by the Romans, enjoying its liberty till the reign of Veſpaſian, when it underwent the ſame fate as the other ſtates of Greece.

country became fruitful again. In proceſs of time, the Æginetes having overcome the Epidaurians carried off theſe ſtatues, and having erected them a place called Oia in the middle of their iſland, to render them propitious they appointed ſacrifices accompanied with dances to be performed by women in their honour, aſſigning to each ſtatue ten men to preſide in the ſolemnity. On this occaſion the women who danced were allowed to abuſe one another with opprobrious language, but not the men who preſided. This they did in conformity to the former practice of the Epidaurians, who beſides theſe uſed other ceremonies on this occaſion not fit to be mentioned. After theſe ſtatues were carried away by the Æginetes, the Epidaurians would no longer perform their contract with the Athenians, which they had religiouſly obſerved till that time, alledging, that the Æginetes, who were in poſſeſſion of the ſtatues, and not they, who were to their great ſorrow deprived of them, lay under that obligation. Hereupon, the Athenians diſpatched a meſſenger to Ægina to demand the ſtatues, which the Æginetes refuſing to deliver, they ſent a ſhip with ſome of their citizens to Ægina, injoining them in caſe of a refuſal to uſe violence. Theſe attemping to pull down the ſtatues were ſo terrified by a dreadful earthquake, accompanied with thunder and lightening, that they became outrageouſly mad, and fell upon one another with fury, that one only remained alive, who made his eſcape to Phaleron in Attica. Thus the Athenians relate the ſtory. But the Æginetes tell us, that the Athenians arrived in their iſland with a numerous fleet, and not, as is pretended, with a ſingle ſhip, which they could have eaſily reſiſted. They add, that having landed their men without oppoſition, they marched directly to the ſtatues, which, as they endeavoured to pull them down with ropes, fell on their knees, and ever after continued in that poſture. Notwithſtanding this miracle, the Athenians perſiſted in their reſolution of carrying off the ſtatues; but in the mean time the Argians, at the requeſt of the Æginetes, having privately entered the iſland, cut off their retreat to the ſhips, and Salamis. Salamis, now Coluri, lies in the ſame Saronic gulf about three leagues weſt of Ægina, over-againſt the city of Eleuſis, from which it is ſeparated by a ſtraight about a league over called antiently Porthmos, and at preſent Perama [b]. It was formerly known by the names of Cychria, from Cychreus the firſt king of the iſland, and of Pityuſſa, becauſe abounding with pine-trees called by the Greeks Pitus [c]. The name of Salamis it borrowed from Salamine the daughter of Aſopus king of Bœotia, whom Neptune is ſaid to have raviſhed and carried into this iſland. By her he had Cychreus, or Cycherus, the firſt who reigned in the iſland. As Cychreus died without children, he was ſucceeded by Telamon, the father of Ajax by Heſione, the ſiſter of Priam and the daughter of Laomedon king of Troy [d]; whence Salamis is ſtiled by Virgil the kingdom of Heſione [e]. It is according to Strabo between ſeventy and eighty furlongs in length, fifty miles in compaſs, and had antiently a city bearing the ſame name, and facing the iſland of Ægina. This city was deſtroyed, and another, called alſo Salamis, built on the coaſt over-againſt Attica, which was well peopled, and governed put them all to the ſword, one man only exceped, who, as the Athenians affirm, ſoon periſhed in the following manner: Having on his return to Athens given an account of this diſaſter, the wives of thoſe who had been killed in the iſland of Ægina, highly incenſed that one man alone ſhould be left alive of the whole number, crowded about him, and aſking for their huſbands killed him with the points of their pins. This action gave the Athenians more uneaſineſs than their defeat; and as they could not any other ways puniſh the women, they obliged them to change their dreſs, which was after the Dorian faſhion, and to wear the Ionian habit, that is, a linen veſt not faſtened with any pins. From this event a cuſtom was introduced among the Argians and Æginetes of making pins by three fourths larger than before. Of theſe pins conſiſted the chief offerings that were dedicated in the temples by the women of Ægina, who in deſpite to the Athenians governed by its own laws in the time of Auguſtus [f]. This iſland will be ever famous in hiſtory for the ſignal victory gained here by the Greeks over the Perſians. It was firſt peopled by the Ionians, and afterwards by colonies from different cities of Greece. The form of government which firſt prevailed here was monarchical; but monarchy was of no long continuance, Cychreus, Telamon, Euryſaces, and Philæus being the only kings who reigned over the Salaminians. Cychreus is ſaid by Diodorus to have killed a dragon which infeſted the iſland; whence he had the name of Ophis; but Stephanus tells us, that he was ſo named on account of his crafty and inhuman temper. As Cychreus had no male iſſue, he appointed Telamon, the father of Ajax, his ſucceſſor. Telamon was ſucceeded by Euryſaces, the ſon of Ajax by Tecmeſſa the daughter of Teuthras the Myſian, Teucer the other ſon of Telamon being on his return from the ſiege of Troy baniſhed by his father, as we have related in the hiſtory of Cyprus, for not revenging on Ulyſſes the death of his brother Ajax. After the death of Telamon, Teucer attempted the recovery of his paternal kingdom; but Euryſaces, entering into an alliance with the Athenians, defeated his deſigns, and left the ſovereignty of the iſland to his ſon, or, as others will have it, to his brother, Philæus, who of his own accord yielded the iſland to the Athenians, and retiring to Athens led there a private life. From him the tribe of the Philiadæ, of which was Piſiſtratus, borrowed its name [g]; but his deſcendants, among whom were Miltiades and Alcibiades, were called Euryſacidæ from Euryſaces. The iſland of Salamis was taken from the Athenians by the Megareans, and held by them till the time of Solon, who, being originally a Salaminian, prevailed upon the Athenians to attempt the recovery of that iſland. Their attempt attempt was attended with ſucceſs, and the Salaminians again brought under ſubjection to Athens; in which ſtate they continued till the reign of Caſſander, whom they joined againſt the Athenians, and were on that account driven from their antient habitations, a new colony being ſent from Attica to take poſſeſſion of their lands and eſtates. After the reduction of Athens by Sylla, Salamis was declared free, and enjoyed its freedom till it was with the other ſtates of Greece reduced by Veſpaſian to a Roman province.

Eubœa. The iſland of Eubœa went antiently by the names of Chalcis, Ellopia, Conia, Abantis, or Abantia, Macris, Oche, Bomo, &c. [h]. The name of Chalcis, which was common to the iſland, with its capital, Stephanus derives from Chalce the daughter of Aſopus king of Bœotia, and Pliny from a Greek word ſignifying braſs, which he ſuppoſes to have been firſt made uſe of here [i]. It was called Ellopia from Ellops the ſon of Ion, who ſettled in this iſland; Conia from the Cones; Abantia from the Abantes, or, as Strabo inſinuates, from one Abas an antient hero; Macris or Macra from its narrowneſs, that being the import of the Greek word, or from a nymph of that name, as the poets will have it by whom they feign Bacchus to have been nurſed in a cave of this iſland; Oche from a high mountain; Bomo from the cattle, with which it was well ſtored, the antient Arabian word Bomo or Bohmo, ſignifying, according to Heſychius, cattle, or herds of cattle. This appellation is perhaps the moſt antient of all, the iſland having been firſt peopled, as Strabo informs us, by the inhabitants of Arabia and Phœnice. The name of Eubœa, according to ſome writers, was borrowed from an antient heroine, according to others from a famous cave on the eaſtern coaſt of the iſland, called by the Greek Boos Cule, or the Ox-ſtall; but the common opinion is, that it was ſo named from its excellent paſtures. The name of Eubœa was changed in latter ages into that of Egripos, which is perhaps a corruption of the word Euripus; from Egripos was probably formed the modern name of Negropont; for the Franks or weſtern Chriſtians, who firſt reſorted to this iſland, being unacquainted with the Greek tongue, and hearing the inhabitants ſay, eis ton Egripon, that is, to Egripos, took the name of the country to be Negripon, or Negripont. In like like manner from miſunderſtanding the words eis ton Delon, to Delos, they formed Sdelos, Sdillos, and Lisdelos, all modern names of the ſaid iſland. Some have fooliſhly imagined, that Eubœa was called Negroponte from its being joined to the continent by a bridge of black ſtone, the word Negroponte ſignifying in Italian a black bridge. This iſland lies oppoſite to the continent of Attica, Bæotia, and Locris, extending from cape Sunium, now capo delle colonne, in Attica, as far as Theſſaly [k]. It was formerly joined to Bœotia, as Pliny informs us [l], by an iſthmus, as it is at preſent by a bridge; ſo narrow in ſome places is the Euripus (K), which divides it from the continent. It

(K) That canal, or ſtrait, which divides Eubœa from Attica, Bœotia, and Locris, was called by the antients Euripus. It is ſo narrow over-againſt the capital, that a galley can ſcarce paſs through it. The agitations of the Euripus are, as every one knows, much ſpoke of by the antients. Some, among whom Antiphilus of Byzantium, ſay, that the whole canal has a flux and reflux only ſix times in four and twenty hours; but Strabo, Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Seneca the tragedian, and Suidas agree, that it ebbs and flows ſeven times a day. Livy does not allow this flux and reflux to be ſo regular. Father Babin, a jeſuit of great learning, who made many obſervations on the ſpot, during his long abode in the iſland of Negropont, tells us, that the Euripus is regular in its ebbing and flowing the firſt eight days of the moon; the ſame regularity he obſerved from the fourteenth to the twentieth day incluſively, and in the three laſt days; but in the other days of the lunar month it is not ſo regular, for it ſometimes ebbs and flows eleven, twelve, thirteen, and fourteen times in the ſpace of a natural day. This irregularity, the cauſes of which both antients and moderns have ſought for in vain, became proverbial among the Greeks; whence the expreſſions Ἄνθρωπος Εὔριπος, Εὔριπος διάνοια, Εὐριπίζειν, &c. to ſignify the caprices of an uncertain and fluctuating mind. In this ſenſe Cicero compares the Comitia or aſſemblies of the Roman people to the commotions and agitations of the Euripus (65). Juſtin the martyr and Gregory of Nazianzum ſay, that Ariſtotle died of grief, becauſe he could not diſcover the cauſes of the flux and reflux of the Euripus; and the teſtimony of theſe fathers, uncertain as it is, gave riſe to the fabulous tradition, that this philoſopher

It extends from north-eaſt to ſouth-weſt a hundred and fifty miles; but its breadth bears no proportion to its length, being, according to Pliny and moſt of the modern geographers, forty miles over where broadeſt, and only twenty where narroweſt. It is three hundred and ſixty-five miles in compaſs, and has ſeveral remarkable promontories ſtretching a great way into the ſea. Pliny and Mela mention three, Geraſtus and Caphareus to the ſouth, and Cenæum to the north; Geraſtus faces Attica, Caphareus the Helleſpont, and Cenæum the country of Locris and Thermopyæ [m]. Strabo mentions a fourth, which he calls Petalia, and places over-againſt Sunium [n]. Artemiſium, which faces the Pegaſæan gulf and is famous for the firſt victory gained by the Greeks over the fleet of king Xerxes, is counted by Cornelius Nepos [o] and Plutarch [p] among the promontories of Eubœa. The ſame writers tell us, that on the top of Artemiſium ſtood a temple or rather a chapel conſecrated to Diana, ſurnamed Proſœa, that is eaſtern. Pliny ſpeaks of Artemiſium a town, and not a promontory. The doubling of cape Caphareus was in former times, when navigation was, we may ſay, in its infancy, reckoned very dangerous, on account of the many rocks and whirlpools on that coaſt much ſpoke of by the antients [q]. Among theſe rocks the Grecian fleet, returning from Troy under the command of Agamemnon, was ſhipwrecked by the treachery of Nauplius king of Eubœa, who underſtanding that his ſon Palamedes had been unjuſtly condemned by the artifice and intrigues of Ulyſſes and Diomedes, reſolved to revenge his death with the deſtruction of the whole fleet. To this end, as the Greeks were in all likelihood to ſail that way on their return from Troy, he cauſed fires to be made on the tops of the moſt dan-dangerous rocks, not doubting but they would take them, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, for tokens of a ſafe harbour, and thither ſteer their courſes. This malicious device had the deſired effect, two hundred ſhips and upwards being daſhed to pieces, and many thouſands of men periſhing in the whirlpools. However, Ulyſſes and Diomedes, whoſe ruin Nauplius chiefly deſigned, had the good luck to eſcape the common calamity, which ſo grieved the king of Eubœa, that he threw himſelf headlong from one of thoſe very rocks, and periſhed in the ſea. Caphareus is at preſent, according to Sophian and Niger, called Capo d'Oro, Capo, Chimi, and Capo Figera. Cape Cenæum, now Capo Liter from a neighbouring town of that name, is ſuppoſed by the poets to have been called Cenæum from Cenæus an antient hero, whom Neptune, ſay they, rendered invulnerable. On this promontory ſtood a temple conſecrated to Jupiter, ſurnamed from the place Cenæus. From Cenæum to Geraſtus, now Capo Roſſo, Strabo meaſures the length of the iſland, theſe two promontories being according to him twelve hundred furlongs diſtant from each other, which meaſure agrees exactly with the length of the iſland, as ſet down by Pliny. In Eubœa are ſeveral high mountains covered great part of the year with ſnow; namely, Oche the higheſt of the whole iſland, Telethrus, Dryphis, Nedon, Cotyleus, and Chalcis, whence the city of that name, which ſtood under it, was called Hypochalcis. On mount Dryphis was a famous temple dedicated to Diana, worſhipped there under the name of Dryphas. The following rivers are mentioned by Strabo, viz. Callas, Budorus, Cireæus, and Neleus, or, as others call it, Melas. The two latter, if that author is to be credited, had very different or rather oppoſite qualities, the wool of the ſheep that drank their waters turning white by thoſe of the Cireæus, and black by thoſe of the Neleus[r]. The ſame virtue Pliny aſcribes to the Melas and Cephiſſus, two rivers of Bœotia. That writer ſpeaks of another river in Eubœa called Lelas, which watered the territory of Lelantum; and Strabo of a fountain in the ſame territory, which he calls Arethuſa; but Stephanus will have Arethuſa to be the name of a city, and not of a fountain. The champain country of Eubœa is exceeding fruitful, yielding great plenty of corn, oil, wine, and all ſorts of delicious fruit; but it was chiefly famous for its rich paſtures, which the Athenians, as Thucydides informs us [s], made uſe of even before the Peloponneſian war to fatten their cattle.

This iſland had in former times many cities of great note, mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, and Mela. On the eaſtern coaſt, between the two promontories of Geraſtus and Caphareus, ſtood the cities of Geraſtus by Petalia, and Caryſtus. Petalia is mentioned only by Strabo [t]; and Geraſtus by Homer [u] and Livy [w], who ſpeak of it not as a city, but a famous haven. In the time of Stephanus it was a village. Caryſtus, or, as Ptolemy writes it, Caryſte, now Caſtel roſſo, ſtood, according to Strabo and Livy, at the foot of mount Oche, and was ſo called from Caryſtus the ſon of Chiron. It was alſo known by the names of Chironia from Chiron, and Ægea from Ægon, who reigned here, and is ſuppoſed by Stephanus to have given his name to the Ægean ſea. The inhabitants of Caryſtus worſhipped the giant Briareus, who according to Homer was the ſame with Ægeon, adored by the Chalcidians, the name of Ægeon being given him, as that poet informs us, by men, and that of Briareus by the immortal gods. Near Caryſtus, were the two ſmall villages of Styra and Marmarium, and at a ſmall diſtance from the latter the famous quarries of marble in great requeſt among the Romans, to whom it was known by the name of Caryſtian marble [x]. Here alſo was dug up the wonderful ſtone called Amianthos or Aſbeſtos, whereof cloth was made, for it was ſpun and drawn into thread like hemp, or flax, which, however ſtained, recovered, if Strabo is to be credited [y], its firſt gloſs and beauty, if kept ſome time in the flames. Styra was firſt peopled by the inhabitants of Marathon, a city of Attica, and was deſtoyed in the Lamian war by Phædrus the Athenian commander, who beſtowed its territory on the Eretrians. About five miles from Caryſtus, on the coaſt facing Attica and Bœotia, ſtood the village of Amarynthus, famous for a temple of Diana, ſurnamed from thence Amarynthia. Stephanus ſpeaks of Amarynthus as a ſeparate iſland, wherein he was certainly miſtaken. On the ſame coaſt, over againſt Oropus in Attica, ſtood the antient tient city of Eretria, the next, according to Strabo, in greatneſs, beauty, and wealth to Chalcis. It borrowed the name of Eretria from Eretreus the ſon of Phæton, one of the Titans, and was built, according to Strabo, by the Athenians before the Trojan war. Herodotus tells us [z], that it was peopled by Æclus and Clothus, two Athenians, after the deſtruction of Troy. Other writers will have it to be a colony of another city in Attica bearing the ſame name. Be that as it will, Eretria was in the earlieſt ages a place of great renown, and at the height of its glory, as Strabo informs us [a], in the reign of Darius Hyſtaſpis. The ſame writer mentions a pillar erected by the Eretrians in the temple of Diana Amarynthia with an inſcription the purport of which was, that they had triumphed with three thouſand ſoldiers, ſix hundred horſes, and ſixty chariots. They were long maſters of the iſlands of Andros, Tenos, and Cos, and carried on a war with the Chalcidians, which Thucydides ſtiles the antient war. Strabo mentions a ſchool of philoſophers founded here by Menedemus, and called the Eretrian ſchool. The antient city of Eretria was deſtroyed by the Perſians, and another, known by the name of new Eretria, built near the ruins of the former, which were ſtill to be ſeen in Strabo's time. The new city was overſtocked, as we read in Livy [b], in proportion to its bigneſs and other riches, with pictures, ſtatues, and ornaments of the like nature. The Eretrians in their ſpeech uſed not only to add the letter R to the end, but inſert it in the middle of their words; for which uncouth pronunciation they were ridiculed by the other Greeks [c]. The city of Eretria in Theſſaly and thoſe which ſtood in the neighbourhood of Pallene and Athos in Macedonia are ſaid by Strabo to have been built and peopled by the Eretrians of Eubœa. In the territory of Eretria ſtood Oechalia, formerly a city, but in Pliny's time a village. Strabo likewiſe calls it a village, and adds, that the antient city was deſtroyed by Hercules [d], which is confirmed by Ovid [e]. On the ſame coaſt, over-againſt Aulis in Bœotia, ſtood Chalcis the metropolis of the whole iſland, known to the antients by the names of Eubœa, Stymphelos, Halicarna, and Hypochalcis. The name of Chalcis, which prevailed over all the reſt, is ſuppoſed to have been borrowed from the daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia, called Combe, and surnamed Chalcis from her having first invented brazen armour. Chalcis was built by Æclus and Clothus, according to some before, according to others after, the Trojan war, and is celebrated by all the antients as a most magnificent, populous, and wealthy city. The Chalcidians applied themselves early to navigation, and sent numerous colonies into Thrace, Macedon, Sicily, Corcyra, Italy, Lemnos, &c. in all which places were cities, as Aristotle, quoted by Strabo, informs us, built and peopled by the inhabitants of Chalcis [e]. The Chalcidians are more commended by the antients on account of their courage and bravery than for their morals, having been in all times infamous even among the Greeks for their unnatural lust. Their avarice was a standing topic of ridicule, as Hesychius informs us, among the antient comedians [f]. Chalcis stood on the narrowest part of the Euripus, being joined to Bœotia by a bridge; which situation agrees with that of the present city of Negropont. It was one of the three cities, which Philip the son of Demetrius used to call the fetters of Greece [g]. Between Chalcis and the promontory Cenæum stood the cities of Ædepsum and Oreos. The former was famous for its hot baths mentioned by Pliny and Strabo, who commended them under the name of the hot baths of Hercules. Near these issued suddenly out of the earth, if Athenæus is to be credited, in the reign of Antigonus, a spring of cold water, which, as it performed most stupendous cures, drew crowds of people to it from the most remote nations. But the governors of Antigonus, to whom Eubœa was then subject, obliging those who used the water to pay a certain tax, the spring immediately disappeared. The city of Oreos, built, according to Homer, during the Trojan war, was formerly one of the most powerful cities of Eubœa, the fourth part of the island belonging to the Oreans in the time of Philip the father of Alexander. In the several revolutions of Greece it became subject to different masters, and, after it had undergone many changes, was by Pericles brought under subjection to the Athenians, who sent thither a new colony, after having driven out the antient inhabitants, and obliged them to retire into a canton of Thessaly

Theſſaly called Heſtiotides. The newly tranſported Athenians changed the name of Oreos, which was given it becauſe built on a hill, into that of Iſtiæa or Heſtiæa, which was the name of their tribe. The territory of Oreos was famous for its vineyards, whence it is by Homer diſtinguiſhed with the epithet of Polyſtaphylos, that is, abounding with vines. Goltzius produces a medal of Iſtiæa with an ox on one ſide, alluding to the excellent paſtures of Eubœa, and bunches of grapes on the other, to ſhew the nature of the ſoil. In Pliny's time this city was noways conſiderable; and now is only a ſmall village called Oreo. Theſe are the cities of note on the coaſt facing Attica and Bœotia. On the north-ſide of the iſland, overagainſt Theſſaly and extending from Cenæum to Artemiſium, ſtood Dia or Athenæ Diades, founded by one Dias an Athenian, who called it after his own name and that of his native city, Athenæ Diades. This Dios was, according to Stephanus, the ſon of Abas, and brother of Aleo and Arethuſa. The inhabitants of Dia peopled the city of Canæ in Æolis. Ptolemy calls Dia or Dium only a promontory. On the coaſt, which is waſhed by the Ægean ſea, ſtood the city of Cerinthus, built, according to Strabo, by Ellops the ſon of Ion, and brother of Æclus and Clothus. Pliny counts this among the antient cities of note in Eubœa [h]. Homer mentions both Dium and Cerinthus, calling the latter a maritime city, and the other a high town [i]. The inland cities mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, &c. are Ellopia, Nyſa, Eubœa, Orobiæ, Rhamnus, Porthmus Algæ, and Tamine, Ellopia, according to Strabo, ſtood at the foot of mount Telebrium, and was ſo called, as was alſo the whole iſland, from Ellops its founder, who, as the ſame author tells us, was the ſon of Xuthus and grandſon of Helleus. The inhabitants of this city after the battle at Leuctra were obliged by the tyrant Philiſtides to abandon their native country and ſettle at Iſtiæa [k]. Algæ ſtood over-againſt Anthedon, the laſt maritime city of Bœotia on the ſide of Locris. Strabo calls it the Euboic Algæ, and alſo Æges, to difference it from two other cities of that name, the one in Achaia near the river Aratis, the other in Æolis. The ſame author is of opinion, nion, that from this place, once famous for a temple of Neptune, the Ægean ſea borrowed its name. In the ſixth year of the Peloponneſian war the city of Orobiæ was in great part over-thrown by an earthquake, and laid under water by the ſea, which on that occaſion broke in [l].

The moſt antient inhabitants of Eubœa were the Titans, according to Solinus [m], who by the kingdom of the Titans underſtands the iſland of Eubœa. But this opinion is only founded on the religious worſhip which the inhabitants paid to Briareus and Ægeon, two of that race, or rather one known by two different names. Other writers, taking no notice of the Titans, ſuppoſe the Abantes to have firſt peopled the iſland. Theſe took the name of Abantes from Abas a city of Thrace, whence they paſſed over into Eubœa, which from them was named Abantis and Abantia. This is the opinion of Ariſtotle, as quoted by Strabo; but others pretend, that they were called Abantes from Abas their leader, who was the firſt that reigned in the iſland. The learned Reineccius takes the Abantes to be the Arabians, who, according to Strabo, followed Cadmus into Eubœa and ſettled there. Herodotus counts the Abantes of Eubœa among the people of Ionian extraction [n]. Homer gives them the epithet of brave, and repreſents them with a long lock of hair on the back-part of their head; from which deſcription his interpreter Euſtathius concludes the Curetes and Abantes to be one and the ſame people; which was the opinion of Archemagus, an antient Eubœan writer quoted by Strabo (L). 'Tis remarkable, that Homer,

(L) Archemagus was a native of Eubœa, wrote ſeveral books on the animals, and other remarkable things, of that iſland, and as often quoted and commended by Athenæus. This antient writers tells us, that the inhabitants of Chalcis and Eretria, diſagreeing about a certain field called Campus Lelantus, came to an engagement, wherein the Eretrians cloſing with the Chalcidians, and taking hold of them by their long hair, eaſily overcome them. Whereupon the Chalcidians, to prevent misfortunes of the like nature for the future, cut off their hair, leaving out of ſuperſtition but one lock on the back part of their heads. From this manner of ſhaving they were called, according to Archemagus, Curetes; ſo that the Curetes, who are ſaid to have once inhabited Chalcis, were originally Abantes.

mer, who often ſtiles the iſland Eubœa, yet never calls the inhabitants Eubœans, but conſtantly Abantes. The Pelaſgians likewiſe abandoning Peloponneſus ſettled in this iſland [o], which on that account is called Pelaſgia by the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius. To theſe Diodorus Siculus adds the Dorians, Æolians, Eleans, and Dryopes. The latter being driven from Phocis by Hercules, after the death of their king Phylas, ſettled partly in Eubœa, where they built Caryſtus, and partly in Cyprus and Peloponneſus [p].

EUBOEA muſt have been formerly a very conſiderable ſtate, ſince it is by the antients ſtiled the queen of the Ægean, and by Herodotus equalled to the iſland of Crete itſelf. The Chalcidians, Eretrians, and Caryſtians were deemed expert mariners, and courted by the contending powers of thoſe days. They ſent forty ſhips, a grand armada in thoſe times, to the war of Troy under the conduct of their king Elephenor, and are ſaid, at leaſt by the poets, to have given on that occaſion proofs of an uncommon valour.

THE firſt form of government which prevailed in Eubœa was monarchical. Solinus dates the beginning of the Eubœan kingdom from the time of the Titans, which it is no eaſy matter to define. Others, taking no notice of the Titans, ſuppoſe Abas to have been the firſt who reigned in Eubœa. He was, according to Homer and Euſtathius [q], the ſon of Neptune and the nymph Arethuſa. By the ſons of Neptune the antients meant expert mariners, or princes powerful by ſea. Iſaacius Tzetzes tells us, that he was killed inadvertently by his grandſon Elephenor, who being provoked at ſeeing a ſlave, who led him in his old age, perform that duty without the due care, diſcharged a blow at him with a club; but miſſing the ſlave unfortunately killed the prince [r]. Abas, according to Homer and the ſcholiaſt of Apollonius, had by his wife Aglaia two ſons, Chalcodon and Canethus. Chalcodon, who ſucceeded his father, made war upon the Thebans, reduced their city, and obliged them to ſubmit to an annual tribute. He was afterwards overcome and killed by Amphitryon the father of the Theban Hercules. Upon his death the Thebans recovered their antient liberty. Plutarch, who mentions this war, calls the place, where the battle was fought and Chalcodon codon killed, Leuctra [s]. From this king Homer ſtiles the Eubœans Chalcodontidæ [t]. Canethus, who according to Apollonius [u] gave his name to a mountain of Eubœa, had a ſon named Canthus, who attended Jaſon in this expedition into Colchis, and loſt his life in that enterprize. Chalcodon had by his wife Imonarete two ſons, Elephenor and Pyræchmes. The latter renewed the war againſt the Thebans and Bœotians; but being overcome and taken priſoner by Hercules, he was tied to two horſes, his arms to one and his legs to the other, and cruelly tore aſunder [w]. Elephenor was baniſhed for killing his grandfather, as we have related above. But as his countrymen were preparing to ſet out for the Trojan war, he drew near the Euripus, and ſtanding on a rock on the Bœotian ſide of the ſtreight, he invited them to aſſemble, convinced the aſſembly of his innocence, and prevailed upon them not only to reſtore him to his native country, but to intruſt him with the command of the fleet, conſiſting of forty ſhips, which was ready to ſet ſail for Troy. In this war Elephenor, if we believe Homer [x], gave proofs of an extraordinary valour; but was at laſt killed by Agenor. After the deſtruction of Troy, the Abantes or Eubœans on their return home joined the Locrians of Thronium, and landing near the Ceraunian mountains poſſeſſed themſelves of the adjacent country, and built there a city; the city they called Thronium, but the country Abantis, and held them both till they were many years after driven out by the inhabitants of Apollonia [y]. Some writers tell us, that, upon the death of Elephenor, Nauplius the father of Palamedes was placed upon the throne of Eubœa; but others are of opinion, that the Eubœans immediately after the Trojan war formed themſelves into a republic, or rather into ſeveral ſmall republics, moſt of their cities being governed by their own laws and quite independent of each other. In the reign of Darius Hyſtaſpis the cities of Chalcis, Eretria, Caryſtus, and Oreos were ſo many diſtinct republics, governed by the nobles, whom they called Hippobates, that is, horſemen, none being admitted into the adminiſtraadminiſtration, but ſuch as could maintain a certain number of horſes; whence it is manifeſt, that oligarchy prevailed at that time in thoſe cities. But this form of government was frequently diſturbed, either by the unruly multitude introducing in its room a democracy, or by domeſtic tyrants, who, taking all the power in their own hands, ruled in their reſpective cities without controul. Among theſe we find the following tyrants mentioned by the antients as reigning in the city of Chalcis, Antileon, Phoxus, Meneſarchus, Callias, and Tauroſthenes. The two firſt are ſpoke of by Ariſtotle, who tells us, that Phoxus was put to death by the incenſed multitude [z]. Meneſarchus committed great devaſtations in the territories of the Athenians without any ſort of provocation; but in the mean time the Thebans having made a deſcent in the iſland, with a deſign to drive out the tyrants, and reſtore the cities to their former ſtate of liberty and independence, Meneſarchus had recourſe to the Athenians, who, notwithſtanding the injuries he had done them, haſtened to his aſſiſtance, and in the ſpace of thirty days obliged the Thebans to abandon the iſland, and leave the tyrants in the poſſeſſion of their uſurped power. Meneſarchus had two ſons, Callias and Tauroſthenes, and was ſucceeded by the former, who, unmindful of the favours his father had received from the Athenians, joined Philip of Macedon, their declared enemy; but, being overcome by Phocion the Athenian general, and diſgraced by Philip, he was obliged to ſue for peace, which the Athenians generouſly granted him, and even aſſiſted him to the utmoſt of their power againſt Philip and the Thebans, who had invaded his territories. When he ſaw himſelf attacked at once by two ſuch powerful enemies, he went in perſon to Athens, and there in an aſſembly of the people pronounced an oration compoſed by Demoſthenes, which had ſo good an effect on their minds, that they not only forgot his ungrateful behaviour, but reſolved to ſend troops without delay to his aſſiſtance. By this means he withſtood the efforts of his enemies, and maintained his power to his death [a]. Tauroſthenes, according to ſome writers, ſucceeded him, according to others died before him. If he outlived him, he did nothing after he was veſted with the ſupreme power, which authors have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity.

[a] Æſchin. in Orat. contra Cteſiph.

In the city of Eretria reigned the following tyrants; Diagoras, who, as Ariſtotle informs us [b], having driven out the Hippobates, took the whole power into his own hands: Themiſon, who took the city of Oropus from the Athenians, and ſtirred up the Thebans againſt them; but afterwards changing his mind entered into an alliance with Athens, and aſſiſted his new allies in the recovery of Oropus [c]. Plutarchus, who, being overcome in a pitched battle by the Macedonians, notwithſtanding the ſuccours ſent him from Athens, was driven out by his own ſubjects, and obliged to abandon the iſland [d]. Upon his flight the Eretrians recovered their antient liberty, which they did not long enjoy; for diviſions and parties ariſing among the citizens, ſome of them favouring Philip of Macedon, and others the Athenians, Philip took advantage of theſe diſturbances, and, by means of one Hipponicus having made himſelf maſter of the city, put the whole power into the hands of Hipparchus, Automedon, and Clitarchus, who were all at the head of the Macedonian faction. But they were ſoon driven out by Phocion the Athenian, who reſtored the Eretrians to the enjoyment of their former liberty [e]. The city of Oreos was cruelly haraſſed by one Philiſtides, who was ſupported in his tyranny by Philip. He held alſo the city of Ellopia, which he obliged the inhabitants to abandon and retire to Oreos [f]. Beſides the tyrants of particular cities, we find one Tynondus mentioned by Plutarch [g] as lord of the whole iſland; but all we know of him is, that he was contemporary with Solon the legiſlator, and that he governed with great equity and moderation [h]. The wars of the Eubœans, with the Athenians, Perſians, and Spartans, we have deſcribed in the foregoing volume [i]; and therefore ſhall only add here, that they ſubmitted firſt to Philip, and then to his ſon Alexander, after whoſe death they ſhook off the Macedonian yoke, but were by Antigonus gonus brought anew under subjection. When the Romans first passed over into Greece, the island Eubœa was subject to the kings of Macedon, but soon after declared free by a decree of the senate, in order to weaken the power of Philip in those parts. Antiochus, surnamed the great, and Mithridates king of Pontus were in their turns masters of Eubœa; but the Romans prevailing in the east restored the the Eubœans to their former state of liberty. Mark Antony subjected them to Athens; but Augustus, incensed against the Athenians for siding with his rival, declared free first the city of Eretria, and soon after the whole island, which was governed by its own laws, and continued in a flourishing condition till the reign of Vespasian, when it underwent the same fate as the other states of Greece.

In the Euripus, now gulf of Negropont, Pliny places the island of Atalanta, which is mentioned also by Ptolemy and Strabo, and the Petaliæ, so called because they lie over-against the city of Petalia in Eubœa. They are four in number, but rocks rather than islands. Some writers rank Anticyra, famous for its hellebore, among the islands of the Ægean sea, and place it in the Pegasean bay, between Eubœa and Thessaly, over-against mount Oeta; but Strabo, a most accurate writer, though well acquainted with the other Greek islands, seems to have been quite a stranger to this. He mentions indeed two cities of this name, the one on the coast of Phocis near Cissa on the side of Bœotia [k]; the other, which he commends for its hellebore, as Pausanias does the former [l], on the banks of the Sperchius, at an equal distance from mount Oeta and the Maliac gulf [m]; but he no-where speaks of an island bearing the name of Anticyra; and his silence inclines us, notwithstanding the authority of Pliny, Gellius, and some modern geographers, to believe, that there was no such island; the more because neither Pliny nor Gellius give us any account of its situation, but only tell us, that the island of Anticyra was famous for its hellebore, mistaking in all likelihood one of the abovementioned cities for an island. But it is now time to dismiss this subject, and take our leave of the Ægean or Archipelago, having visited with Ptolemy, Strabo, and Pliny, the best guides of antiquity, all the islands of note in that sea, without suffering any thing to to escape our notice, which those eminent antiquaries have thought worthy of observation. The present account, with that which we have delivered in the foregoing volumes, of the several Greek states in Europe and Asia, completes, we may say without presumption, the most distinct and extensive history of Greece that has hitherto appeared in any language.

CHAP. II.

The Hiſtory of the Macedonians.

SECT. I.

The deſcription of Macedonia.

AS this country was antiently inhabited by various nations, ſo it was, in a long ſucceſſion of ages, diſtinguiſhed by different appellations, being ſometimes called by the name of one of its diſtricts, and ſometimes by that of another, as the nation inhabiting thoſe regions prevailed. Thus, in the moſt antient times it took its name from Æmathia [b], which received its appellation from Æmathius, a prince of great antiquity; but afterwards the whole country, which the Greeks called Macedonia, received that denomination from [c] king Macedo, a deſcendant from Deucalion, as ſome think, or, as others affirm, by an eaſy mutation mutation of Mygdonia, the name of one of its provinces, into Macedonia (A).

The bounds of this country are not very easily assigned, because, according to the fortune of its princes, they have been sometimes esteemed larger, and sometimes less. We shall, however, endeavour to accommodate our description to the succeeding history in such a manner, as that the reader may easily perceive what accessions it received from time to time from the valour of its antient kings. And as to the alterations which it sustained, after it fell under the dominion of the Romans and was reduced into a province, we shall consider them in another place [d]. Of old then it was bounded

(A) The antient names of countries are, generally speaking, various, and hardly to be traced to their sources. It is the opinion of many commentators on the holy scriptures, that by the כִּתִּים Chittim, or the descendants of Cheth, we are to understand the inhabitants of this country (1). The learned Bochart is of a different sentiment, and will have the Chittim to be the people of Italy (2). The judicious Mr. Shuckford supports the former notion, and hath offered many probable reasons in justification of his reviving it (3). Some critics have fancied, that the old name might easily be reconciled to the new thus, Κήτειοι, Μακέται, Μακεδόνες; but whether in length of time this permutation of names might really happen, the reader's judgment must determine. As to Cluverius, his conjecture, that Macedonia was derived from Mygdonia, through the different pronunciation of the Greeks, we can affirm nothing concerning it (4). The old opinion, however, seems preferable, that it was so called from the antient hero Macedo, whom Diodorus asserts to have been the son of Osiris (5); but Solinus will have him to be a descendant from Deucalion (6). They agree, however, in this, that from him this country received its name, which was before called Æmathia. Concerning the antient king Æmathius, from whom this appellation came, we find nothing in history, except that he lived in the oldest times, and was probably the first king of that ed on the eaſt by the Ægean ſea, on the ſouth by Theſſaly and Epirus, on the weſt by the Adriatic or the Ionian ſea, and on the north by the river Strymon and the Scardian mountains, afterwards by the river Neſſus or Neſtus (B).

that little diſtrict which retained his name, tho' it was a province only of Macedonia (7). It is from Livy that we learn Pæonia was once the general name of this country, which afterwards became peculiar to a people thruſt up in the northern part thereof lying under mount Scopus (8). Thus much may ſuffice on this ſubject, which, however dry, the intelligent reader will find to have its uſes.

(B) The acceſſions of territory which Macedonia received, from the wiſdom and virtue of its kings, were made at different times, and on account of different wars. Caranus and his immediate ſucceſſors were pent up in the very midſt of Macedonia, and the conqueſts they made were either towards the north, at the expence of the Pelagonians, Edonians, and other nations, or on the ſouth, where they gained ſome very rich and fruitful countries from the Theſſalians (9). In proceſs of time, when the Perſian king came to have great affairs in this part of the world, the tributary princes of Macedon found their account in it, and, as the reward of their attachment to that crown, had ſeveral of the weſtern provinces beſtowed on them (10). This enabled them to conteſt the poſſeſſion of the ſea-coaſts with the moſt powerful republics of Greece, who, under pretence of ſettling colonies, ſought by all poſſible methods to eſtabliſh large principalities, and to draw immenſe riches to themſelves. The jealouſy the Macedonian kings had of this, their art in procuring ſupplies from one republic to diſtreſs another, and their dexterity in negotiating treaties, when they were no longer able to carry on war, reſtored them to the poſſeſſion of the eaſtern coaſt, and left them on that ſide no other boundary but the ſea. On the weſt they had ſtill many nations between them and the Adriatic, when Philip the father of Alexander came to the throne; but he, contemning all limits not ſet by nature, forced all thoſe nations to ſubmit to his ſway; and having conquered all the country to the ſea on this ſide, turned his arms to the ſouth-eaſt, where driving out the Athenians, Thracians, and other nations, he

Pliny [e] tells us, that no less than an hundred and fifty different nations were seated within this territory; and [f] Pomponius Mela confirms the multitude of different states in this country, by saying it had as many nations as cities. Of those the [g] Taulantii inhabited the western part on the coasts of the Adriatic sea. Within this territory stood the city [h] Epidamnum or Epidamnus; which, for its unlucky name, the Romans afterwards thought fit to change into Dyrrachium; it is now called Durazzo (C) [i].

he added all the rich and plentiful regions between the rivers Strymon and Nessus or Nestus to Macedonia, adorning the old city of Crenides with rich and stately buildings, and calling it from his own name Philippi (11). This account will free the reader from those difficulties, which otherwise in the perusal of this work might frequently give him trouble. He will therein meet with accounts of wars carried on by the Lyncestians, Alopians, and other nations against the Macedonians, tho' it should seem that the countries inhabited by these nations were within the limits of Macedonia; he will find the Athenians, Corcyrians, and Corinthians holding large districts in this country; and he will hear the river Strymon sometimes, at other the river Nessus, named as the boundary of Macedonia on the east, and the authorities of the antients quoted for both (12); all of which this short account will render perfectly clear and intelligible.

(C) The city of Epidamnus was seated on the entrance of the Ionian gulph (13). It was a colony of the Corcyrians, but settled under the command of Phalius the son of Heratoclidas, a Corinthian by birth, and as to family descended of Hercules. At the time of their settlement here, the Taulantii looked upon the territory they seized as justly belonging to them; on which account count the riſing city and its inhabitants were frequently diſturbed by them and other barbarous nations; but by degrees the Epidamnians grew powerful, and ſtood in little awe of their neighbours, till their own ſeditions furniſhed both with opportunity and force the Taulantii their antient enemies. This happened about the ſecond year of the eighty-fifth olympiad, when the commons having expelled the nobility conſtrained them to fly to the barbarians. Theſe, excited by the exiles, preſently invaded the territories of the Greeks, and ſhortly after beſieged the city, which they reduced to great ſtreights. The Epidamnians in great diſtreſs applied themſelves for aſſiſtance to the Corcyrians, but were refuſed. They then, at the inſtance of the oracle, made ſuit to the Corinthians, who furniſhed them ſpeedily and effectually with all things they deſired. This terribly incenſed the Corcyrians, who thought the Corinthians, in relieving their colony, had meddled where they had nothing to do, notwithſtanding that they themſelves were a colony from Corinth, and that part of the original colony ſettled at Epidamnus were Corinthians alſo. The next year therefore, after the Corinthians had relieved this city, the Corcyrians fitted out a great fleet, attacked the Corinthians and their allies, and alſo beſieged Epidamnus; which proceeding of theirs induced what was called the Corinthian war, of which we have given the reader an account elſewhere (14). In ſucceeding times this, like the reſt of the Macedonian cities, laid hold of every opportunity of aſſerting its freedom; and tho' we cannot be very particular as to the accidents which befel it in ſo long a ſeries, yet we know, that the fact was ſo; for we find Diodorus Siculus ſetting down the reduction of this place by Caſſander, who left a gariſon therein; however, in a ſhort time afterwards the city diſmiſſed the gariſon, and ſided with Glaucias king of the Illyrians (15). After Epidamnus fell under the juriſdiction of the Romans, they are ſaid to have changed its name into Dyrrachium, on account of the unluckineſs of its former appellation (16), tho' Appian ſays, that the Corcyrians made this change; holding its antient name Dyrrachium, to be ominous, they called it Epidamnus (17).

nus (17); however, the former ſeems to be the more probable opinion of the two, ſince Plautus gives us the reaſon why the laſt mentioned name was thought unlucky, it being expreſſive of the nature of the inhabitants, who were, generally ſpeaking, knaves, ſycophants, and proſtitutes; his words are theſe,

Nunc ita eſt hæc hominum natio Epidamnia;
Voluptarii atque potatores maximi:
Tum ſycophantæ & palpatores plurimi
In urbe hac habitant; tum meretrices mulieres
Nuſquam perhibentur blandiores gentium.
Propterea huic ubi nomen Epidamno inditum eſt:
Quia nemo ferme huc ſine Damno divortitur (11).

Some have thought, that Dyrrachium was rather the name of the port than the city; and others again have ſuggeſted, that the antient city of Epidamnus ſtood on the continent, whereas Dyrrachium was ſeated in a peninſula (19). It is now without doubt called Durazzo, and is a port of conſiderable note, that is, conſidering the condition of other maritime places on the coaſt, which once made a conſiderable figure in hiſtory (20).

(D) Apollonia ſtood ſeven miles from the ſea on the river Laus. It was a colony of the Corinthians, and alſo of the Corcyrians, perhaps in the ſame manner as Epidamnus. It had ſome time the name of Gylace from Gylaces a Corinthian, who probably was the leader of the firſt colony (21). There is a very remarkable ſtory relating to this city related by Herodotus; and, inaſmuch as we ſhall have no occaſion to ſpeak of it elſewhere, it is but juſt the reader ſhould meet with it here. "In "the territories of Apollonia, a flock of ſheep, ſacred to the "ſea, fed by day on the banks of a river, which, deſcending "from the mountain Laemon, runs through that country into "the ſea at the port of Oricus; but by night they are folded in "a cave far diſtant from the city, and guarded by men cho-"ſen annually to that end, out of the moſt eminent among "the citizens for birth and riches; becauſe the people of Apol-"lonia ſet a high value upon theſe ſheep, purſuant to the ad-"monition

South of the Taulantii, but ſtill on the coaſt of the Adriatic, lay the country of the Elymiotæ, whoſe chief cities were Elyma and Bullis [k], both ſea-ports and both mentioned by Pliny [l]. Eaſtward of the Elymiotians lay a little inland

When he awaked, and ſaw what was done, he ſaid " nothing to any man, thinking to purchaſe the like number, " and to put them among the reſt; but the Apollonians, being " ſoon informed of the thing, cauſed him to appear without " delay before the court of juſtice, and ſentenced him to loſe " his eyes for ſleeping when he ought to have watched. " you the reparation you demand for the loss of your " eyes, in obedience to an oracle they have received : " Which when Euenus heard, he was not a little mor- " tified to find himself deceived by this artifice. However, the " Apollonians, having first satisfied the possessors, made him a " present of the lands he demanded, and in a short time he ob- " tained the spirit of divination, and acquired a considerable " name (22)." In the days of Cassander king of Macedon, it ran the same risque that Epidamnus did, that is of being reduced under his dominion ; but, by the help of the Illyrians, it threw off his yoke (23). Under the Romans it flourished and was very famous, particularly on account of its pleasant situation, which invited many persons to settle therein and form a kind of academy. It is now (as we think) called Pallina (24).

(E) The little district in the kingdom of Macedonia, which retained for ages the denomination of Orestes's kingdom, is said to have derived that title thus. Orestes the son of Agamemnon, after he had been acquitted of his mother's murder and had stolen away Hermione, retired with such Greeks, as, out of regard to his virtue, were content to follow his fortunes, through Thessaly and Epirus into this region, which lay on the borders of the latter, and there settled himself. Here by Hermione he had a son, whom after his own name he called Orestes, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and by his just and gentle sway so endeared himself to his people, that in memory of his and his father's goodness towards them, they called the country and themselves after the name of these princes (25). This people, tho' they lived within the bounds of the Macedonian kingdom, and were obedient to its kings, at least after the reign of Philip, yet they preserved such privileges, and vindicated their liberty with such firmness, that when the Romans, after the overthrow of Perseus, possessed themselves of Macedon, they left this people in freedom, and allowed them to set up the form of a dependent commonwealth, acknowledging the Roman protection, but not the jurisdiction of the provincial magistrates (26).

was Gyrtone, mentioned by Pliny [n]. The Eordians lay behind the country of the Taulantii, and between it and the kingdom of Oreſtes [o]. To the north of theſe lay the territory of the Daſſaretæ [p], whoſe chief cities were Lychnides and Evia. Polybius [q] indeed calls the former Lychnidia. It was a place remarkable for its fine ſituation near a lake of the ſame name. and is at this day called Ochrida [r]. Eaſt of this country lay Æmathia [s] properly ſo called, a region from whence, as we have ſaid, the whole country ſince called Macedonia derived its moſt antient name. It ſtretched itſelf quite to the Sinus Thermacius, or, as it is now called, the gulph of Salonichi, and contained ſeveral famous cities, particularly Ægæa or Edeſſa, the antient capital of the Macedonian kingdom, of which we ſhall have hereafter occaſion to ſpeak at large, it having been the royal ſeat of Caranus the firſt king of Macedon, and the burial place of the kings of his line to the time of Alexander the great [t] Pella, antiently called Bunomos or Bunomia, ſeated at the mouth of the river Actius, famous for being the birth-place of Philip and his ſon Alexander, and for having in its neighbourhood the tomb of Euripides the celebrated tragic poet [u]. Europus, a place ſeated, as Pliny tells us, on the river Actius [x], and Beræa where a ſedition was raiſed againſt the apoſtle Paul by the Jews [y]. South-eaſt from Æmathia, and cloſe on the ſhore of the gulph of Saloniotis, lies the little country of Pieria [z], famous for its being the region of the muſes, who were from thence ſtiled Pierides. Its chief cities were Pydna, antiently called Citron, ſtanding between the mouths of the rivers Aliacmon and Lydius, in which Olympias the mother of Alexander, Roxana his wife, and Alexander his ſon were put to death by Caſſander [a]. In its neighbourhood was fought the deciſive battle between Paulus Æmilius the Roman conſul and Perſeus king of Macedon, wherein the latter was utterly defeated [b]. ſtrong town, in which Alexander the great is ſaid to have ſeen a viſion, wherein he was promiſed the conqueſt of the Perſian empire [c]. On the other ſide of Æmathia, that is, to the north, lay the country of Mygdonia, in which were the cities of Antigonia, Letæ, and Terpilus [d]. Eaſt of this we find the region of Amphaxitis, in which ſtood the noble city of Theſſalonica, antiently called Therma, or rather built near the place where that old city ſtood. Its founders were Caſſander and Theſſalonica, the daughter of Philip and ſiſter to Alexander the great. It is celebrated in hiſtory on many accounts, and is at this day the moſt conſiderable place in Macedonia, under the name of Salonichi [e]. (F) Theſſalonica had the good luck to remain always conſiderable in the midſt of that almoſt total ruin, which various conqueſts brought on Macedonia. Strabo tells us, that in his time it was the moſt flouriſhing city in the kingdom (27). St. Paul found it no leſs flouriſhing, when he preached the goſpel therein; and how great regard he had for the church there, appears from the epiſtles directed thereto (28). Even at this day it makes a very great figure under the name Salonichi, and is not only very remarkable for the great trade carried on there, by which its inhabitants are ſtill rich, at leaſt in propotion to their neighbours, but alſo for the noble ruins which teſtify its antient magnificence. There are the remains of ſeveral triumphal arches, as well as one which is ſtill almoſt entire, erected in honour of the emperor Antoninus. There are alſo churches now turned into moſques of ſurprizing beauty, particularly that which was conſecrated to St. Demetrius, containing two churches, one over the other, both of excellent marble, and adorn'd with upwards of a thouſand columns of jaſper, porphyry, &c. In this, and in other churches, are the tombs of ſeveral illuſtrious perſons, and without the city are numerous fragments of antiquity with variety of inſcriptions. There alſo quantities of medals frequently found here; but the Turks

this country lies the region of Chalcidica, in which were the towns of Angæa, Singus, and Acanthus, now called Eriſto [g]. Next lay the country of Paraxis, full of gulfs and inlets formed by the Ægean ſea. In it were the cities of Palena [h], antiently called Phlegra, as Herodotus tells us, in the neighbourhood of which there dwelt of old certain cruel and inhoſpitable giants, who were extirpated by Hercules [i]. Potidæa, a colony of Corinthians, but afterwards poſſeſſed by the Athenians, from whom it was taken by Philip the father of Alexander. It was afterwards re-edified by Caſſander, who called it from his own name Caſſandria, which appellation it ſtill retains [k]. Torone, from whence the neighbouring bay received the appellation of Toronaicus [l]. Olynthus, a city famous for the ſeveral ſieges it ſuſtained, and for being the birth-place of Calliſthenes the philoſopher [m]. The Biſaltæ held a ſmall country bordering on the Sinus Strymonicus, and in the northern part of Macedonia. Their chief cities were Euporia, Oſſa, and Calitera [n]. North-weſt from them lay the region of Edonia, on the confines of which ran the river Strymon. In it ſtood the cities of Amphipolis, Scotuſa, and Berga; the firſt famous for being a colony of the Athenians [o]; and ſome

Turks are ſo incurious, that they ſet no value upon them, and ſo careleſs, that they will not preſerve them for thoſe that do: inſomuch, that travellers are conſtrained to make uſe of various arts to obtain from this illiterate nation pieces, of which they neither know the uſe, nor account them of any value (29). It is very probable, that the excellent ſituation of Theſſalonica hath been the chief cauſe of that reſpect which all conquerors have ſhewn it. It has certainly ſuch advantages therefrom as are ſcarce to be met with elſewhere, and which have been celebrated by the antients, as well as admired by the moderns.

some think that the antient city Crenides stood also within its bounds, which Philip the father of Alexander rebuilt and called Philippi [p]. North-west of this territory lies the country of Pelagonia, bordering on mount Hæmus, the chief city of which was Stobi, now called Starachino [q]. West of it lies Orbelia, in which were seated the cities of Orma and Gariscus [r]. Next, bending to the south-west, lies the country of Joria, in which stood the city of Jorum. West from it is situate the territory of the Almopians, in which stand the cities of Europus, Albanopolis, and Apsalus [s]. Directly south of these we find the region of the Æstrians, the chief city in which was antiently called Æstrium [t]. East of them, and in the very heart of Macedonia, lies the country of the Lyncesti, the chief city in which was called Heraclea [u]; north of which lay the inland country of Sintica, the principal towns in which were Paræcopolis and Tristolius [x].

The use of this description.

The reader may possibly think he might have been spared so particular a detail of nations and cities now no more; but he will easily perceive them from the following history, that an accurate description of the antient Macedonia was absolutely necessary to render it intelligible; and he will be the better satisfied, when we assure him, that the foregoing description was not collected without great pains taken, not only in comparing antient historians, but modern geographers also, and the relations of such travellers as have seen the ruins of those cities, which make such a figure in antient history, and are yet very differently placed in our maps.

The extent of Macedonia.

Macedonia, according to M. del' Isle's map of Greece, lies between the 40th and 42d degrees of north latitude, and between the 37th and 42d degrees of longitude. Brixius reckons from mount Orbelus to Pindus, that is, from north to south, 2000 stadia, and from Epidamnus to mount Athos 2500 stadia [y], from west to east. According to the map before-mentioned it is from north to south about 160 miles, and from west to east about 220.

220. Its form is very irregular; but its ſituation is excellent, in reſpect that it is waſhed on the eaſt by the Ægean ſea, and on the weſt by the Ionian; which advantages, however, were never cultivated as they might have been, nor were the Macedonians ever powerful at ſea, notwithſtanding, that many noble bays and excellent harbours are to be found in their country.

Mountains. AMONGST the moſt conſiderable mountains in this region, we may reckon that great ridge running acroſs the north part thereof, ſtiled the Scardian mountains. In this part alſo of Macedon ſtood mount Pangæus, lofty and well covered with wood, yet infinitely more valuable from its contents, which were both gold and ſilver, as we ſhall ſhew elſewhere [z]. Hæmus, or rather Amus, the weſtern ſpurs of which, joining the Scardian hills, divide this country from Thrace [a]. Athos in the Chalcidian region, one of the moſt celebrated mountains in the world [b]. Mela reports, that it is ſo high as to reach above the clouds [c]. Martianus Capellus affirmed it to be ſix miles high [d]; and it was a received opinion, that it never rained thereon, becauſe the aſhes, left on the altars erected near its ſummit, were always found as they were left, dry and unſcattered; but if on many accounts it was famous among the antients, it is no leſs ſo among the moderns. The Greeks, ſtruck with its ſingular ſituation, and the venerable appearance of its towering aſcent, erected ſo many churches, monaſteries, and hermitages thereon, that it became in a manner inhabited by devotees, and from thence received the name of the holy mountain, which it ſtill retains, tho' many of thoſe conſecrated works are now decayed (G). (G) This mount Athos is thought to have received its name from a giant, who, the ſcholiaſt on Theocritus informs us, was the ſon of Neptune and Rhodope; but in this there is a concealed meaning, becauſe he is ſaid to have removed this mountain from the neighbourhood of a lake of the laſt-mentioned name: Hence he is called the ſon of Rhodope, becauſe from her he came; and the ſon of Neptune, becauſe he came to him. There are coins, which on their reverſe have the ſummit of mount Athos, with a man of a gigantic ſize lying on the rocks, with his right hand over his head. Whether this be the giant, the Genius of the mountain, or Jupiter Athous, is not clear (21) As to the cutting off the iſthmus which unites it to the land, Herodotus gives us the following account of it, and therein an admirable deſcription of the mountain: "Athos is a mountain of great fame and magnitude, leaning "upon the ſea, and well inhabited. It terminates to the land-"ward in the form of a peninſula, and makes an iſthmus of "about twelve ſtades in length, containing a plain with ſome "mixture of little hills from the coaſt of Acanthus to that of "Torone. On this iſthmus, which lies at the foot of mount "Athos, ſtands Sana a Grecian city; but Xerxes determined "to cut off from the continent all the other cities, which, "being built upon the mountain and beyond this place, were "Dion, Olophyxus, Achrotoon, Thyſus, and Cleone. The "operation was carried on in this manner; the barbarians "having drawn a line before the city of Sana, divided the "ground among the ſeveral nations, and when the trench was "conſiderably ſunk, thoſe who were in the bottom continued "to dig, and delivered the earth to men ſtanding upon lad-"ders, who handed the ſame again to ſuch as were placed "in a higher ſtation, till at laſt others who waited to re-"ceive the burden at the edge of the canal, carried it away "to another place; but by digging in a perpendicular man-"ner, and making the bottom of equal breadth with the top, "all the workmen, except the Phœnicians, drew double la-"bour upon themſelves, becauſe the earth, as is natural, "fell down continually in great quantities from the upper parts. yet, with the leave of theſe towering wits, men of cooler imaginations conceived it no impoſſible taſk to meaſure it. This

" they had a court of juſtice, and a market furniſhed with a " great abundance of corn brought over from Aſia. My con- " jectures lead me to think, that Xerxes undertook this enter- " prize upon a motive of oſtentation, in order to ſhew the " greatneſs of his power, and to perpetuate the memory of " his name; for tho' he might have cauſed his fleet to be con- " veyed over the land without much difficulty, yet he would " rather command the iſthmus to be cut, and a canal to be " made to receive the ſea of ſuch a breadth as might be ſuf- " ficient to carry two ſhips ſailing in front (22)." From Thucydides we learn, that the inhabitants of the five cities above-mentioned were barbarians, ſpeaking two tongues, that is, the Greek and a language of their own. Plutarch and Pliny have both written, that this mountain is ſo high, as to project its ſhade, when the ſun is in the ſummer ſolſtice, on the market-place of the city Myrrhina in the iſland of Lemnos. On account of this it is ſaid, that the inhabitants of this city erected a brazen calf at the termination of the ſhadow, on which was inſcribed this Monoſtic:

Ἄθως καλύψει πλευρὰ Λημνίας βοός.
Half Lemnos' calf doth Athos ſhadow hide.

Pliny aſſerts the diſtance between the foot of mount Athos and the iſland of Lemnos to be 87,000 paces. He does not tell us at what hour of the day this ſhadow was obſerved, yet this may be ſupplied by ſuppoſing it to have been a little before ſun-ſet, the ſun being then in the vertical circle, which paſſeth over Athos and Myrrhina; or rather it may be ſuppoſed two degrees higher, becauſe otherwiſe the ſhadow could not be ſo exactly obſerved in Lemnos (23). Theſe points ſettled, it will appear from the principles of trigonometry, that the altitude of Athos is thirty-two furlongs, which, however, is not very conſiſtent with the truth. The reaſon in all probability is, becauſe Pliny hath aſſigned too great a diſtance between the mountain and the iſland. The beſt maps we have make that diſtance but 55 Italian miles; which being aſſumed reduces it nearer the true height, viz. of eleven furlongs, or a little more (24). As to the the modern ſtate of this celebrated mountain, we cannot inform the reader better thereof, than by tranſlating the acurate deſcription of a French traveller: "As I ſtaid a good while "at Salonichi; and as that city is not far diſtant from Monte "Santo, which is mount Athos, ſo much celebrated by the "antient poets for its height, and ſo famous among the modern "Greeks for the monks and hermits reſiding thereon, I could "not be ſatisfied without going to ſee it. In the ſpace of a "few days I examined this wide and ſo-much talked of field "of wonders, leaving no part of it unexplored, no not even "the chapel on the ſummit, which is very little viſited. As "I aſcended, I found a good deal of ſnow; but as it was in "the fineſt ſeaſon of the year, (in the month of June) the ſun "began to operate upon it every-where, and to turn it into water. "Its ſummit is a perfect rock and abſolutely naked; but the "ſnow did not lie there ſo long as in the vallies. Paſſing "to the ſouth-ſide, we found it ſhady. Arriving at the chapel, "which was ſeated on a high rock, we were informed, that it was "conſecrated in memory of the transfiguration, and that on "the ſixth of Auguſt they ſung a ſolemn maſs in the preſence "of a multitude of people, who out of devotion remained there "all night. As to other things, we found them in pretty good "order, conſidering that it is a place not to be viſited but "in ſummer weather. The building too was well enough, "eſpecially if we conſider its ſituation, it being not a "little ſurprizing to find a chapel erected, where one can-"not ſtay a quarter of an hour without a great fire. That "which our geographers call Monte Santo comprehends not only "mount Athos, but the whole chain of mountains which unites "it to the continent of Macedonia. This chain is ſeven or "eight leagues long, and three or four broad, and it is true, that "the Greeks calls this ridge Oros Agion, or the holy mountain; "but when they ſpeak of mount Athos in particular, they call "it ſtill Athos. Of the twenty monaſteries erected in this ſo-"litude, there is but one, which ſtands on this mountain, and "that is dedicated to St. Laura, which is indeed richer and more "conſiderable than all the reſt; and it is owned, that from the "monks inhabiting therein, the reſt took the rule under which "they live. Theſe convents, generally ſpeaking, reſemble for-"treſſes rather than religious houſes. They are ſurrounded with "good walls, flanked with towers, or at leaſt ſurmounted by a "vaſt donjon, well furniſhed with artillery, and all things elſe

"neceſſary

Engliſh mile. Many geographers reckon this mountain to Theſſaly,

" neceſſary for defence. This is a very neceſſary precaution,
" conſidering their ſituation in the midſt of thieves. As theſe
" monaſteries are generally five or ſix ſtories high, the apart" ments in them are numerous and very large, but not over-well
" diſpoſed. They are covered with lead, which by the re-
" flexion of the ſun-beams ſhines like ſilver; and, all things con-
" ſidered, we may rather wonder at their being in ſo good ſtate, " than at their being in no better. Theſe monaſteries are in" dependent of each other in point of government; and tho' in " the center of theſe monaſteries there is an epiſcopal ſee in a " pretty large town called Kapirab, yet the monks pay no ſort
" of obedience to this biſhop. The cathedral, however, is
" ſtiled Acrotaton, i. e. the moſt high, and is ſerved by monks
" ſent by the ſuperiors of the reſpective convents for that pur" poſe. There is alſo on mount Athos a conſiderable church, " dedicated to St. Anne, where the Anchorites reſort for the " performance of their devotions at certain feſtivals, and other
" ſettled times. Theſe poor people are quite ſecluded from the " reſt of human race. They may be about ſixty in number,
" and live moſt of them alone; the reſt, two in a cell; they " live by the labour of their hands, as did the antient monks,
" and are under the direction of a chief, who is called Dicaios,
" i. e. the juſt; yet he himſelf is dependent on the monaſtery of " St. Laura, becauſe their cells are built on the ground belong" ing to that religious houſe. All the monaſteries have little " farms belonging to them, which are managed by certain " monks for the benefit of the houſe. All theſe religious, as " has been ſaid before, live under a common rule, which rule
" conſiſts chiefly in the ſtrict obſervance of the following points:
" 1. The keeping certain ſtated faſts, which they recommend " vehemently in their ſermons, and which, to do them juſtice,
" they recommend no leſs by the ſeverity with which they keep " them. 2. The paſſing whole nights in certain churches con-
" ſecrated to the honour of God, where they either make ſolemn
" prayers, or elſe join together in chanting pſalms, conforming
" herein to the practice of the antient church, in which theſe
" devotions were ſtiled Vigils. 3. They ſuffer no woman to ap" proach the holy mountain, which they carry yet farther, by " excluding all kind of animals of the feminine gender; and on " this principle they were wont alſo to cauſe their younger monks
" to be inſtructed in ſeparate houſes, as if youth itſelf had ſome-
" thing in it feminine (25)."

Theſſaly, but we think it belongs rather to Macedonia (H).

Woods, deſarts, &c.

We have heretofore obſerved, that the Scardian hills and mount Athos were well covered with woods; and indeed the whole kingdom of Macedonia, being every-where intermixed with mountains, hills, and riſing grounds, abounded with all ſorts of trees, which are valuable in Europe, either on account of timber, fruit, or ſhade. As to deſarts or large waſtes, we find not that there were any ſuch in antient times; on the contrary, it appears, that no part of Europe was more throughly peopled; but ſince it has been in the hands of the Turks, great part of it is become uninhabited, a thing not unfrequent in other parts of the Ottoman Empire.

The

(H) As Athos aſtoniſhed by its height and bulk, the mountain Olympus ſtruck the beholder with reverence by its amazing loftineſs, and at the ſame time invited his aſcent by the beauty and variety of proſpects which it afforded. The river Peneus, one of the cleareſt, gentleſt, and moſt beautiful ſtreams in the univerſe, ran at its foot, dividing it from Oſſa, and makeing a multitude of ſmall but charming iſles, covered with ſhady trees, and adorned with magnificent temples, grottoes, porticoes, and other ſtately buildings(26). Its height is certainly very great; but, as we obſerved above, not near ſo great as it was imagined by the antients. As to the notion of its being above the ſecond region of the air, it depended intirely upon a fact, viz. that letters traced on the aſhes of Jupiter's altar, remained unfaced for a long ſpace of time. This altar ſtood on the very ſummit of Olympus, and the god was worſhipped there with peculiar devotion. On the ſouth-eaſt ſide of the hill ran the famous river Helicon, and near it ſtood a noble temple of Jupiter, in the midſt of a ſhady grove. The mountains Oſſa and Pelion were in its neighbourhood, much ſpoken of in antient authors, and very conſiderable for their height, tho' they come far ſhort of Olympus. Deſiarchus Siculus, at the command of ſome of the neighbouring princes, meaſured mount Pelion with great exactneſs, and found it to be in height 1250 paces, or about an Italian mile and a half. It is now called Petras, and has ſome little forts on its ſides (27). There is ſome doubt amongſt geographers, whether this region ought to be reckoned to Macedonia or Theſſaly; but, as we make the river Peneus their common boundary, Olympus and the territory about it falls under our cognizance here.

Seas, rivers, lakes, &c.

THE peculiar happineſs of Macedonia, in having the ſea on each ſide of it, we have already remarked. It is our duty here, however, to be a little more particular. The Adriatic waſhes its weſtern coaſt, and, beſides the great haven of Epidamnus, now Durazzo, makes ſeveral ſafe ports, which are now moſt of them neglected. On the eaſt the Ægean ſea was ſtill more advantageous, opening to Macedonia not only the trade of Greece, but that of Aſia alſo; which commerce was eſpecially forwarded by the ſpacious bays every-where formed on the coaſt. Four of theſe were chiefly remarkable, viz. Sinus Strymonicus, having on its north ſide part of Thrace, and on the ſouth the long extending promontory of Athos, including in its boſom the iſland of Thaſus. It was called the Strymonic bay, becauſe the river Strymon ran there into the ſea. It is now called Golpho di Conteſſa. Sinus Singiticus, having on one ſide mount Athos, and on the other a long ſlip of land, once full of rich and populous towns, of which there is now no appearance; the bay therefore takes its preſent name from the neighbouring mountain, and is ſtiled Golpho di Monte Santo. Sinus Toronaicus, having the ridge of land before-mentioned on the one ſide, and part of the region Paraxia on the other. It received its old name from the city Torone, but is now called Golpho d' Aiomama. Sinus Thermaicus, having on the one ſide Macedonia, on the other, for the moſt part, Theſſaly. It is at leaſt ſixty miles in length, and received its name from the antient city Therma, called afterwards Theſſalonica, now Salonichi [f]. In ſpeaking of the rivers of Macedon, we will begin with thoſe which run into the Adriatic, and after ſpeak of ſuch as run into the Ægean ſea. Panyaſus riſes not far from the city. Pitheum, and, after a winding courſe of upwards of a hundred miles, from the ſouthern borders of Macedon to Epidamnus or Durazzo, near which it diſcharges itſelf into the Adriatic [g]. The Apſus, riſing not far from the city of Eordea, after a ſhort courſe of thirty miles, diſcharges itſelf about ten miles below the mouth of the Panyaſus. The Laous, called alſo Æas and Aous, has its ſource near the city of Antigonia, and, after a north-weſt courſe of forty miles, enters the Adriatic a little below the city of Apollonia. Celydnus or Pepylichus running from the Acroceraunian mountains directly into the Adriatic, would not be worthy of mention, if it were not regarded as the boundary between Macedon and Epirus. The rivers running into the Ægean ſea are, The Aliacmon; it riſes in the mountains lying above the city Elymea, and running for ſome time parallell to the Panyaſus, after a courſe of ſeventy miles almoſt due eaſt, enters the bay of Theſſalonica, between the cities of Pydna and Dium. The Erigon riſes in the country of the Lynceſtæ, and running directly north about thirty miles, turns then to the eaſt, and declining by degrees to the ſouth, falls, after a farther courſe of forty miles, into a lake formed by the waters of the river Axius, and with them runs into the ſea. The Axius, which is by far the greateſt river in Macedon, riſes from two fountains in the Scardian mountains, and, after a courſe of eighty miles, it ſpreads itſelf into a large and noble lake below the city of Edeſſa, and having received the Erigon there, falls into the bay of Theſſalonica almoſt over-againſt that city. The river Strymon riſes in Thrace, and rolling with a rapid ſtream almoſt directly ſouth, after a courſe of ſeventy miles, it enters by two broad and deep mouths that bay, which from it was ſtiled the Strymonic. This river was the antient boundary of Macedon towards Thrace; but Philip the father of Alexander took in all the country between it and the river Neſtus, or, as ſome write it, Meſtus; which, running almoſt parallel to the river Strymon, falls into the ſame bay near the city of Abdera, about forty miles diſtant from the mouths of the Strymon. Smaller rivers there are many, ſuch as the Cidorus, Aſtræus, Pontus, &c. As to lakes, beſides thoſe formed by the overflowing of the river Strymon, and the junction of the rivers Axius and Erigon, there is almoſt in the heart of Macedon, not far from the Candavian mountains, a large and famous lake called the lake of Lychnidus, or the lake of Preſpa. There is another famous lake in the province of Mygdonia, and another near the antient city of Sintia, called afterwards Heraclea Sintica. As for ſprings and fountains, they are innumerable; ſuch as on account of their properties are remarkable, we ſhall mention elſewhere.

[f] Cluver. Geogr. l. iv. Cellar. Geog. Antiq. l. ii. c. 13

The climate, ſoil, produce, riches, &c.

The air of Macedonia is, generally ſpeaking, clear, ſharp, and wholeſome, inſomuch, that people live there commonly commonly to a very great age. This is eaſily accounted for, when we conſider, that it lies in the middle of the north temperate zone, and in the ſixth and ſeventh climates, its longeſt day containing about fifteen hours. The ſoil is everywhere tolerable, in moſt places fruitful, on the ſea-coaſt eſpecially abounding with corn, wine, and oil, and indeed with every thing that could be deſired either for the uſe or convenience of men; but the principal riches of Macedonia conſiſted in its mines, of which it had many, and of almoſt all kind of metals, but of gold particularly. In Pieria under its antient kings there were found large quantities of this precious metal in the ſand, in lumps of conſiderable bigneſs [h]. There were alſo gold mines in the country between Theſſalonica and Stagira, which mines are ſaid to have been wrought by the Turk; but by far the moſt conſiderable were in the mountain Pangæus, which king Philip added to his dominions. The Thaſians, inhabitants of a little iſland lying in the Strymonic bay, had rendered themſelves very conſiderable by the wealth they drew from them. This made the Athenians ſo covetous of this tract of country, which, after many expeditions and much a-do, they attained, and loſt it to the Thracians afterwards. Philip drove them out, and having rebuilt the antient city of Crenides in a magnificent manner, called it by his own name Philippi; and carefully eſtabliſhing perſons ſkilful in the art of refining there, he made much greater advantage of thoſe mines than any of their former poſſeſſors had done; nay, it is ſaid, that he obtained the empire of Greece chiefly by means of the treaſures extracted hence; which muſt appear very probable, if what Diodorus tells us be true, that he received annually a thouſand talents of gold [i]. The Romans when they reduced Macedonia into a province, reſtrained the inhabitants from digging or refining gold or ſilver, leaving them at liberty, however, to manufacture any other metal [k].

As there are not in Macedonia any animals peculiar thereto, we are under no neceſſity of entering into a detail of thoſe common to it and to the reſt of Greece; we ſhall content ourſelves therefore with mentioning only one thing which is very remarkable, and that is the abundance of horſes which were in Macedonia under its antient princes. Animals.

This

[h] Ariſtot. de met. [i] Diodor. Sicul. l. xvi. [k] Tit. Liv. l. xliv.

This will be ſet in a clear light by a ſingle fact: There were kept in the royal ſtud near Pella three hundred ſtone-horſes and thirty thouſand mares [l]. It is evident from hence, that it was the military prudence of the Macedonian kings which determined them to place their hopes not in horſe but in foot, which might be ſerviceable in all countries, whereas cavalry could act only in plains. Their inordinate love of hunting engaged them, however, to keep up ſo large a breed of horſes, which were excellent in their nature, fleet, high-metled ſtrong-hooſed, and able to ſubſiſt on very little and very ordinary provender. We need not wonder therefore, that the Macedonian armies were ſo terrible, when their horſe were extraordinary good, and their foot excellent.

Rarities. As to the rarities of Macedonia, which, according to the order obſerved in this work, ought to cloſe the deſcription, we will begin with the Pierian hills and ſhades, which, on account of their lovely verdure and pleaſant ſolitude, were ſtiled the habitations of the muſes, who thence alſo were called Pierides. Amongſt them roſe the fountain Pimplia, from whence they were called Pimpliades [m]. Vitruvius tells us, that near the ſepulchre of Euripides there flowed from a fountain waters of ſo poiſonous a nature, as if ſwallowed brought on immediate and inevitable death [n]. A modern traveller informs us, that in paſſing mount Jougous, which ſeems to be part of that ridge formerly called the Scardian mountains, he found a certain flower, which he takes to be a kind of Lunaria major, which produced, as he apprehended, a ſtem or button according to the increaſe of the moon, till thoſe buttons equalled the days of the month's age. He brought ſome roots and ſeeds of this flower with him into France, that this curioſity might be more leiſurely obſerved and conſidered [o]. We might add to theſe abundance of other curioſities, if we could give credit to all the fragments of natural hiſtory left us by the antients, or to the ordinary collections on the ſame ſubject which have been made by the moderns; but as many of theſe relations are apparently abſurd, many more very injudiciouſly recited, and the authorities in moſt caſes but very weak, we ſhall content ourſelves with reporting theſe, and ſo conclude a chapter, wherein the reader hath at leaſt a more complete deſcription of Macedonia than he he can find elſe-where ; for tho' its kings ſubdued ſo great a part of the known world, yet hath no hiſtorian, antient or modern, written explicitly of this country ; but have contented themſelves with brief and general deſcriptions, ſuch as might ſuit well enough with the form of their hiſtories, but were abſolutely incompatible with the nature of this, which is univerſal, not in title and ſhew only, but in a particular conſideration of all the kingdoms, empire, and ſtates treated therein.

SECT. II.

Of the antiquity, government, cuſtoms, laws, manners, and military diſcipline of the Macedonians.

The Macedonians originally Argives.

IT has been hitherto obſerved that Macedonia was originally inhabited by many nations. In our geographical deſcriptions, we have recorded their names, pointed out their ſeats, and delivered whatever remarkable paſſages we could find about them in antient authors. Thoſe from whom that race ſprung, which from ſmall beginnings became lords of Greece and afterwards of the world, were Argives. Under the leading of Caranus, who was deſcended from Hercules by his ſon Temenus, they came into this country, and with their ſwords carved out themſelves fair poſſeſſions[a]. By degrees they enlarged their dominions, not more by their valour than by their prudence and condeſcenſion ; for erecting no trophies after victories, and treating thoſe they ſubdued with the tenderneſs of brethren they vanquiſhed not only their perſons but their minds ; and thus taking away all diſtinctions, they in time reduced various tribes into one nation, which of courſe became too potent for its neighbours, and continually made incroachments upon them, unleſs reſtrained by their united force, or the fear of provoking the Perſian monarch, or ſome of the moſt powerful Greek republics. As the Macedonians, whoſe hiſtory we are now writing, were compoſed of many nations nations mixed with each other, and as all thoſe nations were remarkable for bravery, hardineſs, and contempt of luxury, it is eaſy to conceive, that the Macedonians were not unlike them. If we were to follow the method hitherto uſed, we ſhould be obliged to repeat many things already ſaid of the Greeks; to avoid which, and at the ſame time to deliver all that the reader can expect under this ſection for clearing the ſubſequent hiſtory, we ſhall reduce what we have to offer under three general heads. The firſt ſhall regard the government of Macedon and the adminiſtration of its princes: The ſecond the cuſtoms of the people religious and civil: The third their military diſcipline.

Their form of government.

THE Macedonians had always kings; yet under their adminiſtration they preſerved as great or greater liberty than was enjoyed under moſt of the Grecian commonwealths [b]. Their monarchs ruled, but they ruled according to law, or rather according to the maxims of natural equity, and did not commit any flagrant injuſtice merely to gratify their wills. This was the original conſtitution, and it may be ſaid to the glory of this nation, that it was not ſubverted but with the kingdom. On this account Lucian introducing Philip and Alexander in his dialogues, makes the former call the Macedonians, Freemen [c]. In caſes where the puniſhment was capital, the cauſe was heard by the army or by the people; and, till they condemned the party, the king did not pretend to put him to death. We ſhall meet with many inſtances of this in the reign of Alexander, who maintained the cuſtoms of his native ſoil when far from it, and did not think, that all his victories could releaſe him from the obligations he was under of acting according to the conſtitution of his country. When in his paſſion he killed Clitus, he on recollection would have puniſhed himſelf with death, if the army had not interfered and taken his guilt upon them [d]. Polybius informs us, that when king Philip, the laſt but one of the Macedonian princes, had cauſed Leontius, whom he ſuſpected of conſpiring againſt him, to be ſeized, a body of targeteers, who were advanced before the army, ſent deputies to deſire that he might not be proceeded againſt till they ſhould rejoin it, that the king might not ſeem to have no regard for them or their ſentiments [e]. It is true the ſame author tells us, that that the king provoked by this meſſage, put Leontius ſooner to death than he would have done; but he excuſed himſelf from the neceſſity of the thing, and puniſhed the reſt of the conſpirators after the antient manner, By verdict of the army. It is not to be concluded from hence, that the Macedonians were always jealous of their liberties, and quarrelling with their princes about them, for that was not the caſe. They did not call themſelves a free people, but acknowledged that they were ſubject to their prince; yet with this hope, that he would govern them as he ought, which when he did, they were moſt loyal; but were not ſo obedient, when he digreſſed from the paths of reaſon: They clamoured loudly at Alexander, when he began to affect the eaſtern mode of governing, nor would they be reconciled to him by gifts and fair ſpeeches, but ſhewed a viſible diſlike, not of the king, but of ſuch actions as he committed unworthy of his royal dignity [f]. The throne was hereditary, and continued in the race of Caranus till the ſlaughter of Alexander's family; but it does not appear, that the Macedonians were very ſtrict as to the ſucceſſion, ſo it was of the royal houſe, though generally ſpeaking the eldeſt ſon ſucceeded. The antient kings of Macedon were very modeſt in the enſigns of their dignity; for Alexander the Great ſeems to have been the firſt who wore a diadem and rich robes of ſtate; which, however, he transferred to his ſucceſſors, yet the old kings had what was ſufficient to diſtinguiſh them from their ſubjects, ſplendour, armour, and a chair of ſtate [g]. The generality of the people were always wonderfully loyal and not only chearfully obeyed, but were zealouſly addicted to the ſervice of, their prince; nay, they ſeem to have carried their affection towards his perſon too far, by making a law, or elſe adopting it from the Perſians, that not only conſpirators, but all who were related to them, ſhould be put to death, with which, however, Alexander diſpenſed [h]. Their love for their princes, however, did not carry them into any indecent or idolatrous ſubmiſſion, when they approached them; on the contrary, they converſed with them freely, and ſaluted them with a kiſs [i]. When therefore Alexander would have introduced the Perſian cuſtom of adoring him, the Macedonians were extremely diſpleaſed, and did not forbear declaring their ſentiments, timents, that reverence was due to kings, but adoration to the gods [k]. In point of marriage the Macedonian kings seem not to have been very strict; for it appears from history, that they had frequently many wives, and concubines not a few [l]. In the education of their children they were exceedingly strict; their sons were brought up under the best masters in the love and knowledge of all things great and glorious; their daughters in the practice of all things virtuous. What Alexander said to Sisygambis will better demonstrate this than any description; Mother, the robe I have on was not only the gift of my sister, but the work of her hands [m]. In the conduct of their affairs the kings of Macedon were remarkably moderate, and behaved with the greatest prudence; they did not affect magnificent entertainments, but eat plainly with their friends. They admitted all sorts of persons to their presence, and by a continual habit of business made themselves at once necessary and agreeable to their subjects [n]. Hunting was their chief diversion, and Alexander was so addicted to it, that he would follow it for a whole day without taking refreshment [o]. These princes were generally speaking learned, or at least favourers of learned men. Archelaus was the great patron of Euripides, and not only honoured him living, but mourned for him when dead. Philip the father of Alexander was one of the best speakers of his age; he was generous to such men of learning as sought his friendship, because he thought himself honoured thereby; and he pardoned libellers, because he would not punish wit even in an enemy [p]. If his son Alexander had not been the most active prince in the world, he would have been celebrated for being the most knowing [q]. As in the ordinary occurrences of life the kings of Macedon did not affect that pomp which in those days was frequent enough with princes, so in the most solemn acts of their administration they preserved such a modest decorum as rather endeared than awed their subjects. They heard causes in person, and suffered those who pleaded before them to speak with the utmost freedom. Thus, when Philip after drinking drinking hard had decided contrary to right againſt a poor woman, ſhe cried out, I appeal. To whom, ſaid the king? Why, replied ſhe, from Philip, with his head diſturbed by the fumes of wine, to Philip, when he ſhall be ſober and in his right ſenſes [r]. Which the king received as a juſt rebuke, and without the leaſt reſentment. This cuſtom by a felicity peculiar to this people continued as long as they had kings; for Livy tells of Perſeus, the very laſt of them, that, after the manner of his anceſtors, he ſat in an ivory chair, and heard all ſorts of cauſes, even thoſe which were of little conſequence [s]. The kings of Macedon ſpoke even to private ſoldiers with great freedom and condeſcenſion; they took as much care of them as if they had been their children, or at leaſt their intimate friends, and ſuch of them as were ſlain in the wars were always carefully interred with all military honours. Such as behaved themſelves with extraordinary valour were honoured with particular marks of diſtinction; and it is eſpecially recorded of Alexander the Great, that he ſuffered no one to go without a juſt recompence of his merit [t]. The great men of the kingdom were honoured with the titles of the king's friends and counſellors, nor were they ſo in name only, but in reality; they gave their advice as ſtateſmen, but they gave it with all the freedom the moſt intimate friendſhip ſhould confer [u]. Hephæſtion the friend of Alexander was not afraid even of the reſentment of the queen mother, anſwering her angry letters with a manly freedom, telling her, that, ſecure in his innocence, he was in no pain from her threats, ſince Alexander was to judge of all things [x]. And that this was not peculiar to Hephæſtion or Alexander, we may gueſs from the obſervation in Juſtin, That the friends of the Macedonian kings were not only companions in war, but aſſociates in empire [z]. They were allowed to wear purple, were intruſted with armies without inſtruction, and when the Macedonian greatneſs triumphed over kingdoms, they were appointed governors of them with the court and ſtate of kings [a]. The king's life-guard, which conſiſted but of a ſmall number, was

was a poſt of high honour; Oxathres the brother of Darius was received into this number: Beſides theſe there were other houſhold troops, the commanders of which were not only honourable perſons, but even the private men, who, as occaſion ſerved, were from thence preferred to great commands [b]. With reſpect to civil officers, we find that the king's ſecretaries were very much conſidered; they not only drew up orders, but ſaw them executed [c]. The king's ſeal, or ſignet, which was on his ring, remained generally ſpeaking in his own cuſtody; but ſometimes he delivered it for ſpecial purpoſes to one of his own friends, becauſe whatever was ſealed therewith was by the Macedonians held ſacred and inviolable. Alexander, when dying, delivered his ſignet to Perdiccas, which was thought to explain an expreſſion he had before made uſe of, that the government ſhould be inveſted in the moſt worthy. Not that he meant to diſinherit his own family, but that by this act he conſtituted Perdiccas protector of the kingdom; and in this ſenſe Perdiccas underſtood it, when in the preſence of the Macedonians he deſired to decline that mighty load of buſineſs, which the king in his laſt moments would have laid upon his ſhoulders [d]. The royal phyſicians were highly conſidered in the court of Macedon, and were treated by their maſters as if they had been their intimate friends [e]. When the kings were ſick, the whole nation made prayers and vows for their recovery, the meaneſt people ſhewing the ſame ſorrow in their looks, their habits, and their ſpeeches, as if their neareſt relations were on their death-beds [f]. When Alexander lay ill at Babylon, the grief of the ſoldiers ſome days before his death was ſo tumultuous, that he condeſcended to ſhew himſelf, and, notwithſtanding his great weakneſs, extended his hand and ſuffered every one of them to kiſs it [g]. After their deaths the Macedonian kings were interred in the royal ſepulchre, built by Argeus at the command of his father Perdiccas, with this aſſurance, that while the kings were buried there, his race ſhould never fail, and after their interment the people mourned for them as for their common parents [h]. Such was the eaſy, ſuch the excellent conſtitution of Macedon, ſuch the paternal piety of its princes, princes, and ſuch the filial obedience of their people. Let us now proceed to the ſecond head.

The cuſtoms of the Macedonians religious and civil.

THE Macedonians in point of religion followed the opinions embraced by the reſt of the Greeks, worſhipping many gods, and indulging a vaſt variety of vain and ridiculous rites. Jupiter, Hercules, and Diana were eſpecially reverenced by them, the firſt as their protector; the ſecond as the patron of the brave; the laſt as the goddeſs of hunting, to which they were univerſally addicted [i]. As they were ſtrict in their morals, ſo according to the mode of thoſe times they were very religious. Their princes diſdained not to act on ſpecial occaſions as prieſts, and to offer ſacrifices for themſelves and their people. All the hiſtorians who have wrote of the life of Alexander agree in furniſhing us with many inſtances of his devotion, not only in ſacrifices, but in erecting altars, inſtituting games, dedicating ſtatues, and many other things. Omens were greatly heeded by this people; two eagles fluttering the whole day over the royal palace when Olympias was in labour was conſtrued to portend, that the two empires of Europe and Aſia would center in the child of which ſhe was then delivered [k]. Many other inſtances of a like nature, occur in the hiſtory, as the reader will obſerve; and therefore we need not anticipate them here.

IN their ordinary manner of living this nation was remarkably temperate; but when they feaſted, they were always magnificent, and loved to eat well and drink hard. Caranus the king of Macedon is recorded to have made a marriage-feaſt remarkably ſplendid [l], and the ſame taſte appeared in his ſucceſſors, particularly in Philip, who was a prince of high ſpirit. At theſe feaſts the young men were admitted to ſit down as ſoon as they had killed a wild boar fairly, that is with their ſpears, without toils or nets [m]. From their very infancy they were accuſtomed to ride, to hunt, and as ſoon as they were able to go into the field. At their banquets no women were admitted, and it was an inviolable rule with them, that nothing ſaid at them ſhould be repeated. At marriage-feaſts they had an extraordinary cuſtom, a piece of bread was cut in two with a ſword, one part of which was given to the bridegroom, and the

the other to the bride, which had no doubt some concealed meaning [n]. Their captives they made use of as concubines, but it was held dishonourable to marry them; yet Alexander broke through this by his marriage with Roxana, and numbers followed his example. It is certain his victories changed the manners of his soldiers as well as his own; for whereas before they were content with plain and light arms, they afterwards adorned themselves with the spoils of the vanquished, and became not only well, but richly, clad, at the expence of the Persians [o].

Little versed in maritime affairs.

In affairs of government we have shewn them to be wise and prudent; in one thing, however, they were very defective, viz. in their care of maritime affairs, which, notwithstanding the great advantages they had, they neither practised nor understood, as is evident from the accounts we have of Alexander's fleets and naval expeditions, and the fright and terror his seamen were under at every new sight they saw [p]. We can account for this no otherwise, than from their being continually engaged in wars with their neighbours upon the continent, and having their ports at the same time either in the hands of, or blocked up by, the maritime powers of Greece. Philip, who first freed his country from these inconveniencies, had not time to think of naval affairs before he was cut off by an immature death; his successor, amongst other great designs he had formed, had that of settling and increasing his fleets in his mind when he died at Babylon [q]. Whatever contributed to make them strong and warlike was particularly affected by the Macedonians, which was the true reason why hunting was their great exercise and prime diversion; besides this, they were addicted to all the Grecian exercises, particularly wrestling and boxing, for which sports there was a place set apart in all their camps, and their commanders, when the business of the war allowed them leisure, diverted themselves with seeing the activity of their soldiers in these exercises [r]. They also practised a kind of military dancing, which was at once both pleasant and wonderfully graceful [s].

Their laws.

We have already ſaid, that their laws conſiſted only in the decrees of their princes, which were, however, founded on the principles of natural equity, or otherwiſe would have expoſed him, whoſe deciſions they were, to the hatred and ill-will of his ſubjects. We have likewiſe obſerved, that in capital caſes judgment was given by the people of the army; here it will be fit for us to obſerve, that the accuſed was always ſuffered to defend himſelf with the utmoſt freedom, though even at his trial he appeared bound in a habit of diſtreſs and without any enſigns of dignity, let his quality be what it would. In doubtful caſes the torture was permitted without any reſpect to birth or former ſervices, of which we ſhall find frequent inſtances in the hiſtory of Alexander, whoſe reign, as it was tinged purple with the blood of his enemies, ſo it was alſo ſtained with the gore of his countrymen. The puniſhments among them were of different kinds; ſometimes the criminal was thruſt through with darts, at other times crucified with his head downwards: Sometimes they were thrown chained into rivers; yet theſe ſeem to have been either foreign cuſtoms or puniſhments inflicted in extraordinary caſes; that which was moſt frequent, and which conſequently ſeems to have been legal, was ſtoning [t] to death, wherein the army, as they had been made judges, were executioners, which perhaps was no ill expedient to prevent raſh judgments.

The Macedonian kalendar.

The Macedonian year, or, as it is uſually called, the Greek year, to diſtinguiſh it from the Attic year, was compoſed of twelve months; but as to the number of days in each of theſe months and the method of the Macedonian kalendar, there are great diſputes, we ſhall ſet down the ſcheme of the judicious archbiſhop Uſher, and ſhall inform the learned and inquiſitive reader where he may receive further ſatisfaction in a note [u].

A Table of the Macedonian Months.

Dius conſiſted of thirty days, the firſt of which anſwered to the 24th of September, the laſt to the 23d of October.

[u] Uſſerii, Diſſertatio, &c.

Apellacus, containing thirty days, the first of which answered to the 24th of October, the last to the 22d of November.

Audynaeus, consisted of thirty-one days, the first answering to the 23d of November, the last to the 23d of December.

Peritius, containing thirty days, the first answering to the 24th of December, the last to the 22d of January.

Dystrus, consisting of thirty days, the first answering to the 23d of January, the last to the 21st of February.

Xanthicus, containing thirty-one days, the first answering to the 22d of February, the last to the 24th of March, excepting the intercalated year, when it answered to the 23d. In this month there was a lustration solemnly performed, which from the name of the month was called Xanthica, in this manner: They divided a bitch in the middle, laying one side with the entrails on their right hand, the other on the left; between marched the army in battalia, and after they had passed, they separated into two corps, and maintained a mock fight.

Artemisius, consisting of thirty-one days, the first answering to the 25th of March, and the last to the 24th of April.

Daesius, containing thirty days, the first answering to the 25th of April, the last to the 24th of May; This month the Macedonians held to be extremely unfortunate, which Alexander observing, and knowing how dangerous superstition is, when strongly seated in vulgar minds, he as a remedy in the present case decreed, that this month should not be for the future called Daesius, but by a repetition of the name of the former month, called it the second Artemisius.

Panemus, consisting of thirty-one days, the first answering to the 25th of May, the last to the 24th of June.

Lous, containing thirty days, the first answering to the 25th of June, the last to the 24th of July.

Gorpiachus, consisting of thirty-one days, the first answering to the 25th of July, the last to the 24th of August.

Hyperberetaes, containing thirty days, the first answering to the 25th of August, the last to the 23d of September.

THUS the Macedonian year conſiſted of ſeven even months, that is of months of thirty days each, making in all two hundred and ten days, and of five unequal months conſiſting of thirty-one days each, making in all a hundred and fifty-five days, together three hundred and ſixty-five days; but every fourth year the month Hyperberetaes, conſiſted of thirty one days, which anſwered the end of our leap year (A).

As there were very rich mines in Macedonia, ſo under ſeveral kings there were great variety both of ſilver and gold pieces coined; of the latter ſort were the Philippics, ſo called from bearing the buſt of Philip the father of Alexander, which are ſo often mentioned in antient authors, and were for a long time the moſt current money in Greece; and ſuch were many others, deſcriptions of which are to be found among the writings of antiquaries, as ſome of the pieces are yet extant in the cabinets of the curious. There is a ſingularity in the Macedonian coins, which ought not to Their coin

(A) Lalamnatius wrote three diſſertations on the antient methods of computing time, the ſecond of which relates only to the Macedonian year, which he tells us conſiſted only of twelve months, making Xanticus the firſt, and Dyſtrus the laſt. One half of theſe months he aſſerts to have conſiſted of twenty-nine days, and the other half of thirty; taken together, the Macedonian year according to him conſiſted of 354 days; to reconcile which to the ſolar year, at the end of each third year they intercalated a month of thirty-three days. He does not attempt to ſupport all he ſays by authorities, but contents himſelf with laying them down as matters of fact. The very learned and judicious primate Uſher in his excellent work, intitled, A Diſſertation on the Macedonian and Aſiatic ſolar year, has examined this matter to the bottom; and, with all the ſkill of a learned aſtronomer and all the knowledge of a critic in the Greek literature, hath made this matter as plain as can be made, ſupporting every thing which he advances by reaſon and authority; to him therefore we have adhered in this hitherto intricate matter, and to his moſt excellent treatiſe we muſt refer the inquiſitive reader for a perfect account of the conſtruction of the Macedonian kalendar (1).

to be paſſed over, and it is this; they not only bear the buſts and inſcriptions of the princes under whom they were coined, but alſo the names of the cities in which they were coined, and the figures in their reverſes frequently refer to thoſe cities [x].

Their language.

The Macedonian tongue differed very much from the Greek, that is, from all the ſeveral dialects of that language, as is evident from Strabo [y] and Athenæus [z]; but eſpecially from Curtius in his account of the proceedings againſt Philotas; from whence it is clear, that the natives of Greece, who ſerved in Alexander's army, were not able to underſtand a diſcourſe delivered in the Macedonian tongue [a].

Their military diſcipline.

We come laſt of all to the military diſcipline of the Macedonians, which was their peculiar glory, and which raiſed them from a mean and obſcure people to be lords of Greece. They were in their firſt beginning obſtinately brave, as well as naturally warlike; by degrees they acquired knowledge in diſcipline, and became at laſt invincible from a happy mixture of ſuperior courage with ſuperior ſkill. We are indebted for theſe obſervations to Polybius, an author of equal character for veracity and penetration, who, in his deſcription of the military virtues of the Macedonians, does them all the juſtice that the beſt of writers could afford the braveſt men [b]. But it may be objected, if the Macedonians were always ſo fierce and ſo unconquerable a nation, how came they to be ſo long under the dominion of the Perſians, to be awed by the Illyrians, Thracians, and other neighbouring nations, and to be tributary to the Athenians even to the time of Philip? The reader will find an anſwer to all this in the courſe of the ſucceeding hiſtory, whence it will appear, that theſe ſo many obſtacles placed in the way of the Macedonian greatneſs from the natural ſituation of things, againſt which they continually ſtruggled, and in the end overcame them all. True it is, that the Macedonians were often leſs powerful, though never leſs brave than their neighbours, that till the time of Philip they were far from being rich, and that till his reign they had not either ſhewn hopes or ambition of aſſuming the ſovereignty of Greece; but when once the genius of their prince had opened a path path to the empire, they ſeconded his efforts by undertaking chearfully the moſt arduous expeditions, and undergoing in order to their accompliſhment the ſevereſt diſcipline. War from this time forward was the buſineſs of the whole nation, inſomuch, that the youth of Alexander's army were not only bred but born in the camp; but it is neceſſary for us to be more particular, and therefore we will ſubdivide the remaining part of this head into five conſiderations.

THE firſt ſhall relate to the choice of the army, that is, the troops of which it was made up; and theſe, after the Macedonian kings became conſiderable, were, firſt, their natural-born ſubjects; ſecondly, their allies; and thirdly, mercenaries. The natural Macedonians ſerved at their own expence, and contented themſelves with the ſpoil of their enemies [c]. The allies were compoſed of the reſpective quotas of Theſſaly, Pæonia, and other dependent provinces, as alſo of the auxiliary troops furniſhed by Greece after the kings of Macedonia were elected captains general [d]. The mercenaries were ſoldiers of fortune, who never inquired the cauſe, if they ſtood in no doubt about their pay [e] When Alexander marched on his grand expedition, his infantry conſiſted of thirteen thouſand Macedonians, ſeven thouſand auxiliaries, and five thouſand mercenaries [f]. The Theſſalians furniſhed, generally ſpeaking, horſe, and there were alſo many troops of Macedonian cavalry; their diſcipline was ſtrict, for in caſe the private men loſt their horſes, either by ſickneſs, or in action, their officers were obliged to furniſh others out of their own ſtables, if they had any in them, from an old-faſhioned notion, that the good of the public was to be preferred to the pomp of private men [g]. Their ſoldiers, how choſen.

SECONDLY, let us ſpeak of the order of the Macedonian troops; the foot were compoſed of three ſorts, viz. the light-armed [h], the Peltaſtæ, who were better armed [i], and the heavy-armed ſoldiers, of whom the phalanx was compoſed [k]. Theſe troops were ſuited to all ſorts of enterprizes; for if a poſt was to be attacked ſuddenly, the light-armed foot were employed; if ſteadily, and in expectation pectation of an obſtinate reſiſtance, then the Peltaſtæ or targeteers were ſent; the heavy armed foot were generally drawn up in the center of the army in a ſquare body, which was called the phalanx [l]. Polybius tells us, that it conſiſted of ſixteen in flank and five hundred in front, all pikemen, the ſoldiers ſtanding ſo cloſe, that the pikes of the fifth rank reached their points beyond the front of the battle. It is evident from hence that the pikes of the laſt ranks were of no uſe according to this diſpoſition; they had, however, an excellent remedy for this, which was thus; the hindermoſt ranks leaned the pikes on the ſhoulders of thoſe who were before them, and locking them faſt preſſed briſkly againſt them when they made the charge, ſo that the five firſt ranks had the impetus of the whole phalanx, which was the reaſon why its ſhock was, generally ſpeaking, irreſiſtible [m]. It is not very clear into what corps the groſs of the Macedonian infantry was divided; but that they were divided into many ſmall bodies, is apparent. But as in all wars the king was commander in chief, ſo, generally ſpeaking, he had the greateſt trouble upon his hands; for in camp, in ſieges, and in battles, he went every-where, and directed all things, affecting neither in pomp of habit, in eaſineſs of life, or by a large train, to diſtinguiſh himſelf from other commanders, but, on the contrary, fared as meanly as any of his ſoldiers, and exceeded them in his labours; nor is this to be underſtood only of Philip and Alexander, thoſe great and ſhining lights in the Macedonian empire, but of their predeceſſors and ſucceſſors alſo; the laſt Philip is recorded by Livy to have trod the ſame ſteps, and to have diſdained, that either the luſtre of empire, or the load of upwards of threeſcore years, ſhould excuſe him from any part of that fatigue which he required of the meaneſt Macedonian [n]. Happy nation, in which the royal diadem was known and revered, not from the ſplendor of its jewels, but of the virtues of him who wore it!

Their arms. THIRDLY, we will conſider the arms of the Macedonians offenſive and defenſive. At firſt their targeteers were furniſhed only with wooden bucklers, or ſuch as were made with a kind of wicker; but in proceſs of time they had them of leather and braſs, as we learn from a ſpeech of Alexander's, [l] Arrian. & Curt. mult. in locis. [m] See Potter's Archæol. vol. ii. lib. iii. [n] Arrian. lib. v. Tit. Liv. lib. xlii. c. 58.

Alexander's, when his ſoldiers were about to mutiny, wherein he reproaches them with their being in a manner naked, in his father's time, being furniſhed only with wooden arms and bucklers made of hurdles [o]. It is a difficult thing to write clearly on this ſubject after Curtius, becauſe he uſes words as ſynonymous which have very different ſignifications. Arrian therefore is a better guide; from him we diſcover, that the Macedonians had a large ſtrong ſhield called in Greek Aſpis, and a ſmall light buckler called Pelte, the former belonging to the heavy-armed troops, the latter to thoſe who were between the heavy and light-armed, who were from thence called Peltaſtæ or Targeteers [p]. As to the Macedonian ſwords, we do not find that they differed from thoſe of the reſt of the Greeks; they were made both for puſhing and cutting, as will appear from various incidents in the ſucceeding hiſtory; their hilts were wrought in various forms, and that pretty early, as appears from the murder of Philip the father of Alexander, which was performed by Pauſanias with a ſword, on the hilt of which was engraven a chariot drawn by four horſes; the Macedonians alſo made uſe of daggers; as to their ſpears, they were of different kinds, viz. long and ſhort; the former were uſed by the ſoldiers compoſing the phalanx, and were ſometimes ſixteen, at the leaſt fourteen, cubits, or one and twenty feet in length; the ſhorter ſpear was uſed by the light armed troops [q]. The head-piece was made of a raw oxe's hide, that is, untanned, we may ſuppoſe, for the ſake of its toughneſs; Livy ſpeaks of horns to it. 'Tis very probable that theſe were the wings of a double creſt, one of which, as Plutarch tells us, was ſtruck from the head-piece of Alexander at the battle of Granicus. They had alſo breaſt-plates made of linen quilted to a proper thickneſs, and a particular kind of military ſhoe [r]. The horſemen wore the ſame defenſive arms as the foot, except that their bucklers were lighter and ſmaller and their ſpears ſhorter. All theſe things were well contrived for the times in which they were uſed; and it is obſervable, that the Roman authors all ſpeak of the Macedonian diſcipline as very complete, and acknowledge that the phalanx was almoſt an equal match for the legion.

FOURTHLY, let us turn our thoughts on the Macedonian armies when in the field. The phalanx was drawn up

Their diſcipline in the field.

[o] Curt. x. c. 2. [p] Arrian. lib. iv. [q] Polyb. Eclog. xvii. [r] Crophii. antiquitat. Macedon. lib. iii. c. 4.

up generally in the centre; the horse and light-armed troops in two lines on the right and left. In all engagements the phalanx marched slowly, but was particularly quick in its motions; that is to say, it did not press precipitately upon the enemy, but receiving its orders from the king, took what form he directed, sometimes extending itself in front, at others deepening its files till it had the shape of a wedge, fighting steadily and obstinately, till the force of the enemy was intirely broken, who were then pursued by the light-armed forces and the horse, the phalanx remaining in the field of battle, and carefully preventing the enemy's reassembling their troops [s]. It is not evident from any of the antient historians, that the phalanx was divided into very small corps; a phalanx of sixteen thousand men consisted but of ten battalions; and as they were seldom intended to march in separate bodies, there was no great occasion for those subdivisions which were in use in other armies [t]. When the armies drew near, the charge was sounded by trumpets; after which the king or general was wont to make an oration, exhorting the people to consider the glory which their ancestors had won, and to shew themselves worthy of such ancestors by their own conduct. Curtius tells us, that after the fight was begun, as often as occasion offered, the king addressed himself to the army, and endeavoured by all means to excite them to the performance of great things [u]. If the soldiers were pleased with the king's speech, then they signified it by the clashing of their arms; but if it did not effect them, then they remained silent. When they charged, they cried out, Alala, Alala, a word which has no proper signification; but may be properly enough rendered into English by a word used to the same purpose, viz. Huzza. Lastly, when they desired quarter, their method was to hold their spears aloft in the air [x].

In the fifth place, their general discipline, or rather the Macedonian art of war, falls under our cognizance. With respect to the hardiness, frugality, and good order of the Macedonian troops, all authors are agreed; and though, it may be, their discipline was in some measure relaxed, when Alexander distributed amongst them the spoils of the east, yet by degrees the antient rules were restored, so that that the very laſt Macedonian armies were much admired for the regularity of their diſcipline. When the army was in the field, the king, aſſiſted by his generals and by ſuch officers of the army as were beſt acquainted with thoſe matters, marked out a place for a camp, which was immediately fortified with a good ditch and retrenchment. When the army was to march, part of this retrenchment was levelled, that they might march in order; an excellent maxim, if we conſider the ſtructure of their phalanx, which could not well have borne paſſing through ſeveral openings [y]. The tents were ſmall, as being intended to ſupply only a neceſſary covering againſt the inclemency of the weather. They were made of ſkins, and therefore, when they were bundled up, they ſometimes made uſe of them in paſſing rivers; two ſoldiers lay in a tent. As for the king, his tent was pitched in the centre, where he lay by himſelf; it ſeems to have conſiſted but of two apartments, one where the king ſlept, the other where he ſaw company; before the door of it his guards did duty [z]. The military ſignals among the Macedonians were either trumpets or fires. On a march the cavalry and light-armed troops took poſt in the van, the phalanx in the centre, and the baggage in the rear, except when there was reaſon to apprehend a ſudden engagement; then they marched in order of battle; every ſoldier had a kind of knapſack, and there were alſo carts and waggons which attended on the army, but not in ſuch numbers as were uſed by other nations, becauſe among the Macedonians neither women nor uſeleſs ſervants were indulged [a]. As to plunder, it was ſometimes diſtributed amongſt the ſoldiers, at others collected together and ſold for the uſe of the king, or for the army [b]. When in quarters, to keep up diſcipline, and to preſerve the army from corruption, military games were inſtituted, wherein rewards both honorary and lucrative were beſtowed. After victories obtained, their kings were wont to reward all ſuch as particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves; as for ſuch as died in the ſervice, they were honoured with public monuments, and their children and relations freed from tribute; in all other reſpects, they were treated with the greateſt humanity and condeſcenſion, and when the time limited for their ſervice expired, or their wounds rendered them incapable of ſerving, they were diſmiſſed, missed, not to seek a living where they could, but with ample provision for themselves and families, that they might enjoy the fruits of their labours, and by living in ease and peace excite younger and more robust men to serve chearfully in their stead [c]. We have insisted the longer upon this head, because the Macedonians were rendered considerable by nothing so much as their abilities in war; their empire was gained and preserved by arms, and of consequence the Macedonian history would be unintelligible, if the nature and discipline of their armies were not fully and properly described; for want of it the exploits of Philip have been ill understood, and those of Alexander wear too often the air of romance. We hope that in the subsequent sheets they will appear in the light of true history.

SECT. III.

The History of the Macedonian kingdom, from its foundation, to the reign of Philip the father of Alexander.

THE great obscurity of the Greek history, arising chiefly from the want of antient historians, and the variations which are visible in the works of such authors as have attempted to give us the story of those antient times, have already sufficiently appeared from the account we have given of the fabulous and heroic times, and of the antient states of Greece. The history of the Macedonian kingdom wants not many difficulties of the same kind, and flowing from the same causes; however, the series of its antient kings is pretty well settled, and though we have no regular account of them in any one antient historian, yet from the scattered relations in Herodotus, Thucydides, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Justin, Pliny, Solinus, and other antient writers, we have been able to assemble such a number of passages, as, when ranged in their just order of time, affords us a very passable account of the Macedonian affairs, during the period assigned at the head of this chapter; and thencefor-

t henceforward we ſhall meet with fewer doubts and obſtacles, and ſcarce any chaſms in the narration to the very end of the Macedonian monarchy under Perſeus the ſon of Philip. But, in the firſt place, it will be neceſſary to exhibit a ſcheme of thoſe kings and the years of their reigns, as they are ſet down by the learned Petavius, who has adjuſted theſe intricate points with wonderful judgment and perſpicuity.

CARANUS the founder of this kingdom was an Argive by birth, and a deſcendant from Hercules, though authors, are not well agreed at what diſtance. An antient Greek writer cited in Euſebius's chronicon places him in the eleventh degree [a]; but Velleius Paterculus ſays, that he was the ſixteenth from Hercules [b]. It is, however, owned, that he derived his line from Temenus one of the ſons of that hero, and that this Caranus was the brother of Phidon, the brother of Argos, who is reported to have been the inventor of weights and meaſures. On what account Caranus quitted his native country, no authors inform us; but all agree, that he left it at the head of a conſiderable body of Greeks, with whom intending to ſettle, as the cuſtom of thoſe times was, in ſome other country, he conſulted the oracle as to the meaſures which he ought to take; he was anſwered, that he ſhould eſtabliſh his empire according to the direction of the goats. It is very probable, that Caranus, Caranus

Caranus, when he received this reſponſe, knew not what to make of it; however, in purſuit of his firſt intention he entered that country, ſince known by the name of Macedonia, and particularly the little kingdom of Æmathia, at that time governed by king Midas, and drew near to its capital, which was then called Edeſſa. On a ſudden the ſky being overcaſt and a great ſtorm coming on, Caranus obſerved a herd of goats running for ſhelter to the city; immediately recollecting the oracle, he commanded his men to follow them cloſely, and entering the city by ſurprize, he poſſeſſed himſelf firſt of it, and after of the kingdom. In gratitude to his conductors, he changed the name of the place into Ægea, and called his people Ægeates; he likewiſe made uſe of a goat in his ſtandard, in order to perpetuate the memory of this extraordinary event. Telegonus the ſon of Aſteropæus, the friend of Priam and one of the heroes in the Trojan war, governed Pæonia, and other little princes the ſeveral regions of which Macedonia is compoſed [c]. Caranus ſubdued by degrees ſuch of his neighbours as were inferior to him in force, and added their dominions to his own, laying by that means the foundation of that kingdom, which his ſucceſſors afterwards raiſed to ſuch ſplendor. Pauſanias has recorded an exploit performed by this prince, which deſerves conſideration, inaſmuch as it confirms what we have ſaid before, and ſhews alſo how maxims come to be eſtabliſhed in particular kingdoms. Caranus, among other princes againſt whom he turned his arms, attacked Ciſſæus the ſovereign of a ſmall territory ſouth of the new kingdom Ægæa, and conquered his country; whereupon, according to the cuſtom of the Argives, Caranus erected a trophy; but a lion, coming out of a foreſt in the neighbourhood of Olympus, deſtroyed it; of which the conqueror being informed, underſtood it as a caution from the gods not to irritate his barbarous neighbours by erecting monuments to their ſhame; whence he made it a rule to himſelf, and left it as an inviolable maxim of ſtate to his ſucceſſors, never to treat any vanquiſhed people as enemies, but to receive them immediately into their protection, as if they had been born their ſubjects [d]. Chronologers are by no means agreed as to the beginning of this prince's reign; but, after conſidering what has been offered, on all hands, and

and comparing the conjectures of the learned in this science with the facts mentioned by antient historians, the most probable opinion seems to be, that he founded this kingdom about seventeen years before the first olympiad, that is to say, about the years specified in the margin, according to the tables of the judicious archbishop Usher [c].

Year after the flood 2205. Before Christ 794.

To Caranus succeeded his son Cœnus, of whom we know very little more, than that his mother was the daughter of one Chopis a Colchian, who on some account or other came into Macedonia, and lived with Caranus, who married his daughter; this Cœnus began his reign in the last year of the third olympiad, and having governed twenty-eight years as well as his father, he left his throne to Thurymas or Thurimas his son [f].

Cœnus.

Thurymas, Thurimas, or Thyrmas, succeeded to the Macedonian throne about the eleventh olympiad. As to the particulars of his reign, we are totally in the dark, no antient author having recorded any thing about it. In order, however, to give the reader some idea of the time in which this Macedonian prince swayed with so little noise the sceptre of his fathers, it may not be amiss to take notice of some few remarkable things which fell out in his days in the neighbouring parts of the world. He was cotemporary with Ahaz and Hezekiah kings of Judah; in the eighteenth year of his reign Salmanazar carried away captive the ten tribes of Israel. In his twentieth year Candaules king of Lydia was slain by Gyges his servant, and thereby the race of Hercules dispossest of that kingdom. About the same time the famous Sethos began his reign in Egypt. In the twenty-ninth year of Thurymas's administration, Dejoces erected the monarchy of the Medes. Rome, which had been founded in the days of his father Cœnus, had during his life its two first kings Romulus and Numa. After possessing the throne of Macedon forty-five years, he transmitted it to his son Perdiccas [g].

Thurymas.

Perdiccas the first began his reign in the twenty-second olympiad, a monarch of great parts, and happy in his fortune; he extended his dominions at the expence of his neighbours, and did so many great things, that, like most other heroes, the light of his glory hath received some diminution from the shade of fiction which hath followed it [h].

Perdiccas.

When full of years, he is said to have shewn his son the place where he desired to be buried, and where he likewise exhorted him to order his own body to be laid, and those of his posterity, signifying at the same time, that till this custom was abolished, there should not want one of his line to sit upon the throne; and some have been superstitious enough to imagine, that this prediction was fulfilled on the interring of Alexander the Great's body elsewhere [i]. Herodotus hath recorded many things which have indeed the air of fable in relation to this prince; but as it is fit the reader should be acquainted with them, they are placed below in a note (A).

(A) The relation of Herodotus runs thus: "Perdiccas obtained the monarchy of Macedonia in the following manner; "Gavanes, Æropus, and Perdiccas, three brothers, descendants "of Temenus, fled from Argos to Illyria, and from thence passing into the upper Macedonia, arrived in the city of Lebæa, "where they entered into the king's service for wages. One of "them had the care of his horses, another of his oxen, and Perdiccas, who was the youngest, kept the lesser cattle; for in "antient time, not only the people, but monarchs too, had little wealth. And as the wife of this king made their bread, "she constantly perceived that of Perdiccas encreased to double "the quantity of the rest; which when she had long observed, "she acquainted her husband with what she had seen. The king "having heard, and taking the thing for a prodigy, portending "some considerable event, sent for the brothers, and commanded them to depart out of his territories. They answered, "that in justice they ought to receive their salaries, and then they "would readily go. But the king hearing them mention their "salary, and at the same time seeing the sun shining through "the chimney into the house, blasphemously said, This I give "you as a sufficient reward of your service, pointing to the sun "as he pronounced these words. Gavanes and Æropus the "elder brothers stood amazed at his discourse; but the youngest "answering, We accept thy offer, O king, took out a sword "which he happened to have about him; and having drawn a "circle upon the floor, round the brightness made three several "motions to put up the light of the sun into his bosom, and then "departed with his brothers. After their departure, one of "those that were present, told the king what the youth had "done, and that being the youngest, he must have had some design

ARGÆUS the ſon of Perdiccas ſucceeded his father about the thirty-fourth olympiad; he was a prince of great affability and goodneſs, whereby he gained the love of his people, and governed with much tranquillity and applauſe. In his time the Illyrians, a fierce and barbarous nation, invaded the Macedonians, and did them conſiderable miſchief; but Argæus, who was a wiſe and valiant, as well as a mild and peaceable, prince, put himſelf at the head of his troops in order to oppoſe them; and having by a ſtratagem drawn them into his power, he fell upon them, and put them to the ſword with great effuſion of blood. In the laſt year of his life, he was cotemporary with Ancus Martius king of Rome, and having then enjoyed the royal ſceptre thirty-two years, he died and left the kingdom to Philip [k]. Argæus.

PHILIP the firſt became king of Macedon about the entrance of the forty-ſecond olympiad; he was a very good, as well as very valiant, monarch; but, as to the tranſactions of his reign there is little or nothing recorded about them, farther than that he fought with great courage in defence of himſelf and his people againſt the Illyrians, by whom he was ſlain in battle, and ſo left the crown to his ſon, an infant in his cradle [l]. Philip II.

ÆROPAS became king of Macedon, about the beginning of the fifty-firſt olympiad, at which time the Thracians Æropas.

and Illyrians ravaged all his country, and were continually ſucceſsful in their battle againſt his ſubjects, till the Macedonians, enraged by the misfortunes they had ſuffered, and ſuperſtitiouſly conceiving that they could never fight ſucceſsfully, but under the auſpice of their king, cauſed the young Æropas to be carried into the midſt of the battle in his cradle; and either encouraged by the preſence of their infant prince, or diſdaining to leave a child in danger, they fought with ſuch obſtinate reſolution, that they intirely defeated the Illyrians, and obliged them to retire. What were the future fortunes of a prince ſo proſperous in his infancy, no antient hiſtorian has told us; and therefore we can only ſay, that, after the ruling Macedon forty-two years, he yielded to fate, and left his dominions to his ſon [m].

Alcetas. Alcetas began his reign over Macedon, at a time when the ſeveral ſtates of Greece exerted their increaſing power, and ſought to extend their fame and their dominion both by ſea and land; when the affairs of Aſia and the whole eaſt were ſtrangely altered by the fall of the Aſſyrian empire, and the conjunction of the Perſian and Median power in the perſon of the great Cyrus; and when the petty princes in his neighbourhood began to feel the effects of the Greek power on the one ſide, and of this new-erected empire on the other, what precautions this king of Macedon took, either to preſerve his own dominions from inſults, or to extend their boundaries by ſubduing his neighbours, is not to be diſtinguiſhed in the Greek hiſtories now extant; but, if we may conjecture from what they relate of the tranſactions happening in his ſon's time, it will appear moſt probable, that he contented himſelf with the kingdom left him by his anceſtors, and ſought rather to preſerve that in peace, than to run the hazard of war through an ambitious deſire to encreaſe it [n].

Amyntas. Amyntas ſaw the power of the Perſian empire increaſe daily: for a while the ambitious views of Cambyſes and Darius were either directed another way, or checked by ſeditions at home; but after the reduction of Babylon, Darius, either envying the power of the Scythians, who ſome time before had made themſelves lords of Aſia, or being incenſed againſt king Iancyrus for refuſing him his daughter in marriage, determined to march with a prodigious army into that country, and utterly to deſtroy the people;

people; accordingly having drawn together, as ſome authors report, an army of ſeven hundred thouſand men, he cauſed a bridge to be laid over the Boſphorus, whereon his army paſſed over from Aſia to Europe, himſelf, however, going by ſea; then he gave inſtruction to the Ionians, and other his ſubjects, to ſail to the mouth of the river Iſter, over which they were commanded to lay a bridge; which having paſſed, he gave them leave after waiting for him ſixty days, if he returned not in that time, to retire back again into their own country [o]. While the Perſian emperor and all his mighty army were wandering about the deſarts of Scythia, ſometimes having an enemy in ſight, and yet ſeeing nothing, which might give them to believe the country in which they travelled was inhabited at all; the Ionians, with the reſt of the nations who were left to guard the bridge over the Iſter, were conſulting among themſelves whether they ſhould ſtill remain there in expectation of the Perſians, or whether breaking up the bridge they ſhould leave Darius and his army to periſh by want and by the arms of his enemies.

THE Scythians ſtrongly ſolicited them to return into their own country, and the famous Miltiades, at that time prince of the Cherſoneſe, conjured them not to loſe ſo fair an opportunity of delivering themſelves from the Perſian yoke. But Hiſtæius, tyrant of Miletus a city of Ionia, conſidering with himſelf, that, the Perſian power deſtroyed, he ſhould no longer be able to keep his city in ſubjection; took pains to poſſeſs the other reguli or petty kings, who were preſent, with the ſame notion, and ſo drew them all to concur with him in remaining firm to the intereſt of Darius. That the Scythians, however, might be pacified, and give them no diſturbance, he adviſed them to break up ſo much of the bridge as was within bow-ſhot of their coaſt; which when they began to do, the Scythians, conceiving that they had gained their purpoſe, immediately quitted the ſhore, and went in purſuit of Darius. The ſixty days being expired, that prince made all the haſte he could to the banks of the Iſter, fearing that the bridge was broken, and that he and his army ſhould find no paſſage; but when they had reached it, and, as their cuſtom was, ſet up a great ſhout to give notice of their arrival, Hiſtæius inſtantly brought together the veſſels which had had been taken away, and ſo the army paſſed over into Thrace, from whence Darius, with the far greater part of it, made all the haſte he could into Aſia p.

To conceal, however, the want of ſucceſs in this expedition as much as the thing would allow, he left behind him Megabyzus in Europe with an army of eighty thouſand men, giving him orders to reduce all the neighbouring nations. In purſuance of theſe inſtructions, he ſent ſeven of the principal commanders of his army into Maeedonia, to require Amyntas to acknowledge king Darius. Herodotus has preſerved to us a very exact account of this negotiation; we are of opinion, that the reader will not be diſpleaſed in having it as near as may be in his own words. When the Perſians arrived in Macedon, they went and demanded earth and water in the name of Darius. Amyntas not only gave them what they required, but received them for his gueſts; and, having prepared a magnificent feaſt, entertained them with great humanity. But, as the Perſians were beginning to drink after ſupper, "Macedonian "friend, ſaid they, when we make a great feaſt in Per-"ſia, our manner is to bring in our concubines and young "women to the company; and therefore, ſince you have "received us ſo affectionately, treated us with ſuch mag-"nificence, and owned king Darius by the delivery of "earth and water, we invite you to imitate our cuſtom". Amyntas anſwered, "The manner of our country is quite "different; for we keep our women ſeparated from our "men: Neverthelefs, becauſe you are our maſters and re-"quire their attendance, we will do as you deſire". Having finiſhed theſe words, he ſent for the women, who, coming in as they were ordered, placed themſelves on the other ſide of the table oppoſite to the Perſians. But when they ſaw the women were very beautiful, the Perſians told Amyntas, that they were not placed with diſcretion; and that he would have done better not to ſend for them at all, than to let them ſit at that diſtance only to offend their eyes. Upon this Amyntas, compelled by neceſſity, ordered the women to ſit down among the men: Which when they had done, the Perſians when full of wine, began to handle their breaſts, and ſome would have proceeded to kiſſes. Theſe actions Amyntas ſaw with indignation; yet ſeemed unconcerned, becauſe he was afraid of the Perſian power. But his ſon Alexander, who was preſent and

and obſerved the ſame thing, being a young man and unacquainted with adverſity, was no longer able to endure their inſolence; and therefore ſaid to Amyntas, "Father, "conſider your age; and leaving the company retire to your "reſt. I will ſtay here, and furniſh theſe ſtrangers with "all things neceſſary". Amyntas perceiving that Alexander had ſome raſh deſign to put in execution, "Son, ſaid he, I pretty "well diſcern by thy words, that thou art angry, and art re-"ſolved to attempt ſome imprudent action in my abſence. I "charge thee therefore to do nothing againſt theſe men, that "may turn to our diſadvantage: But be contented to obſerve "their actions with patience; and, for my own part, I "will comply and retire". When Amyntas had given him this council and was gone out, Alexander ſpoke to the Perſians in theſe terms: "Friends, ſaid he, theſe women "are at your command: You may lie with all, or as many "of them as pleaſe you beſt; and therefore I deſire you to "declare your intentions with freedom: For I ſee you are "inclined to ſleep, and abundantly repleniſh'd with wine. "Only permit them if you think fit, to go out to bathe; "and in a little time you may expect their return". The Perſians applauded this propoſal, and Alexander ſending away the women, ordered them to their own apartment: And having dreſſed a like number of ſmooth young men in the habit of women, he furniſhed every one with a ponyard, and introducing them to the Perſians, ſaid, "We have "treated you with all manner of variety: We have "given you not only all we had, but whatever we could "procure: And, which is more than all the reſt, we have "not denied you our matrons and daughters to complete "your entertainment, that you may be abundantly per-"ſuaded we have paid you all the honours you deſerve; "and at your return may acquaint the king who ſent you, "that a Grecian prince of Macedonia gave you a good "reception both at table and bed". Having thus ſpoken, Alexander placed at the ſeat of every Perſian a young Macedonian in the diſguiſe of a woman; who, when the Perſians attempted to careſs them, immediately diſpatched all the ſeven. This was the fate of theſe Perſians and of their attendants, who together with the chariots and all the baggage preſently diſappeared [q].

poor a kingdom himself, sent thither Bubaris one of his principal officers with a considerable body of troops, instructing him, as soon as he entered the frontiers of Macedon, to send for Amyntas, and make a strict inquisition after the embassadors sent him before. This had certainly been the ruin of the Macedonian kingdom in the house of Caranus, if Alexander, who had been the author of the death of the Persians, had not likewise contrived a method how to pacify Bubaris; in order to this, he went directly to confer with him as soon as he entered the country, carrying with him Gygæa his sister, a very beautiful woman; with whom Bubaris became so much in love, that for the sake of obtaining her for a wife, he adjusted all things to the satisfaction of Amyntas. Thenceforward the kings of Macedon became dependent on the Persian emperors, but were always regarded as faithful allies, and therefore worthy of good usage and esteem [r]. It fell out in the reign of Amyntas, that Athens recovered her liberty, by expelling Hippias the son of Pisistratus, who had assumed the sovereignty. This exiled prince the king of Macedon (or his son) offered a retreat in his dominions, and the revenues of the city Authymus for his support; but Hippias thought fit to refuse this favour, as he did also an offer of the same sort from the Thessalians, who would have given him the city of Iolchus, chusing to retire first to Sigeum, and afterwards to Darius [s].

Many circumstances about this time concurred to influence the Persian emperor with a desire of making war with the Greeks; the Athenians, without staying till any injuries were offered them, sent a fleet to the assistance of the Ionians, who had revolted from Darius, merely because he had given a kind reception to Hippias; while the tyrant used all the eloquence, of which he was master, to persuade Darius to restore him the sovereignty of Athens; in which he had at last prevailed, for, the rebellion in Ionia being suppressed, the great king determined to send Mardonius to chastise the Athenians, and to put Hippias again in possession of the sovereignty he had usurped. This general, having crossed the Hellespont, marched with his land-forces into Macedonia, which, as Herodotus tells us, he added to the Persian dominions: but this must be understood in a restrained ſtrained ſenſe; for it is univerſally agreed, that the Perſians did never deprive Amyntas nor any of his poſterity of the kingdom, but on the contrary treated them always with kindneſs and reſpect. While Mardonius lay here, the Perſians endeavouring to double the cape of mount Athos, were ſurprized by a ſtorm, which drove more than half their ſhips aſhore, whereby there periſhed no leſs than twenty thouſand men. Nor did the land-army eſcape all misfortunes in theſe quarters; for the Bryges, a bold and barbarous people of Thrace, ſuddenly attacked Mardonius and his army in the night, with ſuch advantage, that they ſlaughtered a great number of his men, and wounded himſelf, which provoked him ſo much, that he quickly made their country the ſcene of war, and reduced them under the Perſian yoke. After which, and ſome other inconſiderable conqueſts on the north and north-weſt of Macedon, he marched back into Aſia. Spurred on rather than checked by theſe diſappointments, Darius ſtill meditated the deſtruction of Greece; in order to which, he ſent a new army, under the command of Datis a Median and Artaphernes the ſon of his brother, with whom went Hippias, who conducted them to the plains of Marathon, where they were ſhamefully defeated by Miltiades at the head of the Athenian army. Even this misfortune could not cure Darius of the malice he had conceived againſt the Greeks; on the contrary, it heightened and inflamed it; he ordered new preparations to be made for war throughout all his wide dominions, and eſpecially directed all the Greeks, who were tributary to him, to provide ſhips and men, which gave the Macedonians an opportunity of exerting themſelves with uncommon diligence, and thereby meriting the favour of their maſters. But while theſe things were doing, Egypt revolted, againſt which Darius finding it neceſſary to march in perſon, he appointed Xerxes his ſucceſſor, not long after which he died, without ſeeing either the Egyptian or Grecian war ſo much as begun [t].

Xerxes, purſuing the ſchemes of his father notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the wiſeſt men about him, determined on a war with Greece; but previous to his grand expedition, he reſolved to cauſe two things to be performed, which might ſtrike his enemies with terror, and thereby induce ſubmiſſion without the expence of blood; theſe were

were the cutting a canal or paſſage for his ſhips through the iſthmus, joining mount Athos to the continent, which was twelve furlongs, or a mile and a half broad; the other erecting a bridge croſs the Helleſpont, where the ſea was about a mile broad. The firſt of theſe enterprizes was committed to the care of Bubaris and Artachæus, and as ſoon as all things were ready, the great king marched with his prodigious hoſt into Macedonia, his fleet being alſo ſtationed on this coaſt. The diligence and fidelity of Amyntas, his ſon Alexander, and their ſubjects, appeared in ſo fair a light to the Perſians, eſpecially through the repreſentation of Bubaris who had married Alexander's ſiſter, that he thought fit to add to the Macedonian kingdom the country lying near the mountains Hæmus and Olympus; at the ſame time Amyntas the nephew of Alexander obtained the city of Alabanda in Phrygia. It would be foreign to our purpoſe, ſhould we enter here into a long detail of what happened in the famous war carried on at this time by the Perſian emperor againſt the Greeks; we ſhall therefore take notice only of ſuch points as immediately concern the princes whoſe hiſtory we are writing. When the Greeks firſt heard of Xerxes's invaſion, they had thoughts of ſending a body of forces into Theſſaly in order to check him there, and to prevent his eaſy entrance into Greece; but the Alluadæ, princes of Theſſaly, and Alexander of Macedon adhering to the Perſian intereſt, the Greeks were conſtrained to abandon this ſcheme, and content themſelves with diſputing the paſſage at Thermopylæ. After the battle of Salamis, in which the mighty fleet of Xerxes was beaten in his ſight by that of the Athenians and their confederates, and the haſty retreat of Xerxes, on a ſuppoſition that the Greeks would attempt the ruin of his bridge over the Helleſpont, Mardonius, was left with an army of four hundred thouſand men, to try if he could conquer the Greeks by land, whom his maſter had found invincible by ſea. This Mardonius was an accompliſhed courtier, one who ſought to accommodate himſelf to his prince's humour, and to preſerve himſelf in honour and power by giving pleaſing counſels; this man had been a principal inſtrument in ſupporting Xerxes in this deſtructive ſcheme, and therefore, to avoid the odium and puniſhment due to that offence, he had promiſed the performance of mighty things, provided the command of the army was given to him. As ſoon as Xerxes was gone, he ſent for the principal perſons of the

the adjacent countries, to whom he repreſented what a mighty confidence the great king repoſed in them, and exhorted them, by their zeal on this occaſion in bringing troops to join his army, to demonſtrate their being worthy of the friendſhip of the great king. This made ſuch an impreſſion on the Macedonians and the reſt, that, exerting themſelves to the utmoſt, they in a ſhort time augmented the Perſian army with two hundred thouſand men. However, the city of Potidea in Macedonia, in the midſt of theſe preparations, abſolutely refuſed to ſend any ſuccours to the Perſians; but on the contrary declared for their enemies the confederate ſtates of Greece: with theſe the Pellenians joined, and the Olynthians ſhewed ſome inclination to increaſe the defection, which began now to become formidable to the Perſian power. Mardonius, that he might as ſoon as poſſible put a ſtop to this evil, detached Artabazus at the head of ſixty thouſand men to reduce theſe rebels. Againſt the Olynthians and Pellenians this commander was very ſucceſsful, but the Potideans gave him a very great deal of trouble; it is highly likely, that the inhabitants of this place being free, and ſubſiſting chiefly by their traffic with the Greeks, were better diſciplined, and conſequently more capable of defending themſelves againſt the Perſians. At firſt Artabazus contented himſelf with blocking up Potidea, becauſe he at the ſame time beſieged the city of Olynthus, then inhabited by the Bottiæanes, who had been driven out of the coaſt of the bay of Therma by the Macedonians. But after the taking of this city, and putting moſt of the inhabitants thereof to death, he came with his whole army before Potidea, and entered in earneſt on the ſiege. How ſtrong ſoever the place might be, and whatever valour its citizens might exert, it narrowly eſcaped the fate of Olynthus; for Timoxenus the commander of the Scyonæans entered into a conſpiracy to betray the city; the manner in which he carried on his correſpondence with Artabazus was, by putting a letter into the head of an arrow, afterwards affixing the feathers, and then ſhooting it to a certain place. But Artabazus having the misfortune to ſhoot when the people were about the place, it ſo happened, that his arrow ſtruck into the ſhoulder of one of the Potideans; upon this ſeveral gathered about him, and drawing out the arrow, the letter was diſcovered, and thereby the conſpiracy defeated. But this was not the only misfortune; after Artabazus had continued the ſiege three months, the ſea broke into his camp, upon which he raiſed the ſiege, and marched as expeditiouſly as he could to Pellene; but before they had reached half way to that city, the waters overtook them, and, what was no leſs fatal, the Potideans in their boats, ſo that ſuch as could not ſwim were drowned, and ſuch as could were ſlain by the enemy; only Mardonius lying in Theſſaly, Artabazus found mains to march the ſmall remainder of his army, which had taken the higher road to his camp, and thereby finiſhed this unfortunate expedition, which, inaſmuch as Potidea is a city of Macedon, fell properly within this ſection of our hiſtory [u].

In the beginning of the ſpring, Mardonius ſent one Mus of European extraction to conſult the moſt famous oracles on the preſent ſtate of affairs. At his return he took a a ſudden reſolution of treating with the Athenians, whom he juſtly looked on as the moſt dangerous enemy his maſter had. In order to negotiate a ſeparate peace with them, and thereby weaken the force of Greece, he made choice of Alexander, the ſon of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, to be his embaſſador. What were the motives that determined him to this are not very exactly recorded; but it is not difficult to diſcover them with ſome degree of certainty. Alexander was a prince of great genius, ſtrictly allied to the Perſians, and at the ſame time not a little eſteemed by the Greeks; for he, when a very young man, being preſent at the olympic games, and challenged there as a barbarian who had no right to aſſiſt, had proved himſelf by deſcent an Argive, on which, being admitted, not only to ſee, but to ſtrive, he carried off the prize, and had the honour to be victor. When he came to Athens, that wiſe and then virtuous people, though they received him with great hoſpitality, and kindneſs, yet they delayed giving him audience, till the Lacedæmonian embaſſadors arrived. Then in a ſolemn Aſſembly, he was permitted to ſpeak freely, and to acquaint them with the propoſitions with which he was entruſted by Mardonius. Herodotus having given us the ſpeech which he made on this occaſion, the reader will probably be well pleaſed to ſee it in the words of that author, whoſe harangues are not the leaſt admired parts of his work. "Men of Athens, Mardonius "has arguments offered by Alexander, inſiſted, Firſt, on the diſhonour which the Athenians would ſuſtain, if they made a ſeparate peace with the common enemy: Secondly, they took notice that the commencement of this war was wholly owing to the Athenians, in whoſe cauſe the other confederate ſtates had armed: Thirdly, they promiſed, that the allies would provide for the ſubſiſtence of the Athenian women, and ſuch as were unable to bear arms as long as the war continued: Laſtly, they let fall ſome bitter expreſſions in regard to the embaſſador himſelf. "Be not "therefore (ſaid they) ſeduced by the deluſive colours which "Alexander the Macedonian has put upon the words of "Mardonius. He acts in conformity to his condition; "he helps the tyrant becauſe he is a tyrant himſelf. But "you ought to act in another manner, if you judge "rightly, becauſe you know the Barbarians have no re-"gard either to truth or juſtice". The Athenians acted as became them on this occaſion, they told Alexander, "They were ſenſible, that the power of the Medes was "far ſuperior to theirs; but that liberty was to be de-"fended againſt any force, bidding him therefore tell Mar-"donius, that they would never make peace with his "maſter as long as the ſun continued his courſe, adding "by way of caution to the embaſſador himſelf; Appear "no more in the preſence of the Athenians with ſuch "meſſages, nor exhort us to deteſtable actions under co-"lour of doing us good offices; for we are unwilling to "uſe methods that may be uneaſy to you, who are our "friend, and engaged with us in a reciprocal hoſpitality". Alexander, having received his anſwer, returned to Mardonius, who, when he found that the Athenians would not hear of a treaty, immediately determined to march his mighty army into their country, and deſtroy Athens a ſecond time [x]. Having performed this, and gratified his revenge, he quitted Attica and marched into Bœotia, becauſe being a champain country, it was more proper for his horſe. Here he encamped on the banks of the river Aſopus. The confederate ſtates of Greece, having drawn together their army, marched towards the enemy, and encamped over-againſt them in the neighbourhood of mount Cithæron. For ſome time the armies looked upon each other, neither of them them caring to act offenſively, it having been declared by ſuch as inſpected the ſacrifices, that the victory would be on that ſide that ſhould be attacked. Mardonius, at length growing weary of this lingering kind of war, whereby they were reduced to the want both of proviſions and of forage, reſolved, againſt the opinions of Artabazus and the Thebans, to fight the Greeks. Having one day diſcovered his opinion, and ordered all things to be diſpoſed for the attack early in the morning, Alexander of Macedonia, when the night was far ſpent, mounting on horſeback, advanced to the Athenian guard, deſiring to ſpeak with their leaders, whom he named diſtinctly: Notice being given them, they came immediately to the barrier; then Alexander addreſſing himſelf to them in theſe terms: "I come to depoſit a ſecret with you, O Athenians, on "condition you will conceal it from all men, except only "Pauſanias, leſt you ſhould ruin me. I would not make "this diſcovery to you, if I were not extremely concerned "for the ſafety of Greece, and being myſelf of Grecian "original, were not very unwilling to ſee the liberty of "Greece oppreſſed. Know then, that Mardonius would "have fought long before this time, if the ſacrifices "offered for him and his army had been found favourable; "but now he has taken a reſolution to have no regard to "the ſacrifices, and to attack you at the break of day; "fearing, as I conjecture, that more forces may come in "to your ſuccour. Be therefore in readineſs to receive "him. But if Mardonius ſhould defer the execution of "his purpoſe, and not come to a battle, continue in your "camp; for his proviſions are not ſufficient to laſt many "days, and if this war terminates happily on your ſide, "ſome of you ought to remember me; who, for the ſake "of the Græcians, and out of a deſire to preſerve their "liberty, have voluntarily undertaken ſo dangerous an en-"terprize, and acquainted you with the intentions of Mar-"donius; to the end, that the Barbarians may not ſurprize "you, and fall upon your forces before you are prepared to "receive them". Of this advice the Greeks made great uſe, and no doubt retained a grateful ſenſe of Alexander's favour. Not long after a deciſive battle was fought, in which Mardonius was ſlain, and his prodigious army cut to pieces, excepting only a body of forty thouſand men commanded by Artabazus, who retired as ſoon as he ſaw that victory declared againſt him. With theſe he paſſed ſafely, though with great haſte, thro' Theſſaly and Macedon, diſſembling the defeat which the Perſians had received, and affirming that Mardonius with the groſs of the army was marching after him y. The ſubſequent actions of Alexander's life are moſt of them covered with oblivion, becauſe we have no antient writer left, who treats expreſly of the Macedonian affairs before the time of Philip, and therefore we are forced to join ſuch circumſtances from general hiſtorians as regard that people, in order to fill up, as well as we may, that obſcure period, between the acceſſion of Caranus and that of the famous monarch we have before mentioned. An antient hiſtorian informs us, that in the beginning of the LXXVIIth olympiad, the Argives, moved by ambition and a thirſt of revenge, made war againſt the Mycenians, a brave and free people, whom by degrees they mightily diſtreſt; and at laſt, taking their capital city, drove them out of their native country and obliged them to ſeek habitations among ſtrangers. Drawn by the fame of his generoſity and virtue, numbers of theſe diſtreſſed people fled into Macedonia to king Alexander, who received them with much kindneſs and hoſpitality, aſſigned them a region to dwell in, and thereby gained immortal honour to himſelf. As he was extremely uſeful to the Perſians, ſo we need not queſtion that he took the neceſſary meaſures in order to make them uſeful to him, by procuring from time to time, as their circumſtances would allow, ſuch additions to his dominions, as made him before his death a great and formidable prince. But, however extended his territories might be, his ſoul was yet ſuperior to his fortune; he lived with ſuch magnificence, made ſuch noble preſents to the oracles, and gave on all occaſions ſuch teſtimonies of generoſity and munificence, that he was by the Greeks ſirnamed the rich, and is always very reſpectfully ſpoken of by their authors. He had three ſons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip; the firſt ſucceeded to his throne, but the latter kept up for a long time a claim thereto, and thereby created great diſturbances in their native country z.

Perdiccas I. PERDICCAS the ſon of Alexander, in the very beginning of his reign, diſcovered ſuch prudence and forecaſt as ſeemed to demonſtrate, that he ſucceeded to his father's abilities as

as well as to his dominions; he found himſelf environed on all hands either by open enemies or ſuſpicious friends. The inhabitants of Thrace, and other barbarous nations, looked on his increaſing kingdom with an envious eye; the Perſians treated him as their vaſſal, and, on the other hand, the Athenians became ſo powerful by their colonies and allies on the ſea-coaſt, that he was in no ſmall danger from them. A while he amuſed them with a ſhew of friendſhip; but when he found, that they treated him with an air of ſuperiority and haughtineſs, he reſolved to check their progreſs in this part of the world, nor did he long want an occaſion. The city of Epidamnus or Epidamnum, being alike diſtracted by ſeditions at home and terrified with the approach of foreign enemies, was in the utmoſt diſtreſs; the weaker party had called the Illyrians to their aſſiſtance, by which the government was brought ſo low, that they ſent firſt to the Corcyrians, after to the Corinthians, for aid; they being a colony immediately from the former, who were themſelves a colony of the latter. The Corinthians ſent relief to Epidamnum, which the Corcyrians reſented and ſent a fleet on the coaſt of Macedonia, in order to compel the Epidamnians to ſubmit to ſuch terms as they were pleaſed to preſcribe them. Thus a war was began between the two ſtates, in which the Corcyrians had the better in the beginning; for they beat the Corinthians by ſea, and took the city of Epidamnum by ſtorm. The Athenians alſo took part in this buſineſs, and aſſiſted the Corcyrians; whereupon the Corinthians tampered with the city of Potidea to revolt from Athens, at the ſame time that king Perdiccas declared himſelf againſt that ſtate, and perſuaded the Chalcidians to abandon their ſea-ports, and to inhabit and fortify the city of Olynthus. The Athenians, highly provoked at theſe proceedings, determined to revenge themſelves on thoſe who had deſerted them, and eſpecially on king Perdiccas, whom they looked upon as the principal author; to which end, they ſent Agnon with a fleet and a conſiderable army on board it to beſiege Potidea, and to reduce the Chalcidians; but the plague infecting his army, he was able to effect little, and therefore ſailed quickly back to Athens, leaving Potidea as he found it, blocked up by a ſmall army the Athenians had there before. By the end of the winter the Potideans, finding themſelves reduced to the utmoſt extremity, inſomuch, that they had been obliged to eat one another, treated with Xenophon,

Heſtiodorus,

Hestiodorus, and Callimachus, the Athenian generals, to render the place on honourable terms, which were granted them, so that they had leave to depart with their wives and children, every man having one suit of cloaths, and every woman two, with a small sum of money to bear their charges into Chalcidia, and other places where they thought fit to retire [a]. The next year the Athenians, under the command of Xenophon, made war against the Chalcidians, but with ill success. Perdiccas in the mean time, foreseeing that in the end the Athenians would be too powerful for him, endeavoured to reconcile himself to that state, or rather with a shew of reconciliation, in which he was assisted by Sytalces king of Thrace, a very potent prince, and one who sought to augment his dominions at the expence of his neighbours. But how artfully soever the Macedonian managed his affairs, the Athenians suspected him anew, and Sytalces took umbrage at his behaviour. The Athenian embassadors, then at the Thracian court, solicited this king to make war upon Perdiccas, and exalt Amyntas the son of Philip his brother to the throne of Macedon, into which project Sytalces was easily drawn. That the invasion might be attended with all imaginable success, the several nations of Thrace and all its allies were invited to contribute their quotas to the war, which in hopes of plunder they readily did; the Athenians also promising to send a strong fleet with a considerable number of land-forces on board. Sytalces, taking with him the embassadors and young Amyntas, entered Macedon at the head of 150,000 men, two-thirds foot and one cavalry. Perdiccas, knowing it was impossible for him to make any resistance in the field against so great an army, withdrew his forces into strong towns, that he might spin out the war into the greater length. At first Sytalces went on as prosperously as he could wish; for the principal cities in that territory, which formerly belonged to Philip, readily yielded to his son; Mygdonia, Grestonia, and Anthemus he wasted without opposition; Europus, however, he attacked in vain, and the Macedonian horse, falling on him in defiles and other advantageous places, where his numbers could be of no use, did him considerable mischief; in the end, however, it appeared, that though the Macedonian horse were excellent, yet numbers would overpower them, and therefore Perdiccas cas would not hazard any longer his forces in theſe ſkirmiſhes. He found indeed an eaſier and ſafer way of getting clear of this formidable enemy; for having engaged one Seuthes the king's near relation in correſpondence with him, he offered him his ſiſter Stratonica with a vaſt fortune, in caſe he could bring about a peace. He immediately applied himſelf to the work with an eagerneſs ſuitable to the reward which was promiſed him, nor did he want very plauſible topics to induce Sytalces to enter into the meaſures which were to be profitable to him. In the firſt place, he inſiſted, that the Athenians inſtead of a fleet had ſent embaſſadors only with inconſiderable preſents, notwithſtanding the war was entered into at their requeſt, and was carried on chiefly for their advantage: He obſerved next, that though this war had not profited the king much, yet it had ſtirred up a multitude of enemies; for the Theſſalians, not knowing what turn this war might take, were all in arms in the ſouth, and in the north all the Thracians, inhabiting the plain country, with the Panæans, Odomantians, Droans, and Derſæans, were likewiſe in arms, fearing this humour of conqueſt might lead him their way; but above all, he argued from the ſituation he was in, unſupported by his allies, haraſſed by his enemies, and already ſtraitened for victuals, as well as pinched with cold. After eight days conſideration, Sytalces yielded to his kinſman's arguments, and quitting the Macedonian territories, marched with all imaginable ſpeed into his own. Within a ſhort ſpace after this, Seuthes had his wife given him with a large ſum of ready money, and Amyntas, in ſupport of whoſe title the war was undertaken, was left in the ſame melancholy ſtate in which he was before [b]. Perdiccas, being rid of this formidable enemy, retained, however, a moſt implacable enmity againſt the Athenians, who had ſtirred him up to this invaſion; he therefore privately negotiated with the Lacedæmonians to ſend an army into thoſe parts, promiſing to do all in his power to drive the Athenians out of all their colonies and conqueſts in Thrace and Macedon. This was in the beginning of the eighth year of the Peloponneſian war, and the Lacedemonians, having had lately many and great misfortunes therein, gladly accepted this offer, in hopes of retrieving the honour of their arms; in order to which, they diſpatched Braſidas, one of their beſt and braveſt captains, with a well provided army to march through through Thessaly into Macedonia. The Thessalians, when he first entered their country, were in great confusion; they were well inclined to the Athenians, but had never done any thing to provoke the Lacedæmonians, and therefore looked upon Brasidas's coming amongst them as an invasion. But this general, being a person of very moderate temper, as well as invincible courage, entertained them with soft words, and general assurances of friendship and kindness, till he reached Dion, a small city in the neighbourhood of mount Olympus, and the first in the Macedonian dominions; of which when he had given Perdiccas notice, that prince declared openly against the Athenians, and owned, that he called Brasidas to expel them out of his own country and Thrace. But there was still more at the bottom, Perdiccas had framed a design of subduing the Lyncestheans, a bold and warlike people, very troublesome to himself, as well as his ancestors; and though he had given out, he fought only to protect his own dominions and the Chalcidians, who at his persuasion had revolted from the Athenians; yet when Brasidas arrived, he would have immediately employed him and his forces against Arrhibæus king of the Lyncestheans; but Brasidas desired to be excused, till he had sent a herald to that prince, to acquaint him of his arrival, and to demand whether he would be a friend or foe to Sparta. Perdiccas took this very ill, and could not forbear saying, that he did not send for him thither to be an arbitrator, but to fight against such enemies as he should shew him. The Chalcidians, however, hoping to attach Brasidas more strongly to themselves, commended his conduct much; and Arrhibæus, laying hold of this favourable opportunity, declared himself the friend of Sparta, upon which Brasidas removed from his frontiers; which so offended the king of Macedon, that whereas before he had furnished half the expences of the army, henceforward he would furnish but a third. The moderate behaviour of Brasidas wrought greater effects than any army twice as numerous as his could possibly have done, and many cities opened their gates to him, for where-ever he had an opportunity of treating, his word rendered his sword unnecessary. About this time died Sytalces king of the Odrysians, and was succeeded in all his dominions by Seuthes the brother-in-law of Perdiccas. In the winter, Brasidas with the confederate army blocked up Amphipolis, a famous city; for the possession of which the Athenians and Thracians had struggled long, but was at preſent in the hands of the former, who had alſo an army not far from it under the command of Thucydides. Braſidas after ſome time determined to attempt ſurprizing the place, having very good intelligence therein; and he marched with ſuch expedition towards it, that he had well-nigh effected what he propoſed; as it was, he put the inhabitants into ſuch a confuſion, that they ſent to Thucydides the hiſtorian, who, as we ſaid before, then commanded in Thrace, to intreat him to come to their relief. Braſidas, having intelligence of this, offered the townſmen their liberty, either to reſide in the city under their own government, or to remove in five days, if they thought fit; which propoſition they accepted, notwithſtanding all that Eucles the Athenian general, who commanded in the place, could ſay to prevent them. After this ſucceſs, Perdiccas joined him, and they together made many other conqueſts; after which they marched to reduce the country about mount Athos, which in a great meaſure they affected, and then turned their arms againſt Torone, a ſtrong city in Chalcidia, which was ſtill held by the Athenians, and which Braſidas ſurprized in the night, but without fighting [c]. After this the campaign ended, and the Athenians procured a truce, deſigning to make uſe of the time afforded them thereby, to put their affairs in Thrace into better order, and to contrive the utter deſtruction of Perdiccas, whom they now held for their moſt bitter and moſt formidable enemy. On the other hand, Perdiccas, having a juſt idea of the ſituation in which his affairs ſtood, neglected nothing which might reſtore them, or tend towards eſtabliſhing the Macedonian power ſo effectually, as to leave him for the future without apprehenſions either of Greeks or barbarians [d].

WITH this view he ſtrongly ſolicited Braſidas to undertake now that expedition, which he had ſo much preſſed on his firſt coming into Macedonia, viz. againſt king Arrhibæus, which, on account of that prince's not performing his promiſes, the Lacedæmonian general readily yielded to. The expedition once reſolved was immediately put into execution, Braſidas leading his own army, and Perdiccas his, but with promiſe to act for each other's benefit, and to unite their their forces, if there ſhould be any occaſion. When they came into the country of the Lynceſtheans, they found Arrhibæus very ſtrongly incamped on the brow of a hill, with a plain before him; whereupon Perdiccas and Braſidas encamped on the deſcent of an oppoſite hill, having the ſame plain before them. In this ſituation the armies did not continue long before an engagement enſued. At firſt only the horſe fought; but Arrhibæus ſending ſome of his men at arms to ſupport his cavalry, Perdiccas and Braſidas did the ſame; upon which the battle became general, in which the Lynceſtheans were defeated with very great ſlaughter, and conſtrained to betake themſelves to their fortreſſes. Thither the king of Macedonia would have purſued them; but Braſidas would not conſent, becauſe his heart was ſet on a ſpeedy return to the ſea-coaſts, from an apprehenſion that the Athenians would attempt ſomewhat during his abſence. During ſome days the army was in ſuſpenſe, Braſidas conſenting to march on, in caſe a body of Illyrians, whom Perdiccas had taken into his pay, joined them; but it was not long before they were conſtrained to think of a retreat, by reaſon that the Illyrians, fearing to aggrandize Perdiccas, deſerted to the Lynceſtheans, and thereby enabled them to take the field the ſecond time, which they did with ſuch vigour, that on the firſt news thereof the Macedonian forces being not well diſciplined, and having with them as auxiliaries ſeveral thouſand much worſe diſciplined than themſelves, were ſtruck with ſuch a panic, that they fled in the night, carrying their king with them by force, without ſo much as ſuffering him to confer with Braſidas. The Lacedæmonian, however, made a retreat with ſome difficulty, and much loſs; and from this time forward there was not a right underſtanding between the king and that general, each conceiving himſelf to be ill treated; Perdiccas reſenting his refuſal to proſecute the war after their victory, when he conceived it to have been intirely in their power to have ſubdued Arrhibæus; and Braſidas having been much offended with the Macedonian army's quick retreat, which left him and his troops expoſed to ſo much danger. The ſtate things were now in gave the advantage to Perdiccas, becauſe it inclined the Athenians to court him, notwithſtanding all the injuries he had done them; and he, on the other hand, beginning now to diſlike the Greeks in general, from an apprehenſion that they all fought their own intereſt, and to aggrandize themſelves at the expence of others, determined to lay hold of this opportunity of cloſing with Athens, in hopes that it would enable him to rid himſelf both of it and the other party [e]. He accordingly began to treat with Nicias, and at laſt concluded peace; but the Athenian general ſuggeſting, that it would be proper for him to give ſome open proof of his ſincerity, the king reſolved to gratify him, and at the ſame time to do himſelf a kindneſs; he therefore undertook to ſtop a body of Spartan troops under the command of Iſchagoras, which was ordered to march through Theſſaly to join Braſidas. This he effected by his great intereſt in Theſſaly, and thereby prevented ſuch an acceſſion of ſtrength to the Lacedæmonian army, as would in all probability have rendered them far ſuperior to their enemies; whereas a ſhort time afterwards, the Athenians ſending over freſh troops, under the command of Cleon, Braſidas was forced to fight in defence of Amphipolis; and tho' he gained the victory, yet he was ſlain in fight, which determined the Lacedæmonians to make peace, and ridded Perdiccas of his apprehenſions on that ſubject. Some time after the Athenians began to have new jealouſies as to the intentions of Perdiccas. They charged him with treachery, or at leaſt with coldneſs, in their affairs, and eſpecially with his not aſſiſting Nicias ſo much as they thought he might have done; for which reaſon they poſted troops in ſuch a manner, that Perdiccas had no communication with the ſea, which was exceedingly detrimental to his affairs. The next year they carried matters farther; for they ordered a body of horſe to be tranſported to Methone, from whence they made inroads into Macedonia, and did much miſchief. The Lacedæmonians had it not now in their power to aſſiſt Perdiccas much; however, they did all they could, which was to ſend orders to the Chalcidians their allies to aſſiſt him; but the Chalcidians, being not a little afraid of the power of Perdiccas, did not think fit to act as they were directed [f]. From this time we meet very little concerning him in Greek hiſtorians; becauſe, as we have more than once obſerved, there is not one of them who treats profeſſedly of the affairs of Macedon; all therefore that we can add of this Perdiccas the ſecond is, that he died after a long reign full of years and glory [g]. He ruled at a time when all Greece was in commotion, when the Athenians ans were moſt ambitious and moſt powerful, and when the Lacedæmonians, who had never attempted it before, began to think of eſtabliſhing gariſons in Thrace. He had alſo long and ſharp conteſts with his barbarous neighbours, equally fierce and perfidious, ever ready to make war when occaſion offered, and ſeldom to be depended upon when they thought fit to make peace; yet, in ſpight of all theſe difficulties, and, which added not a little to them, the imbecillity of the Perſian government, which had been the chief ſupport of his predeceſſors, Perdiccas maintained himſelf in a ſtate of independency, was formidable to all parties, and left his kingdom both in a better condition and larger in extent, than he found it. It is true, that thoſe authors, from whom we have collected our hiſtory, ſeem to charge him with art and falſhood; but if we conſider who theſe hiſtorians were, and what king Perdiccas was, we ſhall not think their authority of any great weight. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians ſought to aggrandize themſelves, by making conqueſts in, or upon the borders of, his dominions; and in their turns they endeavoured to make uſe of him for that purpoſe. Perdiccas, as far as in him lay, eluded their deſigns, and, under colour of fulfilling them, uſed their forces to ſtrengthen himſelf. Here was art and falſhood on both ſides; but the king was true to the intereſt of Macedon; and therefore, as all authors acknowledge him to have been a great king, ſo, with reſpect to his own ſubjects, we muſt allow him to have been a good one *.

Archelaus. It is certain, that Perdiccas was ſucceeded by his ſon Archelaus, a prince of great parts and wonderful induſtry; but with reſpect to his title to the crown, his perſonal character, and the number of years that he reigned, authors ſpeak ſo indifferently, and ſo obſcurely, that it is next to an impoſſibility to deliver with tolerable clearneſs the ſtory of his reign. Some ſay, that he was not the legitimate ſon of king Perdiccas, but that he obtained the kingdom by throwing his brother, who was its lawful heir, into a well, and paſſing it upon his mother that he tumbled in by chance, as he was following a gooſe. They alledge likewiſe, that he invited Alcetas the ſon of Alexander the rich, with his young ſon Alexander, to return into Macedonia; and that when he got them into his power, he put them to death, for fear leſt, at ſome time or other, they might ſet up a claim to the crown, and give him ſome diſturbance g. All dread of of rivals being now removed, he bethought himſelf of fortifying ſome of his principal cities, that his neighbours, who were powerful in horſe, and who could eaſily draw aſſiſtance from Athens, might not over-run Macedonia with the ſame facility they did in the days of his father, when Sytalces king of Thrace ravaged the richeſt provinces, without riſquing a battle, or running any great hazard in his retreat. He likewiſe took other meaſures for raiſing the courage and reputation of the Macedonian monarchy, which did not a little diſturb his neighbours. The city of Pydna, more apprehenſive than the reſt, after ſoliciting the aid of the Athenians, declared againſt him, upon which he raiſed a very puiſſant army, and laid ſiege thereto. The Athenians, according to their promiſe, ſent a fleet and army, under the command of Theramenes, to relieve Pydna; but that general found king Archelaus's army in ſo good condition, and ſo advantageouſly encamped, that he was forced to retire without ſuccouring the place, which, after a long ſiege and a very brave defence, fell into the hands of the king, who obliged its inhabitants to remove twenty furlongs farther from the ſea, that their friends the Athenians might not ſo eaſily viſit them. Archelaus was for nothing more diſtinguiſhed than for his love of learning and learned men. He had always many about his court, whom he not only maintained with a magnificence worthy of a prince, but converſed with them as familiarly as if they had been his equals; inſomuch, that many of his ſayings at table are recorded; for it was the peculiar wiſdom of the Greeks to preſerve from oblivion ſuch ſentences as were either remarkable for their ſprightly wit, or for the ſolid ſenſe contained in them [h]. Amongſt others Socrates was of the number of the learned, whoſe friendſhip was ſtrongly ſolicited by Archelaus; but on account of the violences he had committed in the beginning of his reign, it is ſaid that great philoſopher declined correſponding with him [i]. Euripides the tragic poet was his gueſt, and lived with the greateſt intimacy with this king, who is thought to have honoured his memory with a tomb, deſervedly commended by antient authors [k]. It is clear from theſe paſſages, that Archelaus ſpent his days in peace and honour. It ſeems to us moſt probable, probable, that he reigned fourteen years, and that he was ſucceeded in the throne by his ſon Oreſtes. As for the manner of his death, it was by treaſon, Craterus his favourite conſpiring againſt him; but he alſo was murdered in four days, and ſo reaped little benefit from his treachery [l]. Others again affirm, that he reigned but ſeven years, and that he was ſucceeded by another Archelaus, who was the elder brother of Oreſtes; which Archelaus the ſecond they will have to be the perſon murdered by Craterus. Diodorus Siculus indeed ſays, that Archelaus reigned but ſeven years, and that he was killed by Craterus; yet he does not mention two princes of that name; and he places the death of Archelaus where it ought to be placed, according to our table [m].

Oreſtes. ORESTES being but a Child, Æropus, one of the royal blood, governed as protector, and by degrees he increaſed this power of his ſo much, that he acted as abſolutely as if he had been king. It was in his time that Ageſilaus king of Sparta returned by land out of Aſia into Greece. He ſent to Æropus, as he had done to the reſt of the princes whoſe dominions lay in his way, to deſire the liberty of paſſing. Æropus anſwered his meſſengers, That he would conſider of it; which anſwer being reported to Ageſilaus, let him conſider, ſaid he, but let us march [n]; which accordingly he did through the heart of Macedonia, without waiting for any farther permiſſion; which ſo ſtruck Æropus, that he gave orders for the treating him and his army with the utmoſt civility, by which he preſerved his country from being pillaged; for in Theſſaly, where the people were not ſo tractable, Ageſilaus ſuffered his troops to live at diſcretion. The only reaſon aſſigned for transferring the regal authority, from the family of Perdiccas to this Æropus, was, that the kingdom could not bear the want of a prince, or, which to the Macedonians ſeemed all one, that the ſceptre ſhould remain in the hands of an infant; however, it is very likely, that the family of Perdiccas had many friends; and that after the death of Oreſtes, Æropus ſtood ſo much in fear of them as to act very cautiouſly; for we hear of nothing he did againſt any of his neighbours; but that, after a troubleſome reign of ſix years, he was ſucceeded by his ſon.

PAUSANIAS

[l] Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. [m] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Petav. in Catal. Reg. Macedon. [n] Plut. in Vit. Ageſil. in Apophthegm. Lacon. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

PAUSANIAS held the ſceptre of Macedon by no better title than his father had done; and therefore Amyntas the ſon of Philip Tharaleus conceiving, that neither poſſeſſion nor ſucceſſion could ſanctify an uſurpation, cut off Pauſanias before he had reigned a year, and placed the crown on his own head [o]. Pauſanias.

ÆROPUS had ſeveral ſons beſides Pauſanias, and of theſe one named Argæus, who was the moſt capable. He, on the murder of his brother, immediately began to intrigue, both with the Macedonian nobles and with the neighbouring princes, by whoſe aſſiſtance he quickly raiſed a numerous army; and having put himſelf at the head thereof, entered Macedonia, and aſſerted his right to the crown, which Amyntas not being able to conteſt, he was forced to abandon it almoſt as ſoon as he had aſſumed it [p]. Æropus.

ARGÆUS remained in poſſeſſion of Macedon about two years. We are not informed either how he governed, or what it was that induced his people to wiſh for Amyntas again; but at the expiration of that term, the Theſſalians furniſhing that exiled prince with an army, he entered Macedonia therewith, and forced his competitor to retire. Argæus.

AMYNTAS, being reſtored to his kingdom, found himſelf quickly engaged in a quarrel with the Olynthians, on this account: At the time he quitted his kingdom, he made over to them part of his territories which lay next to their city, being in doubt, whether he ſhould ever come into Macedon again; but now, when he was throughly re-eſtabliſhed on his throne, he demanded the reſtoration of theſe lands, which the Olynthians peremptorily refuſed, and prepared to defend their title by force. Amyntas ſaw clearly, that, as things ſtood, he ſhould not be able alone to contend with ſo powerful a people; he therefore determined with himſelf to call the Lacedæmonians to his aſſiſtance, which accordingly he did; and that republic, having long had a jealous eye on the power of the Olynthians, readily yielded to his requeſt, and ſent Phæbidas with ten thouſand men to ſupport the king in this war. Soon after they appointed his brother Eudamidas general, and diſpatched him with three thouſand men into Macedonia. The Olynthians, not at all frighted at theſe formidable armies, prepared to defend themſelves; and having aſſembled a very Amyntas reſtored.

great body of troops, an engagement enſued, wherein Amyntas and his allies were beaten. The Spartans, as ſoon as they received the news, raiſed forces afreſh, and ſent a new army, under the command of Teleutius the brother of king Ageſilaus, to join Amyntas. This general, being a man of great courage, immediately entered upon action; and before the Olynthians were ready to take the field, waſted their country, and enriched the ſoldiers with the diſtribution of the booty; but when the Olynthians had received the ſuccours they expected, immediately they quitted their city, and offered Amyntas and Teleutius battle. The battle was very long, and very obſtinate; but in the end the Olynthians were victors, Teleutius, with 1200 Spartans, being killed upon the ſpot. This ſlaughter ſerved only to exaſperate the Lacedæmonians, by whom a third army was raiſed, and Ageſipolis their king intruſted with the command thereof. The Olynthians, perceiving plainly that they ſhould be at laſt beſieged, raiſed ſtrong fortifications, and laid up vaſt quantities of corn and other proviſions in their magazines. They found means, however, to protract the war for a year, without coming to an engagement. About the end of this ſpace king Ageſipolis died, and Polyudas was ſent from Sparta to command in his ſtead. This new general gained ſeveral victories, and at laſt ſhut up the Olynthians in their city, preſſing them with ſo cloſe a ſiege, that they were at length conſtrained to ſubmit themſelves to the Macedonians, and accept of ſuch a peace as they were pleaſed to give them[q]. Amyntas was not only happy enough to engage Lacedæmon ſo heartily in his cauſe, but he was alſo ſucceſsful in his negotiations with the Athenians, who had not hitherto ſhewn any great kindneſs to the kings of Macedon. He artfully declared, that, in his opinion, Amphipolis belonged to them, and promiſed to do all in his power to put it into their hands, whereby he procured their friendſhip without any expence to himſelf[r]. In all other reſpects he behaved like a great politician, ſtrengthening the intereſt of his family, raiſing the credit of the Macedonian monarchy, and binding moſt of his neighbours, particularly the Theſſalians, to his intereſt, by good turns, till after a reign of twenty-four years, he died much reſpected by all the Grecian ſtates, and greatly beloved by his own ſubjects. He left left behind him three legitimate ſons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, under the tuition of Eurydice their mother, as alſo an illegitimate ſon, called Ptolemy, ſirnamed Alorites, and ſeveral others.

ALEXANDER, being the eldeſt, ſucceeded his father, and proved a prince of great parts, tho' of little probity. The Theſſalians were at that time oppreſſed by Alexander of Phærea, who ſought to make himſelf abſolute lord of the whole country; the nobility applied themſelves to Alexander king of Macedon, who was not backward in promiſing them aſſiſtance. Alexander the Phærean, having intelligence of theſe negotiations, immediately raiſed an army, and therewith entered Macedon. The king met him with another army, and a briſk engagement enſued, wherein the Macedonian gaining the victory, he marched ſtraight on to Lariſſa the capital of Theſſaly, the inhabitants of which opened their gates to him, and their example was followed by the moſt conſiderable places in that country, the king promiſing to reſtore them to their liberty; which, however, he was ſo far from performing, that he put gariſons into every one of them, ſo that the Theſſalians quickly found they had only exchanged one tyrant for another [s]. Upon this they applied to the Thebans to deliver them from both. Pelopidas was choſen to command a body of troops ſent for this purpoſe; and the reputation of ſo great a captain effected almoſt as much as could have been expected, if the whole power of Thebes had been employed in this enterprize; for Alexander immediately began to execute the treaty he had formerly made with the Theſſalians, and to quit Lariſſa, and other cities which had been put into his hands. Alexander of Phærea alſo began to act with greater moderation, and the preſence of Pelopidas diffuſed a quiet hitherto unfelt in theſe parts [t]. In this time Ptolemy Alorites, the baſe ſon of Amyntas, began to plot againſt king Alexander, and drew ſuch a number of Macedonian lords to his intereſt, as made the king's authority very precarious; he therefore applied to Pelopidas, intreating him, ſince he had quitted Theſſalia, to act as umpire in the diſputes between him and Ptolemy in Macedonia. Pelopidas, conſenting to what he deſired, marched immediately into Macedonia; and having there ſettled all things to the ſatisfaction of both parties, parties, it was agreed, that Philip the king's youngeſt brother ſhould be put into his hands as a hoſtage, and with ſome other young noblemen of Macedon be carried to Thebes, whither Pelopidas at preſent departed, and immediately after king Alexander was ſlain, and the kingdom transferred to his brother [u]. What were the original ſources of theſe diſputes in Macedon, hiſtorians do not inform us; but it is moſt likely, that the factions, formerly ſubſiſting in this kingdom and which Amyntas ſo hardly kept under, began to revive. However it was, of this we are certain, that, on the death of Alexander, all things fell into great confuſion, inſomuch, that the queen-mother thought neither herſelf nor her children ſafe, even as to their lives and private fortunes.

Perdiccas ſhould have mounted the throne on the demiſe of Alexander, and he did accordingly claim it; but was far from obtaining a peaceable poſſeſſion. Pauſanias, a prince of the royal houſe, ſet up for the kingdom as well as he, and was at firſt ſo grateful to the people, that the whole family of Amyntas were in the utmoſt danger. It happened fortunately for them, that the Athenians about this time ſent Iphicrates with a ſmall fleet to prepare things for the ſiege of Amphipolis; to him therefore on his arrival Eurydice applied herſelf; and on her intimation to him of the difficulties ſhe was under, Iphicrates with great alacrity repaired to the place of her reſidence. After the firſt civilities were over, Eurydice placing her two ſons upon her knees, ſhewed them to Iphicrates, and then putting the eldeſt into his hands, and placing the other upon his knee, ſhe ſpoke to him thus: "Generous Athenian, you know "perfectly well how tenderly Amyntas the father of theſe "orphans loved your country, and how ſincere an affection "he had for yourſelf, whom he adopted for a ſon; by "this double tie therefore you are bound to ſuccour my "diſtreſſed family. The friendſhip my huſband had for the "Athenians his dear allies, and his peculiar tenderneſs for "you, muſt conſpire to fill your breaſt with the ſentiments "of a brother in reſpect to theſe orphans." [x] Iphicrates, moved by the queen's tears and intreaties, eſpouſed her cauſe, turned his arms againſt Pauſanias, and compelled him to retire out of Macedon [x]. Perdiccas had little more quiet quiet from this friendly interpoſition of the Athenians; for ſcarce was Pauſanias retired, before Ptolemy Alorites pretended to the throne, and by degrees wrought himſelf into favour ſo with the people, that he outed his brothers, aſſumed the enſigns, and diſcharged the functions, of a king. Perdiccas did not, however quit his title, tho' only a ſmall part of the country owned it. He had always hopes, that either the Athenians or Thebans would ſupport him; but they, being much embarraſſed at home, neglected all his ſolicitations; till at laſt Pelopidas, moved with compaſſion towards the brother of a king with whom he had treated, drew together a few mercenaries, and, with no other authority than what he derived from the reputation of his virtue, marched towards Macedonia, in order to reſtore this deprived prince. Ptolemy raiſed an army to oppoſe him, and when their forces drew near to each other, he made privately ſuch offers to Pelopidas's mercenaries, that they immediately deſerted him, and went over to Alorites; yet this diſertion did not quiet Ptolemy's fears, who looked upon this as an eſcape only for the preſent; and fearing the reſentment of Pelopidas much more than many armies, he, of his own motive laid down his arms, and referred the difference between himſelf and his brother to that general's deciſion. He having declared, that the crown belonged to Perdiccas, the Macedonians ſo readily came into his ſentiments, that Ptolemy was forced to ſubmit y. Pelopidas, fearing, that, as ſoon as he was withdrawn, all things might fall again into confuſion, took hoſtages on both ſides; from Perdiccas his brother Philip, who was to have been ſent to Thebes before; from Ptolemy his ſon Philoxenus, with ſeveral young men his companions; and thus an end was put to all diſturbances here for the preſent. Eurydice doubtleſs was not a little fearful of giving up her darling Philip into the hands of ſtrangers; her concern, however, was ſomewhat abated, from the conſideration of the worth of Pelopidas, whom ſhe earneſtly beſought to take care of his education, which he not only promiſed, but very exactly fulfilled. On his return to Thebes, he placed the young prince in the hands of Epaminondas his friend, who had in his houſe a Pythagorean philoſopher of great reputation. Under his care Philip learned the principles of philoſophy, and under Epaminondas himſelf he acquired the art of war.

Thus

y Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

Thus his exile became beneficial, not only to himself but to his country; and he acquired amongst foreigners those abilities which enabled him afterwards to triumph over them. This was especially owing to his making Epaminondas his model; for by studying that great man's temper and disposition, he joined qualities which are seldom met with together, that is, indefatigable activity and a steady composure. As for his temperance, justice, disinterestedness, and candour, those Philip meddled not with, as suiting little with his temper and circumstances [z]. Perdiccas in the mean time governed Macedon with a mediocrity of fortune, till he came to be engaged in a war with the Illyrians, a very martial nation, the antient hereditary enemies of his subjects. Against these Perdiccas, at the head of a very considerable army, marched as soon as possible, that he might hinder them from plundering the country. A general engagement quickly ensued, wherein the Macedonians were routed with great slaughter, and which was still worse, with the loss of their king, who left behind him a son named Amyntas, then in his infancy; who, tho' the lawful heir of the kingdom, was unable to govern it; so that now a field was opened to civil dissensions, while at the same time the kingdom groaned under the weight of a foreign war [a].

SECT. IV.

The reign of Philip.

The miserable state of Macedon at Philip's accession. Year after the flood 2639. Year before Christ 360.

IT was the peculiar felicity of this prince, of whom we are now to record the actions, that his fame suffers no diminution, which ever end of his reign we consider, and whether we enquire from what condition he raised his kingdom, or to what height under his auspice it arrived. When he went suddenly and secretly from Thebes to Macedon, on the news of his brother's death, he found the people dejected, and the state in the utmost confusion, a king just slain, the whole strength of the kingdom routed, the the Illyrians preparing for a new invaſion, and the Peonians on the point of making one; a child on the throne, and two powerful competitors contriving to diſpoſſeſs him; Pauſanias, ſupported by the Thracians, and Argæus, to whoſe aſſiſtance the Athenians had ſent their general Mantias with an army: yet was Philip, tho' but twenty-two years old, ſo far from ſinking under this mighty load, that he not only kept up his own ſpirits, but invigorated and re-encouraged his deſpairing countrymen. He applied eſpecially to the army, whom he careſſed with the tendereſt expreſſions, and the nobility, whom he bound to his intereſt by the ſtrongeſt teſtimonies of confidence and vaſt promiſes. Things a little quieted at home, he began immediately to provide for what was requiſite to put foreign affairs in a better ſituation. In order to abate the vigour of the Athenian army, king Philip cauſed Amphipolis to be declared a free city, and left it to its inhabitants to govern it how they would. By this ſtep, tho' it ſeemed a leſſening to his kingdom, on account of the importance of the place, yet he was a great gainer; for chiefly for the ſake of this city the Athenians undertook the war and ſupported his competitor, and by leaving it free, he took away all ground of quarrel with reſpect to himſelf; and yet added nothing to the power of the Athenians in theſe parts. To the chief men in Peonia he made conſiderable preſents, and thereby avoided a diſpute in the field, for which as yet he was unprovided. By the ſame arts he took off Pauſanias, his friends knowing well, that, to a feeble ſtate, gaining time is gaining all [a] (A).

(A) The diſcerning reader will eaſily perceive, that we have taken the liberty to diſcourſe large on the policy of Philip, which is indeed a liberty we ought to account for, this work being intended for an univerſal regiſter of facts, not of lectures upon them. Firſt then, let it be obſerved, that this was the moſt glorious reign which was ever ſeen in Macedon; for Alexander cannot be ſaid to have reigned in Macedon after his conqueſts; on the contrary he rather deſpiſed it; and of his ſucceſſors none, in point of prudence, fortune, or true greatneſs, can be compared with Philip. It is requiſite therefore, that this reign, which laid

His prudence in settling affairs civil and military.

That the best use might be made of this interval of quiet, Philip, who at first acted as guardian only to his nephew

laid the foundation of the Greek empire, should be copiously treated of. Secondly, the reign of Philip, tho' crowded with wars, and adorned with many remarkable victories, was, however, a reign of policy, in which the judgment of the prince wrought more than the force of the people. The Macedonians were a brave and generous nation before his time; but it was he who fixed fortune to their arms, and, by making a right use of their valour, procured them those advantages they had deserved, but had scarce tasted before. He found them a nation inured to war; yet he taught them a new discipline, incomparably better than any at that time in use, by which they were enabled to bear away the victory, not only from more numerous armies, but from the best troops in Greece, having also numbers on their side; such as the Phocians, who made war a trade; and the Athenians, in pitched battles held, till then, the experteſt among the Greeks. He found his subjects low, beaten, and alike without spirits and without allies. He left them feared by their neighbours, dreaded by the great king, and sovereigns of Greece, and all this by dint of genius. Thirdly, they who opposed Philip, considered him rather as a politician than as a hero (unless we take that in the oriental sense, and conceive it to signify a person distinguishable alike for the excellence of his wisdom and for his extraordinary valour). His enemies, I say, considered him in this light, and so ought we, otherwise we shall have but an imperfect idea of his character, as is ingeniously hinted by a great French writer, who says, Philip is in esteem only with such as understand history (1). Our political reflections are inserted for that very purpose. We have collected them from the best authors, not invented them ourselves; and we have inserted them in such places only, as with great difficulty would be intelligible without them. This much on this subject may suffice; let us close this note with a few words on the school wherein Philip learned this extraordinary wisdom: It was the house of Polymnas the father of Epaminondas, the greatest man among the Gree[illegible], if we will subscribe to the opinion of the most judicious of the Romans (2), frequented by the most learned and the most virtuous citizens of Thebes, wherein Lysidas nephew Amyntas the ſon of Perdiccas, laying the youth aſide, ſtept into the throne, with the unanimous conſent of the Macedonians, who declared, that neceſſity ought to ſupercede loyalty; and that ſince the public ſafety required a man, they ought not to pay allegiance to a child. He then proceeded to introduce a new and ſtricter diſcipline among the troops, which probably he had learned from the Thebans, at leaſt in part. He particularly inſtituted, or rather modelled, the phalanx, and taught the ſoldiers how to become more formidable from order and a juſt conception of the rules of war, than from force; and by the help of frequent inſtructions, kind language, and, when it was neceſſary, ſome bold ſtrokes of ſeverity, he attained his end. Moſt authors attribute all things in the Macedonian diſcipline to Philip, which in one ſenſe is certainly true, but in another falſe. Philip fixed the rules of diſcipline amongſt his troops; but it is not likely he invented them, which, tho' a new opinion, is yet probable, as we ſhall ſhew in a note (B). Argæus with a body of mercenaries

Lyſidas of Tarentum read his lectures (3). In all probability Philip rather ſtudied Epaminondas, than any ſyſtem of philoſophy. That great man raiſed Thebes to be miſtreſs of Greece; Philip did the ſame by Macedon. Epaminondas looked on diſcipline as the main ſkill of a general, as well as the main ſtrength of an army; Philip taught it his Macedonians, and took care they ſhould not forget his leſſons. Epaminondas was ſecret and ſudden in all his enterprizes; ſo was Philip. We might eaſily carry the parallel farther; but this is enough to ſhew, that what Plutarch (4) and others of the antients have advanced on this head, is well founded, and that we ought to regard this Macedonian ſtateſman as a copy of the Theban.

(B) It is certain, that in a ſtrict ſenſe Philip could not be the inventor of the phalanx, ſince we find the Purgos or Tower, which was a kind of phalanx, and the very reverſe of the plinthion or tile, mentioned by Homer (5). To ſay the truth, the phalanx was in uſe among the Greeks in general, as our preſent learned and venerable primate has fully demonſtrated (6), tho' it is probable, that the Macedonian phalanx was better diſpoſed, and thoſe who compoſed it better diſciplined, than any of the Greek naries advancing as far as Ægæ, and being conſtrained by the citizens to retire, Philip determined to try the mettle of his troops by purſuing them; which accordingly he did, and coming up with them, engaged and defeated them with great ſlaughter; an action which mightily revived and encouraged the Macedonian army, taught them to confide in their prince, and to diſcern the ſingular advantages they received from regular diſcipline. The king, however, ſhewed on this occaſion the moderation which diſtinguiſhed his character from moſt of the chieftains of his age, by admitting a great body of troops, which had retired to an eminence, to a compoſition. By this method he ſecured a preſent victory, and eſtabliſhed a reputation of clemency, which proved of infinite ſervice.

Greek armies had been before. Officers uſually improve one on the other. The Spartans were famed in the earlieſt times of Greece for exact order; then the Athenians came into high reputation from the improvements made by Iphicrates; after theſe came Epaminondas, or rather Pelopidas, who taught war as an art to the Thebans, from whom Philip learned it, and quickly ſurpaſſed his maſters. That he was not, however, the firſt who introduced the phalanx into Macedon, ſeems evident from the teſtimony of Diodorus, who tells us, the Illyrians, when firſt attacked by Philip, had their plinthion (7); and inaſmuch as they lay farther from Greece than the Macedonians, it would be unreaſonable to ſuppoſe them better skilled in the Greek diſcipline; we muſt therefore conceive, that the phalanx was known to his countrymen before the reign of Philip, tho' it was new-modelled, and received a freſh ſet of rules from him; which diſcipline became peculiar to them, rendering the Macedonian infantry invincible then, and admirable yet. Whoever reads Ælian (8) will diſcern, that the whole doctrine of drawing up armies conformable to the ground aſſigned for the line of battle, the methods of changing theſe forms, marching, countermarching, charging, retreating, and encamping, was thoroughly ſtudied by the Grecians, and practiſed by the Spartans, Athenians, Thebans, Theſſalians, &c. with great facility and ſucceſs. As this art

IMMEDIATELY after this victory, he diſpatched embaſſadors to Athens, and having inſtructed them to give up all his right to Amphipolis, he eaſily procured a peace; for tho' the Athenians drew great benefit from their colonies and conqueſts in Thrace and Macedon, yet the vaſt expence of ſending and of maintaining armies there, diſcouraged them much, and inclined them to make peace whenever it was offered them, eſpecially on honourable terms, which, as they conſiſted chiefly in words, Philip failed not in gratifying them [d]. Another thing which contributed to the ſpeedy concluſion of this peace was, the mean opinion the Athenians had of Philip's power, which inclined them to believe all his embaſſadors told them, and made them little apprehenſive of his breaking the peace. Thus delivered from one potent art of diſcipline was of great conſequence and public utility, it was taught by public profeſſors, ſtiled Tactici, or maſters in military exerciſe, from a verb ſignifying to exerciſe. That what we have advanced may be juſtified, as well by authority as from probable conjecture, it will be neceſſary to remark, that Ælian before mentioned expreſly mentions the alterations introduced by Philip in the evolutions of the Macedonian phalanx; whence it is evident, he did not either invent or introduce the phalanx itſelf. The great change he made, was in the mode of their altering their wings, at the beginning of an engagement. According to the old method, the motion contrived to effect this purpoſe had the air of a retreat; Philip had penetration enough to perceive, that this motion reverſed would effect the ſame thing, and yet ſhew rather as an onſet. As all things are of the utmoſt conſequence which have a tendency to encourage the ſoldiery, Philip laid aſide the old method, and brought in this which had been practiſed by the Lacedæmonians (9). To theſe remarks we may add one general one, that diſcipline, under the eye of an able general, renders troops invincible; but, under officers of ſmall abilities, it is far from being of ſuch high advantage. Men of inferior genii have no idea of thoſe changes which the alterations induced by time require, and therefore, by adhering too ſcrupulouſly to old rules, ruin themſelves and thoſe under their command, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew, when we come to ſpeak of the conqueſt of Macedonia by the Romans.

potent enemy by his own addreſs, nature quickly freed him from another, by taking off Agis king of Pæonia. This news no ſooner reached the ears of Philip, than he determined to lay hold of this opportunity of revenging himſelf of the Pæonians, and accordingly invaded their country, took their cities, and reduced them to ſuch extremities, that they were conſtrained to ſubmit to him, and become his ſubjects. This war thus happily concluded, he without delay marched againſt the Illyrians, with an army of ten thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe. This was one of the boldeſt and moſt martial nations in thoſe parts, and had within a few years often beaten the Macedonians. Bradylis, however, who was their king, offered to treat with Philip of a peace, on this condition, that each ſhould keep what he poſſeſſed. Philip anſwered, that he always preferred peace to war, but could not think of obtaining it, by quitting his claim to thoſe places in Macedonia at preſent in the hands of the Illyrians. Bradylis upon this encouraged his troops, from the conſideration of their victories, to behave gallantly; and with ten thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, offered Philip battle. The engagement was both bloody and obſtinate, and, as Diodorus Siculus intimates, the Illyrians had their phalanx as well as the Macedonians. In the end, however, chiefly thro' the conduct of Philip, who brought a body of horſe to charge the Illyrians in flank, whilſt himſelf with the phalanx charged in front, the enemy was routed, and the Macedonians purſued, and ſlew in the whole no leſs than ſeven thouſand men; which exceedingly broke and diſordered the Illyrians, and conſtrained them to buy a peace at the expence of all their conqueſts [c].

By this time the affairs of Macedon were in a tolerable poſture, and Philip, from the ſucceſs which he already had experienced, animated to greater things. It is not probable, that he already meditated the ſubjection of Greece, becauſe as yet he was maſter of no force adequate to ſuch an undertaking, but it is moſt likely he propoſed even now the rendering his kingdom not only independent, but raiſing it to a ſtate of pre-eminence over its neighbours. Whatever his views were, he did not continue long at reſt, but ſuddenly, and when it was leaſt expected, attacked Amphipolis. This city, as we have already ſeen, was always a mighty curſe to the Macedonian princes, and therefore, from the beginning

ning of his reign, Philip had kept his eye continually thereupon, watching for a fit time to reduce it. The Amphipolitans, ſenſible of the danger to which they were expoſed, ſent Hierax and Stratocles to Athens, to offer themſelves and their city to that commonwealth. Demoſthenes, and thoſe who with him foreſaw how formidable Philip would one day become, ſeconded the deputies of Amphipolis; but the agents of Philip giving out, that the king intended to deliver it up to the Athenians when taken, they ſuffered themſelves to be amuſed, and denied the Amphipolitans relief. Philip proſecuted the ſiege briſkly, both by force without, and by negotiation within. At laſt he took it by ſtorm, and treated it as he did other places, that is, he put to death or baniſhed ſuch as were not in his intereſt, and treated the reſt of the inhabitants kindly. This blow once ſtruck, he proceeded to reduce Pydna and Potidæa, in the laſt of which was an Athenian garriſon, which he drew out, and diſmiſſed with all the marks of honour. After this he delivered the city to the Olynthians, according to his maxim, "That thoſe are to be obliged whom we cannot overcome". Theſe conqueſts made a great noiſe, and Philip now began to grow terrible to all his neighbours [f]. If this terror had engaged them in a league, in all probability they had ſet very narrow bounds to the Macedonian king; but as it produced a deſire of obliging the conqueror, and turning his arms from themſelves, the bordering nations concurred to ruin each other; and this they did the more effectually, becauſe Philip was ſo perfect a maſter in diſſimulation, that he ſeemed to give implicit credit to whatever was told him, tho' at the ſame time he communicated his real ſentiments to nobody, his ſucceſs being known as ſoon as his deſign.

Subdues the country between the rivers Strymon and Neſſus. Year after the flood 2642. Year before Chriſt 357.

We have heretofore ſhewn, in our deſcription of Macedonia, that the tract of country between the rivers Strymon and Neſſus, was extremely rich in gold. Indeed the fame of its mines had made it often change its maſters. When the Athenians were firſt powerful at ſea, it belonged to the Thaſians, from whom they conquered it. This republic declining, it fell into other hands; and a few years before this time the Thracians poſſeſſed themſelves of it, and fortified Crenides its capital city. Philip, who looked upon gold as the beſt weapon, and the the beſt ſervant in the world, reſolved to ſeize upon this country, and to extract out of its bowels a treaſure ſufficient to buy that empire for which he ſo paſſionately longed. He executed this ſcheme before it was known that he had formed it, and having taken Crenides, he not only altered the city, but in a manner rebuilt it, changeing its name into Philippi [h]. He likewiſe gave directions for working the gold mines to greater advantage than had been made of them before, and having by this means eſtabliſhed a certain revenue of a thouſand talents per annum, which was in itſelf a large ſum, and ſo much the larger in that it was extracted out of the earth, and not from his ſubjects, he began to turn his eyes towards other conqueſts.

The birth of Alexander the Great. Year after the flood 2643. Year before Chriſt 356.

IN the firſt year of the one hundred and ſixth olympiad, Philip, being then in the field received advice that his wife Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus king of Epirus, was brought to bed of a ſon at Pella. This ſon was the famous Alexander juſtly ſurnamed the Great. At the ſame time Philip received advice, that his chariot had gained the prize at the olympic games; and upon the heels of this a third courier came, with an account that Parmenio had beaten the Illyrians. This ſurprizing run of good fortune is ſaid to have affected Philip ſo much, that he wiſhed it might be tempered by ſome ſlight miſhap; not that he was inſenſible of felicity, but becauſe he was afraid that his fortune might decline as ſwiftly as it had riſen (C).

(C) The birth of Alexander we have fixed to the firſt year of the one hundred and ſixth olympiad. Antient authors are much divided on this head, and therefore it is but reaſonable to ſhew on what grounds we have adhered to ſome, and rejected the authority of others (10). Arrian from Ariſtobulus informs us, that Alexander died in the month of Thargelion the laſt but one of the Attic year, in the cloſe of the firſt year of the one hundred and fourteenth olympiad, being then thirty-two years and eight months old (11). This plainly refers his birth to the year wherein we have fixed it. Ælian indeed ſays expreſly,

(10) Euſeb. Chronicon. (11) Arrian. expedit. Alex. l. ix.

AT this time all Greece was in confuſion; the Phocian, or, as it was otherwiſe called, the ſacred war, of the cauſe and conſequences of which we have ſpoken elſewhere [k], then raged with prodigious fury, which gave Philip an opportunity of ſecuring and extending his frontiers without interruption. It alſo produced various applications from the contending parties, in order to incline his aſſiſtance, the effects of which we ſhall hereafter ſee. In the mean time, let us follow the track of his conqueſts. The little city of Methone had given him the ſame umbrage; he conceived that his conqueſts in Thrace might be in ſome danger, if it fell into the hands of his enemies; to prevent which he immediately inveſted it. The inhabitants made expreſly, that he was born and died on the ſixth day of the month Thargelion (12). Plutarch places his birth in the month Hecatombeon, which, he ſays, anſwered to the Macedonian month Lous (13); but in this he was miſtaken, for it appears clearly from a letter of Philip's ſtill preſerved in the orations of Demoſthenes, that at this time the Macedonian month Lous did not anſwer to the Attic month Hecatombeon, but to the month Boedromeon (14). In after-times indeed the month Lous anſwered to Hecatombeon, which, without doubt, was the ſource of Plutarch's miſtake in this point. Plutarch hath fallen alſo into another miſtake on this ſubject; he ſays, that Philip received this news immediately after he he had taken Potidæa; yet, without doubt, Potidæa was taken two years before, viz. in the third year of the one hundred and fifth olympiad, where we have placed it, on the authority of Demoſthenes, who was Philip's cotemporary (15). and of Diodorus Siculus, a more accurate writer in point of Chronology than Plutarch (16). There is one thing which may be urged againſt thus ſettling the birth of Alexander as we have done, and that is, his father's receiving the news of his victory in the olympic games on that very day (17). But admitting that this is improbable, had we not better allow that Philip received this news a little before, than depart from a fact ſo clearly and ſo exactly ſettled by Ariſtobulus, who is acknowledged to have been the moſt authentic hiſtorian in whoſe works the actions of Alexander were found?

a very ſtout defence, and ſubmitted at laſt, on condition, that they might have free leave to quit the place, which was agreed to and executed ; after which Philip cauſed the city to be razed, and divided its territories among his ſoldiers[1]. At this ſiege he had the misfortune to loſe an eye, by a very extraordinary accident if the circumſtances tranſmitted to us may be believed (D). This evil was, however, in ſome meaſure alleviated by the skill of his ſurgeon, who,

(D) There is ſomething ſo fabulous in the ſtory we are told of Philip's loſing his eye before this place, that we could not judge it fit to appear with thoſe circumſtances in the body of our hiſtory. The reader, when he has peruſed the relation as it is commonly told, will judge of the propriety of our conduct. It is ſaid, that when Philip inveſted Methone, one Aſter, a moſt excellent archer, was recommended to him with this commendation, that he could ſtrike the ſwifteſt bird in its flight. Very well, replied Philip, we will call for him when we make war with ſtarlings. This ſo ſtung the archer, that he immediately threw himſelf into the city beſieged, from the walls of which, when Philip was one day viewing the place, he diſcharged an arrow with this inſcription, For the right eye of Philip ; which it accordingly ſtruck, and put out. The king ſhot back the ſame arrow with this anſwer on the oppoſite ſide, Philip when the town is taken will cauſe Aſter to be hanged ; which he alſo performed (18). It was not here only that Philip felt the effects of war ; his courage puſhed him into all places of danger ; and darts, ſtones, and javelins make no diſtinction of perſons. Demoſthenes therefore, who cannot be ſuſpected of flattering Philip, could not forbear, when the ſubject afforded him a proper occaſion, painting his perſonal bravery in ſuch a light, as might have routed the Athenians to emulation. " I will ſhew you, ſaid that glorious orator, this ſame " Philip, with whom we diſpute for ſovereignty and empire ; I " will ſhew him to you as he is covered with wounds, blind of " an eye, his ſkull cracked, lame of a hand and of a leg, " ready to throw himſelf into the midſt of new dangers, and " to put it into the power of fortune to deprive him of ſome " other limb, in hopes with the remainder of his body to live " with glory and honour ; ſuch, Athenians, is Philip (19) !". It muſt be owned, that if in the reſt of his orations Demoſthenes hath ſhewn this monarch to be a very bad man, he has here acknow-

who, tho' he could not ſave its ſight, preſerved the form of the king's eye from ſuffering any diſfigurement [m]; yet the king was ſo much chagrined thereat, as never afterwards to hear the word Cylop, or even an Eye, mentioned with patience [n]; a ſtrange weakneſs in ſo great a man!

As ſoon as Philip was recovered, he began to think of marching into Theſſaly, where the petty princes of the country earneſtly deſired his preſence, to redreſs thoſe miſchiefs which the ambition of a ſingle family had brought upon all Theſſaly. Alexander of Phærea, the original tyrant, had been murdered for his inſupportable arrogance, by his wife and his brethren, who thereupon grew into great reputation with the Theſſalians; but Lycophron the elder brother aſſuming the government, and acting no better than Alexander had done, the Alluadœ, ſo the Theſſalian chiefs are called, addreſſed themſelves to Philip, and beſought his protection. He, having ſettled his affairs in Thrace and on the ſea-coaſts, marched into Theſſaly, and made war on Lycophron; who, finding himſelf too weak to conteſt with the Macedonian foot, joined with the Theſſalian cavalry, demanded aid of the Phocians, or rather of Onomarchus their general, who ſent his brother Phayllus with ſeven thouſand men, to preſerve Lycophron in his dominions. The tyrant, after the junction of theſe troops, no longer declined battle; yet his ſucceſs no way anſwered his expectation, for he was defeated by Philip, and the Phocians driven out of Theſſaly. Onomarchus hearing this marched with all his forces to ſupport Lycophron, and in two general engagements vanquiſhed Philip, and compelled him to retire out of Theſſaly in great diſtreſs. But tho' his army was beaten, his ſpirit remained unconquered ſtill; ſo that perceiving the reduction of Theſſaly was abſolutely neceſſary to his propoſed empire, he applied himſelf with all diligence to the recruiting of his army; and, as ſoon as it was in a tolerable condition, marched immediately againſt Lycophron. The tyrant did not wait his coming; but withdrawing his troops into a ſecure camp, ſent again to acknowledged him to be the greateſt prince of his time; which it is certain was a character ſo much his due, that how much ſoever they might ſeek to leſſen, even his enemies could not deny him.

to invite the Phocians to his aſſiſtance. Onomarchus being determined to put an end to the war, marched with twenty thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, to oppoſe the Macedonian. Philip in the mean time had prevailed on the Theſſalians to make their utmoſt efforts in his favour; ſo that at length his forces conſiſted of twenty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, and then he no longer delayed a general battle. This action proved deciſive, chiefly through the valour of the Theſſalian horſe; for the princes who commanded them, knowing that they were to expect nothing but deſtruction from Lycophron, if he prevailed, fought with deſperate reſolution; inſomuch, that ſix thouſand of the Phocians were ſlain upon the ſpot, and amongſt them their general, and three thouſand were taken priſoners. There had been ſtill a greater ſlaughter, if the engagement had not happened on the ſea-ſhore, when the Athenian fleet commanded by Chares paſſed by, and thereby afforded ſuch of the Phocians as could ſwim a refuge. Philip cauſed the body of Onomarchus to be ſearched for, and when it was found, he directed it to be hung up with ignominy, denying alſo funeral rites to all that were ſlain, looking on them as ſacrilegious perſons for having violated the temple at Delphi. Lycophron and his brother Pitholaus, ſeeing no hopes of retaining their principality, were content to reſign it; and being diſmiſſed on giving their oaths to be quiet, they delivered up the city of Phærea into the hands of Philip, who, as he had promiſed the Theſſalians, reſtored all the cities to liberty, and having thereby ſecured the friendſhip of ſo powerful a nation, he attempted to paſs through the Pylæ, in order to make war upon the Phocians [o]. This was a very bold attempt; for ſince the defeat of the Perſians at Platæa, no Macedonian prince had ever ſet foot in Greece. The Athenians therefore, having notice of his deſign, marched with the utmoſt expedition, ſeized the paſſes, and obliged him for this time to abandon his purpoſe and return into Macedon [p].

Meditates the ruin of the Athenian power.

We may reaſonably look on this retreat as the æra of Philip's hatred to the Athenians. He ſaw that they were the only people in Greece capable of defeating his projects, or or of giving him uneaſineſs in his own kingdom; he therefore provided with much diligence a fleet compoſed of light ſhips, which continually diſturbed their trade, and at the ſame time enriched his ſubjects by bringing in wealthy prizes. He alſo encreaſed his army by bringing in new levies, and projected the deſtruction of the Athenian colonies in Thrace. Beſides theſe preparations at home, he practiſed very ſucceſsfully in Athens itſelf; and by large appointments ſecured ſome eminent orators to charm the people with deluſive hopes of peace, or to frighten them with very expenſive eſtimates, while they pretended a zeal for carrying on the war. Demoſthenes was the only man in Athens, who had a juſt idea of the danger his country was in from the growing power of Philip, and who had likewiſe capacity enough to point out the proper methods for reducing his exorbitant greatneſs [q]. He ſhewed the Athenians, that the meaſures they had hitherto purſued were unworthy of them, and would never anſwer their ends. He told them, that running hither and thither, according as they heard that Philip marched this way or that, looked more like following him as their general, than making war upon him as their enemy; he therefore adviſed tranſporting two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe into Macedonia, aſſuring them, that if they had once an army, how ſmall ſoever, there, the enemies of Philip would ſoon advance it to a formidable greatneſs [r]. The Athenians approved, but they did not follow, his advice; all the effect it had was this, that Philip, being informed of it, provided with greater vigour, and determined at all events to have neither ſtate nor prince independent of himſelf within the limits of Macedon, that the Athenians might be deprived of all hopes of treating him as they had done his anceſtors, viz. compelling them, by the aſſiſtance given to their neighbours, either to put all to the hazard of an unequal war, or to become abſolute dependents on their republic [s].

Makes war on Olynthus. Year of the flood 2649. Before Chriſt 350.

Olynthus had now, in a great meaſure, recovered that power and authority, which it had when Amyntas the father of Philip called in the Lacedæmonians to aſſiſt him in making war againſt it. Philip himſelf had contributed to this recovery, by giving up thereto certain cities and territories, when he firſt began his conqueſts; but this was only

only to lull the Olynthians aſleep, and to ſave himſelf the expence of gariſons, when it ſuited not his circumſtances to maintain them [t]; but now, when his affairs were altered, he began to think not only of reſuming what he had beſtowed, but of making himſelf maſter of Olynthus, and thereby ſubverting a republic, which had been heretofore an over-match for Macedon. The Olynthians were too diſcerning not to ſuſpect Philip's deſign, before he actually put it in execution; as ſoon therefore as they obſerved that he was advancing towards the Chalcidian region, they put themſelves on their guard, and ſent embaſſadors to Athens to entreat a conſiderable and ſpeedy aſſiſtance. Demoſthenes failed not to eſpouſe the cauſe of the Olynthians. He begun with putting the Athenians in mind, that till now they had held the ballance between the kings of Macedon and this ſtate; and that, if they held it not ſtill, they were as ſure to be ruined as the Olynthians themſelves. Hence he inferred, that a prompt and conſiderable ſuccour ſhould be ſent according to the requeſt of the embaſſadors, and that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed for abrogating ſuch laws, as hindered the ſetling the neceſſary funds for carrying on a war of ſuch importance with vigour [u]. Demades and the reſt of the orators, who were corrupted by Philip, oppoſed this propoſition with all their eloquence; but as they had not either truth on their ſide, or a power of ſpeaking equal to Demoſthenes, the people inclined to follow his advice [w], and accordingly decreed, that relief ſhould be ſent to the Olynthians. Philip in the mean time took Zeira, a town in the Chalcidian region, and razed it to the ground. He ſoon after marched againſt Mycaberna and Torone, both of which he ſubdued. After this he openly attacked the Olynthians, defeated them twice in the field, and at laſt ſhut them up in their city [x]. The Athenian ſuccours conſiſted of mercenaries, which therefore did the Olynthians but little ſervice, and were beſides ſo much ſuſpected, that they were little leſs dreaded than the Macedonians themſelves; the citizens therefore ſent embaſſadors a ſecond time to Athens, to entreat freſh aſſiſtance, and that it might be of Athenian troops. Demoſthenes ſeconded this propoſition with his uſual uſual vehemence, and on his motion Chares was ſent a ſecond time with ſeventeen gallies, and a land army of two thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, all citizens of Athens; but, alas! the cordial came too late. It did indeed revive the fainting ſpirits of the Olynthians for a time; and the Athenians hearing of ſome ſlight ſucceſſes of theirs, grew ſo elate that they took no farther care of the war, as appears from an oration of Demoſthenes yet remaining [y]; but in the end Olynthus was taken, not ſo much by the bravery of the Macedonian troops, as by Philip's corrupting its principal magiſtrates, Euthycrates and Laſthenes, who baſely betraying their country, after the city had made a glorious defence, ſecretly opened its gates, and let in Philip and his army. The king on this occaſion proceeded with great ſeverity; he gave up the houſes of the citizens to be plundered, and expoſed their perſons to ſale, acquiring thereby an immenſe treaſure, at the ſame time as he ridded himſelf of ſuch as were his implacable enemies. After this he celebrated olympic games in honour of this victory, which happened in the one hundred and eighth olympiad, cauſing ſplendid ſhews to be exhibited for the diverſion of his army, making magnificent feaſts, at which they might be merry, and giving great rewards to ſuch as had ſignalized themſelves during the ſiege, that his ſoldiers might be encouraged to ſerve him both gallantly and faithfully [z]. Year after the flood 2651. Year before Chriſt 348.

Two incidents happened amidſt theſe ſolemnities, which deſerve to be recorded, becauſe they ſhew the temper of Philip on both ſides, and conſequently muſt enable us to form a better idea of the motives on which he acted, than we could poſſibly have done without them; for without doubt the reaſons of actions are better found by knowing the mind of the actor, than by the moſt circumſtantial accounts of the things acted. The firſt of theſe incidents was a complaint brought by Euthycrates and Laſthenes againſt the Macedonian ſoldiers for calling them traitors. To which Philip gave this anſwer, You muſt never mind what ſuch fellows ſay; they are a ſort of clowniſh people, who will call a ſpade a ſpade [a]. As to the other remarkable incident, Satyrus a player, whom Philip

Philip had admitted to a great familiarity with him, was the only person who wore a grave countenance, and reached not out his hand to receive any of the gifts which Philip bestowed upon his friends. The king observed it, and with his usual complacency asked him, How he came to look so dull? and why he would not suffer himself to be obliged as well as other people? To which Satyrus answered, I don't either affect gravity, Sir, or put any slight on your presents; on the contrary, I should be extremely glad if you would give me yonder girls, pointing to two young women who were among the slaves; they are the daughters of a man in whose house I lodged. I ask them not out of greediness, but with an intent to give them such portions as may procure them honest husbands. Philip commended his generosity, granted his request, and loaded him with presents of great value [b]. This affability, and particular care in rewarding every man who served him, gained Philip friends in every city, and made them eager to run any risque to obtain his favour. He was sensible of this, and was so far from being ashamed of it, that he was wont to say publicly, that he was no less indebted to his purse than to his sword.

He overreaches the Athenians.

The Phocian war was still unextinguished, and Philip, tho' he affected a neutrality, placed all his hopes in putting an end to this war, and thereby making himself the arbiter of Greece. His hopes were well founded. The Thebans, who were at the head of the league formed for reducing the Phocians, sollicited him on one side; the states confederate with the Phocians sought his friendship on the other. He answered neither, yet held in dependence both. In his heart he favoured the Thebans, or rather placed his hopes of favouring his own cause on that state; for he knew well enough, that the Athenians, Spartans, and other states allied with Phocis, would never suffer him to pass Thermopylæ, and lead an army into their territories [c]; yet he shewed so much respect to the embassadors from these states, particularly to Ctesiphon and Phrynon, who were sent from Athens, that they believed the king was in their interest, and reported as much to their masters. The Athenians, who were now dissolved in ease and and luxury, and conſequently were afraid of being diſturbed with wars, received this news with great ſatisfaction, and named immediately ten plenipotentiaries to go and treat of a full and laſting peace with Philip. Of the number of theſe plenipotentiaries were Demoſthenes and Æſchines, the moſt eminent orators in Athens. The king of Macedon gave directions, that theſe embaſſadors ſhould be treated with the utmoſt civility, naming at the ſame time three of his miniſters to confer with them, viz. Antipater, Parmenio, and Eurylochus. Demoſthenes being obliged to return to Athens, recommended it to his collegues not to carry on their negotiations with Philip's deputies, but to proceed with all diligence to court, there to confer with the king himſelf. On this, he told them, all things would depend, as on what they did depended the ſafety of their country. The embaſſadors, however, were ſo far from following the inſtructions of Demoſthenes, that they ſuffered themſelves to be put off for three months by the arts of Philip and his miniſters. In the mean time the king took from the Athenians ſuch places in Thrace as might beſt cover his frontiers, giving their plenipotentiaries in their ſtead abundance of fair promiſes, and the ſtrongeſt aſſurances, that his good-will ſhould be as beneficial to them as ever their colonies had been. At laſt a peace was concluded; but then the ratification of it was deferred till Philip had poſſeſſed himſelf of Phærea in Theſſaly, and ſaw himſelf at the head of a numerous army; then he ratified the treaty, and diſmiſſed the plenipotentiaries with aſſurances, that he would be ready at all times to give the Athenians proofs of his friendſhip. On their return to Athens, when this matter came to be debated before the people, Demoſthenes plainly told them, that in his opinion, the promiſes of Philip ought not to be relied on, becauſe they appeared to be of little ſignificance in themſelves, and came from a prince of ſo much art and ſo little fidelity, that they could derive no authority from their maker [d]. Æſchines, on the other hand, gave it as his ſentiment, that the king of Macedon's aſſurances ought to give them full ſatisfaction. He ſaid, that, for his part, he was not politician enough to ſee any thing of diſguiſe or diſſimulation in the king's conduct; that there was great danger in diſtruſting princes, and that the ſureſt method of putting men upon deceit, was to ſhew that we ſuſpected them of it. The reſt of the plenipotentiaries concurred with with Æschines; and the people, desirous of quiet and prone to pleasure, easily gave credit to all that was said, and decreed that the peace should be kept. All this was the easier brought about, because that Phocion, the worthiest man in the republic, did not oppose Philip; which was owing to his having a just sense of the state his country was in. He conceived, that the Athenians of those times were nothing like their ancestors, and therefore, as he expressed himself on another occasion, he was desirous, since they would not be at the head of Greece themselves, they would at least be upon good terms with that power which would be so [e].

He enters Phocis, and puts an end to the sacred war.

Philip, who knew how to use, as well as to procure, opportunity, while the Athenians were in this good humour, passed Thermopylæ, without their knowing whether he would fall on Phocis or Thebes; but he quickly undeceived them, by commanding his soldiers to put on crowns of laurel, declaring them thereby the troops of Apollo, and himself the lieutenant-general of that god. He then immediately entered Phocis, with an air of triumph, as if thunder and lightening had been at his command; which so terrified the Phocians, whom he had caused to be proclaimed sacrilegious persons, that they immediately dismissed all thoughts of defence, and without more ado submitted to his mercy. Thus the Phocian war, which had so long employed all Greece, was ended without a stroke, Phalæcus, with eight thousand mercenaries, being permitted to march off into Peloponnesus, and the judgment on the Phocians remitted to the Amphictyons, or grand council of Greece. By their decree the walls of three Phocian cities were demolished, the people were forbid to inhabit in any but villages, to pay a yearly tribute of six talents, and never to make use of horses or arms, till they had repaid to the temple of Apollo the money they had taken sacrilegiously from thence. Their arms were taken from them, broken to pieces, and burnt; their double voice in the council was taken from them and given to the Macedonians. Other orders were made for resettling the affairs both of religion and state throughout Greece, all of which were executed by Philip with great exactness and moderation, paying the most profound respect to the council; and when he had performed its commands, retiring peaceably with his army back to Macedon, don, which gained him great reputation [f]. This ſeems to have been one of the greateſt atchievements of his life, and that which laid the foundation of his empire. Hence one hiſtorian remarks, that the Grecians paid the next honours to divinity, to a prince who had vindicated the honour of the gods [g]; and another tells us, that from this time forward Philip proſpered in all things, which was thought to be the juſt reward of his piety, and the care he had taken in reſtoring the worſhip of Apollo and a general quiet to Greece [h]. Year after the flood 3653. Before Chriſt 346.

AT Athens alone the juſtice and piety of Philip was not underſtood. The people began to ſee, tho' a little of the lateſt, that they had been abuſed and deceived by thoſe who had negotiated the late peace; they ſaw, that, through their acceptance of it, the Phocians were deſtroyed, that Philip was become maſter of Thermopylæ, and might enter Greece when he pleaſed; that in abandoning their allies they had abandoned themſelves; and that, in all probability, they might ſoon feel the weight of his power, whom they had ſo fooliſhly truſted: they therefore began to take new and violent meaſures; they ordered, that the women ſhould retire out of the villages into the city, their walls ſhould be repaired, and their forts new ſtrengthened. They ſeemed inclined to queſtion Philip's election into the council of the Amphictyons, becauſe it had been done without their conſent, and even to proceed to an open war. In all likelihood they had carried things to extravagancy, if Demoſthenes had not interpoſed. He told them, that tho' he was not for making the peace, he was, however, for keeping it; and that he ſaw no manner of occaſion for their entering into ſo unequal a conteſt as would needs enſue, if they took up arms, not only againſt Philip, but againſt all the ſtates concurring with him in the late tranſactions. This ſeems to have cooled the rage of the Athenians, and to have brought them to think of ruining Philip by degrees, as by degrees they had raiſed him [i] (E). Athenians ready to declare againſt him. Diopithes with an Athenian army enters Macedon, while Philip invades Thrace.

Year after the flood 2665. Before Chriſt 334.

The fame of his atchievements without the bounds of Macedon having diſpoſed the ſubjects of Philip to hope every thing from his conduct, and the ſeveral ſtates of Greece to deſire above all things his friendſhip; that prudent monarch laid hold of this favourable ſituation to fix his dominion on ſuch a ſtable foundation, as that a reverſe of fortune ſhould not immediately deſtroy it. To this end, while he carried on his negotiations through Greece, he likewiſe kept his army in exerciſe by taking ſeveral places in Thrace, which terribly incommoded the Athenians [k]. ledging, that it has been generally eſteemed his, and, as ſuch, as conſtantly maintained its place in his works. This would be ſufficient for our purpoſe; but in truth, the arguments on which the oppoſite ſentiment is built are ſo eaſily overturned, that we might be juſtly blamed for neglecting ſo favourable an occaſion of ſetting this point in its true light. Demoſthenes, ſay thoſe who will not allow this oration to be his, charged Æſchines with betraying his country on account of his recommending warmly a peace with Philip; they cannot therefore think, that Demoſthenes would run openly into thoſe meaſures, which he had ſo lately and ſo warmly decried, or that he, who on every other occaſion ſingly oppoſed Philip, and run all hazards to bring him into odium with the people, ſhould now be ſingle on the other ſide, and attempt to croſs the diſpoſition of the Athenians in favour of peace and Philip (20). Theſe objectors forget, that Demoſthenes was a patriot as well as an orator; that he did not purſue Philip with implacable hatred, becauſe he was king of Macedon, but becauſe he thought him both willing and able to obſtruct the deſigns of Athens, and even to reduce her from that ſplendid pre-eminence which ſhe now held in Greece, to the ordinary rank of a ſtate in name free, but in truth dependent upon him; this was the motive of Demoſthenes's heat on other occaſions; and the motive to his coolneſs now was the ſtrict alliance between Philip and the other Grecian ſtates, which rendered it a thing impracticable for Athens to contend with him and them alone. Beſides, as he rightly obſerves in the harangue, it would have nian colonies in thoſe parts, perceiving well what end Philip had in view, did not ſtay for any inſtructions from home; but having raiſed with much expedition a conſiderable body of troops, taking advantage of the king's being abſent with his army, entered the adjacent territories of Philip, and waſted them with fire and ſword. The king who, on account of the operations of the campaign in the Cherſoneſe, was not at leiſure to repel Diopithes by force, nor indeed could divide his army without eminent hazard, choſe like an able general rather to abandon his provinces to inſults, which might be afterwards revenged, than by following the dictates of an ill-timed paſſion to hazard the loſs of his veteran army, whereon lay all his hopes. He contented himſelf therefore with complaining to the Athenians of Diopithes's conduct, who in a time of peace had entered his dominions, and committed ſuch devaſtations, which could ſcarce have been juſtified in a time of war. His partiſans ſupported this application with all their eloquence; they told the Athenians, that unleſs they recalled Diopithes, and brought him to a trial for this infringement of the peace, they ought not to hope either for the friendſhip of Philip, or of any other prince or ſtate; neither could they juſtly complain, if, prompted by ſuch a precedent, others ſhould break with them, and fall without the leaſt notice upon their dominions. Demoſthenes defended Diopithes, and undertook to ſhew, that he deſerved the praiſe, and not the cenſure of the Athenians. Thoſe of the other party began to charge him then with crimes of a different nature; they alledged that he had oppreſſed the ſubjects, and mal-treated the allies of Athens. Demoſthenes replied, that of theſe things there was as yet no proofs; that when ſuch ſhould appear, a ſingle galley might be ſent to bring over Diopithes to abide their judgment, but that have been ridiculous for thoſe, who refuſed to enter into an equal war for rich cities and fertile provinces, to have ruſhed ſuddenly into a moſt unequal conteſt about an empty title, or, as he emphatically expreſſes it, to take away the ſhadow of Delphos from him who was maſter of Delphos itſelf (21). We therefore acknowledge this to be the oration of Demoſthenes, becauſe he was worthy of it.

that Philip would not come if they sent a fleet; whence he inferred, that they ought to be cautious, and to weigh well the merits of this cause before they took any resolution. He said, that it was true, Philip had not as yet attacked Attica, or pretended to make a descent on their territories in Greece, or to force his way into their ports; when it came to that, he was of opinion, they would be hardly able to defend themselves; wherefore he thought such men were to be esteemed as sought to protect their frontiers, in order to keep Philip as long as might be at a distance. Whereupon he moved, that instead of disowning what Diopithes had done, or directing him to dismiss his army, they should send him over recruits, and shew the king of Macedon, they knew how to protect their territories, and to maintain the dignity of their state as well as their ancestors. These arguments had such an effect that a decree was made conformable to his motion [1].

An account of the sources of the continual differences between Philip and the Athenians.

The reader must certainly be somewhat at a loss as to the grounds on which these parties proceeded; nor is it easy to set them in a clear light. Philip is, generally speaking, represented not only as a politic and over-reaching, but as a fraudulent and perfidious prince, one who had small regard to treaties, and who set no bounds to his ambition. But then it must be considered, that we have all these reports from the sworn enemies of Philip; he had the misfortune to have been at variance all his reign with the Athenians, and the Athenians were at that time the most eloquent, as their authors are yet the most excellent, among the Greeks. The orations of Demosthenes many of them remain, but for any answer that were made to them, time has swallowed them up; and we scarce have any apologies for Philip; yet in spight of these cross accidents, it may be discerned, that Philip's character ought not to be considered altogether in so bad a light as the orator has placed it. For, first, all speakers in popular assemblies are wont to exaggerate the subjects on which they declaim, and like the painters of domes and cupolas make large allowances for the distances between their pictures and those who are to look up to them. Secondly, the Athenians naturally hated kings, and conceived all nations to be barbarians who were governed by them. Thirdly, they held their territories in Thrace by a very dubious title, which we shall take this occasion to explain. When the republic was in the the zenith of its glory, they had poſſeſſed themſelves of the Cherſoneſe by force. When Lyſander deſtroyed Athens, the inhabitants of the beforementioned country put themſelves under the protection of the Lacedæmonians [m]. Conon afterwards reduced them to the obedience of their antient maſters [n], and Cotys king of Thrace conquered them once more from Athens. Cherſobleptes his ſon, finding himſelf unable to oppoſe Philip of Macedon, gave up this place again to the Athenians, reſerving only the city of Cardia, which ſtood on the iſthmus [o]. Philip having now diſpoſſeſſed Cherſobleptes of his kingdom, the citizens of Cardia, unwilling to fall under the Athenian yoke, ſubmitted themſelves voluntarily to Philip; whereupon Diopithes began the war, on a ſuppoſition, that ſo enterprizeing a prince would not ſtop here, but would make uſe of the advantages he had already gained, utterly to diſpoſſeſs the Athenians of their colonies in theſe parts [p]. Such were the ſources of thoſe differences, which ſo long embroiled the Athenians and Philip; ſources which, lying as they did in the conſtitutions of Macedon and Athens, could never be dried up; for the prudence of Philip giving him to underſtand, that till he was maſter of Greece, he would never be able to keep the Athenians under; and till that was done, knowing himſelf to be unſafe at home, and ſcarce to be called a king; he choſe to run all hazards in order to be the former, chiefly becauſe of all ſituations he dreaded to be in the latter (F).

The reader will meet with what can be collected reſpecting their hiſtory hereafter; at preſent it will be neceſſary to ſay ſomething of the families of thoſe kings with whom Philip had to do. Teres king of the Odryſians, by the conqueſt of many little princes, raiſed himſelf to a very high rank, and ſwelled his dominions to a large extent; he had two ſons, Sitacles, and Sparadocus (22). The deſcendents of theſe ſons were engaged in continual wars amongſt themſelves, which extremely broke and ruined all their principalities, till at laſt Seuthes raiſed a conſiderable kingdom out of the conqueſts he made, and left it to his ſon Cotys the father of Cherſobleptes, as Demoſthenes tells us (23); but Diodorus will have him to be his

His expedition in repreſſing the Illyrians, and his negotiations in Greece.

While affairs ſtood thus, the Illyrians, recovering courage, and ſeeing Philip at ſuch a diſtance, harraſſed the frontiers of Macedon, and threatened a formidable invaſion; but this attempt of theirs prejudiced none ſo much as themſelves, for Philip by quick marches arrived on the borders of Illyrium, and ſtruck this barbarous people with ſuch a panic, that they were glad to compound for their former robberies at the price he was pleaſed to ſet [q]. Moſt of the Greek cities in Thrace now ſought the friendſhip of the king, and entered into a league with him for their mutual defence. As it cannot be ſuppoſed, that each of theſe free cities had a power equal to that of Philip, we may therefore look upon him as their protector. This is exactly conformable to the account which Diodorus gives us of this matter; but Demoſthenes repreſents this tranſaction as downright robbery, inſinuating, that to have Philip for a protector, was to own him for a maſter; and that conſequently his proceeding in this manner was making a conqueſt of ſo many cities, and an injury to all Greece [r]. About this time Philip's negotiations in Peloponneſus his brother (24). After the death of Cotys, his dominions were ſhared by Cherſobleptes, Beriſades, and Amadocus. Cherſobleptes quickly diſpoſſeſſed the other two, and fluſhed with theſe conqueſts, and the hopes he had of the friendſhip of the Athenians, he began to contend with Philip, who, falling upon him with a veteran army of well-diſciplined troops, defeated and dethroned him. This Cherſobleptes we ſhall hear much of hereafter: the Athenians granted him the honour of being inrolled in their city regiſter, and he, when he found Philip too ſtrong for him, reſigned a part of his dominions to them. The truth is, conqueſt was the beſt title that any of them had, except the Thracians, who may be ſaid to have had a birth-right in their own country. Philip therefore wiſely added that tract of land he conquered between the rivers Strymon and Neſſus to Macedonia, without pretending to make himſelf abſolute maſter of Thrace. His ſon Alexander indeed did conquer it, but after his death, it fell again under the obedience of a native, viz. Seuthes the ſon or grandſon of Cherſobleptes, who defended his right and his poſſeſſion againſt the Macedonians, more ſucceſsfully than his anceſtors had done (25).

neſus began to come to light; the Argives and Meſſenians, growing weary of that tyrannical authority which the Spartans exerciſed over them, applied to Thebes for aſſiſtance; and the Thebans, out of their natural averſion to Sparta, ſought to open a paſſage for Philip into Peloponneſus, that, in conjunction with them, he might humble the Lacedæmonians. Philip readily accepted the offer, and reſolved to procure a decree from the Amphictyons, directing the Lacedæmonians to leave Argos and Meſſene free; which if they complied not with, he, as the lieutenant of the Amphictyons, might, with great appearance of juſtice, marc hwith a body of troops to enforce their order. When Sparta had intelligence of this, ſhe immediately applied to Athens, earneſtly entreating aſſiſtance, as in the common cauſe of Greece. The Argives and Meſſenians, on the other hand, laboured aſſiduouſly to gain the Athenians to their ſide, alledging that if they were friends to liberty, they ought to aſſiſt thoſe whoſe only aim was to be free. Demoſthenes at this juncture outwreſtled Philip, if we may borrow the king's expreſſion; for by a vehement harangue, he not only determined his own citizens to become the avowed enemies of the king, but alſo made the Argives and Meſſenians not over fond of him for an ally [s]; which when Philip perceived, he laid aſide all thoughts of this enterprize for the preſent, and began to practiſe in Eubœa.

The cauſes of the war in Eubœa. Year after the flood 2695. Before Chriſt 304.

THIS country, now called Negropont, is ſeparated from Greece by the Euripus, a ſtreight ſo narrow, that Eubæa might eaſily be united to the continent. This ſituation made Philip call it, the Fetters of Greece, which he therefore ſought to have in his own hands. There had been for ſome years great diſturbances in that country, under colour of which Philip ſent forces thither, and demoliſhed Porthmos, the ſtrongeſt city in thoſe parts, leaving the country under the government of three lords, whom Demoſthenes roundly calls tyrants, eſtabliſhed by Philip [t]. Shortly after the Macedonians took Oreus, which was left under ther government of five magiſtrates, ſtiled alſo tyrants at Athens. Thither Plutarch of Eretria, one of the moſt eminent perſons in Eubæa, went to repreſent the diſtreſs of his country, and to implore the Athenians to ſet it free. This ſuit Demoſthenes recommended warmly to the people, who sent thither their famous leader Phocion, supported by formidable votes but a very slender army; yet so well did he manage the affairs of the commonwealth and her allies, that Philip quickly found he must for a time abandon that project, which, however, he did not, till he had formed another no less beneficial to himself, or less dangerous to Athens [u]. It was the prosecution of his conquests in Thrace, which he thought of pushing much farther than he had hitherto done, or could be reasonably suspected to have any intention of doing (G).

(G) We have shewn above of what importance Eubæa was both to Philip and to the rest of Greece; we shall here have occasion to speak of the form of government which Philip would have established there. We no-where find, that he had any idea of annexing it to his dominions, or of obliging the people to live under new laws, or new modes of rule. Eubœa was full of great cities, each of which was a kind of republic, and together with the benefits of freedom and independence were sometimes disturbed by that spirit of dissension, which frequently enters where liberty is adored. In these disputes both parties were wont to have recourse to foreign assistance; the Athenians, Thebans, Lacedæmonians, all in their turn, had sent auxiliaries to support their friends in this island; and it seems the king of Macedon thought fit to do the like; without doubt on a principle of interest, for when do princes act from any other? We have very imperfect accounts of this war, which ended at last to the disadvantage of the Athenians: instead therefore of drawing together all the jejune passages in antient authors, wherein the Eubœan war is mentioned; we will from Demosthenes himself give a succinct detail of the tyranny which Philip set up in Oreus, one of the principle cities of Eubœa. Philistides, Menippus, Socrates, Agapeus, and Thoas, were at the head of affairs, and were professed friends to Philip of Macedon; Euphræus, who had formerly dwelt at Athens, began to treat these magistrates as traitors; he alledged, that they were entirely devoted to the Macedonian, and would betray the city into his hands; Philistides and his collegues immediately threw this man into prison; the people it seems concurred with their magistrates, and looked upon him as a disturber of the public peace. When the disorders in the rest of Eubœa had occasioned Macedonian troops to be sent thither, the magistrates of Oreus owned them for their pro-

THE preparations he made for the campaign were extraordinary, his army larger than he was wont to make uſe of, and the precautions he took for the ſafety of his dominions in his abſence, by appointing his ſon Alexander regent, ſuch as ſhewed he had vaſt deſigns in his mind. At length when the ſeaſon of the year permitted, he marched with thirty thouſand men and inveſted Perinthus [x]. This city was one of the moſt conſiderable in Propontis, always firm to the Athenians, and conſequently both dreadful and dangerous to Philip. The ſiege was hardly formed before the king received advice, that his reſtleſs neighbours had taken arms, ſuppoſing that they could eaſily deal with forces commanded by a child; for Alexander was not above fifteen: but before he had leiſure to reflect on this danger, he was farther informed, that Alexander had marched againſt them with ſuch ſecrecy and expedition, as to fall upon them before they were aware, and thereby ſtruck them with ſuch conſternation, that making a precipitate retreat, they covered themſelves with ſhame, and crowned the youth they deſpiſed with laurels: Philip, however, ſent for his ſon immediately to the camp, fearing that this ſucceſs might make him adventurous, and that fortune might not be always ſo favourable, as upon this occaſion ſhe had been. The Perinthians, however, made a gallant defence, their city being well fortified, as well as remarkably ſtrong from its ſituation. Philip on his ſide preſſed it cloſely, both by his artillery, that protectors, baniſhed ſuch as had confederated againſt them, and aſſumed the direction of public affairs to themſelves, which had ſuch an effect upon the patriot they had impriſoned, that he laid violent hands upon himſelf. Philiſtides and his collegues are qualified by the Athenian orator with the name of tyrants, and Philip who was their protector, is made the tyrant of tyrants (26). This was the true ſtyle of Athens, where all power underived from, or unexerciſed for, them, was held tyrannical. It is very poſſible, the Eubœans might ſpeak another language, and without queſtion the partizans of Philip proteſted loudly, that he intereſted himſelf in the affairs of Eubœa, in order to preſerve the people from being oppreſt by foreign ſtates.

(26) Demoſthen. Orat. Philip. iii.

that is, battering engines, and by sap: he caused also moveable towers to be erected, and bringing them near the walls, his soldiers from thence threw all sorts of missive weapons into the city [y]. Athens, for whose sake Perinthus thus suffered, heard the complaints of her embassadors, supported by the pathetic orations of Demosthenes, with compassion. Succours were immediately decreed in spight of all the arts which the friends of Philip could make use of; however, Chares, was made choice of to command them, and if Philip had been to have appointed a general, he would probably have been the man. He was vain, luxurious, haughty, insolent, and unjust; was very indifferently skilled in military matters, yet so full of promises of what he would perform, that the promise of Chares became a proverb, to signify an undertaking which would never be fullfilled. This commander in chief set sail with a small squadron of gallies, a considerable body of land-forces, and an excellent band of music, which he chose with great care, and paid at an extravagant rate. His character was so well known, that the Perinthians, in as bad a state as they were, refused to admit him into their port, so that he was forced to return home, without doing any thing more than plundering the allies, and thereby bringing disgrace on the Athenian name [z].

Philip writes a letter to the Athenians.

As Philip was perfectly well acquainted with the state of Athens at that time, and knew that the engaging it in a war would in all probability revive that spirit of ambition and that appetite of glory, which had in former times rendered it so powerful; he had recourse to those mighty talents which distinguished him in that age, and which may be said to have distinguished him from all kings. He wrote the Athenians a letter, which is still extant, and which it would be injurious to his memory to abridge, or to publish in any other than his own words. It was intended as a manifesto to the commons and to his enemies in Athens, and as a scheme of instruction to his friends; how well it answered both purposes, the reader will discern, and form from thence a just idea of a prince, who was his own secretary, as well as his own general, his own minister, and his own treasurer; not that he was opinionated of his own own parts, but becauſe he was a perfect judge of thoſe of other men, as appears from a ſaying of his relating to theſe Athenians. He was told they elected annually ten generals: They are a happy people, ſaid he, who every year can find ten generals, ſince I in my whole life have found but one; which was Parmenio [a]. But as to the letter, thus it ran:

Philip to the ſenate and people of Athens, greeting;

" AFTER applying to you often, though always in vain, " by my embaſſadors, in order to engage your paying the " ſame regard to your oaths and treaties that I do to mine; " I am determined to explain to you myſelf the miſchiefs " I ſuſtain by your perſiſting in a contrary conduct. Do " not be ſurprized at the length of my letter; to enter " into a detail of your infractions and my patience, requires " no ſmall room.

" I begin with Nicias my herald, taken out of my do- " minions. Inſtead of puſhing ſuch as were concerned in " this fact, you were pleaſed to detain him in priſon for " no leſs a time than ten months before you ſent him " back, neither did you make any difficulty of taking " from him, and reading in the public aſſemblies, the let- " ters with which he was intruſted by me. After this " the ports of the iſle of Thaſus were opened to the By- " zantine gallies, or rather to all ſorts of corſairs; which you " ſaw with the ſame indifference, as if this practice did " not involve you in the guilt of evident perjury. Then " your general Diopithes entered my territories in a hoſtile " manner, carrying into ſlavery the inhabitants of Croby- " lus and Tiriſtaſas, and pillaging and ſacking all the villages " in that part of Thrace. When Amphylochus my em- " baſſador went to treat for the ranſom of the priſoners, " Diopithes, to crown his worthy exploits, clapped him up, " and forced him, to reſcue himſelf from ill uſage, to " pay down nine talents, and all this he did with your " participation and countenance. Ought the violating the " reſpect due to a herald at arms, or an embaſſador, to be " borne rather from you than from other people? What " think you of the buſineſs at Megara? As ſoon as its in- " habitants

" then! an outrage held so intolerable, when done to your

" it?"

" Callias, one of your generals, made not the least
" scruple of reducing under your obedience all the towns
" seated on the Pegasæan gulph, though they were ex" pressly comprehended in our treaty under the name of my " allies. This done, he attacked all the vessels bound to " Macedonia; passengers, merchants, all were held good

" don't see what you could have done worse, if you had

" the sword was drawn, you contented yourselves with " carrying on hostilities in an open manner; you made
" reprisals on my subjects; you did all you could to injure

" to make descents on my territories; but now, while we " are at peace, you stop not at these things, your rancour
" and your injustice have pushed you on to stir up a barba-

" solicited the king of Persia to overwhelm Macedonia.
" What strange conduct is this? to beseech that monarch to " ally himself with you against me, without remembering,
" that before he had subdued Egypt and Phœnicia, you

" Pisistratus, that they invited the great king into Greece;
" yet the same thing is done by your modern politicians.
" You are not thus it seems ashamed to injure me by " methods you condemned even in your tyrants, so that " all things become lawful and laudable, as soon as it is " discerned they will spight Philip. You have given me a " signal mark of this in your decrees, enjoining me to put

" this I know very well, that I have ſeen Teres ſerving in " my armies againſt you, and Cherſobleptes being on the " very point of ſwearing to a treaty concluded with my " embaſſadors, declined it, terrified by the menaces of " your general, who threatened to proclaim him an enemy " to your republic. What juſtice! what equity! what " conſiſtency is here! when he was about to become my " friend, you threatened to declare him your enemy; after " doing me all the miſchief he could, now truly he is your

" for taking Cherſobleptes under your protection, and for " making war on me on his account; however, upon " other occaſions, you have more than once regarded in " another light theſe adopted citizens, your laws, and " your decrees. But to cut ſhort this diſpute, you cannot " deny, that you have ſeen dethroned, and ignominiouſly
" baniſhed, Evagoras of Cyprus and Dionyſius of Syracuſe;

" nesses not excepted. I offered you this Halonnesus merely
" out of the great respect I had to your friendship; this did " not please your demagogues, they talked you into a re" fusal of my offer, and which was somewhat singular,
" they talked you into reclaiming what they made you re" fuse to accept. Would you know the reason? Come,
" I'll tell it you: Either I must have restored the island,
" which you know would have been a full proof of my
" taking it unjustly; or I must have refused to restore it,
" and thereby have opened a way to those violent motions
" which they long to make in your assemblies. Well, I " penetrated all this, and, to be even with them, offered " to submit our disputes to arbitration, resolving to make " you a present of the island, if it was adjudged to me, and " have yielded it up, if judgment had gone against me.
" Many a time did I offer this, and as often did you reject
" it. The Peparethians in the mean time seized the island.
" Well, what was I to do then? Was I bound not to " punish those violators of their oaths? Was I patiently " to submit to injuries of such a nature, offered in such a " manner?

" manner? Conſider a little; if Halonneſus belonged to " this people, how came the Athenians to demand it?
" if it belonged to you, why did you not attack the " uſurpers? Things came at laſt to ſuch a paſs, that, to " ſecure the paſſage of Macedonian veſſels from the priva-
" teers, fitted out from your colonies by order of Poly-
" crates, authorized ſo to do by your decrees, I was con-
" ſtrained to come in perſon before the ports of theſe cor-
" ſairs, in order to keep them in awe. I had little reaſon
" to act with all this caution, when that general at the " ſame time ſent to the Byzantines to join with him, and " declared publickly, that, when occaſion ſhould offer, he " would make war upon me. All this did not engage me " to act with a violence proportioned to yours. I attempted
" nothing againſt you; I ſeized not either your gallies or " your dominions, though it was in my power to have " taken a part, if not the whole, of both; and all this " time I continued to ſolicit you, that our differences
" might be put to arbitration. Judge for yourſelves,
" whether equity is beſt awarded by reaſon or the ſword;
" and whether it be fit, that you or I ſhould be judges in our " own cauſes; conſider too with yourſelves, how unrea-
" ſonable it will appear, that the Athenians, who forced " the Thaſians and the Maronites to be content with an ar" bitration made on their reſpective claims to the city of " Stryma, ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to the deciſion of their " own differences with me in the ſame way. Your ob-" ſtinacy muſt appear ſtill more unreaſonable, when it is " remembered, that the arbitration I offered would not " have left you expoſed to the uncertainties which uſually
" attend ſuch judgments. If it went againſt you, you " were to loſe nothing; a decree in your favour would " have given you my conqueſts.

" To crown all your oddities, you refuſe to hear my
" embaſſadors, who are impowered, in the name of me " and my allies, to aſſure you, that we are willing to
" compromiſe upon reaſonable terms whatever differences
" ſubſiſt between us and other Greeks. Could you take " any better method than complying with this propoſiti" on? At all events, it muſt have been beneficial to " you; for I muſt either have acted conformable to my " offers, or not: In the firſt caſe, you ſhould have had the " honour of protecting all the Greeks, who, you ſay,
" have taken umbrage at my power: In the ſecond, you " would

" would have had the greateſt advantage over me; my
" want of faith could not have been concealed, I muſt
" have paſſed for a traitor convict throughout Greece.
" To ſay the truth, my propoſitions were perfectly ſuited
" to your people; but, alas! your demagogues could not " find their accounts in them. Thoſe who are beſt ac" quainted with your government ſay, that theſe ſort of " people know no ſort of war ſo cruel as a peace, and ne" ver taſte ſo much of peace as in the midſt of war. When " the ſword is drawn every Athenian general is tied down " to compound with them; and muſt either pay for " their crying him up, or for their not crying him " down. Your dealers in words carry it ſtill farther:
" In order to have reputation, a man's character muſt be " publickly given by them. This is a general buſineſs, nor " is it of any great conſequence what country he is of,
" who deſires to be recommended; the noble citizen, the " illuſtrious ſtranger, a whole ſtring of theſe ſort of epi" thets are at their command; and, once beſtowed in the " aſſembly, thoſe who are honoured with them become " moſt excellent commonwealth's-men in the opinion of " the vulgar. I could upon very reaſonable terms have
" ſilenced their invectives or even have converted them " into eulogies; but I ſcorn to acquire your friendſhip in " ſo ſcandalous a manner. I ſhould be aſhamed to have any " thing to do with theſe mercenaries, who, becauſe they " did not ſell me Amphipolis, have the impudence to ſay,
" I uſurp it. I am poſitive, my title to that city is built " on reaſons too ſtrong for them with all their eloquence " to overthrow. For, if Amphipolis ought to belong to " its moſt antient poſſeſſors, how do I hold it unjuſtly?
" Alexander, one of my anceſtors held it firſt: witneſs the " riches taken by him there from the Perſians, the firſt
" fruits of which he conſecrated in a ſtatue of gold, ſet up " in the temple of Delphi. Well, if you don't like this
" reaſon, ſhall Amphipolis belong to its laſt maſter? I am " content, for by this title alſo it is mine. I took it from " the Lacedæmonians, who, after they had driven you out,
" ſettled in it a colony of their own. As I take it, all cities " are held either by a right of ſucceſſion or a right of " conqueſt. Now both theſe rights have I; you have " neither the one or the other; and yet, becauſe you " held the city ſome time, you are pleaſed to ſet up a " claim to it, though you have confeſſed my right in the
" moſt

" moſt authentic manner in the world. For in your
" anſwers to my letters on this ſubject, you have over-" and-over acknowledged me for the lawful ſovereign of " Amphipolis; beſides you have recognized me for its ma" ſter by your laſt treaty of peace. Is it poſſible to have the " poſſeſſion of a place better guaranteed than I have this?
" My anceſtors held it formerly, I have conquered it,
" you have acknowledged my right, you who never " parted with any thing, to which you had ſo much as the " colour of a title. You ſee then the grounds of my com" plaints. Becauſe you are without contradiction the ag-" greſſors, becauſe I have ſpared no pains to prevent your
" having any reaſon for a rupture, you load me with re-" proaches, and make it your buſineſs to blacken me all " you can. I take the gods to witneſs the goodneſs of " my cauſe, and the neceſſity I am under of doing my-
" ſelf that juſtice which you have refuſed me (H) [b]".

(H) There are ſome few paſſages in this eloquent letter which may be illuſtrated from antient authors. Evagoras king of Cyprus was originally a private citizen of Salamis, but deſcended of a noble family, and a man of great ſpirit; he perſuaded his fellow-citizens to throw off the Perſian yoke, which they did under his conduct, and conquered a great part of the iſland; he was afterwards ſlain by Nicocles; however his ſon Evagoras the younger pretended to the kingdom of Cyprus, and was ſupported by the Athenians againſt Protagoras the ſucceſſor of Nicocles. The Athenians were induced to take his part on account of the great aſſiſtance his father had given their admiral Conon, when he laboured to reſtore Athens to her former grandeur (27). As to Dionyſius the younger, the reader has had his hiſtory already; there is, however, a paſſage relating to him, which deſerves to be mentioned here. It is ſaid, that Philip, having an interview with this prince, could not help aſking him, how in ſo ſhort a time he had loſt the flouriſhing kingdom left him by his father? Dionyſius anſwered frankly, becauſe, Sir, my father did not leave me his fortune with his kingdom (28). When the king of Macedon wrote in a high ſtrain to the Lacedæmonians to leave the

The judicious reader will not be diſpleaſed at the extraordinary length of this letter, when he conſiders, that it is an accurate and authentic hiſtory of many curious events, and at the ſame time an artful apology written by the moſt potent prince and moſt conſummate politician of his time. Happy would it have been for us, if more ſuch letters as theſe had been preſerved; but time has ſwallowed them up, and we have only a few ſhort epiſtles, which ſerve barely to demonſtrate, that this is truly Philip's from the conformity of its ſtile, as it muſt be allowed worthy of him from the conſideration of its matter.

Meaſures taken by the Athenians.

In all probability, this epiſtle had wrought its deſired effect, if Demoſthenes the conſtant adverſary of Philip had not undertaken to open the people's eyes, and to convince them, that the king's deſign was only to ſuſpend their judgments, and to hinder their taking any vigorous reſolution, till he had ſubdued ſuch places in the country where his army now lay, as would leave him without apprehenſions from that quarter [c]. It happened, that about this time the news arrived at Athens of Chares's being excluded the ports of the allies; this occaſioned great heats in the aſſembly, the partizans of Philip inſiſting warmly on the contempt ſhewn towards the republic, by firſt ſoliciting ſupplies, and then refuſing to admit them. Phocion cleared up this; he told Argives and Meſſenians free, he received this Laconic anſwer: Dionyſius at Corinth; by which they intimated, that he was no leſs a tyrant than Dionyſius, and no more out of fortune's power than he (29). The iſlands of Peparethus, Halonneſus, and Sciathus, lie in the Ægean ſea, where they form a triangle. Philip, as he tells us in the letter, would have given up Halonneſus to the Athenians as a preſent, but Demoſthenes engaged them to refuſe it in that light, alledging, that their acceptance would be injurious to them as a republic (30). Æſchines, however, told them plainly, that it was fooliſh to refuſe an iſland, and diſpute about words; that theſe ſort of proceedings would do ſervice to Philip, and afford him an opportunity of charging them with haughtineſs and inſincerity, as often as they upbraided him with breach of faith (31).

told them in few words, that the allies had not insulted the people of Athens by endeavouring to secure themselves from a rapacious Athenian; and that, if they would retrieve their reputation, they ought to send back their succours under the command of some man of honour [d]. According to the wonted flexibility of popular councils, this motion was approved, and Phocion himself named admiral and captain general. In this flow of their good humour, the Athenians did every thing that could be expected from them; as, on the other hand, Phocion shewed himself a true patriot by accepting readily this command, when he found it in his power to execute it with honour to himself and to the state; though upon other occasions he had opposed their declaring against Philip, when he judged those declarations would only serve to irritate him and do themselves no good. Such were the enemies of Philip on this side. The Persian kings, as we have already frequently noted, were wont to regard the Macedonian princes, not only as their tributaries, but as their faithful allies. The fortune of Philip, the continual clamour of the Athenians against him, and his dethroning at his pleasure the petty princes of Thrace, concurred to make the Persian view him in another light. When therefore he led his troops against Perinthus, the great king, as he was stiled by the Greeks, sent his letters mandatory to the governors of the maritime provinces, directing them to supply the place with all things in their power; in consequence of which they filled it with troops, granted large subsidies in ready money, and sent besides great convoys of provisions and ammunition. The Byzantines also, conceiving their own turn would be next, exerted their utmost force for the preservation of Perinthus, sending thither the flower of their youth with all other necessaries for an obstinate defence [e]. Thus Philip found all this part of the world either open enemies or suspicious friends.

Philip compelled to raise the sieges of Perinthus and Byzantium. Year after the flood 2660. Before Christ 339.

These difficulties, which would certainly have made a strong impression on a prince of less firmness or more moderate abilities, served only to stimulate the ambition of the Macedonian. As soon therefore as he saw a small breach made in the wall, he proceeded to the attack, and stormed Perinthus with a vast effusion of blood on both both ſides. It is not likely, that with all theſe advantages the Perinthians would have been able to have ſuſtained many ſuch efforts, if the ſituation of the city had not proved of greater uſe to them, than either themſelves or Philip foreſaw. For ſtanding as it did on the ſide of a hill, and their houſes being built with great regularity, every ſtreet with the help of a few works was converted into a new wall, which while the beſiegers battered, they were expoſed to all the ſhot of the beſieged; which, as the houſes roſe gradually one above another, did prodigious execution. Philip ſeeing this, and being informed by his engineer named Polindus, that nothing but time could overcome theſe difficulties, he inſtantly bethought himſelf of a method, whereby he hoped to indemnify his army for their long and great fatigue, though for the preſent he encreaſed it; for marching ſuddenly with a great corps of troops, he blocked up Byzantium, which as it was in a manner exhauſted by the ſuccours ſent to Perinthus, had well nigh fallen into his hands immediately, and could never have endured a ſiege even of a moderate length. But while Philip dreamt of gaining two cities at a time, he was compelled to leave them both; for Phocion arriving with his fleet quite changed the face of affairs. The inhabitants of the Cherſoneſe declared immediately for the Athenians, and Philip, ſeeing all hopes of ſucceeding taken away, raiſed both his ſieges, and marched off with an army exceſſively harraſſed, and not a little diſpirited [f]. Phocion made the beſt uſe of his abſence, he retook ſuch places as the Macedonian had garriſoned, took many of his ſhips, and by frequent deſcents raiſed contributions throughout the maritime provinces of Macedonia [g].

Makes war on the Scythians and defeats the Triballi.

THIS reverſe of fortune ſerved only to aggrandize the character of Philip; he ſent immediately to treat of a peace, and that the reputation of his arms might not ſuffer from his late diſappointment, he turned them inſtantly on a Scythian prince who ſought to take advantage of his misfortune; and having totally defeated his forces, made the Macedonians rich with their plunder. The Triballi, a fierce and barbarous nation, refuſed him paſſage through their country, unleſs he would ſhare with them the ſpoil he had taken.

taken. Philip, conſidering rather the wound his reputation would have received by complying with ſuch a propoſition, than the worth of what they required, abſolutely rejected their demand, and marched to give them battle. The engagement was obſtinate and bloody, and had well-nigh been fatal to the king; for, after receiving a wound in his thigh, his horſe was killed under him, and himſelf trampled to the ground. This being perceived by the young Alexander, he flew immediately to his aſſiſtance, and having covered his father's body with his ſhield, ſlew or put to flight ſuch of the Barbarians as were got about him. Philip being remounted gained a ſignal victory, and returned to Macedon, as he was wont, covered with laurels, and received with loud acclamations, though in himſelf he was much diſſatisfied, and began to form new projects for depreſſing the Athenians, who, kept continually warm by the orations of Demoſthenes, were far from being ſo ready as they had formerly been to clap up a peace [h].

Philip ſucceeds in his project of entering Greece. Year after the flood 2661. Year before Chriſt 338.

THE effects of the Athenian war became daily more and more inſupportable to the ſubjects of Philip; for, as the Macedonians were never very powerful at ſea, the Athenians now deprived them of all their trade, by keeping continually ſuch ſquadrons on their coaſts, that their veſſels durſt not ſtir out of port. If Philip's deſign had ſucceeded in Thrace and on the Helleſpont, he would have ſtarved Athens, her proviſions as well as her revenues being chiefly drawn from thoſe countries; the Athenians were now even with him in the ſame wars with this unlucky circumſtance, that the king knew not how to relieve himſelf [i]. Yet he did not deſpair; he formed, on the contrary, a project of invading Attica, though he had no fleet to tranſport his troops, and notwithſtanding that he knew well enough the Theſſalians were not to be depended on, if he attempted to march through the Pylæ, and that the Thebans would even then be ready to oppoſe his march. To obviate all theſe difficulties, he had recourſe to Athens itſelf, where, by means of his partizans, he procured Æſchines his old friend to be ſent their deputy to the Amphictyons; this ſeemed a ſmall matter, and yet this was the hinge on which his whole project turned. By that time Æſchines had taken his ſeat, a queſtion was ſtirred in the council, whether the Locrians of Amphissa had not been guilty of sacrilege in plowing the fields of Cyrrha in the neighbourhood of the temple at Delphi. Sentiments being divided, Æschines proposed a view, which was accordingly decreed. But when the Amphictyons came in order to see how things stood, the Locrians, either jealous of their property, or spurred thereto by the suggestions of some who saw farther than themselves, fell upon these venerable persons so rudely, that they compelled them to secure themselves by flight. The Amphictyons, considering this matter in council, decreed, that an army should be raised under the command of one of their own number to chastise the delinquents; but as this army was to be composed of troops sent from all the states of Greece, the appearance at the rendezvous was so inconsiderable, that the Amphictyon sent to command them durst undertake nothing. The whole matter being reported to the council, Æschines in a long and eloquent harangue shewed, how much the welfare and even the safety of Greece depended on the reverence paid to their decrees; and after inveighing against the want of public spirit in such as had not sent their quotas at the time appointed by the council, he moved, that they should elect Philip for their general, and pray him to execute their decree. The deputies from the other states, conceiving that by this expedient their respective constituents would be freed from any farther trouble or expence, came into it at once; whereupon a decree was immediately drawn up, purporting, that embassadors should be sent to Philip of Macedon in the name of Apollo and the Amphictyons, once more to require his assistance, and to notify to him, that the states of Greece had unanimously chosen him their general, with full power to act as he thought fit, against such as had oppósed the authority of the Amphictyons[k]. Thus of a sudden, and before any body foresaw it, Philip by this round about method acquired all that he fought; and having an army ready in expectation of this event, he immediately marched to execute the commands of the Amphictyons in all appearance, but in truth to fulfil his own designs; for having passed into Greece with his army, he meddled not with the Locrians, but seized immediately Elatea, a great city in Phocis on the river Cephisus[l]. This amazed all Greece, nor was there any any body who could pretend to ſay what ſtep he would take next (H).

The Athenians and Thebans reſolve to oppoſe him.

THE Athenians were in the utmoſt confuſion on the news of Philip's march; an extraordinary aſſembly was called, in which the people demanded advice of Demoſthenes by name. That great orator with much preſence of mind exhorted them to ſend embaſſadors throughout all Greece,

(H) This was Philip's maſter-piece; upon this occaſion he ſhewed that he was able to over-reach all the ſtateſmen in Greece; for it is morally certain, that if any of the Grecian ſtates had ſuſpected his deſign, they would never have conſented to the decree, which gave him a paſſage into the heart of their country. By ſeizing Elatea, he provided himſelf the fitteſt place in the world for his head-quarters, ſince it awed Bœotia, and opened him a paſſage into Attica. It is true, the Thebans barred his paſſage, but that was what he could not foreſee; for, inaſmuch as he had done them very conſiderable ſervices, particularly in the Phocian war, he might better have reckoned upon them than upon any of the Grecians. Theſe were not the only people who were not over-grateful to the king of Macedon; the Peloponneſians, for whom he had done much, openly hiſſed his chariot at the olympic games, offering him thereby the higheſt affront in the ſight of all Greece. When it was reported at the court of Philip, there wanted not ſome to declare, that ſuch inſolence ought to be chaſtiſed; but Philip, who was practiſed in the art of ſwallowing injuries (32), anſwered very mildly: If the Peloponneſians hiſs us for doing good turns, what will they not ſay, if we ſhould do them ill ones (33)? This calmneſs of his had its deſired effect. His enemies, while they indulged their tongues, never thought of acting to his prejudice: When therefore he ſeized Elatea, they ſtood amazed, inſtead of running to arms, and, as if they had been faſcinated by the charms of Philip, ſtood gazing on his army, expecting where it would march next. This ſight was doubtleſs as pleaſing to Philip as his ſubſequent victory at Cheronæa, ſince it was the avowed maxim of this ſagacious monarch, that an advantage gained by policy was more glorious than a conqueſt by arms; becauſe in the glory of the latter his whole army had a right to ſhare, whereas in reſpect to the former the fame reſulting therefrom belonged to himſelf alone (34).

Greece, but especially to the Thebans to engage them to rise at once and oppose the Macedonian torrent before it bore down all. The people instantly assented, and Demosthenes went to Thebes as the head of the embassy [m]. Philip had sent to the same city Pytho as his embassador; he was a man of great abilities, by birth a Byzantine, by his merit a citizen of Athens, by choice the minister of Philip [n]. This orator easily overcame the colleagues of Demosthenes; but Demosthenes himself who could overcome? His speeches had such an effect on the Thebans, that forgetting all the obligations they owed to Philip, they considered him no longer as their benefactor, but as one who sought to arrive at the sovereignty of Greece. Fired therefore with resentment, they concurred unanimously with the Athenians, and concerted with Demosthenes the measures proper to be taken in so nice a juncture. Philip, on the other hand, did not sit still, he sent his embassadors to Athens to treat of peace, and he is said to have engaged the priestess of Delphi to prophesy nothing but destruction to those who should make war against him. Demosthenes defeated both designs, he engaged the Athenians not to listen in any degree to his propositions, and encouraged them also to pay no regard to the oracle, by telling them that Pythia "philippized". An army was immediately raised, which marched with incredible diligence to Eleusis, where they were joined by the Thebans, who shewed a laudable zeal for the liberty of Greece. The confederates made the greatest appearance that ever had been seen in Greece, and the troops were without doubt exceedingly good, but, unfortunately, generals were wanting. Chares, that scandal to his country, and Lysicles, a man without conduct, commanded the Athenians; the Thebans were without any general of note; however, they prepared for a battle, which, all circumstances considered, could not but be decisive [o].

Philip, when he found his arts defeated, and that all his negotiations could not hinder this extraordinary junction, resolved as his last resource to have recourse to an engagement. Thus determined he advanced to Cheronæa, in the neighbourhood of which city the confederates were encamped.

encamped. The next day, by that time the ſun was up, both armies were in the field. The king gave the command of his left wing to his ſon Alexander, then about nineteen years of age; but he placed about him his moſt experienced generals to prevent any accident his extraordinary courage, unſuſtained by experience, might draw on him. The right he commanded in perſon. On the other ſide, the Athenians were on the left, the Thebans on the right. Alexander began the charge, and his troops ſeconded his ardour with an alacrity conformable to his wiſhes. The ſacred band of the Thebans, however, made a ſteady and gallant reſiſtance [p]. The Athenians in the mean time had the better on the left, and having puſhed the enemy from their ground, Lyſicles their general had the imprudence to cry aloud, Come on, my fellow ſoldiers, let us drive theſe cowards to Macedon. On which the Athenians loſing all order ruſhed on to the purſuit. Philip, who ſaw and heard this from the ſide of a hill, whereon his phalanx remained in excellent order, ſaid coldly to thoſe who were near him, Theſe Athenians don't know how to conquer [q]. Then bearing down upon them, all in confuſion as they were, he obtained an eaſy, though a very bloody, victory; a thouſand Athenians being ſlain on the ſpot. At the ſame time, and with like effuſion of blood, Alexander triumphed over the Thebans. Thus the confederates were totally overthrown, and the authority of Philip effectually eſtabliſhed. Demoſthenes, who had been ſo inſtrumental in bringing the Athenians and Thebans into the field, was there in perſon; but it ſeems he wanted military courage, for in the beginning of the rout he threw away his ſhield and betook himſelf to flight. We are farther told, that a ſtake catching hold of his robe as he fled, he, not doubting but it was an enemy, cried out, Alas! ſpare my life [r]. On his return to Athens, he was well received, though Lyſicles was put to death. As to Philip, in the firſt tranſport of his joy, he behaved very ridiculouſly; he cauſed the decree of Demoſthenes to be ſung in his preſence, ſpoke contemptibly of the powers of Greece, and inſulted his priſoners, till Demades the Athenian brought him to his ſenſes, by telling him, Heaven, O king, king, hath assigned thee the part of Agamemnon, and thou wilt needs play that of Thersites [s] (I). It was the peculiar felicity of this prince, that he would hear advice, and receive those things kindly which to monarchs of a weaker brain would have sounded like treason. He instantly ordered Demades to be released, esteemed him as his friend, and

(I) We need not wonder at Philip's intemperate joy on account of his victory. Heroes and kings are the greatest of men, but they are still men. Demosthenes who alone preserved his courage, when Thebes and Athens were struck with terror, lost it, when he came to engage those Macedonians, against whom he made it the business of his life to excite enemies and raise armies. Philip, so wise in his designs, so cool in the execution of them, could not behold this success without transports. When the news of Philip's death reached Athens, Demosthenes put on a garland and appeared publicly in pomp, though his daughter was but just dead. He did that for the death of Philip, which Philip had done for the political death of Athens; both were mad from the same motive, and both, if either, were excusable alike (35). It is indeed alledged in favour of Philip, that his senses were overcome with wine; but methinks the joy of his victory might intoxicate him sufficiently. He had good sense enough to foresee that he should fight no more battles against Greeks; that this victory would establish the pre-eminence of Macedon, and leave him at liberty to pursue those vast designs he had formed. But if all that has been said will not wipe off the stain of his intemperance on this occasion, his future conduct ought to obliterate it; he buried the Athenians who fell in the battle honourably, and on all occasions afterwards acknowledged them to be the bravest and politest people in Greece. Nay, he was wont to do justice to the merit of Demosthenes, at whom, when some of his courtiers were railing, Let the man speak freely, said Philip, since he is not in our pay, though we would gladly give him a larger appointment than to any of our household (36). At another time, speaking of the different kinds of eloquence, Isocrates, said he, fences with a foil, but Demosthenes with a sword (37). 'Tis plain, that if Philip had vices and follies, he had also many good qualities and much good sense.

and loaded him with benefits ever after. His converſation, Diodorus tells us, gave Philip ſo high a reliſh of the Athenian civility, that he diſmiſſed all his priſoners. But when they afterwards demanded their baggage, though he granted their requeſt, he could not help ſaying, Theſe men, I believe, do not think we fought in earneſt [t]. The reflection of Polybius on this act of clemency ought ever to accompany its recital, ſince it is no leſs honourable to its author, than the act itſelf was to Philip. By this, ſays that polite Grecian, he gained a ſecond victory more glorious than the former; for, whereas at Cheronæa he triumphed only over ſuch Athenians as oppoſed him, he now vanquiſhed the whole city [u]. He carried his moderation ſtill farther; for he concluded a peace with Athens on their own terms, and leaving a good garriſon in Thebes did the reſt of the Bœotians no manner of hurt.

The conſequences of this victory.

THUS Philip of Macedon, with an army of thirty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, effected what Xerxes with his millions attempted in vain. He attained by one victory the ſovereignty of Greece, though it coſt the Greeks many to eſtabliſh its liberty. He did not indeed diſturb his countrymen, with the rattling of their chains; but when there was a neceſſity, he did not ſpare to ſhew them that he was, and would be, their maſter. The Athenians in the mean time acted as they were wont, that is, violently and beyond all bounds of reaſon. They cried up the virtue of Demoſthenes to the ſtars, they inveighed loudly againſt ſuch as had any ſhare in betraying Greece, and interred thoſe who were ſlain at Cheronæa at the public expence. Demoſthenes publiſhed their virtues in a funeral oration, and, if we may be allowed to expreſs our ſentiments in a metaphor, they ſhewed by the ſolemnity of its interment what a high value they ſet upon their liberty [w]. The reſt of the Greeks did not either ſo readily perceive, or did not think it prudent ſo publicly to lament, the chance which this expedition had made in their affairs; inſtead of deploring their ſervitude, they rejoiced in the lenity of their ſovereign, and ſeemed rather to regard the greatneſs of Philip as due to his merit, than acquired by his arts and arms.

Philip chosen generaliſſimo of the Greeks againſt the Perſians.

We are now to behold the king of Macedon in a new light; hitherto we have ſeen him ſtruggling with his neighbours, courting the Athenians, and practiſing as the times required with the other ſtates of Greece. He was now lord of all, and the uſe he made of his power was to convoke a general aſſembly of the Greeks, wherein he was recognized generaliſſimo, and with full power appointed their leader againſt the Perſians. Having by virtue of his authority ſettled a general peace amongſt them, and appointed the quota which each of the ſtates ſhould furniſh for the war, he diſmiſſed them, and returning into Macedon began to make great preparations for this new expedition; an expedition which, beſide the antient hatred of the Greeks toward the barbarians, occaſioned by the injuries received from them, he coloured with a new pretence relating particularly to himſelf, viz. the aſſiſtance given by the Perſian to the cities of Perinthus, and Byzantium [x].

The motives which encouraged Philip to invade Aſia.

From the very time that Xerxes invaded Greece, its inhabitants had projected a return of his viſit, not in a piratical way, by making deſcents on his ſea-coaſts, for that they did immediately after they had driven him back into Aſia [y]; but with a view of making an abſolute conqueſt of his dominions, or at leaſt ſo much of them as might ſuit them beſt; of this we have ſeen already, that one of the Spartan kings had ſome thought, and actually gave ear to a plan laid before him for that purpoſe [z]. One of his ſucceſſors, Ageſilaus, carried it ſtill farther, and with an inconſiderable army gave law to the lieutenants of the great king. It is true, Ageſilaus did not openly profeſs a deſign of conquering the whole empire. But that he really intended no leſs may be gathered from his affecting to ſacrifice in the ſame manner with Agamemnon, when he went upon his expedition, and his reply to one who called the Perſian emperor, as the Greeks were wont, the great king. In what, ſaid Ageſilaus, is he greater than I, if he be not braver or better? His ſacrificing ſhewed, that he meant to emulate Agamemnon, who did not harraſs but ſubvert Troy; and his apophthegm, that he deſired to make make himſelf equal to him who was called the great king [a]. Jaſon of Theſſaly is thought to have been meditating the ſame thing when his thread of life was abruptly cut off through a domeſtic conſpiracy [b]. Philip ſeemed to have entered upon this momentous conqueſt with more probable and auſpicious hopes; he was by common conſent elected general of Greece, and he had ſo effectually humbled the Grecians, that he had reaſon to expect they would obey him; he had beſides a numerous, well-diſciplined, and victorious army, and, which might be juſtly reckoned his peculiar felicity, able and faithful miniſters, and brave and experienced officers: At the head of the former ſtood Antipater, whoſe character might have taken up a page, if his maſter had not ſummed it up in a line; having riſen later than uſual one morning, he ſaid, rubbing his eyes at his levee, I ſlept ſoundly to day, for I knew Antipater was waking [c]. This was an eulogium worthy of the prince and of his miniſter; yet Alexander deſcribed him better, when it was obſerved to him, that all his lieutenants except Antipater wore purple, true, ſaid he, but Antipater is all purple within [d]. In ſhort, he was a man of prodigious abilities, but made no diſplay of them. And as his maſter rightly depicted him, was alike aſpiring in his thoughts, and humble in his manners. Parmenio was of another caſt, Philip, the beſt judge in Greece, had pronounced him the only general he ever met with [e]. Parmenio returned his maſter's compliments upon another occaſion, in a manner which ſhewed the penetration of a ſtateſman and the frankneſs of a ſoldier. The embaſſadors of the Grecian ſtates expreſſed ſome uneaſineſs, that Philip came not out earlier in the morning. Be quiet, gentlemen, ſaid Parmenio, for while you ſlept he was waking. Antipater would have thought this, but only Parmenio would have ſaid it, who as he conceived juſtly is remarkably famous for ſpeaking freely, which under Philip procured him the higheſt honours, under Alexander a violent death; ſuch was the ſtate of things in Greece and in the court of Philip, when he projected the conqueſt of Aſia [f] (K).

How great ſoever he appeared there, how happy ſoever he might be here; in his family, he was not only uneaſy but the Perſian empire. It may not, however be amiſs to put the reader in mind, that the Perſians, by their fooliſh attempt to conquer Greece, had firſt inſpired the Greeks with a thirſt of conquering them, and by their ſubſequent proceedings cheriſhed and kept up that deſire, either through want of foreſight, or from a fatal neceſſity. We do not mean by this any inevitable deſtiny, but ſuch a neceſſity as is the conſtant attendant on imprudence and luxury. When governors, either through want of thought, or, which is often the caſe, from a wrong turn of thought, ſuffer thoſe of whom they have the care to ſink into all the exceſſes of debauchery, they muſt not expect from theſe weak and effeminate men either generous thoughts, or gallant actions. When a people become ſlaves to their luſts, they are in the faireſt train imaginable of becoming ſlaves to their neighbours. Politicians may for a time indeed ward off the blow; but how? Why, by making uſe of mercenary troops. Thus the cowardly ſpendthrift pays a bully to fight his quarrels, and when he pays him no longer is beaten by him himſelf. This was the fate of the Perſians; they hired Greek troops, maintained them in the exerciſe of their diſcipline, made them perfectly acquainted with their country and their manners, ſuffered them to ſee and to conſider thoſe errors in their government, which made it in ſpight of its grandeur appear contemptible; and then thoſe very Greeks, on their return home, were continually prompting their countrymen to go and pull down that empire whoſe weight ſcarce permitted it to ſtand. If the Perſian emperors had always encouraged feuds in Greece, the Greeks could never have turned their arms upon them; for, we ſee, that till one ſtate ſubdued the reſt, an expedition into Aſia might be talked of, but could not be executed. Inſtead of this the neceſſity I before-mentioned compelled the Perſian to compoſe the quarrels of the Grecians, that they might furniſh him with troops. Peace enervated the Greeks, the facility of recruiting their mercenaries made the Perſians neglect all martial diſcipline. In the mean time Philip, bleſſed with an excellent education, exerciſed with early troubles, endued with invincible fortitude, and as full of reſtleſs ambition, raiſed the nation he governed from an indigent and dependent ſtate to be firſt the terror of its neighbours, then the miſtreſs of Greece, laſt of all a match for Perſia. On this foundation ſtands the fame of Philip; theſe were the cauſes of his being in a condition to paſs into Aſia; and theſe the ſources of that weakneſs and inability to reſiſt, which afterwards appeared in the Perſian adminiſtration (37).

but miſerable. His wife Olympias was the daughter of Neoptolemus, brother of Arymbas, king of Epirus, whom Philip raiſed to a participation in the kingdom; his ſon Alexander, by the favour of the ſame monarch, was raiſed to the ſole poſſeſſion of the throne to the prejudice of Æacidas the ſon of Arymbas; all which teſtifies how great a ſhare Olympias once had in the affection of her huſband. She was a woman of a high ſpirit, great abilities, a fine addreſs, much cunning, and has been terribly wronged, if ſhe had not more intrigues than that with Jupiter, to which Alexander ſought to aſcribe his birth [g]. The reader muſt remember, that Philip in his letter to the Athenians, ſpeaks with great heat of their ſeizing his herald, taking from him his letters, and reading them in a public aſſembly; in which, if they ſhewed their diſreſpect to Philip, they ſhewed at the ſame time a high regard to Olympias, to whom they ſent a packet of letters taken at the ſame time without preſuming to open them [h]. How this lady embroiled herſelf with her huſband might be ſomewhat myſterious even in thoſe days; at preſent it is impoſſible to give a very diſtinct account of it. Whatever it was, the king was ſo extremely offended with her, that he proceeded to a repudiation, and married Cleopatra the niece of Attalus [i]. This conduct of his, added to ſome other ſlights, either real or ſo conceived, inſpired Alexander with a warm diſkike of his father; and as young princes have ſeldom prudence enough to conceal their reſentments, he gave evident tokens of it, inſomuch that the whole court knew and obſerved it. An accident happened which put all things into a flame. At the nuptual feaſt, Attalus, the young queen's uncle, was ſo unpolite as to tell the king in the hearing of his ſon, that his Macedonians hoped he would give them now a lawful heir to the throne. Alexander in the heat of his reſentment cried out, What then, raſcal, do you take me for a baſtard? And, while he ſpoke, threw a flaggon at his head. Attalus returned the compliment in the ſame way, and the king extremely provoked at this diſturbance, drew his ſword, and, forgetting that he was a cripple, haſtily made towards his ſon; but in his paſſage fell down, which gave the courtiers time to get between them. Alexander riſing up, and forgetting that he to whom he ſpoke was both his father and his prince, had the aſſurance to ſay in quit-quitting the room, the Macedonians are likely to conquer Asia, when led out of Europe by a prince who cannot go from one table to another, without hazarding his neck. He rightly conjectured, that it would not, after this, be proper for him to remain in Macedon, where his father Philip was both revered and beloved; he therefore retired with his mother into Epirus [k] (L).

(L) Philip's greatest fault was his pronenes to feasting and flattery. If we may believe a certain author, he made one of his flatterers, whose name was Thrasidæus, king in Thessaly, merely because he had a happy way of making his compliments. Neoptolemus, the Athenian poet, was at once his favourite and the chief manager of his affairs in that city. At this time of day a poet would be thought a very indifferent agent in politics; but it was quite otherwise at Athens. That writer knew how to manage the people so well, that he gave umbrage to Demosthenes, who failed not to raise a spirit of persecution against him, which constrained the poet to retire to Macedon, where he was extremely well received by Philip and became the darling of the whole court (38). When his Affairs required it, the king was patient, abstemious, and attentive to every thing; when they allowed of relaxation, he made great entertainments, drank hard, and talked very freely with his friends. It would have been well if nothing worse than freedom had mingled in his feasts; but, it is said, they were pollutted with every kind of vice, and all the various debaucheries, which the most sensual wits could devise (39); yet it must be allowed, that, in his graver moments, Philip saw the folly of this, and reflected severely enough on the inequality of his own conduct. He would often say, That he was obliged to Messieurs the speech-makers of Athens for pointing out his faults, and thereby giving him an opportunity to amend them (40). Indeed he always heard reproofs, not only with patience, but with pleasure, and shewed, upon every occasion, a strong inclination to reward such as put him upon doing right. Once at a public sale of captives, a poor man, approaching the tribunal, whispered in his ear, Sir, it would be more decent if you let your robe fall lower. Here, cried Philip, set me this man at liberty; I did not know he was my friend (41). The regard we owe to truth obliges us to record these things.

A little after theſe diſturbances at court, Damaratus the Corinthian, who had been Philip's hoſt, and who lived with him, not only in the ſtricteſt friendſhip, but with the greateſt familiarity, came to make him a viſit. When the firſt compliments were over, Philip aſked him, If all things were quiet in Greece? You have reaſon, Sir, returned he, to trouble yourſelf about the peace of Greece; you who have filled your own family with noiſe and diſſenſion [l]. The king, who, tho' he liked flattery, loved truth, received this reproof as kindly as it was meant, immediately made up the breach between himſelf and his ſon, and thereby recalled Alexander to court. It is not clear, whether the king of Epirus engaged heartily in his ſiſter's quarrel or not. In all probability he temporized with Philip, who in a ſhort time after gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, with an intent, it is likely, to preſerve all things in quiet during his abſence. It is time now to return to public affairs. Philip recalls his ſon.

As Philip piqued himſelf on bearing the character of a religious prince, he ſent deputies to conſult the oracle at Delphi as to the ſucceſs of the Perſian war. Pythia returned for anſwer a ſingle line in verſe, in Engliſh thus; Prepares for the war in Perſia.

The oxe's deſtin'd head now wreaths inthral,
To ſlaughter doom'd, and quickly ſhall he fall.

The king, when he received this reſponſe, immediately conjectured, that it portended his leading the Perſian king as a victim to the Grecian gods [m]. But when the event ſhewed that he was miſtaken, others held that to be clearly pointed out, which had been utterly unſuſpected before (M). Attalus and Parmenio, who with an excellent corps of

(M) There is no ſubject that hath been oftener treated, and remains yet leſs clear, than this of oracles and their reſponſes. Some, ſtruck with particular inſtances of the correſpondence between their anſwers and the events which followed them, have been led to confeſs, that there were in them undeniable marks of ſupernatural aſſiſtance (42). Others, fixing their eyes on the many inſtances of doubtful, and even falſe, reſponſes which are recorded in hiſtory, have attributed the whole to prieſt-

of troops were detached to open the war, had orders given them to ſet the Grecian cities at liberty; for how much ſoever Philip might be eſteemed a tyrant at Athens, he affected to paſs for a lover of liberty at home, requiring that as a juſt reſpect from others, which the Athenians called a ſlaviſh ſubmiſſion. Without queſtion the Greek cities, whoſe inhabitants had ſo readily libelled him, when Phocion forced him to raiſe the ſieges of Perinthus and Byzantium, were now as ready to load him with panegyrics, ſince they were entirely at his mercy, the Athenians having it neither in their power nor their will to afford them now any kind of aſſiſtance; on the contrary, Athens herſelf at this time ſought to ſooth the victor, and began, with the reſt of Greece, to philippize, as Demoſthenes emphatically called it. Indeed Philip had been very kind to them, giving up the places they ſo much deſired in Eubœa, and removing, as far as was conſiſtent with his own ſafety, whatever might be grievous to them, or afford them apprehenſions. They ſeemed alſo to be highly pleaſed with the prieſtcraft, and have excluded the devil's having any further ſhare in the anſwers of the oracles, than he may claim as the patron of fraud and the father of lies (43). We do not pretend to unravel in a note a knot twiſted by ſo many volumes; on the contrary, we ſhall confine ourſelves to the reſponſe mentioned in the text, and ſhall propoſe to the learned ſome difficulties which have occurred to us, and which, we cannot think, can be reſolved by either of theſe ſyſtems. Philip, had been, in a particular manner, the protector of the temple at Delphi; if therefore any dæmon delighted in the worſhip offered to him there, why did not he give this royal friend of his a fairer caution? Or, if the oracle was a mere engine of prieſtcraft, and as Demoſthenes alledged, had by this time learned to philippize, how came he to give ſuch a reſponſe, as particularly enough pointed out, not only Philip's ſudden death, but the very manner of it? It ſhould ſeem, that a verſe might eaſily have been contrived to have ſpoke the future ſucceſs of Philip, without wearing that cloudy aſpect, which was evident in the verſe delivered. We ſhall enter no farther into this matter here; but when we come to ſpeak expreſly of the methods in uſe among the Greeks for penetrating into the myſteries of providence, we ſhall ſhew, that Chance was chiefly relied on in theſe caſes, and that the clearneſs in ſome inſtances, the doubtfulneſs in others, and the falſehood in many, reſulted entirely from hence, and from nothing elſe.

(43) Van. Dale, Fontenelle, &c.

the expedition he was about to take, and ſent their deputies to compliment him upon that occaſion. The reſt of the Grecian ſtates did the ſame thing; ſo that Philip had now need of a ſecond monitor. He had already appointed one of his pages to ſalute him every morning with this ſober compliment, Philip, remember thou art a mortal; a caution, which, as we ſhall ſee, he forgot long before night, being in himſelf much addicted to pleaſure, tho' when it was neceſſary, no one was more indefatigable in buſineſs. Amongſt the reſt of his cares, that of making his family eaſy gave him a good deal of concern. He had not only a young wife, whom he had lately married, but ſeveral concubines alſo, by whom he had children. Alexander was very jealous of theſe, and Philip no leſs uneaſy at his jealouſy; he ſought, however, to ſooth him; and when the prince would ſometimes break out into harſh expreſſions, Philip would ſay, Be patient, my ſon, and let my having other children engage you to act in ſuch a manner, as that the preference I give you may appear the effect of your own merit, rather than of my choice (N). To quiet

(N) It may be juſtly ſaid, that Philip was a better father than Alexander proved a ſon. As ſoon as the young man was capable of inſtruction in the ſciences, Philip put him under the care of Ariſtotle, from whom, ſuch was that monarch's modeſty, he was contented to receive leſſons in government himſelf. The king formed the deſign of educating his ſon thus on his very birth. Here is his letter to Ariſtotle on the occaſion, alike conciſe and inimitable; "You are to know I have a "ſon, I thank the gods for it; not ſo much for that they "have given me one, as that he is born co-temporary with Ari"ſtotle. I promiſe myſelf from your care, he will become wor"thy of ſucceeding us and of ruling Macedon (44)". We have given ſome inſtances of his care of that young prince's perſon, of his concern for his reputation at the battle of Cheronæa, and of his deſire to infuſe into him noble and heroic principles. To theſe let us add, that tho' Philip, as a politician, had a great opinion of the force of gold, and was wont to ſay, that no city was impregnable, through the gates of which an aſs laden with that metal could paſs, tho' he was addicted to the retaining penſioners in every ſtate, and alſo laviſh of his money to domeſtic flatterers, yet he checked this humour as ſoon as he perceived it in his ſon. He wrote him a letter on the ſubject, full of excellent philoſophy: "How came you, young man, ſaid he "to quiet alſo the relations and friends of Olympias, the king of Macedon thought it neceſſary to celebrate, in a public and ſplendid manner, the marriage between her brother Alexander and his daughter Cleopatra. He accordingly appointed Ægæ for the place wherein this ſolemnity ſhould be performed, and alſo ſignified, that there, for the laſt time, he would regale the Greek embaſſadors, before he marched into Aſia. The concourſe on this occaſion was prodigious, not only the Macedonians, but all the Grecian ſtates, ſtriving to outvie each other in expreſſions of zeal and friendſhip, towards Philip and his government. Amongſt the reſt the Athenians, always ingenious in flattery, ſent him a gold crown, which when preſented by their miniſter, he alſo declared, that if any plotter of treaſon againſt Philip ſhould, for the future, endeavour to ſhelter himſelf in Athens, he ſhould immediately be delivered up. The king was mightily pleaſed with this, and no leſs delighted with a dramatic entertainment compoſed by Neoptolemus the Athenian, a famous tragic poet and highly in Philip's favour. The title of this piece was Cinyras; and it was intended to repreſent the king as having already triumphed over the Perſian; and made himſelf lord of Aſia. The following lines repreſenting the pride of thoſe antient enemies of Greece, particularly affected Philip, inſomuch, that he cauſed them to be more than once repeated.

Your tow'ring hopes above heav'n's concave ſtray,
O'er all the globe of earth you ſeek to ſway;
Palace to palace join, and madly vain,
Think that no bounds ſhould life or land reſtrain.

Alas!

" to reaſon ſo wretchedly with yourſelf, as to fancy thoſe will
" ſerve you faithfully, whom daily you corrupt with money!
" Do you this, that the Macedonians may hereafter take you,
" not for their king, but for their ſteward or pay-maſter!
" If you diſcharge theſe offices well, you muſt make but a piti" ful prince. They are ſpoiled who take gifts, by being taught
" thereby a habit of taking (45)". Thus, as a father, he endeavoured to eradicate thoſe vices, which he practiſed and boaſted of as a prince. Perhaps he thought them lawful, or at leaſt more excuſeable, when done from political motives, than when ſpringing from an idle inclination of waſting and throwing away.

(45) Cicero de Offic. l. ii.

Alas! that lot, which ye wou'd far remove,
With haſty ſtep your conſtancy ſhall prove.
Secure in thought, a ſtroke doth now impend,
Which to extended views ſhall give an end;
Sudden and ſure it falls, nor ſhall your pow'r defend *.

The correſpondence between the reſponſe of the oracle and this prediction of the poet gave Philip an unuſual confidence, and ſpread an air of joy and ſatisfaction through the greateſt part of his court. Some, it is ſaid, there were, who ſuffered themſelves to doubt of theſe omens; they thought the anſwer of the oracle equivocal; they held the compliment of the Athenian embaſſador portentive of ſome ſecret conſpiracy; they conceived thoſe lines, which ſo much moved the king, deſcriptive, not ſo much of the Perſian ſtate, as of his own. Whether theſe conjectures were made before the king's death is a little uncertain; if they were, certain it is, that they were well grounded; for a plot there was againſt the king's life, a plot as dark in its circumſtances as in its nature. We are indebted to Diodorus for the fulleſt account of it; and from him therefore we ſhall take it (O).

(O) We have different accounts of the manner in which Pauſanias was injured. Some ſay, that Attalus himſelf abuſed him at the feaſt, and afterwards proſtituted him to the reſt of the gueſts. However it was, Attalus without queſtion was much to blame, and ſo alſo was Philip, in not doing juſtice upon the complaint of Pauſanias. On another occaſion he ſhewed himſelf remiſs in the ſame way, and was recalled to his duty by the quick anſwer of a poor woman. She had offered him a petition ſeveral times, and as often been told, that he had no leiſure to hear her. At laſt, ſtung with this ill uſage, ſhe could not forbear replying, If you have not leiſure to do juſtice, be no longer a king. The propriety of this reproof was at that time ſo viſible to Philip, that he immediately heard her complaint, and redreſſed it. Happy had it been for this monarch, if the good woman's logic had made a deeper impreſſion on his heart. Certain it is, that a politician could not have made a nicer diſtinction than this," that a denial

Pauſanias conſpires againſt him.

THERE were in the court of Macedon two young men of quality of the ſame name, viz. Pauſanias. One of theſe was in great favour with the king, who treated him with ſuch indulgence and familiarity, that it began to be ſuſpected the king's inclination for him tranſgreſſed both the bounds of reaſon and of nature. This had reached the ear of the other Pauſanias, who, having frequent quarrels with the favourite, was wont, by way of reproach, to call him "either ſex". The lad, ſtung with this terrible outrage, addreſſed himſelf to Attalus one of the king's friends, and whoſe niece Cleopatra he afterwards married, ſhewing him how he had been inſulted, and wiſhing for ſome opportunity to wipe off the ſtain. Some time after this, in a general engagement againſt the Illyrians, this Pauſanias fighting near the king, and perceiving that the enemy directed againſt him a ſhower of arrows, threw himſelf before his maſter, and received them into his own body, falling immediately afterwards dead upon the ſpot. The extraordinary courage of the youth, his fidelity, and the manner of his death, made him much ſpoken of. Attalus thought fit to inform the king of the cauſe from whence the young man grew deſperate; he alſo took it into his head to revenge him upon the other Pauſanias; which he did in a manner alike cruel and deteſtable. He invited him to an entertainment, and having taken care to drink him down, he expoſed him, when void of ſenſe, to the luſt of his grooms, who abuſed him according to their beaſtly appetites. Pauſanias, who was an Oreſtian by birth, and had all the haughtineſs natural to his countrymen, applied himſelf frequently to the king, paſſionately

"of juſtice is an abdication of magiſtracy" (46). At other times Philip was more ſtrict, and would not ſacrifice his duty to his paſſions. His courtiers once preſſed him vehemently to interpoſe in favour of a man who was on the point of being condemned; and they gave this reaſon for it, becauſe, if judgment went againſt him, all the world would decry him. Very well, ſaid Philip, I had rather the world ſhould decry him than me (47). Attalus, it ſeems, had a better intereſt than this man; but his intereſt coſt Philip dear. His death, however, ought to be a leſſon to princes, and teach them, that injuſtice begets injuſtice; which therefore they ſhould be afraid to commit, becauſe it is the only means by which themſelves can ſuffer.

(46) Plut. in Apophthegm. (47) Plut. ubi ſupra.

paſſionately demanding juſtice againſt Attalus. That monarch, always partial to his friends, and eſpecially to the uncle of his young wife, put him off with good words; and, in order to make him forget his diſgrace, made him captain of his guards. Herein he greatly miſtook the temper of Pauſanias, who was not to be wrought upon by ſuch methods. Inſtead of growing eaſier he became more impatient, and, from hating Attalus, began more grievouſly to hate the king. It happened, while he was in this ſullen diſpoſition, that converſing one day with Hermocrates the ſophiſt, he put to him this queſtion, What muſt he do who would be famous? He muſt, replied Hemocrates kill him who has done the greateſt things; for when the fame of him whom he ſlew ſhall make him often remembered, that remembrance will of courſe lead to the mention of him who ſlew him. Pauſanias, after meditating ſome time longer on his own wrongs and the ſophiſt's advice, came at laſt to a reſolution of killing the king, in hopes thereby of reſtoring that reputation which Attalus had taken away from him; a ſtrange reſolution this! and a ſtrong teſtimony of the weakneſs of human reaſon, both in the ſage and in his diſciple! A bad reſolution is always eaſier executed than amended. Pauſanias, having directed horſes to be placed for him at the gates of the city, contrived within himſelf how to diſpatch Philip, and afterwards how to preſerve himſelf. Theſe things buſied his mind, while the king was taken up with the ſolemnities of which we have before given an account. We come now to the accompliſhment of Pauſanias's plot, and the laſt ſcene of the king's life [n].

Philip murdered. Year after the flood 2633. Year before Chriſt 366.

THE next day, after the open audience of the embaſſadors of Greece, Philip went in ſtate to the theatre, where certain ſhews were to be exhibited in honour of his daughter's marriage. All the ſeats were early taken up, and the ſhews began with a ſplendid proceſſion, wherein the images of the twelve ſuperior deities of Greece were carried, as alſo the image of Philip, habited in like manner, as if he made up the thirteenth. At this the people, who, as their humour takes them, readily make a man either a god or a devil, ſhouted aloud. Then came Philip alone, in a white robe, crowned, his guards at a conſiderable diſtance, that the Greeks might ſee he placed his ſafety not in them, but in the loyalty of the people. Pauſanias had fixed himſelf by the door of the theatre, and, obſerving that all things fell out as he had foreſeen they would, took his opportunity, when the king drew near him, to draw his ſword from under his garment, and plunging it into his left ſide, laid him dead at his feet. He then fled as faſt as his feet could carry him to the place where his horſes were, and had eſcaped, if the twig of a vine had not catched his ſhoe, and thrown him down. This gave Attalus, Perdiccas, and Leonatus, who purſued him, time to come up with him. Perdiccas threw himſelf on the aſſaſſin firſt, and wounded him with his ſword, and then the reſt put an end quickly to his life [o]. Thus fell this great prince by the hand of his own ſubject, not without ſtrong ſuſpicions, that Olympias and Alexander were not altogether ignorant of his death, being about forty-ſeven years of age, and having reigned twenty-four (P).

(P) The deaths of kings, eſpecially when violent, are uſually attended with myſterious circumſtances. From the account given above, it ſeems, as if Pauſanias had, out of a mad pique, murdered his ſovereign, without conſulting any but his paſſions, and the ſophiſt Hermocrates indirectly; yet as we have hinted above, ſuſpicions have not been wanting, that tho' the arm of Pauſanias diſpatched Philip, yet it received the direction from other minds than his own. If this had been only a flying rumour, or the ſuggeſtion of a ſingle or ſuſpicious hiſtorian, it would not have deſerved a place here; but the fact is otherwiſe, and we ſhall ſhew ſome indubitable authorities, that Philip loſt his life by a conſpiracy, and not merely from the malice of Pauſanias. Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, judged to be in truth the ſon of Philip, who was the boſom confident of Alexander, and afterwards king of Egypt, wrote the hiſtory of Alexander's reign. From this hiſtory Arrian chiefly took his; and in his hiſtory we have a letter from Alexander to Darius, wherein the former, ſetting forth the cauſes of the war, hath theſe remarkable words; My father was ſlain by traitors whom you had hired for that purpoſe, as you have publicly boaſted in your letters (48). The fact is now clearly eſtabliſhed, that a conſpiracy there was, which wrought the death of

(48) Arrian. l. ii. c. xiv.

We ought now, according to the eſtabliſhed method of hiſtorians, to enter into the character of this monarch, whoſe actions and whoſe death we have recorded; but we have already taken ſo many opportunities of illuſtrating the recital of events during his reign, by manifeſting their motives and conſequences, not from conjecture, or to gratify of Philip. We can alſo name ſome of the conſpirators, viz. the ſons of Æropus the Lynceſthean, Alexander, Amyntas, Heromenes, and Arrabæus (49). Of theſe Amyntas fled to Darius, and actually fought againſt Alexander at the battle of Iſſus. As to the ſuſpicion which fell on Alexander, it ſeems to have taken riſe from two cauſes; the firſt, his embroiling himſelf with his father on account of his mother Olympias, which we have heretofore mentioned. This quarrel, it ſeems, went ſo far, that ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who were deep in Alexander's intereſt, were forced to quit Macedon, and durſt not return till after the death of Philip; particularly Harpalus, Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, Nearchus, and Erigyus and Laomedon brothers (50); all of which were in high favour with Alexander afterwards. The ſecond cauſe of ſuſpicion reſulted from Alexander's behaviour after his father's death; for notwithſtanding Amyntas the ſon of Æropus fled into Aſia, and it was known that himſelf and his brethren were in the conſpiracy againſt the king, yet he not only pardoned Alexander one of the brothers, on the ſlight pretence that he was the firſt who ſaluted him king, but made him afterwards general of his horſe; which had well nigh proved fatal to him; for, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, Alexander conſpired againſt him too, and ſought to deprive him at once both of life and kingdom. There is one circumſtance more that deſerves mention on this ſubject; and it is this. Alexander, when he viſited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, enquired of the oracle, If all his father's murderers had been puniſhed (51)? To which the oracle anſwered in the affirmative; but as every body knows there was no credit given to what paſſed at this interview, this queſtion recoils upon him who put it; the rather, becauſe if the oracle really made that anſwer, it was certainly falſe, Alexander the ſon of Æropus, who was a confederate in that buſineſs, being at that time alive. There is this, however, to be ſaid for the oracle, that Alexander alone conſulted it, and, in juſtification of his own character, might report what anſwers he pleaſed (52).

tify a partiality which too frequently grows on writers, in favour of thoſe of whom they write, but to render the narration clear; that on this account therefore we have the leſs to ſay here, and ſhall content ourſelves with a very ſhort portrait of this glorious prince, of whom it may be reckoned his peculiar felicity, that he has been always moſt admired by the moſt knowing. Philip of Macedon then was in the cabinet by very much the moſt ſagacious prince of his time. He had a perfect idea of the ſtate of his own country, the condition of Greece, and the weakneſs of the Perſian empire. He was ſecret, without affecting cloſeneſs; eloquent, without being either ready to ſpeak or vain of ſpeaking; obliging in his deportment as a king, and yet never departing from the king in any act of complaiſance. In the field he was in all things a complete general, an expert engineer, and an indefatigable ſoldier. He ſtudied war as an art, and acted as cooly in an engagement, as if he had been only attending to a praxis on the leſſons he had given his ſoldiers. His diſcipline was ſtrict, but without ſeverity, which he effected by treating all who ſerved under him with familiarity; whereby he convinced them of the neceſſity of order, which he exacted not more for his own ſervice than for their ſafety. He was not ſo much the commander in the camp, as the father of thoſe who were in it, the meaneſt of whom he treated upon all occaſions with the endearing titles of comrade and fellow-ſoldier. If a private man diſtinguiſhed himſelf, Philip perſonally praiſed and rewarded him; if he grew old, he provided for him; if he fell in the field, he was interred with honour, and his family taken care of. In private life there was no man more affable, chearful, or kinder to his friends than Philip. He was himſelf learned, and a great patron and lover of learning. He eſteemed wit in an enemy, and rewarded it amply in thoſe who profeſſed their reſpect for him. With theſe ſhining qualities he had ſome very dark ones. His ambition had no bounds; his treaties always gave way to his intereſt. He was the moſt finiſhed diſſembler of his time; he treated ſuch as oppoſed his deſigns with great ſeverity, when they fell into his hands. He was greatly addicted to women; and yet was ſuſpected of a luſt too foul to name. He would drink immoderately, took delight in flattery, was ſurrounded with pimps, panders, buffoons, pantomimes, and all that rabble of paraſitical vulturs, which gnaw the bowels of the people through the

the folly of their prince. To ſum up all, he was a great man, but had great vices (Q).

(Q) Throughout the whole of this life and reign of Philip, we have followed no direct guide, tho' ſuch an one we might have had in Theopompus, who wrote fifty books upon this ſubject, all of which have been ſwallowed up by time. Some fragments indeed there are remaining, preſerved by ſuch authors as were happy enough to have peruſed his accurate work. It may ſeem ſtrange, that Plutarch, who was ſo induſtrious in preſerving the ſtories, and vindicating the characters, of the Grecian heroes, ſhould altogether neglect Philip's; but for this an excellent French critic has accounted thus: "I doubt whether A-"lexander can be compared to Cæſar, notwithſtanding that com-"pariſon has been generally received, or univerſally maintained. "Neither the unanimous agreement of the antients and moderns "upon this ſubject, nor my unwillingneſs to be ſingular in an "opinion, can hinder me from thinking, that this compariſon is "built upon a wrong principle. I believe there will appear "greater reſemblance between Philip and Cæſar, at leaſt if we "ground it upon their manners and characters, rather than "their ſucceſſes. Philip perhaps had no place in the lives of "Plutarch, becauſe that hiſtorian, pre-poſſeſſed in favour of his "own nation, wanted the conqueror of Aſia to oppoſe to him "of Rome; and foreſaw very well, that, in the eyes of the "multitude, the moſt illuſtrious of the Romans, maſter of an "empire that laboured under its own weight, would be too "great a match for a Macedonian, who acted in a narrow ſphere, "and whoſe conqueſts had no other theatre than the adjacent "parts of a petty kingdom. At firſt glance indeed there ſeems a "reſemblance in every thing between Cæſar and Alexander; the "extent of their conqueſts, their valour, activity, vigilance, and "that ſublimity of ſoul, which made them ſenſible that they de-"ſerved to command the reſt of mankind, together with an "imperious paſſion that would let them endure no ſuperior; but "made them look on the world as their inheritance. But when "we come to examine them at leiſure, trace them from their "cradles, ſtudy their inclinations, obſerve their proceedings and "their progreſſes, we ſhall find this reſemblance to diminiſh or "fall to nothing (52)." However, Plutarch in other treatiſes, Diodorus Siculus in his moſt learned, comprehenſive, and excellent work, Pauſanias in his ſurvey of Greece, Polyænus in his ſtratagems, with many other Greek writers and not a few of the Latins,

And progeny. BEFORE we conclude this chapter, it will be neceſſary to ſpeak of the offspring of Philip. By Olympias he had Alexander his ſucceſſor, and Cleopatra, who married her uncle Alexander king of Epirus. By an Illyrian lady, whoſe name was Audaca, he had a daughter named Cyna, who was married to Amyntas the lawful heir of the Macedonian crown, being the ſon of Perdiccas Philip's elder brother. By Nicaſipolis, a Theſſalian lady, he had Nicæa, who became afterwards the wife of Caſſander. By Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, he had a ſon named Caranus and a daughter Europa, both ſlain by Olympias, the laſt in her mother's arms. Arſinoe one of his miſtreſſes he gave in marriage to Lagus, when ſhe was big with child; which child proved a ſon, and was the famous Ptolemy king of Egypt. By Philena of Lariſſa, a dancer, he had Aridæus, who for a while was titular king of Macedon; but afterwards put to death by the cruel Olympias [p] (R). If Philip Latins, have recorded enough to ſhew, that Philip was indeed the greateſt man of his age. And with reſpect to his ſon, Cicero has given ſuch a judgment, as, we believe, none of the critics will reverſe. Philip of Macedon, ſays he, in deeds and glory was ſurpaſſed by his ſon; but, in point of diſpoſition and humanity, he ſeems to me to have ſurpaſſed him (53).

(R) Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, is by Arrian called Eurydice (54). There are alſo ſome variations, in reſpect to the reſt of the proper names, to be met with in antient authors; but theſe, as they occur in the ſubſequent part of our work, we ſhall take notice of, without troubling the reader with a long critical detail here. However, it may not be amiſs to take notice of ſome other princes of the blood of Macedon. Amyntas was the ſon of Perdiccas, the ſon of Amyntas, Philip's father. Archælaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, were the natural ſons of the ſame Amyntas king of Macedon, by his concubine Cygnæa. There were beſides ſeveral ſons of Æropus, brethren of Pauſanias, from whom Amyntas the father of Philip took the kingdom (55). We do not find, that Philip, in his life-time, either was uneaſy, or had any occaſion to be uneaſy, about theſe princes; but we ſhall ſee, that it fared otherwiſe with his ſucceſſor.

lip had not fallen ſo ſuddenly, he would certainly have provided for the ſafety of theſe unhappy branches of his family; whereas, by his unforeſeen death, they fell under the power of their greateſt enemies; yet did they not immediately periſh, the veneration the Macedonians had for Philip defending them. But by degrees, when the glory of Alexander had in ſome meaſure ſwallowed up that of his father, and again the miſeries, which the Macedonians endured, had withdrawn their affection from the royal houſe, they fell apace, as will be ſeen in the ſubſequent part of this hiſtory; whence the propriety of treating ſo fully of the life and actions of Philip, as we have done, will clearly appear.

ſor. The truth is, Philip was ſo kind to his people, and put them into ſo different a ſtate from that in which he found them, that they could not avoid loving and admiring him. Whoever would ſee this placed in the ſtrongeſt light, need only turn his eyes on a ſpeech of Alexander's recorded by Arrian. It was otherwiſe with this ſon of his, who, great and glorious as he was, found it enough to do to keep the Macedonians and Greeks in obedience. In the very dawn of his reign he was vexed with conſpiracies, and was never out of the fear of them during his life, tho' he did not ſpare very rigorous and cruel executions; a fault with which none can charge his father, whoſe conduct was ſo full of clemency, that he was accountable for no man's death except his own.

SECT. V.

The reign of Alexander the Great.

THE new-erected empire of Macedon ſo formidable to the Greeks and ſo dreadful to the Perſians, did not change its fortune with its prince; on the contrary, it ſeemed to reap new advantages therefrom, and to derive from the vigour of Alexander that exalted grandeur, of which it was rendered capable thro' the policy of Philip. How this came to paſs, how ſo violent a ſhock went off without diſordering the government; how a prince of twenty years old became truly the father of his country; how he ſo readily took up, and ſo happily conducted the the thread of his father's deſign, without weakening or breaking it; and all this in ſpite of violent and obſtinate oppoſition, leads us to the view of Alexander's character at this time, on which the underſtanding of theſe paſſages entirely depends. This we ſhall draw from ſober and authentic hiſtorians, leaving whatever favours of the wonderful to thoſe rhetorical declaimers, who love to amaze their readers, and to illuſtrate with a pomp of words ſtories altogether incredible [a].

The natural capacity of the Macedonian prince was every way ſuited to ſuſtain the mighty fabric, which his father intended to raiſe thereon. It was lively, but not flight; ſolid, without being intractable; and tho' capable of judging by its own lights, inquiſitive and fond of converſation. When the Perſian embaſſadors were at the court of Philip, Alexander, then a perfect boy, entertained them with much civility and politeneſs; but, inſtead of aſking queſtions about the hanging gardens, the ſplendid palaces, the vaſt retinue of the king, or other marks of grandeur, for which the Perſian court was famous, he enquired about the road leading into the Upper Aſia, the forces which the great king could raiſe, their diſcipline, and the place in which the king took poſt when his army drew into the line of battle [b]. This admirable genius was cultivated by an excellent education. Philip was a lover of letters, as ſome think, to a fault; but this hindred not his regarding other things neceſſary, as well as learning, to the forming of a prince. Alexander had therefore all ſorts of maſters, according as his years and improvements required them. Leonidas, who was his mother's relation, a man of ſevere morals and of a very exact behaviour, was his governor; Lyſimachus the Acarnanian, a man of very moderate abilities, his præceptor; and Ariſtotle when he was grown old enough to receive his inſtructions, became not only his tutor in reſpect of literature, but his maſter alſo in reſpect of politics, which gave that wonderful perfection to his acquirements, which remain as unequal as his conqueſts. In his exerciſes he diſtinguiſhed the uſeful from the fanciful, in his diverſions he declined whatever was unmanly, in his ſtudies deſpiſed alike whatever was trifling or pedantic. He diligently cultivated tivated what may be ſtiled the art of ſpeaking with dignity, or the rhetoric of kings, in which none ever exceeded him. He applied himſelf to metaphyſics and natural philoſophy; but morality eſpecially pleaſed him, and the knowledge of the duties which are eſſential to ſocial life. In order to underſtand theſe he ſtudied Homer, Ariſtotle having corrected an edition of that poet's works for his uſe. This ſtudy made him the man he was; nor can any thing more truly ſpeak his character than this ſhort ſentence, Alexander was a hero formed on the principles Homer hath laid down. Taking this as a key, we may eaſily decypher the actions of this prince, or rather trace them to their ſource; but we muſt have a care of thinking, that the ſublimity of the verſe, the beauty of the compoſition, the ſurprizing majeſty of the poet's thoughts, captivated the mind of Alexander, and inclined him to doat upon this poem. On the contrary his extraordinary regard for it was owing to the recommendation of Ariſtotle, who taught him the true merit of the piece. Homer's poems in ſuch hands were a complete body of divinity, morality and politics, delivered not in dry diſcourſes, but ſet forth in ſtrong, moving, and moſt natural characters; and ſo they were afterwards conſidered by the learned, particularly by Horace, who prefers them to the labours of all the philoſophers [c]. Such were the foundations of Alexander's magnanimity and prudence. They were continually ſtrengthened by the converſation of the ableſt men in Philip's court, and the ſuperſtructure carefully and quickly raiſed by a happy mixture of theory and practice. The turbulent tranſactions in the midſt of Philip's reign ſerved as a ſchool of war to Alexander, as the laſt years of peace afforded an opportunity of teaching him true policy and the intereſts of Greece. Above all he was happy in the indulgence of a father, the greateſt ſtateſman and the greateſt captain of his age. He it was who caſt his eyes on Ariſtotle for the tutor of Alexander; he it was who taught the youth to execute what the philoſopher laid down; and he it was who excited the Macedonians to turn their eyes on this riſing ſun, whom, in Philip's life-time, they began to ſtile their king, allowing his father only the title of their general. Philip himſelf carried the compliment ſtill ſtill higher; for embracing Alexander, who ſhewed more ſkill than all the grooms in Greece in breaking Bucephalus; O! my ſon, ſaid he, look thee out ſome kingdom as extenſive as thy abilities; Macedonia will be too narrow for them. From a perſon thus accompliſhed all things were to be hoped; we may now therefore proceed to ſhew how he accompliſhed all things, and gave laws to Greece, at a time of life when modern princes are ſcarce held of age to govern themſelves [d] (A).

The firſt act of Alexander, as a king, was doing juſtice on his father's murderers, it may be from a double motive, of ſhewing affection to Philip's memory, which he always honoured, and to wipe away the imputation of being concerned in it, which was not eaſily done, if we credit Plutarch. Next he turned his attention to matters of ſtate, which in a moment were all in confuſion. As ſoon as the neighbouring nations heard of the death of Philip, they conceived themſelves intitled to liberty, and began to think of
